
Concert Review

Rain Fails To Dampen Concertgoers' Spirits

BY MARTHA deB. BEAVER

It couldn't have been a wetter setting for the start of the sixth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox.

But the 3,585 brave souls who ventured forth were more than compensated. Their prolonged and thunderous ovation for Bohemian conductor Karel Ancerl showed it. Even their sloshing leavetaking had an air of pleasurable gaiety, with many of the female members removing shoes and wading forth in bare feet to reach their cars. It was a practical gesture, of course.

The evening (Friday) was devoted to the Bohemian composer Smetana's grand and glorious Symphonic Poem Cycle, "Ma Vlast," (My Land), a unique satisfaction seldom experienced. My father remembers hearing Toscanini conduct it in New York many years ago, and again, four or five years ago, in Vienna. (This last was corroborated by a young friend who sat next to an elderly gentleman who recalled the same performance). The second poem, "The Moldau" is well-known and popularly played, along with the fourth "From the Fields and Woods of Bohemia."

Fortunately for music-lovers everywhere, the birth of the symphonic poem (Liszt introduced it) and the dawn of nationalism in music occurred almost simultaneously. Even more fortunate in the immediate present was having Ancerl, native Bohemian, lead us through Smetana's nationally conceived work, lovingly presenting those incredible native rhythms in their astonishing variety, all the vigor and beauty of Bohemia's ancient legends, romantic hills and plains, its villages, and the famous Moldau conjuring water-nymphs and hunting-horns, coursing through the valleys, growing from a forest brook into a mighty stream. Ancerl brought it all forth vividly and expansively through the constant and responsive efforts of the Boston Symphony members, whose attention couldn't waver for an instant, so endlessly does the music flow and weave, like the river, but with a power and strength that sustains both players and listener.

The workings are continuously fascinating and absorbing . . . remembered is the beauty of the clarinet and cello parts in the lyric third poem, a story of love and vengeance. Intermission came at this point, and with the resumption of the cycle, the threatening storm. But not before those grand fugal coursings through all the string sections and finally the winds, in "From the fields and woods of Bohemia," with low moans of thunder insinuating and finally obliterated against a background of rain. All was brought to a stunning finality with sheets of rain and sheets of unison thematic sound.

Of the two final poems, Tabor and Blanik, Smetana noted their relationship . . . "the first gray in coloring (nonetheless strong and stirring, ending on notes of unyielding faith) but I wanted it so . . . Blanik is a continuation . . . (a three-note theme ending Tabor carries into Blanik without pause, in marvelous invention) . . . after their defeat the Hussite heroes hide in Blanik hill and wait . . . for the moment when they are to come to the aid of their country . . ." Tabor's theme on the Chorale "Ye, who are warriors of God," serves as the basis of the resurrection of the Czech nation, its future happiness and glory . . . and with this victorious hymn in the form of a march, the composition and thus the whole cycle is ended . . . (a great roll of drums marks the last)

We understand that last season Ancerl was also given an ovation (this was just before the invasion of Prague) but evidently not as fervent or long-standing as Friday's after "My Land." The relatively small audience made up in enthusiasm what many more had not, so far this season, produced for any other conductor.

The Tanglewood authorities certainly know a sure thing for their box office, which any music organization must need and woo. Van Cliburn is just that, and proved it by drawing 11,316 devotees to his Saturday night's performance of Brahms' First Piano Concerto in D minor op. 15.

There were few moments of real rapture most pianists envision with Brahms, but Cliburn manifested maturity in his approach to the concerto and in personal mannerisms, the latter very much under control. The Adagio was too heavily articulated for this reviewer's taste, and with little lyricism. Resonance glistened occasionally, but not with real warmth. Technique is certainly developed and assured, as always. We found the last movement the most pleasing in style and projection.

Again this was Erich Leinsdorf's only weekend concert. He opened with Kurt Weill's Suite from "The Threepenny Opera for wind orchestra," happily played with a variety of moods inherent in the score, but at the time we wondered "why here?" and never did find out. Light and gay, yes. And a real contrast with Debussy's Nocturnes which followed.

For a more complete integration, Leinsdorf disposed the Sirens (Women of the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus) among the players, and achieved an excellent effect. In fact, the whole series, Clouds, Festivals and Sirens was displayed with the utmost graphic clarity. It was roundly appreciated by the listeners, in an aura of balmy air and starry night.

We attended the Saturday morning rehearsal in lieu of Sunday's concert, to hear Josef Krips conduct, and a joy it was. The familiar strains of Haydn's Surprise Symphony issued forth with an ebullience that is often lacking in the usual performance. And a stirring picture of poor Til Eulenspiegel (Strauss) evolved with few pauses for Krips' specific instructions. We heard just two movements of the Schubert Symphony in C 'The Great' but if the delineation of the final two was as significant as the first, Sunday's concert should have been outstanding. It's a lengthy symphony, and not always appreciated.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 15 1969 New England

RAVENA NEWS HERALD
Friday, August 8, 1969

Van Cliburn At Tanglewood

The sixth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins this Friday evening, August 8 at 9 p. m., when Karel Ancerl, Music Director of the Toronto Symphony, conducts the complete tone-poem cycle, "Ma Vlast" (My Country), by the Czechoslovakian composer, Bendrick Smetana.

The following evening, Saturday, August 9 at 8 p. m. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts Brahms' Piano concerto no. 1 with Van Cliburn as soloist. The remainder of the program includes Debussy's 'Three Nocturnes' with the Women of the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir and Kurt Weill's "Suite From the Threepenny Opera.

On Sunday afternoon, August 10 at 2:30 p. m., Josef Krips, renowned Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, conducts Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel and Schubert's Symphony no. 9.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday, August 8 at 7 p. m., one of the short concerts presented each week for ticket holders for the 9 p. m. concert, features the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, an ensemble made up of the principals of the Orchestra and guest artists, playing music by Blacher and Thuille.

Tanglewood Audience Stirred By Program of Czech Music

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — "Ma Vlast" is exciting music, even for those who don't know why it exists or what its special meanings are.

Czech Patriotism

It is colorful and full of variety. It is a fervent declaration of Czech patriotism composed between 1874 and 1879 by Smetana It made up the wsole program at Tanglewood Friday night.

Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Karel Ancerl. He was guest conductor of the Czech philharmonic last year and was in the United States when Russia invaded his country. He elected to stay and will become conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra next year.

The large work, "Ma Vlast," which translates to "My Fatherland," is seldom heard wholly. It consists of six programmatic symphonic poems which dramatize Bohemia's history, legends countryside and attitudes.

Audience Enthusiastic

Best known of the six in this country is the second, "Mildau." The first is about the ancient castle-home of Bohemian kings, the third about a legendary Amazon, the fourth about Bohemia's fields and woods, the fifth and sixth about the fortress and mountain where Hussite warriors live.

They are, in sequence, 10, 13, nine, 12, seven and 15 minutes long.

Ancerl led the Boston players through them with loving care and received an especially enthusiastic response from the 3585 listeners. Perhaps the audience had a high percentage of Czechs.

Relaxed Direction

Ancerl is a slender man whose silver hair adds to his air of elegance. He used a wide-sweeping motion to inform the players of his wishes and presented an attitude of easy benevolence and relaxed fluidity rather than one of precision.

The music of "Ma Vlast" is fully and brightly orchestrated, is full of folk tune, dances and marches, visions of ruddy, chubby cheeks, bright eyes, swirling dirndl skirts quick tempers, and sudden smiles.

It is soothing and exciting, placid and stormy like the Lenox weather which began the concert benignly and broke into a thunderstorm during the second half.

It is often like the music so popular with the Boston Pops audiences and it drew plenty of applause Friday.

Prelude Program

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players were given responsibility for the weekend prelude program at 7 and they came up with a trio for trumpet, trombone and piano by Boris Blancher, Opus 31, and a sextet for piano and wood wind quintet by Ludwig Thuille, Opus 6.

The trio is a light, salty, spicy, perky piece of about 12 minutes which includes moments of soft trombone a la Tommy Dorsey, piano dirge a la Chopin and big band jazziness of, say, 1940 as well as coltish, contemporary, serious dissonance.

The Thuille piece (28 minutes) is a symphonic, late-19th century work of sweet, limpid lyricism and lush orchestration. . . only occasionally beautiful, often pretty and sometimes saccharine ensemble music.

Last summer they played at Tanglewood every Sunday morning. I wish they would again.

Tonight Van Cliburn is scheduled to play the solo part of Brahms' First Piano Concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 9 1969 New England

tanglewood

Ancerl evokes homeland

by Rodney N. Myrvaagnes

Friday night, August 8, at Tanglewood, was an orgy (in the WHRB sense) of Czech nationalism. Karel Ancerl conducted Smetana's cycle of six tone poems, "Ma Vlast" (My Country) which were germinal pieces in his effort to develop a Czech national style of composition. While one might, after a century, question the point of such an effort, he must be counted successful on his own terms, sonically at least. The orchestral colors as he uses them sound like none of his associate and the effect of his or Dvorak's music is readilly identified as Czech even if the piece is unfamiliar.

Within this stylistic framework, these tone poems share much with "pictorial" tone poems of other composers. There are, for example, printed words on the score to tell you what extramusical ideas (scenery, battles, storms, etc.) are supposed to be conjured up. These may be helpful to the conductor, and are essential to a listener who wants the references, as they are never self-evident. One might easily think for instance, that the rapids at St. John's in the Moldau (which is a river), is a storm scene, but as such it would be greatly inferior to Beethoven or Rossini.

Mr. Ancerl's performance suggested an emphasis on musical coherence, rather than literal rendering of the pictorial matters, and he succeeded admirably. The orchestra was easily up to all demands and everything held together until a violent thunderstorm (real) wrecked the quieter parts of the last two pieces. The conclusion was a loud, accelerated company which brought the small but enthusiastic audience t oits feet.

Earlier in the evening the Weekend Prelude was given by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players with Gilbert Kalish, piano. Both pieces were unfamiliar. The first, trio for trumpet, trombone and piano, by Boris Blacher, incorporated seven short movements using various combinations of solo and accompaniment, which displayed the skills of Messrs. Ghitalla and Gibson to great advantage. The music had some resemblance to "L'Histoire du Soldat" but had a much greater affinity for the big band jazz styles of the thirties, and as such, needed far more swing than it got. One found oneself wishing for Newton Wayland at times, whose hammed up approach might be just what this piece needs.

The Ludwig Thuille sextet for wind quintet and piano is a late 19th century piece bearing casual resemblance to Shumann at times. As with the Blacher, it is a display piece which passes the solo around from part to part. The players were all in good shape except for Mrs. Doriot A. Dwyer, whose tone was so breathy as to obscure what she was playing.

Boston After Dark
8-20-69

Concert Review

Rain Fails To Dampen Concertgoers' Spirits

BY MARTHA deB. BEAVER

It couldn't have been a wetter setting for the start of the sixth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox. But the 3,585 brave souls who ventured forth were more than compensated. Their prolonged and thunderous ovation for Bohemian conductor Karel Ancerl showed it. Even their sloshing leavetaking had an air of pleasurable gaiety, with many of the female members removing shoes and wading forth in bare feet to reach their cars. It was a practical gesture, of course.

The evening (Friday) was devoted to the Bohemian composer Smetana's grand and glorious Symphonic Poem Cycle, "Ma Vlast," (My Land), a unique satisfaction seldom experienced. My father remembers hearing Toscanini conduct it in New York many years ago, and again, four or five years ago, in Vienna. (This last was corroborated by a young friend who sat next to an elderly gentleman who recalled the same performance). The second poem, "The Moldau" is well-known and popularly played, along with the fourth "From the Fields and Woods of Bohemia."

Fortunately for music-lovers everywhere, the birth of the symphonic poem (Liszt introduced it) and the dawn of nationalism in music occurred almost simultaneously. Even more fortunate in the immediate present was having Ancerl, native Bohemian, lead us through Smetana's nationally conceived work, lovingly presenting those incredible native rhythms in their astonishing variety, all the vigor and beauty of Bohemia's ancient legends, romantic hills and plains, its villages, and the famous Moldau conjuring water-nymphs and hunting-horns, coursing through the valleys, growing from a forest brook into a mighty stream. Ancerl brought it all forth vividly and expansively through the constant and responsive efforts of the Boston Symphony members, whose attention couldn't waver for an instant, so endlessly does the music flow and weave, like the river, but with a power and strength that sustains both players and listener.

The workings are continuously fascinating and absorbing ... remembered is the beauty of the clarinet and cello parts in the lyric third poem, a story of love and vengeance. Intermission came at this point, and with the resumption of the cycle, the threatening storm. But not before those grand fugal coursings through all the string sections and finally the winds, in "From the fields and woods of Bohemia" with low moans of thunder insinuating and finally obliterated against a background of rain. All was brought to a stunning finality with sheets of rain and sheets of unison thematic sound.

Of the two final poems, Tabor and Blanik, Smetana noted their relationship ... "the first gray in coloring (nonetheless strong and stirring, ending on notes of unyielding faith) but I wanted it so ... Blanik is a continuation ... (a three-note theme ending Tabor carries into Blanik without pause, in marvelous invention) ... after their defeat the Hussite heroes hide in Blanik hill and wait ... for the moment when they are to come to the aid of their country ..." Tabor's theme on the Chorale "Ye, who are warriors of God," serves as the basis of the resurrection of the Czech nation, its future happiness and glory ... and with this victorious hymn in the form of a march, the composition and thus the whole cycle is ended ... (a great roll of drums marks the last)

We understand that last season Ancerl was also given an ovation (this was just before the invasion of Prague) but evidently not as fervent or long-standing as Friday's after "My Land." The relatively small audience made up in enthusiasm what many more had not, so far this season, produced for any other conductor.

The Tanglewood authorities certainly know a sure thing for their box office, which any music organization must need and woo. Van Cliburn is just that, and proved it by drawing 11,316 devotees to his Saturday night's performance of Brahms' First Piano Concerto in D minor op. 15.

There were few moments of real rapture most pianists envision with Brahms, but Cliburn manifested maturity in his approach to the concerto and in personal mannerisms, the latter very much under control. The Adagio was too heavily articulated for this reviewer's taste, and with little lyricism. Resonance glistened occasionally, but not with real warmth. Technique is certainly developed and assured, as always. We found the last movement the most pleasing in style and projection.

Again this was Erich Leinsdorf's only weekend concert. He opened with Kurt Weill's Suite from "The Threepenny Opera for wind orchestra," happily played with a variety of moods inherent in the score, but at the time we wondered "why here?" and never did find out. Light and gay, yes. And a real contrast with Debussy's Nocturnes which followed.

For a more complete integration, Leinsdorf disposed the Sirens (Women of the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus) among the players, and achieved an excellent effect. In fact, the whole series, Clouds, Festivals and Sirens was displayed with the utmost graphic clarity. It was roundly appreciated by the listeners, in an aura of balmy air and starry night.

We attended the Saturday morning rehearsal in lieu of Sunday's concert, to hear Josef Krips conduct, and a joy it was. The familiar strains of Haydn's Surprise Symphony issued forth with an ebullience that is often lacking in the usual performance. And a stirring picture of poor Til Eulenspiegel (Strauss) evolved with few pauses for Krips' specific instructions. We heard just two movements of the Schubert Symphony in C 'The Great' but if the delineation of the final two was as significant as the first, Sunday's concert should have been outstanding. It's a lengthy symphony, and not always appreciated.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(S) 14,900

AUG 15 1969 New England

RAVENA NEWS HERALD
Friday, August 8, 1969

Van Cliburn At Tanglewood

The sixth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins this Friday evening, August 8 at 9 p. m., when Karel Ancerl, Music Director of the Toronto Symphony, conducts the complete tone-poem cycle, "Ma Vlast" (My Country), by the Czechoslovakian composer, Bendrick Smetana.

The following evening, Saturday, August 9 at 8 p. m., Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, NB conducts Brahms' Piano concerto no. 1 with Van Cliburn as soloist. The remainder of the program includes Debussy's 'Three Nocturnes' with the Women of the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir and Kurt Weill's "Suite From the Threepenny Opera.

On Sunday afternoon, August 10 at 2:30 p. m., Josef Krips, renowned Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, conducts Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel and Schubert's Symphony no. 9.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday, August 8 at 7 p. m., one of the short concerts presented each week for ticket holders for the 9 p. m. concert, features the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, an ensemble made up of the principals of the Orchestra and guest artists, playing music by Blacher and Thuille.

64.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 11 1969

New England

Music Review

Van Cliburn Draws 11,316 at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

IN THE ONE RESPITE the weather granted from its six-week relentless, damp-to-drench domination, the attendance jumped to a seasonal peak of 11,316 for the Saturday night program at Tanglewood. That was the concert at which Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony's musical director, sandwiched himself between the weekend's two conducting guests to play the Brahms D Minor Piano Concerto with Van Cliburn as soloist, all three of the Debussy nocturnes and a novelty to Tanglewood, a suite for wind instruments from Kurt Weill's "Three Penny Opera."

* * *

CLIBURN DELIGHTED his immense public. He is now quite a way beyond his sensational prizewinner days, and when stacked against some of the youths who have been piano soloists already this season at the Berkshire Music Festival, he must sooner or later enter the lists of veterans. Indeed, he has gained in poise and maturity over the years.

His deportment at the keyboard during the long orchestral introduction of his concerto was exemplary in dignity. Would that more soloists, young and old, do likewise! And he proved that the work was transparent to him.

Audiences get carried away sometimes at ends of exciting movements and instead of observing the unwritten law of no applause until the end break out into uninhibited approval. Cliburn would have held his appreciation of their reactions in abeyance until the final note, but Leinsdorf treated him as he had treated the more youthful Watts and Zukerman and pushed him forward to bow. The result is embarrassing to the soloists and a bit gratuitous to the "elder statesman" Cliburn. The ensuing "Alphonse and Gaston" maneuvers backstage at the recalls, too, get to be a bit like the high school dramatic society's antics.

* * *

THERE CAN BE few more gratifying works in the repertory for a conductor than the Debussy nocturnes. The classics, within reason, could be played without central control but the nocturnes are but malleable clay. When an orchestra of the Boston caliber, therefore, has as astute a baton before them as Leinsdorf's, there can be a sort of euphoria under such a spell. The women of the Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Chorus, trained by Charles Wilson, added the sublime ingredient which Debussy's inspiration induced him to utilize. The voices are not assigned a text but simply a tonal "voice" within the orchestral congeries, intoning variations of "ah."

Leinsdorf introduced a suite for wind instruments from "Three Penny Opera," a Tanglewood first. The ballad opera, a collaboration between Weill and librettist Bertolt Brecht, takes off from John Gay's "Beggar's Opera."

Gay, an exact contemporary of Bach and Handel, also had a burlesque disdain for the establishment. His own couplet which serves as his epitaph in Westminster Abbey, "Life is a jest and all things show it; I thought so once, and now I know it," most succinctly exposes his sense of satire and caricature. Gay's opera was produced by a man named Rich and was very successful. It was said to have made "Rich gay and Gay rich."

The Weill version Saturday night is deliciously and intentionally vulgar and it was high fun. Nothing more.

* * *

THERE ARE no computation tables for patriotism and so it is difficult to compare the Czechs' love of their country with that of citizens of other nations. Possibly the intensity of love of country can be measured by the strength and struggles its citizens have exerted to maintain it against invaders—military, political, religious—and of the heartless brutality of aristocratic and feudal domination. It is against such a background that the world is ready to concede the claim of the Czechs for the transcendent magnetism of their country for its natives.

It is necessary hastily to recall this setting before hearing Bedrich (Frederick) Smetana's suite of tone-poems, "Ma Vlast" (My Land), and further to know why the guest conductor Friday night, Karel Ancerl, a native of Bohemia, in addition to his skill as leader, could direct it with such authenticity, insight and affection.

* * *

THERE ARE six chapters in "My Land," each a self-sufficient composition, but they fit into a unified mosaic by the choice of subjects, natural, traditional and of epic heroics. Two of the tone-poems, "The Moldau," the river which Prague straddles, and "From the woods and fields of Bohemia," are on orchestral programs frequently, but the suite in its entirety is rare.

Despite the weather which decimated the attendance, the ovation tendered Ancerl was one of the most vociferous and sustained of Tanglewood memory.

The first half of the program was hardly disturbed, but the celestial tympani, not disciplined by any terrestrial baton, invaded the otherwise plaintive mood of "Bohemia's field" just as the muted strings, high up on their chanterelles, were starting to utter a simple fugal statement. Ancerl heroically ignored the ensuing competition but before resuming "Tabor," the "Fortress of the Hussite Warriors," he resigned to superior elements and waited out the most violent discharges of heavenly artillery.

"Tabor" is one of the most interestingly constructed episodes of the suite. It has an anapestic short idiom which is developed in a canonic sequence and which is never quite abandoned in the entire unfolding of the majestic legend.

* * *

YESTERDAY afternoon Josef Krips was allotted a return engagement after his impressive Tanglewood debut last summer. He read vitality into the Haydn Symphony No. 94 in G, called "The Surprise," and into the long C Major ("The Great") Symphony of Schubert, and he gave the orchestra the stimulus to do its noble best in the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel."

The weather early Sunday afternoon was a factor as it was Friday evening so that only the most hardy pioneers braved the unsheltered lawns. Yet the appreciation of both guest conductors was in no way tempered by the attendance figures.

Schubert has been said not so much to develop his themes as to exhaust them. The C Major Symphony in less competent hands can be unending, but Krips contrived to keep it varied and vigorous without letdown. This he accomplished by various means but mainly because he had a broad and overall conception of the work and was able to polish the many details and set them in place as in a jigsaw puzzle to present at the end a unified picture.

"Till" has never been more graphically portrayed. His escapades came to life as on a screen. The occasional near-just intonation of the brass in no way diminished the excitement of the performance. The orchestra, infused with infectious abandon by Krips' fearless but secure baton, rode hell for leather to exuberance until the epilogue, where the contrasting poignancy made everyone in the audience wish to reverse the penalty exacted of the young lad.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 11 1969

New England

Whitestone

BIGGEST AUDIENCE of the season, 11,316 in number, gave Van Cliburn a rousing ovation at the conclusion of his rendition of Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Saturday night. Rain kept audiences down Friday night and Sunday. (Review on Page 26.)

Monday, August 11, 1969

Van Cliburn Draws 10,000 to Tanglewood

By JAKE SHERMAN

The box office power of Van Cliburn was demonstrated once again Saturday night as the tall, curly-haired pianist made his annual summer guest appearance with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

The event drew well over 10,000 people to the grounds of the Berkshire music festival. They left nary a seat in the shed, turned the manicured lawn into a vari-colored pastiche of blankets and deck chairs and made life rather nightmarish for each other in Tanglewood's many parking lots.

AFTER HEARING Cliburn play Brahms' First Piano Concerto, however, few among them would probably claim that the evening had not been worth its more disagreeable aspects.

The Brahms work proves a suitable vehicle for Van Cliburn in that it gives him plenty of opportunity to display the pyrotechnical virtuosity for which he is known. Fortissimo flights of astonishing rapidity are something he does very well, and they invariably leave an audience dazzled.

His handling to the concerto's slow and delicate sections, however, was what distinguished the performance. Particularly in the gently fluid exposition of the adagio, he showed insight into Brahms, who never wore his passions on his sleeve but sought to house them in structures of nobility and dignity.

His playing meshed neatly with that of the orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf. With a soloist of the assurance and stamina of Van Cliburn, the conductor did not hesitate to draw from the musicians a performance of full sweep and power.

THE "NOCTURNES" of Debussy, which came second on the program, proved almost as well-received as the concerto. This lovely impressionist suite evokes first clouds, then a festival and finally the entrancing lament of the Sirens. The last part featured the women of the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus.

Kurt Weill's Suite from "The Threepenny Opera" provided an unusual opening. The original instrumentation, including banjo of tinny piano, is used to capture the music' cynicism and bittersweet flavor.

Those interested in catching Van Cliburn can do so this Saturday at Saratoga when the pianist joins the Philadelphia Orchestra for a performance of Chopin's First Piano Concerto.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

AUG 10 1969

At Tanglewood

11,318 Hear Older Van Cliburn Add Depth to Keyboard Style

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There were 11,318 listeners at Tanglewood Saturday night to hear Van Cliburn play the solo part of Brahms First Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

10 Years From Moscow

It has been more than 10 years since Cliburn came home from Moscow as a conquering hero with the first prize from the Moscow competition.

And he has ever since faced the problem of gradually living down his exuberant youthfulness. There never has been any doubt of his prodigious technique on the keyboard. His great long fingers can play anything with easy accuracy.

And his biggest reputation has been with the piano music of the expansive, grand manner—Tchaikovsky and Rachmaninoff.

Less Effort

But he has been playing such as Brahms for quite a while now. He played Brahms First Concerto at Tanglewood in 1964 and the second since then.

His increasing age is showing. There was greater depth of feeling Saturday and less sense of effort seeking it. Van Cliburn is becoming a pianist of greater worth and substance.

At the expense of sounding patronizing, it might even be said that he is playing more music while playng the pano as well as ever.

And his grand atmosphere is still there. He still sits very tall with a straight back and communicates a total commitment to the music.

Tckets to Van Cliburn performances are increasing in value.

The concert began with a rare tidbit very seldom heard — especially on a symphony orchestra stage — the eight-section suite drawn by Kurt Weill for his own amusement for his 1928 score for the "Threepenny Opera."

There were 20 instruments on the stage; a wind band including a couple of saxophones plus banjo, guitar, piano, timpani, xylophone, accordion and a set of jazz trap drums.

The music ranges from pure camp through harmonic structures worthy of avant guardists of 1969. There are ricky-tick novelties and acrid harmonies, a fox trot, a Charleston and a parody of Bach Chorale.

It is burlesque and satire — pure fun — and was interrupted by applause from a happy audience.

Contrast

The Debussy "Nocturn" which followed couldn't have offered more contrast. The three sections, "Clouds," "Festivals" and "Sirens, are scored for full symphony orchestra plus women's voices.

There were about 40 singers dispersed among the orchestra members so that their wordless vocalisms as enticing sirens were deeply embedded in the orchestral sound.

It was beautiful, liquid music, at least as satisfying in its way as the salty clowningness of the Weill tunes that preceded it and the dramatic vigor of the Brahms' concerto that followed.

Chamber Concert

The afternoon chamber music concert by the young participants in the Boston University Tanglewood Institute started at 1 and included music by Beethoven, Debussy, Eugene Bozza, Brahms and Jurriaan Andriessen.

The Debussy and Brahms music was for solo piano, and the Bozza and Andriessen pieces were for brass quintet and quartet. The program opened with the first movement of Beethoven's Opus 18 No. 4 string quartet.

It was a one-hour program in the chamber music hall and provided another opportunity to marvel at the musical excellence that can be reached by high-schoolers.

Those there this summer are bright, eager and polished instrumentalists. Their music is on the edge of maturity.

65

At the Concert

Traditional Music At Tanglewood

By MICHAL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — Josef Krips led the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood in a program which was traditional in the best sense of the word. The all-German concert included works by Haydn, Richard Strauss, and Schubert.

Mr. Krrips is Viennese by birth and training, but he has been active in the United States as music director of the San Francisco Symphony and as a conductor at the Metropolitan Opera. He also has guest-conducted such orchestras as the New York and Vienna Philharmonic, and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The program opened with Haydn's Symphony No. 94 in G ("Surprise"). The crashing orchestral chord which interrupts the hitherto quiet second movement is te source of the nickname. Mr. Kripps employed a reduced orchestra.

THE FIRST half of the program also included Strauss's tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Till is a German folk character whose many tricks and jokes finally cause him to be hanged.

The major work of the afternoon was Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C ("The Great"). "Great" is applicable in both a relative and an absolute sesne, for it distinguishes the Ninth from another smaller-scaled Schubert symphony in the same key, and calls attention to the work's majesty and epic proportions.

Mr. Krips is not a "wow" conductor and did not turn the music into a showcase for himself. However, all three works contain conductor's traps which he skillfully avoided.

THE SECOND movement of the Schubert is representative of these difficulties. It begins and ends lyrically, but builds to a central brass climax. Schubert indicates only one tempo for the entire movement, and it must be chosen so as neither to rush the quiet portions nor drag the dramatic ones. The brass climax itself must serve as the focal point of the movement, but it is scored for an early — rather than a late — romantic orchestra and so cannot be pushed too hard.

In this movement, as in all the works on the program, Mr. Krips' well-faced, carefully-integrated performances were highly satisfying.

The coming week at Tanglewood features three different conductors. Erich Leinsdorf will lead performances of Beethoven's "Eroica" and "Pastorale" symphonies on Friday night.

David Zinman conducts a Haydn-Bartok-Tchaikovsky program Saturday, and Sunday afternoon will mark the Tanglewood debut of Henry Lewis.

SIR JOSEPH KRIPPS

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144
AUG 11 1969

After-Breakfast Show
Monday, August 11, 1969

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 11 1969

At Tanglewood

Krips' Precision Conducting Brings Order to Strauss

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Josef Krips came to Tanglewood Sunday afternoon with a predictable concert. He was guest condctor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and led it through a standard (more or less) Germanic program with a traditionally Germanic (more or less) manner.

Exactness Sharp

Krips is a precisionist, known among a few unkind listeners as Herr Crisp. He insists on, and received from the able Bostonians Sunday, a performance of knife-like exactness.

But all the insistence in the world on instrumental precision can't expunge the underlying warmth of Papa Josef Haydn nor his musical grace, and the "surprise" symphony (No. 94), which opened the program, had moments of enchantment as well as fussiness.

The drill-team rigorousness was more useful with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," which followed, because that score is looser and freer and inattention to structural and rhythmical orderliness can result in shambles.

5421 Attend

Strauss' tone poem about the 16th-century knave and his "merry pranks" is a piece of orchestral brilliance and one of the most popular record sellers. It is music devoted to sonic entertainment. Krips' manner helped it.

Schubert's last symphony (The Great," No. 9) also handily survived Krips' emphasis on crystallin tidiness. It is aptly named, a masterpiece. Too bad the composer never heard it.

But there were 5421 at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon to hear it, a respectable number considering the dismal weather in the morning.

* * *

There were some nicely beautiful moments during the 10 a. m. chamber music program in the theater presented by various groups made up of Music Center fellows.

The best ones came during Beethoven's String Quartet Opus 18, No. 4 (played by a different group from that which played the first movement in the chamber music hall Saturday afternoon) and Dvorak's Quintet for Piano and Strings, Opus 81.

And there were some academically interesting moments during a couple of contemporary works — "Serenata" by Casella, a six-movement piece for violin, cello, clarinet, bassoon and trumpet — and "Variations for Four Drums and Viola" by Colgrass.

The drums in the Colgrass piece were small, all the same size and played by a variety of mallets and fingers which drew a wide range of tonal qualities —flat thumps, glowing bongs.

Especially intersting were the passages during which the tuned drums were used for melody while the viola contributed rhythm.

* * *

About 40 music critics will be at Tanglewood this week for the annual meeting of the National Critics Association; Tuesday night the Jefferson Airplane will do its thing in the great shed at 8; Friday Leinsdorf will conduct a Beethoven program; Saturday David Zinman will be guest conductor; Sunday afternoon Henry Lewis will be guest conductor with Marilyn Horne, soprano, as soloist; Sunday night Leinsdorf will conduct the music center vocal and instrumental forces in a concert performance of Berg's atonal opera, "Wozzeck."

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
AUG 14 1969
New England

FRIDAY — AUG. 8
By R.H.

Friday, Aug. 8, Karel Ancerl, who left his native Czechoslovakia last year after the Russian invasion, conducted the Boston Symphony in an all-Smetana program. It was a dull evening, except during the second half, when a heavy thunderstorm competed with Ancerl and won hands down.

Smetana's works are ethnography before they are music. Presumably they say something to Czechs, but to one not in the club there is little of interest. "Ma Vlast" (My Country) filled the first half of the program — a large work, but never great. The other offering of the evening was something having a title with a lot of diacritical marks that means "from Bohemia's fields and woods." But as I have already said, from Berkshire's skies came sounds more vociferous than those of the music. The only thing louder was the indiscriminate bravos from the fans. Tanglewood audiences are increasingly ridiculous. The atmosphere is that of a football game in a place like, let's say, Jericho, Long Island.

*****

SATURDAY, AUG. 9
By J.G.B.

One of the delightful things about Tanglewood is the variability: I gather that last night the weather conditions were unspeakable and the music all but inaudible; tonight was clear, calm, and cool, the audience attentive and polite by Tanglewood standards, and the music easily heard.

The program opened with Kurt Weill's "Suite from 'Kleine Dreigroschenmusik fur Blasorchester,'" a highfalutin way of saying "Hits from 'The Threepenny Opera.'" I was amused to note that the same excited buzz of recognition arose at Tanglewood as was heard in Symphony Hall last November when the familiar strains of "Mac the Knife" came through. The Debussy "Nocturnes" were performed in their entirety, with the women of the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus contributing to the rarely-heard "Sirenes" section. The ladies were distributed throughout the orchestra rather than massed at the rear, and the resulting sound was agreeable.

The concert ended with a rousing performance of the Brahms "Piano Concerto No. 1" with Van Cliburn as soloist. This is not my favorite piano concerto and, despite his fame, Cliburn is not my favorite pianist, but his approach tonight was honest and forthright, and he won fervent applause from his audience.

*****

SUNDAY — AUG. 10
By C.N.D.

At the end of the Tanglewood concert on Sunday afternoon Josef Krips, who conducted the Boston Symphony received an ovation not only from the audience but from the orchestra players as well. This was revealing because Boston Symphony players are notoriously critical about conductors and do not usually bestir themselves in homage to them. But Krips is something special. He is no glamor boy but how he knows his scores and how to conduct them. No wonder the players admire him. There are no mannerisms, the beat is clear, and the knowledge is vast. The music unfolds without rushing or dragging and the result is a performance perhaps without surprises but also without distortions which is completely satisfying.

The program itself was standard fare — Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel", and the long C major Symphony of Schubert. Words of praise have been exhausted for generations — even "Til Eulenspiegel" has nearly three-quarters of a century behind it — on all three of these works and it has all been said before; but the conclusion is obvious; a great orchestra, a first-rate conductor, and good program add up to a magnificent concert and so it was Sunday afternoon.

NASHOBA FREE PRESS
HARVARD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,700
AUG 7 1969
New England

Mass. Jordan Whitelaw is the Symphony Producer; William Pierce is the commentator.

WGBH-FM Presents The Boston Symphony

Guest conductors Josef Krips and Max Rudolf join the Boston Symphony Orchestra the week of August 10 when their concerts will be broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH Radio (89.7 FM).

On Sunday, August 10 at 2:30 p.m. Josef Krips leads the orchestra in Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss and Schubert's Symphony No. 9. The following Friday, August 15 at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf conducts an all-Beethoven program including the "Pastoral" and "Eroica" Symphonies.

For the final program of the week, Saturday, August 16 at 8 p.m. guest conductor Max Rudolf has selected Symphony No. 91 by Haydn, Dance Suite by Bartok and the "Pathetique" Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

All three concerts will be broadcast direct from the 1969 Berkshire Festival in Lenox, Mass. Jordan Whitelaw is the symphony producer; William Pierce is the commentator.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JUL 31 1969

B.S.O. BROADCASTS

Guest conductors Josef Krips and Max Rudolf join the Boston Symphony Orchestra the week of Aug. 10 when their concerts will be broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH Radio (89.7 FM). All three concerts will be broadcast direct from the 1969 Berkshire Festival in Lenox, Mass. Jordan Whitelaw is the symphony producer; William Pierce is the commentator.

Springfield Repub 8-10-'69

Josef Krips is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest conductor today at 2.30 p.m.

20,322 at Tanglewood Over the Weekend

LENOX — Tanglewood officials said today that concert attendance over the weekend totaled 20,322. There were 3,585 in attendance Friday night, 11,316 Saturday night and 5,421 Sunday.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 12 1969

PALO ALTO, CALIF.
TIMES
D. 44,500
AUG 12 1969

Cooley, Szabo selected by SF Symphony

As a result of recent open auditions, Floyd O. Cooley has been selected as principal tuba, and Robert Szabo has been chosen as principal trombone for the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

Cooley currently is performing at the Aspen Festival. Szabo performed with the orchestra last season as temporary replacement for a trombonist on a leave of absence.

Josef Krips, conductor and music director of the orchestra, flew in from Cleveland for the auditions, then went immediately to Tanglewood, where he will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The new members of the orchestra will join Maestro Krips when the San Francisco Symphony begins its 58th season on Dec. 3.

At the Concert

Traditional Music At Tanglewood

By MICHAL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — Josef Krips led the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood in a program which was traditional in the best sense of the word. The all-German concert included works by Haydn, Richard Strauss, and Schubert.

Mr. Krrips is Viennese by birth and training, but he has been active in the United States as music director of the San Francisco Symphony and as a conductor at the Metropolitan Opera. He also has guest-conducted such orchestras as the New York and Vienna Philharmonic, and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The program opened with Haydn's Symphony No. 94 in G ("Surprise"). The crashing orchestral chord which interrupts the hitherto quiet second movement is te source of the nickname. Mr. Kripps employed a reduced orchestra.

THE FIRST half of the program also included Strauss's tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Till is a German folk character whose many tricks and jokes finally cause him to be hanged.

The major work of the afternoon was Schubert's Symphony No. 9 in C ("The Great"). "Great" is applicable in both a relative and an absolute sesne, for it distinguishes the Ninth from another smaller-scaled Schubert symphony in the same key, and calls attention to the work's majesty and epic proportions.

Mr. Krips is not a "wow" conductor and did not turn the music into a showcase for himself. However, all three works contain conductor's traps which he skillfully avoided.

THE SECOND movement of the Schubert is representative of these difficulties. It begins and ends lyrically, but builds to a central brass climax. Schubert indicates only one tempo for the entire movement, and it must be chosen so as neither to rush the quiet portions nor drag the dramatic ones. The brass climax itself must serve as the focal point of the movement, but it is scored for an early — rather than a late — romantic orchestra and so cannot be pushed too hard.

In this movement, as in all the works on the program, Mr. Krips' well-faced, carefully-integrated performances were highly satisfying.

The coming week at Tanglewood features three different conductors. Erich Leinsdorf will lead performances of Beethoven's "Eroica" and "Pastorale" symphonies on Friday night.

David Zinman conducts a Haydn-Bartok-Tchaikovsky program Saturday, and Sunday afternoon will mark the Tanglewood debut of Henry Lewis.

SIR JOSEPH KRIPPS

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144

AUG 11 1969

Albany-Schenectady-Troy
Monday, August 11, 1969

NASHOBA FREE PRESS
HARVARD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,700

AUG 7 1969 New England

WGBH-FM Presents The Boston Symphony

Guest conductors Josef Krips and Max Rudolf join the Boston Symphony Orchestra the week of August 10 when their concerts will be broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH Radio (89.7 FM).

On Sunday, August 10 at 2:30 p.m. Josef Krips leads the orchestra in Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss and Schubert's Symphony No. 9. The following Friday, August 15 at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf conducts an all-Beethoven program including the "Pastoral" and "Eroica" Symphonies.

For the final program of the week, Saturday, August 16 at 8 p.m. guest conductor Max Rudolf has selected Symphony No. 91 by Haydn, Dance Suite by Bartok and the "Pathetique" Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

All three concerts will be broadcast direct from the 1969 Berkshire Festival in Lenox, Mass. Jordan Whitelaw is the Symphony Producer; William Pierce is the commentator.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 31 1969

B.S.O. BROADCASTS

Guest conductors Josef Krips and Max Rudolf join the Boston Symphony Orchestra the week of Aug. 10 when their concerts will be broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH Radio (89.7 FM). All three concerts will be broadcast direct from the 1969 Berkshire Festival in Lenox, Mass. Jordan Whitelaw is the symphony producer; William Pierce is the commentator.

Springfield Repub 8-10-69

Josef Krips is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest conductor today at 2:30 p.m.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 14 1969 New England

FRIDAY — AUG. 8
By R.H.

Friday, Aug. 8, Karel Ancerl, who left his native Czechoslovakia last year after the Russian invasion, conducted the Boston Symphony in an all-Smetana program. It was a dull evening, except during the second half, when a heavy thunderstorm competed with Ancerl and won hands down.

Smetana's works are ethnography before they are music. Presumably they say something to Czechs, but to one not in the club there is little of interest. "Ma Vlast" (My Country) filled the first half of the program — a large work, but never great. The other offering of the evening was something having a title with a lot of diacritical marks that means "from Bohemia's fields and woods." But as I have already said, from Berkshire's skies came sounds more vociferous than those of the music. The only thing louder was the indiscriminate bravos from the fans. Tanglewood audiences are increasingly ridiculous. The atmosphere is that of a football game in a place like, let's say, Jericho, Long Island.

*****

SATURDAY, AUG. 9
By J.G.B.

One of the delightful things about Tanglewood is the variability: I gather that last night the weather conditions were unspeakable and the music all but inaudible; tonight was clear, calm, and cool, the audience attentive and polite by Tanglewood standards, and the music easily heard.

The program opened with Kurt Weill's "Suite from 'Kleine Dreigroschenmusik fur Blasorchester,'" a highfalutin way of saying "Hits from 'The Threepenny Opera.'" I was amused to note that the same excited buzz of recognition arose at Tanglewood as was heard in Symphony Hall last November when the familiar strains of "Mac the Knife" came through. The Debussy "Nocturnes" were performed in their entirety, with the women of the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus contributing to the rarely-heard "Sirenes" section. The ladies were distributed throughout the orchestra rather than massed at the rear, and the resulting sound was agreeable.

The concert ended with a rousing performance of the Brahms "Piano Concerto No. 1" with Van Cliburn as soloist. This is not my favorite piano concerto and, despite his fame, Cliburn is not my favorite pianist, but his approach tonight was honest and forthright, and he won fervent applause from his audience.

*****

SUNDAY — AUG. 10
By C.N.D.

At the end of the Tanglewood concert on Sunday afternoon Josef Krips, who conducted the Boston Symphony received an ovation not only from the audience but from the orchestra players as well. This was revealing because Boston Symphony players are notoriously critical about conductors and do not usually bestir themselves in homage to them. But Krips is something special. He is no glamor boy but how he knows his scores and how to conduct them. No wonder the players admire him. There are no mannerisms, the beat is clear, and the knowledge is vast. The music unfolds without rushing or dragging and the result is a performance perhaps without surprises but also without distortions which is completely satisfying.

The program itself was standard fare — Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel", and the long C major Symphony of Schubert. Words of praise have been exhausted for generations — even "Til Eulenspiegel" has nearly three-quarters of a century behind it — on all three of these works and it has all been said before; but the conclusion is obvious; a great orchestra, a first-rate conductor, and good program add up to a magnificent concert and so it was Sunday afternoon.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 11 1969

At Tanglewood

Krips' Precision Conducting Brings Order to Strauss

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Josef Krips came to Tanglewood Sunday afternoon with a predictable concert. He was guest condctor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and led it through a standard (more or less) Germanic program with a traditionally Germanic (more or less) manner.

Exactness Sharp

Krips is a precisionist, known among a few unkind listeners as Herr Crisp. He insists on, and received from the able Bostonians Sunday, a performance of knife-like exactness.

But all the insistence in the world on instrumental precision can't expunge the underlying warmth of Papa Josef Haydn nor his musical grace, and the "surprise" symphony (No. 94), which opened the program, had moments of enchantment as well as fussiness.

The drill-team rigorousness was more useful with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," which followed, because that score is looser and freer and inattention to structural and rhythmical orderliness can result in shambles.

5421 Attend

Strauss' tone poem about the 16th-century knave and his "merry pranks" is a piece of orchestral brilliance and one of the most popular record sellers. It is music devoted to sonic entertainment. Krips' manner helped it.

Schubert's last symphony (The Great," No. 9) also handily survived Krips' emphasis on crystallin tidiness. It is aptly named, a masterpiece. Too bad the composer never heard it.

But there were 5421 at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon to hear it, a respectable number considering the dismal weather in the morning.

* * *

There were some nicely beautiful moments during the 10 a. m. chamber music program in the theater presented by various groups made up of Music Center fellows.

The best ones came during Beethoven's String Quartet Opus 18, No. 4 (played by a different group from that which played the first movement in the chamber music hall Saturday afternoon) and Dvorak's Quintet for Piano and Strings, Opus 81.

And there were some academically interesting moments during a couple of contemporary works — "Serenata" by Casella, a six-movement piece for violin, cello, clarinet, bassoon and trumpet — and "Variations for Four Drums and Viola" by Colgrass.

The drums in the Colgrass piece were small, all the same size and played by a variety of mallets and fingers which drew a wide range of tonal qualities —flat thumps, glowing bongs.

Especially intersting were the passages during which the tuned drums were used for melody while the viola contributed rhythm.

* * *

About 40 music critics will be at Tanglewood this week for the annual meeting of the National Critics Association; Tuesday night the Jefferson Airplane will do its thing in the great shed at 8; Friday Leinsdorf will conduct a Beethoven program; Saturday David Zinman will be guest conductor; Sunday afternoon Henry Lewis will be guest conductor with Marilyn Horne, soprano, as soloist; Sunday night Leinsdorf will conduct the music center vocal and instrumental forces in a concert performance of Berg's atonal opera, "Wozzeck."

20,322 at Tanglewood Over the Weekend

LENOX — Tanglewood officials said today that concert attendance over the weekend totaled 20,322. There were 3,585 in attendance Friday night, 11,316 Saturday night and 5,421 Sunday.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 12 1969

PALO ALTO, CALIF
TIMES
D. 44,500

AUG 12 1969

Cooley, Szabo selected by SF Symphony

As a result of recent open auditions, Floyd O. Cooley has been selected as principal tuba, and Robert Szabo has been chosen as principal trombone for the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

Cooley currently is performing at the Aspen Festival. Szabo performed with the orchestra last season as temporary replacement for a trombonist on a leave of absence.

Josef Krips, conductor and music director of the orchestra, flew in from Cleveland for the auditions, then went immediately to Tanglewood, where he will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The new members of the orchestra will join Maestro Krips when the San Francisco Symphony begins its 58th season on Dec. 3.

66

7th WEEK

Leinsdorf Offers A Fine 'Pastoral'

By CHARLES BRIEFER

TANGLEWOOD — The road to Hell is paved with good intentions — and so is the turnpike to Tanglewood. The last good intention involved a motorboat that parted company with the car towing it, and it made me miss the Friday evening "warmup" by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players — Schubert's Piano Trio No. 12 and his "Trout" Quintet. I'm sorry about that too, because the chamber players are first rate.

THE MAIN EVENT Friday night consisted of two Beethoven symphonies — the Sixth and the Third, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. The Sixth or "Pastoral," was an absolute knockout. From the very first Leisndorf chose a tempo that sounded just like a stroller in the woods, and he maintained it, building emotional tension gradually as he went along. Then, in the recapitulation, the horns just burst out in sun-drenched glory.

The second movement, "At the Brook's Edge," was a bit soggy, but the thunderstorm was a real bash, the peasant dance whooped and stomped and the finale was warm and full, a marvel of delicacy at the very end. The whole symphony is an obstacle course for the solo clarinet, but Gino Cioffi — who is not noted for his control didn't miss a single note.

On checking around afterwards, I learned that the "Pastoral," was a big feature of the Boston season, and Leinsdorf apparently has been improving it with evry performance. It actually made the mighty "Eroica" which followed, pale by comparison even though the conductor indulged in something a little unorthodox: At the end of the "Funeral March" three extra horns got up and sneaked around to the side, in back of the first violins.

A claque of purists in the audience, knowing what was coming, started an abortive hissing campaign, and in the famous horn trio of the Scherzo Leinsdorf had the two groups playing antiphonally. In this day and age I can't imagine anybody getting that upset over such harmless tinkering. All in all it was a good "Eroica" good, if not terribly distinguished. But maybe that "Pastoral" spoiled me.

SATURDAY EVEINING, David Zinman, the young American-born conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, led the Boston Symphony in Haydn 7th "Hen Symphony-number 83 in G minor, Bartok's "Dance Suite," and the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique." It was the kind of concert a critic has nightmares about: Every note was in place, all the balances were right, the louds were loud and the softs were soft.

Yet I felt in my bones it was wrong, so I have to say so-even though the audience, presumably operating under the theory that loud plus fast equals good, ate it up.

Zinman has a thousand individuals gestures — each one catalogued; each one available as required. He is so studied, so precise, you get the feeling he's been programmed by a computer and wound up with a key. This is fairly harmless in a crisp classic like Haydn, and very useful in a tricky and rhythmically complex work like the Bartok.

In the Tchaikovsky, however, with its long, lyric lines and supercharged emotion, it just doesn't work: Too much driving and striving. I'm afraid Zinman is overly concerned with the effect he makes and not enough with the message that was in the composer's heart.

AFTER A FRIDAY and Saturday which threatened — and sometimes delivered — showers, the sun came uncompromsingly out, just in time for Sunday afternoon's concert. Henry Lewis, the new conductor of the New Jersey Symphony, opened with the Berlioz "Corsaire" overture and closed with Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." In between he led the accompaniments for Berlioz's "Nuits d'Ete" and operatic arias by Mozart and Rossini, sung by his wife, Mezzo-soprano Marilyn Horne.

Miss Horne made her Boston Symphony debut here two years ago, and she was wildly welcomed before she'd sung so much as a note. At the end the audience simply would not let her go, though she indicated she had nothing more to offer.

I lost count after the sixth stomping cheering, whistling curtain call. Miss Horne is indisputably a mezzo — one who, unlike many mezzos, should be proud to have that prefix. She brings us the best of all possible worlds; the rich, fruity resonance of a contralto and the bright, nimble virtuosity of a coloratura.

She is also a sensitive, intelligent musician with a great deal of personality and stage presence, and whether she was singing the erotic pulsations of Berlioz or the fiery arabesues of Rossini, she sounded utterly secure — utterly right.

In the aria "Parto, Parto" from Mozart's last opera, "La Clemenza di Tito," she shared honors with clarinetist Peter Hadcock (you don't entrust intensely virtuosic matter of this sort to the unpredictable Gino Cioffi), for the thing is very nearly a clarinet aria with soprano obbligato. He was magnificent, and the audience told him so.

AS FOR HENRY LEWIS, he's the complete opposite of Saturday night's conductor, David Zinman. Tall and rangy, with extra long arms, especially energetic motions are awkward for him and make him look like a tree in a windstorm. His technique as I observed at Saturday's open rehearsal, is to talk it out with the players beforehand.

Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass, phone 413-637-1600; performances Fris at 9 pm, Sats 8 pm, Suns 2:30 pm, week-end preludes Fris 7 pm, open rehearsals Sats 10:30 am; write the Festival at Tanglewood for complete schedule. Season ends Aug 31.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000

AUG 15 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 19 1969

Power of Beethoven Sweeps Over 7227

R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — We should never underestimate the power of combining Beethoven and "a good cause." There were 7227 listeners at Tanglewood Friday night to hear Erich Leinsdorf lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of two Beethoven symphonies for the benefit of the Berkshire Medical Center.

Magnificent Music

It was of course, magnificent music masterfully played. We just sat back and let the pretty, familiar patterns of sound surround and engulf us.

Beethoven's symphonies, by now, are not listened to closely by very many. They are too well known, too predictable. But they are ideal for day dreaming, especially the first one on Friday's program, "The Pastoral."

"The Pastoral" is a placid piece, full of such pastoral sounds of nature as bird calls, gentle winds, rustling leaves . . . all the nice sounds that set one to thinking about nice things.

The other piece on the program, The "Eroica" is similar in its power for setting a mod, but less placid. The second movement (funeral march) for instance, can launch melancholy thoughts.

Anyway, there is not much left to be said about Leinsdorf's view of Beethoven. It is clean and uncluttered, unsentimental but emotionally effective . . . certainly not encumbered by the excess of the romantromantic style.

The sound was fluid, burnished, gleaming like hand-rubbed oak . . . almost tangible. The pace was comfortable the balance strudy and the general effect most satisfying.

The prelude program at 7 may go down in the annals of Tanglewood's loyals supporters this year as one of the most beautiful of all.

Five members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players presented Schubert's "The Trout" Quintet, Opus 114, 36 minutes of some of the most beautiful music in existence.

The chamber players are in their fifth season and have acquired, through diligent hours together, an ensemble unity worthy of the very best of chamber groups.

The players were Joseph Silverstein, violin, Burton Fine, viola, Jules Eskin, cello, Henry Portnoi, double bass and Gilbert Kalish, piano.

Immediately after the prelude program, about a thousand listeners were attracted to the main house by a strolling player of bagpipes. He led them to a program ofbarbershop harmopy sung by 31 members of the Berkshire Hillsmen from Pittsfield.

Their program was related to the regular orchestral program at 9, a benefit for the Berkshire Medical Center.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 9 1969

Zinman To Conduct The BSO

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — David Zinman, the young American conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra August 16, at 8 p.m. in place of Max Rudolf. Rudolf, retiring music director of the Cincinnati Symphony, withdrew from the concert on the advice of his physicians.

The weekend begins with the weekend prelude at 7 p.m. on August 15. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players perform a Schubert program with pianist Gilbert Kalish.

At 9 p.m., the Boston Symphony Orchestra is conducted by its Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf. Two Beethoven symphonies will be played, the "Pastoral" and the "Eroica."

On Sunday afternoon, August 17 at 2:30 p.m., Henry Lewis, Music Director of the New Jersey Symphony, is guest conductor, with his wife, soprano Marilyn Horne as soloist. Miss Horne sings Berlioz's "Nuits D'Ete" and arias by Mozart and Rossini. Mr. Lewis conducts Berlioz's "Corsaire" overture and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

AUG 8 1969

Beethoven Concert Opened Weekend

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — A heavy Beethoven program was chosen by Erich Leinsdorf for the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh weekend opening concert by the Boston Symphony Friday night at Tanglewood.

An audience of 7,237 turned out on a hot, humid night to hear Symphony No. 6 in F major, Opus 68, "Pastoral." and Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Opus 55, "Eroica."

Leinsdorf's regulated style of conducting produced felicitous results with both symphonies. The Pastoral's storm sequence and scherzo of the Eroica were brilliantly conducted and played.

Sharp contrasts between the characters of both works were definitive.

Lot of Sunshine

A lot of sunshine permeated the Pastoral. Contrary to custom, the funeral march of the Eroica avoided melancholy lament but was turned into a stately expression of sorrow.

The Eroica had nobility, impressive stature. The only serious flaw was tarnished horn sounds in the middle portion of the scherzo.

Leinsdorf saw to it that the mechanics were clear. One could have filled in a blank score from his dictation and wound up with an accurate replica of Beethoven's markings.

Neither of these two works is so fashioned from blueprint as to outlaw romantic ardor. It helped that Leinsdorf conducted both scores from memory. His sequence of thought was admirably reliable and bypassed few details.

The pastoral is a brilliantly clear exposition of country life. But, methodical brush strokes from the podium are not enough to paint this picture. For that matter, neither will they release the strong emotional currents of the Eroica.

A true evaluation of the Boston Symphony is not possible without considering the conductor. Under most conditions, the Boston Symphony is a marvelously perfected instrument.

Both symphonies were played with fine precision, accuracy, balanced materials, incisive dynamics. richness of timbre, perfectly stressed accents, skilfully turned phrases. Only in the third movement of the Pastoral (festive gathering of the country people) did rhythm slip from pulse.

In the light of all this, it becomes almost paradoxical to say that Friday night's performances were intellectual rather than dynamic Beethoven.

The Pastoral reflected its libretto in the basic sense. The eager joy of the opening, folkish flavor of the brook scene, picture-conjuring storm, and quietly ecstatic close — everything was academically present.

It needed no association with Napoleon to unveil Beethoven's original incentives for writing the Eroica. Moods progressed from broad declamation to grave splendor, nervous excitement and final triumph.

What both symphonies had in moderation was that indefinable spark without which they can still become vivid experiences, but fail to reach the pinnacle of their power.

Earlier in the evening, the weekend prelude was played by a trio and quintet of Boston Symphony chamber players.

Adroit Performance

Schubert's string trio No. 1 in B flat (a last-minute substituition for the piano in B flat) was played by Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello.

Adroit performance couldn't disguise the work's casual value.

Of far greater absorption was Schubert's quintet in A major, Opus 114, "The Trout" played by the trio participants, plus Henry Portnoi, bass, and Gilbert Kalish, pianist.

PROGRAM

Symphony No. 6 in F major, Opus 68, "Pastoral" . . . . . Beethoven
Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, Opus 55, "Eroica" . . . . . Beethoven
Boston Symphony
Erich Leinsdorf

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 16 1969

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

AUG 18 1969

Replaces Max Rudolf

Zinman To Conduct BSO Aug. 16

David Zinman, the young America conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, who made two previous appearances with the Boston Symphony, will again conduct the BSO next Saturday at 8 p.m. in place of Max Rudolf. Mr. Rudolf, retiring music director of the Cincinnati Symphony, withdrew from the concert on the advice of his physicians.

Tchaikovsky Program

David Zinman made his debut with the Boston Symphony last season at Tanglewood, conducting a program of Baroque music for chamber orchestra. He repeated his success July 13 of this season with a similar program. This will be his first appearance conducting the full orchestra. He will direct a program similar to Mr. Rudolf's scheduled program, with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony as the major work.

The weekend will begin with the prelude concert at 7 p.m. on Friday. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will do a Schubert program with pianist Gilbert Kalish.

At 9 p.m., the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by its music director, Erich Leinsdorf. Two Beethoven symphonies will be played, the "Pastoral" and the "Eroica."

On Sunday afternoon at 2:30, Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony, will be guest conductor, with his wife, soprano Marilyn Horne as soloist. Miss Horne will sing Berlioz's "Nuits d'ete" and arias by Mozart and Rossini. Mr. Lewis will conduct Berlioz's "Corsaire" overture and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

The usual open rehearsal, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, will be Saturday morning at 10:30.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 14 1969 New England

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 15 1969 New England

DAVID ZINMAN is guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Max Rudolf, the night of Saturday, August 16, at Tanglewood.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 11 1969

SYRACUSE HERALD-AMERICAN
Sunday, Aug 1969

RAVENNA NEWS HERALD
Friday, August 15, 1969

AUG 14 1969

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 15 1969

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 10 1969

GREENVILLE, N. Y.
LOCAL (ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 1,000

AUG 13 1969

ATHENS, N. Y.
HERALD
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 500

AUG 14 1969

At Tanglewood

Bartok, Tchaikovsky Redeem Conductor From 'Cute' Haydn

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Fortunately, the impression made by David Zinman's generalship of Bartok's "Dance Suite" Saturday night at Tanglewood quickly overcame his conducting of Haydn's Symphony No. 83.

Programmed Doll

Zinman was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there are mannerisms in his podium style which might lead an observer to call him cute.

The mannerisms were specially evident during the Haydn symphony, and were reflected in the music.

The first and third movements, especially, were prissy and precious. Zinman waved them along as if he were a little mechanical doll programmed by a computer to make an appropriate move for every sound.

Compelling Rhythms

The Bartok suite, however, is a salty, colorful work . . . pithy and compact with its textures, brilliant with its colors and compelling and powerful with its rhythms.

Zinman seemed less pretentious with it, and it was delivered to the listeners with satisfying impact. It had more integrity.

So, too, with the giant Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 6 ("Pathetique") which followed intermission. It is my favorite Tchaikovsky symphony, and I liked what Zinman did with it. (I like Haydn, too, but I didn't like what he did with that.)

Tchaikovsky's super-wide dynamics, lush orchestrations and sublime melodies were poured out with love. It was a bit overplayed, stretched (louder, softer, faster, slower), than is usually heard . . . but it sounded right Saturday. There were 4886 there to hear it.

Stage Fills Again

At 2.45 the strains of a Prokofieff sonata, which ended a 1.30 concert in the theater of music for violin and piano, had hardly died when the stage filled with 58 members of the young artists orchestra who were there to begin another concert.

Both were presented by the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, which consists of highly talented musicians of high-school level.

The first offered three violinists and two pianists who played musvic by Beethoven as well as Prokofieff.

Yannatos Conducts

The second, conducted by James Yannatos, began with Beethoven's No. 3 Leonora Overture (Op. 72A) and ended with Strainsky's "Petrouchka."

In between were arias from Menotti's "The Consul" and Puccini's "La Rondine" and a set of six songs for soprano and orchestra ("Prieres Dans L'Arche") composed by the conductor.

The soprano soloist was Chloe Owen, a member of the Berkshire Music Center faculty.

Electronic Music

From the theater at 4.30 about 1000 listeners strolled across the great lawn to the shed where speakers set up (two on stage, two in the seats) to make a large rectangle for the proper reproduction of a program of four-track stereo tapes of newly-composed electronic music.

The rectangle easily accommodated the listeners so that they were surrounded with sound.

There were five works on the program, four of them composed this year, one in 1967. The composers were Richard Meckstroth, Olly Wilson, Morton Subotnick, Alice Shields and Charles Wuorinen.

Little Startling

Their music only occasionally indicated to this unprepared set of ears that anything startling has occurred in the last five years to alter the course of electronic music.

The same general classification of electronic sounds were there, all of them, although their organization (on these tapes) is somewhat more logical and sequential and their timbre and color is a good deal fuller, denser, subtler and characterful . . . the latter undoubtedly more a result of newer, sophisticated electronic equipment than of increased musical acumen.

Today at 2.30 Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, will be a guest on the podium for a program of Berlioz, Mozart, Rossini and Tchaikovsky, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With him will be his wife, Marilyn Horne, a soprano of unusual vocal range and high skill.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

AUG 17 1969

Young Conductors Register Well In Two Concerts at Tanglewood

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

AUG 18 1969

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Reviews

LENOX — Final two concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh weekend were dramatized by two young conductors of strikingly different personalities and styles.

Both received tremendous applause so it's quite impossible to say which was the audience's preference.

David Zinman of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra conducted the Boston Symphony Saturday night. Yesterday afternoon it was Henry Lewis of the New Jersey Symphon Orchestra.

Yesterday's soloist was soprano Marilyn Horne.

Weekend attendance was 19,668.

Whatever the symphony men's opinions of the athletic performance given before them by Zinman, they played with unsparing verve and sounded in top form.

Ballet on the Podium

Zinman had a gesture for ever note, along with reflective facial expressions and a bit of modern ballet.

Haydn's "Hen" Symphony was impeccably correct in notes and scored instructions. Zinman set tempos that guaranteed vitality, and Haydn's symphony provided its own humor to which Zinman contribute his podium share.

Zinman's exhaustive physical effort seemed to clarify rather than compound the complexities in Bartok's Dance Suite. The performance was superlative — exquisite string melodies, heavy percussion without pummeling, growling brass and oriental tunes in woodwind.

Just about every ounce of emotion and drama to be found in Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony was wrung dry by the podium athlete.

Tempo of the first and third movements were accelerated. The second remained as expected, and the finale was made to weep in the grand manner.

Tight Musical Ship

Despite the fact that the Tanglewood audience is now applauding between movements, Zinman knotted the movements tightly — no easy task in view of their divergent characters.

Yesterday's program was a mixture of mistakes and brilliant ideas.

Lewis and Miss Horne were both involved with each.

Miss Horne elected to sing Berlioz' "Summer Nights," replendent material for a small concert hall but pallid when heard in the vast area of Tanglewood's music shed. It didn't help that her French pronunciation was either ambiguous or incorrect.

The singer atoned in full with arias by Mozart and Rossini.

Her opulent, unwavering voice built Mozart's "Parto, parto" ("La Clemenza di Tito") into a compelling experience. In Rossini's "Cruda sorte" ("The Italian Woman in Algiers") Miss Horne identified with the rare and most memorable of mezzos with coloratura facility.

Lewis, 37-year-old Negro conductor and native of Los Angeles, made a fine impression with his graceful and authoritative direction. He's a tall man with an arm spread that leaves no doubt as to what he means.

The introduction to Berlioz' "Corsair" Overture was slowed down to a point of idea separation. Thereafter, he opened the way for brilliant orchestral display.

His performance of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini" was surprisingly acceptable. The work is just about the most flamboyant, splashy score that Tchaikovsky fell into.

The heavy downpour of notes and constant eruptions of drama were controlled as calmly as possible from the podium. Lewis' poised efficiency endured through the brassiest of exclamations, heavily punctuated by drums and cymbals.

An audience of 5,481 rewarded Tchaikovsky's hoopla with an equally noisy ovation.

PROGRAMS

Saturday Night

Symphony No. 83 in G minor, "The Hen" — Haydn
Dance Suite (1923) — Bartok
Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Opus 74 — Tchaikovsky

Boston Symphony
David Zinman

Sunday Afternoon

Overture, "Le Corsaire" — Berlioz
Les Nuits d'ete, Opus 7 — Berlioz
Parto, parto, "La Clemenza di Tito" — Mozart
Cruda sorte, "L'Italiana in Algeri" — Rossini

Marilyn Horne, soprano
Francesca da Rimini, Opus 32 — Tchaikovsky

Boston Symphony
Henry Lewis

August 16: DAVID ZINMAN, guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in place of Max Rudolf, at Tanglewood (see Entertainment calendar).

which man is a conductor?

August 17: HENRY LEWIS appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood as guest conductor. (See entertainment calendar.)

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,342

AUG 13 1969

CHATHAM COURIER
Thursday, August 14, 1969

TANGLEWOOD- . . . Friday, Aug. 15: Weekend Prelude with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, 7 p.m. BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in Beethoven's "Pastoral" and "Eroica" symphonies, 9 p.m., Shed . . . Saturday, Aug. 16: BSO conducted by Rudolf in Haydn's Symphony No. 91, Bartok's Dance Suite, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony, 8 p.m., Shed . . . Sunday, Aug. 17: BSO conducted by Lewis in Berlioz's "Corsaire" Overture and Nuits d'Ete, Mozart's Parto from "La Clemenza di Tito," K.-621, Rossini's Cruda Sorte from "L'Italiana in Algeri" with Horne as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's Francesca da Rimini, 2:30 p.m., Shed.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

AUG 10 1969

Three-Day Program Listed for Coming Weekend at Tanglewood

The Jefferson Airplane is appearing in the fifth of the Tuesday Tanglewood Trends concerts this week at 8 p.m.

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — David Zinman, the young American conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, who made a deep impression as guest conductor in his two previous appearances with the Boston Symphony, will conduct the Orchestra on Saturday at 8 p.m. in place of Max Rudolf. Rudolf retiring music director of the Cincinnati Symphony withdrew from the concert on the advice of his physicians.

1968 Debut

David Zinman made his debut with the Boston Symphony last season at Tanglewood, conducting a program of Baroque music for chamber orchestra. He repeated his success on July 13 of thi s season with a similar program. This will be his first appearance conducting the full orchestra. He will conduct a program similar to Rudolf's scheduled program, with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony as the major work.

The weekend begins with the Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. on Friday. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players perform a Schubert program with pianist Gilbert Kalish.

* * *

At 9 p.m., the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, will play two Beethoven symphonies, the "Pastoral" and the "Eroica."

* * *

On next Sunday afternoon at 2:30, Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony, is guest conductor, with his wife, soprano Marilyn Horne as soloist. Miss Horne sings Berlioz's "Nuits d'ete" and arias by Mozart and Rossini. Mr. Lewis conducts Berlioz's "Corsaire" overture and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

* * *

The open rehearsal, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, is Saturday morning at 10.30.

FRIDAY
7 p.m. Shed
Weekend Prelude
Boston Symphony Chamber Players
GILBERT KALISH pianist
Schubert: String trio No. 1 in B flat "Trout Quintet"
9 p.m. Shed
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Erich Leinsdorf, conductor
Beethoven: Symphony no. 6 "The Pastoral"
Beethoven: Symphony no. 3 "Eroica"
SATURDAY
10.30 a.m. Shed
BSO Open Rehearsal
8 p.m. Shed
Boston Symphony Orchestra
David Zinman conductor
Haydn: Symphony no 83 'The Hen'
Bartok: Dance Suite (1923)
Tchaikovsky: Symphony no. 6 Pathetique'
SUNDAY
2.30 p.m. Shed
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Henry Lewis conductor
Marilyn Horne soprano
Berlioz: Overture 'Le Corsaire'
Berlioz: Nuits d'ete
Mozart: Parto, parto from 'Le clemenze di Tito'
Rossini: Cruda, sorte from 'L'Italiana in Algeri
Tchaikovsky: Francesca da Rimini

HENRY LEWIS

MARILYN HORNE

DAVID ZINMAN

Other Calendar Events

Henry Lewis will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. on Sunday, August 17 at 2:30 P.M. in the Shed . . . Martina Arroyo will appear with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs, New York on Thursday, August 14, when Eugene Ormandy will conduc Verdi's "Requiem" . . . Frances Cole, harpsichordist, will make her second appearance on the "Today" Show, Channel 4 between 7 and 9 a.m. on August 19.

N. Y. AMSTERDAM NEWS
Saturday, August 16, 1969

Max Rudolf, director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra for 11 years, has resigned on the advice of his physicians for "complete physical exhaustion," His mid-August guest conducting date at Tanglewood was canceled. Erich Kumzel, assistant conductor of the symphony will take Rudolf's place when the season opens Oct. 25.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS
(E) 94,901

AUG 26 1969

68.

A BUSY SUMMER — Henry Lewis, seated, music director of the New Jersey Symphony, talks over schedule for summer concert season with concertmaster Frank Scocozza.

Henry Lewises Have Heavy Schedule

Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony, and his wife, soprano Marilyn Horne have a busy summer ahead.

Following an appearance July 24 and 25 with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra at the Meadowbrook Festival in Rochester, Mich., they will perform at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Massachusetts Aug. 17, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at the Hollywood Bowl Aug. 26.

The program in Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony will feature Tschaikowsky's Francesca da Rimini and Les Nuit d'Ete by Berlioz. Miss Horne will sing arias by Rossini and Mozart.

Except for a November engagement with the Minnesota Orchestra in Minneapolis, Lewis will be spending most of his time this fall in a resumption of full-scale activity with the New Jersey Symphony. The settlement of differences with the musicians' union and the negotiation of a new three-year contract between the Symphony management and the union has cleared the way for a full program of concert activities in New Jersey.

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. 147,484
JUL 16 1969

MONTCLAIR, N.J.
TIMES
W. 10.000
JUL 17 1969

MARILYN HORNE . . . who is appearing as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at Tanglewood when her husband, Henry Lewis, will be guest conductor.

HENRY LEWIS . . . who will be guest conductor at Tanglewood this Sunday when his wife. Marilyn Horne will be guest soloist.

Henry Lewis

Marilyn Horne

London-to-Hollywood Concert Schedule

Symphony Director and His Wife, Marilyn Horne, at Major Festivals

Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony, and his wife, soprano Marilyn Horne, started a busy summer schedule with an appearance last Sunday with the Royal Philharmonic in London.

They have been booked July 24 and 25 by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra for the Meadowbrook Festival in Rochester, Mich.

A concert at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Massachusetts is scheduled Aug. 17, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A date at the Hollywood (Calif.) Bowl has been set for an Aug. 26 performance.

The couple also will make a recording for Decca records of Mahler's Kindertotenlieder and Wagner's Wesendonck with the Royal Philharmonic. When Lewis last conducted the Royal Philharmonic in December, he recorded Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 ("Pathetique") for London Records. The record since has been released to the public.

The program in Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony will feature Tschaikowsky's Francesca da Rimini and Les Nuit d' Ete by Berlioz. Miss Horne will sing arias by Rossini and Mozart.

Except for a November engagement with the Minnesota Orchestra in Minneapolis, Mr. Lewis will be spending most of his time this fall in a resumption of full-scale activity with the New Jersey Symphony.

The settlement of difference with the musicians' union and the negotion of a new three-year contract between the symphony management and the union has cleared the way for a full program of concert activities in New Jersey.

The Herald-News
PASSAIC, N. J.
D. 60,569
JUL 18 1969

Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 284,218 SUN. 429,830
JUL 12 1969

At Tanglewood: Marilyn Horne will be guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Aug. 17th at 2:30 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000
AUG 14 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 14 1969

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
AUG 14 1969

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. presents Boston Symphony Orchestra, David Zinman, conductor, for open rehearsal at 10:30 a.m. today in shed; regular performance 8 tonight in shed. Haydn, Bartok, Tchaikovsky program. Sunday performance with Henry Lewis conducting, Marilyn Horne, soprano soloist, 2:30 p.m. in shed. Tickets: $3.50-$6.50; admission to lawn, $3, tickets sold before performance. Open rehearsal, unreserved, $2.50. Tanglewood-on-parade—gala concert, 8 p.m. Tuesday features combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Sam Levenson narrates "Young Persons Guide to the Orchestra." Tickets: $4-$6.50.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175
AUG 16 1969

CRITIC-AT-LARGE by Byron Belt

NEWHOUSE NEWSPAPERS
19 August 19

Husband-Wife Team

LENOX, Mass. — New Jersey Symphony conductor Henry Lewis and his celebrated wife, singer Marilyn Horne, were among the featured attractions during the penultimate week of Boston Symphony concerts at the Brookshire Festivals at Tanglewood.

It has become increasingly troublesome to review performances by husband and wife teams, for the female members always seem to have the edge on talent and popular acclaim. It is especially a problem when commenting on Miss Horne, for appearances with her husband are almost inevitably her least successful.

To be sure, and to set the record straight at once, in one of her three selections the vocalist sang with the kind of sumptuous splendor that marked her Verdi Requiem performances with Leonard Bernstein this past spring. The flamboyant aria "Cruda sorte" from Rossini's "The Italian Women in Algiers" was both flashy and exciting, with just the right touch of sly humor to set it off perfectly.

Elsewhere, in music of greater substance, Miss Horne was either uncertain of herself or simply incapable of truly musical or meaningful performance.

The major work on the program was the magnificent Berlioz song cycle "Les nuits d'ete." These seven songs, to haunting texts of Theophile, are among the greatest works for voice and orchestra. Their moods are extremely subtle, however, and they can really easily sound very much alike in hands other then those of a Teyte or Steber.

Her eyes were constantly on the conductor, and his glued to the score and one's ears unhappily confirmed the visual impression that the music simply was not yet ready for performance at a major festival with one of the world's greatest Berlioz orchestras.

With Mozart's great aria "Parto, parto" from "The Clemency of Titus," things were musically better. Here, with reduced forces, and the orchestra's superb solo clarinetist Gino Cioffi to lead the way, there was a sense of vitality, if no real involvement in the music.

Miss Horne, however, had no reason to complain. Although the crowd was one of the smallest of the season, it contained a vociferous contingent of the sort of fans who surround prima donnas like camp followers, and they were loud and long in their acclaim, particularly after the very effective Rossini.

In response to the cheers Miss Horne leaped upon the podium with arms upstretched. It was the ultimate in vulgar crowd-pandering, and something I've never before witnessed and hope never to see again.

While the Boston Symphony players obviously adored their soloist, the same can not be said of their response to Henry Lewis. The orchestra performed perfunctorily at best except during the Mozart and Rossini, and in the brilliant Berlioz "Le Corsaire" overture and the banal "Francesca da Rimini" of Tchaikovsky the sound was more often than not coarse and uninteresting.

Under a more demanding and stylish assured baton I suspect Miss Horne could do much more justice to the Berlioz songs and might behave much less like the diva of a provincial opera company. For his part, I've watched Mr. Lewis since early and promising days in Los Angeles, and am sad to find that today his conducting seems to probe less deeply while seeking primarily for superficial effects. Both artists have far too much potential to settle for easy triumphs.

What satisfactions there were at Tanglewood as Erich Leinsdorf entered his final week as musical director of the usually aristocratic Bostonians, were in a repeat of the maestro's towering version of Alban Berg's powerful opera "Wozzeck."

Any work which tears so ferociously at the gut, blasts the mind so completely and sears the heart so savagely is something to experience. "Wozzeck" is such a work. The Tanglewood performances, featuring Alexandra Hunt and Richard Taylor, both superb in an excellent professional ensemble and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, brilliant beyond its years, have provided Mr. Leinsdorf with a departing triumph of magnificent proportions.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 471,961 SUN. 423,790
AUG 19 1969

At the Concert

Husband-Wife Team In Tanglewood Debuts

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — Vocal music highlighted Sunday afternoon's concert as the husband and wife team of conductor Henry Lewis and soprano Marilyn Horne made joint Tanglewood debuts.

Mr. Lewis is music director of the New Jersey Symphony and has guest-conducted the orchestras of Chicago, Detroit, and San Franscisco.

Miss Horne is internationally famous for her singing of the florid "bel canto" operas of Rossini. She has sung at La Scala and Covent Garden, and will make her Met debut during the coming season.

She formerly considered herself a mezzo-soprano, but her current status as a soprano is justified since her lower voice is quite weak and dependent on puffy chest tones.

MISS HORNE'S presence made possible the inclusion of Berlioz' rarely-heard song cycle, "Nuits d'ete." Six love poems of Theophile Gautier serve as the text.

The music is among Berlioz' most subtle and beautiful.

Miss Horne displayed a rich and powerful voice and extremely accurate intonation. Her singing was more appropriate for Italian opera than the French art song, however, for she neglected the expressive nunances that the music requires.

Mr. Lewis' accompaniment was alternately limp and metronomical.

The second half of the program began with two arias. Included were Parto, parto from Mozart's "La clemenza di Tito" and Cruda sorte from Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri."

Miss Horne was in her element here and revealed an agility which was remarkable for so large a voice. The Rossini especially was dazzling.

THE PURELY orchestral portion of the program included Berlioz' "Corsaire" Overture and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

The lyrical center section of Tchaikovsky's score is descriptive of Francesca's love for Paolo. The outer sections describe the "tortures and agonies of the condemned."

Mr. Lewis' account of "Francesca" was rather cool, but the playing he drew from the Boston Symphony was of a rare richness and unanimity.

Monday, August 18, 1969

At Tanglewood: Henry Lewis will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Aug. 17th at 2:30 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000
AUG 14 1969

62.

A BUSY SUMMER — Henry Lewis, seated, music director of the New Jersey Symphony, talks over schedule for summer concert season with concertmaster Frank Scocozza.

Henry Lewises Have Heavy Schedule

Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony, and his wife, soprano Marilyn Horne have a busy summer ahead.

Following an appearance July 24 and 25 with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra at the Meadowbrook Festival in Rochester, Mich., they will perform at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Massachusetts Aug. 17, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at the Hollywood Bowl Aug. 26.

The program in Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony will feature Tschaikowsky's Francesca da Rimini and Les Nuit d'Ete by Berlioz. Miss Horne will sing arias by Rossini and Mozart.

Except for a November engagement with the Minnesota Orchestra in Minneapolis, Lewis will be spending most of his time this fall in a resumption of full-scale activity with the New Jersey Symphony. The settlement of differences with the musicians' union and the negotiation of a new three-year contract between the Symphony management and the union has cleared the way for a full program of concert activities in New Jersey.

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. 147,484

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES
W. 10,000

JUL 16 1969 JUL 17 1969

MARILYN HORNE . . . who is appearing as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at Tanglewood when her husband, Henry Lewis, will be guest conductor.

HENRY LEWIS . . . who will be guest conductor at Tanglewood this Sunday when his wife. Marilyn Horne will be guest soloist.

Henry Lewis

Marilyn Horne

London-to-Hollywood Concert Schedule

Symphony Director and His Wife, Marilyn Horne, at Major Festivals

Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony, and his wife, soprano Marilyn Horne, started a busy summer schedule with an appearance last Sunday with the Royal Philharmonic in London.

They have been booked July 24 and 25 by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra for the Meadowbrook Festival in Rochester, Mich.

A concert at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Massachusetts is scheduled Aug. 17, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A date at the Hollywood (Calif.) Bowl has been set for an Aug. 26 performance.

The couple also will make a recording for Decca records of Mahler's Kindertotenlieder and Wagner's Wesendonck with the Royal Philharmonic. When Lewis last conducted the Royal Philharmonic in December, he recorded Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 ("Pathetique") for London Records. The record since has been released to the public.

The program in Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony will feature Tschaikowsky's Francesca da Rimini and Les Nuit d' Ete by Berlioz. Miss Horne will sing arias by Rossini and Mozart.

Except for a November engagement with the Minnesota Orchestra in Minneapolis, Mr. Lewis will be spending most of his time this fall in a resumption of full-scale activity with the New Jersey Symphony.

The settlement of difference with the musicians' union and the negotion of a new three-year contract between the symphony management and the union has cleared the way for a full program of concert activities in New Jersey.

The Herald-News
PASSAIC, N. J.
D. 80,569

JUL 18 1969

Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 284,218 SUN. 429,830

JUL 12 1969

At Tanglewood: Marilyn Horne will be guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Aug. 17th at 2:30 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 14 1969 New England

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 14 1969 New England

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 14 1969 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. presents Boston Symphony Orchestra, David Zinman, conductor, for open rehearsal at 10:30 a.m. today in shed; regular performance 8 tonight in shed. Haydn, Bartok, Tchaikovsky program. Sunday performance with Henry Lewis conducting, Marilyn Horne, soprano soloist, 2:30 p.m. in shed. Tickets: $3.50-$8.50; admission to lawn, $3, tickets sold before performance. Open rehearsal, unreserved, $2.50. Tanglewood-on-parade—gala concert, 8 p.m. Tuesday features combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Sam Levenson narrates "Young Persons Guide to the Orchestra." Tickets: $4-$6.50.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 16 1969 New England Newsclip

CRITIC-AT-LARGE by Byron Belt

NEWHOUSE NEWSPAPERS

19 August 19

Husband-Wife Team

LENOX, Mass. — New Jersey Symphony conductor Henry Lewis and his celebrated wife, singer Marilyn Horne, were among the featured attractions during the penultimate week of Boston Symphony concerts at the Brookshire Festivals at Tanglewood.

It has become increasingly troublesome to review performances by husband and wife teams, for the female members always seem to have the edge on talent and popular acclaim. It is especially a problem when commenting on Miss Horne, for appearances with her husband are almost inevitably her least successful.

To be sure, and to set the record straight at once, in one of her three selections the vocalist sang with the kind of sumptuous splendor that marked her Verdi Requiem performances with Leonard Bernstein this past spring. The flamboyant aria "Cruda sorte" from Rossini's "The Italian Women in Algiers" was both flashy and exciting, with just the right touch of sly humor to set it off perfectly.

Elsewhere, in music of greater substance, Miss Horne was either uncertain of herself or simply incapable of truly musical or meaningful performance.

The major work on the program was the magnificent Berlioz song cycle "Les nuits d'ete." These seven songs, to haunting texts of Theophile, are among the greatest works for voice and orchestra. Their moods are extremely subtle, however, and they can really easily sound very much alike in hands other then those of a Teyte or Steber.

Her eyes were constantly on the conductor, and his glued to the score and one's ears unhappily confirmed the visual impression that the music simply was not yet ready for performance at a major festival with one of the world's greatest Berlioz orchestras.

With Mozart's great aria "Parto, parto" from "The Clemency of Titus," things were musically better. Here, with reduced forces, and the orchestra's superb solo clarinetist Gino Cioffi to lead the way, there was a sense of vitality, if no real involvement in the music.

Miss Horne, however, had no reason to complain. Although the crowd was one of the smallest of the season, it contained a vociferous contingent of the sort of fans who surround prima donnas like camp followers, and they were loud and long in their acclaim, particularly after the very effective Rossini.

In response to the cheers Miss Horne leaped upon the podium with arms upstretched. It was the ultimate in vulgar crowd-pandering, and something I've never before witnessed and hope never to see again.

While the Boston Symphony players obviously adored their soloist, the same can not be said of their response to Henry Lewis. The orchestra performed perfunctorily at best except during the Mozart and Rossini, and in the brilliant Berlioz "Le Corsaire" overture and the banal "Francesca da Rimini" of Tchaikovsky the sound was more often than not coarse and uninteresting.

Under a more demanding and stylish assured baton I suspect Miss Horne could do much more justice to the Berlioz songs and might behave much less like the diva of a provincial opera company. For his part, I've watched Mr. Lewis since early and promising days in Los Angeles, and am sad to find that today his conducting seems to probe less deeply while seeking primarily for superficial effects. Both artists have far too much potential to settle for easy triumphs.

What satisfactions there were at Tanglewood as Erich Leinsdorf entered his final week as musical director of the usually aristocratic Bostonians, were in a repeat of the maestro's towering version of Alban Berg's powerful opera "Wozzeck."

Any work which tears so ferociously at the gut, blasts the mind so completely and sears the heart so savagely is something to experience. "Wozzeck" is such a work. The Tanglewood performances, featuring Alexandra Hunt and Richard Taylor, both superb in an excellent professional ensemble and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, brilliant beyond its years, have provided Mr. Leinsdorf with a departing triumph of magnificent proportions.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 411,961 SUN. 423,790

AUG 19 1969

At Tanglewood: Henry Lewis will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Aug. 17th at 2:30 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 14 1969 New England

At the Concert

Husband-Wife Team In Tanglewood Debuts

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — Vocal music highlighted Sunday afternoon's concert as the husband and wife team of conductor Henry Lewis and soprano Marilyn Horne made joint Tanglewood debuts.

Mr. Lewis is music director of the New Jersey Symphony and has guest-conducted the orchestras of Chicago, Detroit, and San Franscisco.

Miss Horne is internationally famous for her singing of the florid "bel canto" operas of Rossini. She has sung at La Scala and Covent Garden, and will make her Met debut during the coming season.

She formerly considered herself a mezzo-soprano, but her current status as a soprano is justified since her lower voice is quite weak and dependent on puffy chest tones.

MISS HORNE'S presence made possible the inclusion of Berlioz' rarely-heard song cycle, "Nuits d'ete." Six love poems of Theophile Gautier serve as the text.

The music is among Berlioz' most subtle and beautiful.

Miss Horne displayed a rich and powerful voice and extremely accurate intonation. Her singing was more appropriate for Italian opera than the French art song, however, for she neglected the expressive nunances that the music requires.

Mr. Lewis' accompaniment was alternately limp and metronomical.

The second half of the program began with two arias. Included were Parto, parto from Mozart's "La clemenza di Tito" and Cruda sorte from Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri."

Miss Horne was in her element here and revealed an agility which was remarkable for so large a voice. The Rossini especially was dazzling.

THE PURELY orchestral portion of the program included Berlioz' "Corsaire" Overture and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

The lyrical center section of Tchaikovsky's score is descriptive of Francesca's love for Paolo. The outer sections describe the "tortures and agonies of the condemned."

Mr. Lewis' account of "Francesca" was rather cool, but the playing he drew from the Boston Symphony was of a rare richness and unanimity.

Monday, August 18, 1969

62.

A BUSY SUMMER — Henry Lewis, seated, music director of the New Jersey Symphony, talks over schedule for summer concert season with concertmaster Frank Scocozza.

Henry Lewises Have Heavy Schedule

Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony, and his wife, soprano Marilyn Horne have a busy summer ahead.

Following an appearance July 24 and 25 with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra at the Meadowbrook Festival in Rochester, Mich., they will perform at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Massachusetts Aug. 17, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and at the Hollywood Bowl Aug. 26.

The program in Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony will feature Tschaikowsky's Francesca da Rimini and Les Nuit d'Ete by Berlioz. Miss Horne will sing arias by Rossini and Mozart.

Except for a November engagement with the Minnesota Orchestra in Minneapolis, Lewis will be spending most of his time this fall in a resumption of full-scale activity with the New Jersey Symphony. The settlement of differences with the musicians' union and the negotiation of a new three-year contract between the Symphony management and the union has cleared the way for a full program of concert activities in New Jersey.

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. 147,484

JUL 16 1969

MONTCLAIR, N.J.
TIMES
W. 10,000

JUL 17 1969

MARILYN HORNE . . . who is appearing as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at Tanglewood when her husband, Henry Lewis, will be guest conductor.

HENRY LEWIS . . . who will be guest conductor at Tanglewood this Sunday when his wife. Marilyn Horne will be guest soloist.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 14 1969

New England Newsclip

London-to-Hollywood Concert Schedule

Symphony Director and His Wife, Marilyn Horne, at Major Festivals

Henry Lewis

Marilyn Horne

Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony, and his wife, soprano Marilyn Horne, started a busy summer schedule with an appearance last Sunday with the Royal Philharmonic in London.

They have been booked July 24 and 25 by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra for the Meadowbrook Festival in Rochester, Mich.

A concert at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Massachusetts is scheduled Aug. 17, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A date at the Hollywood (Calif.) Bowl has been set for an Aug. 26 performance.

The couple also will make a recording for Decca records of Mahler's Kindertotenlieder and Wagner's Wesendonck with the Royal Philharmonic. When Lewis last conducted the Royal Philharmonic in December, he recorded Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 ("Pathetique") for London Records. The record since has been released to the public.

The program in Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony will feature Tschaikowsky's Francesca da Rimini and Les Nuit d' Ete by Berlioz. Miss Horne will sing arias by Rossini and Mozart.

Except for a November engagement with the Minnesota Orchestra in Minneapolis, Mr. Lewis will be spending most of his time this fall in a resumption of full-scale activity with the New Jersey Symphony.

The settlement of difference with the musicians' union and the negotion of a new three-year contract between the symphony management and the union has cleared the way for a full program of concert activities in New Jersey.

The Herald-News
PASSAIC, N. J.
D. 80,569

JUL 18 1969

Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 284,218 SUN. 429,830

JUL 12 1969

At Tanglewood: Marilyn Horne will be guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Aug. 17th at 2:30 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 14 1969

New England

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 14 1969

New England

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. presents Boston Symphony Orchestra, David Zinman, conductor, for open rehearsal at 10:30 a.m. today in shed; regular performance 8 tonight in shed. Haydn, Bartok, Tchaikovsky program. Sunday performance with Henry Lewis conducting, Marilyn Horne, soprano soloist, 2:30 p.m. in shed. Tickets: $3.50-$8.50; admission to lawn, $3, tickets sold before performance. Open rehearsal, unreserved, $2.50. Tanglewood-on-parade—gala concert, 8 p.m. Tuesday features combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, Sam Levenson narrates "Young Persons Guide to the Orchestra." Tickets: $4-$6.50.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 16 1969

New England Newsclip

CRITIC-AT-LARGE by Byron Belt

NEWHOUSE NEWSPAPERS

19 August 1969

Husband-Wife Team

LENOX, Mass. — New Jersey Symphony conductor Henry Lewis and his celebrated wife, singer Marilyn Horne, were among the featured attractions during the penultimate week of Boston Symphony concerts at the Brookshire Festivals at Tanglewood.

It has become increasingly troublesome to review performances by husband and wife teams, for the female members always seem to have the edge on talent and popular acclaim. It is especially a problem when commenting on Miss Horne, for appearances with her husband are almost inevitably her least successful.

To be sure, and to set the record straight at once, in one of her three selections the vocalist sang with the kind of sumptuous splendor that marked her Verdi Requiem performances with Leonard Bernstein this past spring. The flamboyant aria "Cruda sorte" from Rossini's "The Italian Women in Algiers" was both flashy and exciting, with just the right touch of sly humor to set it off perfectly.

Elsewhere, in music of greater substance, Miss Horne was either uncertain of herself or simply incapable of truly musical or meaningful performance.

The major work on the program was the magnificent Berlioz song cycle "Les nuits d'ete." These seven songs, to haunting texts of Theophile, are among the greatest works for voice and orchestra. Their moods are extremely subtle, however, and they can really easily sound very much alike in hands other then those of a Teyte or Steber.

Her eyes were constantly on the conductor, and his glued to the score and one's ears unhappily confirmed the visual impression that the music simply was not yet ready for performance at a major festival with one of the world's greatest Berlioz orchestras.

With Mozart's great aria "Parto, parto" from "The Clemency of Titus," things were musically better. Here, with reduced forces, and the orchestra's superb solo clarinetist Gino Cioffi to lead the way, there was a sense of vitality, if no real involvement in the music.

Miss Horne, however, had no reason to complain. Although the crowd was one of the smallest of the season, it contained a vociferous contingent of the sort of fans who surround prima donnas like camp followers, and they were loud and long in their acclaim, particularly after the very effective Rossini.

In response to the cheers Miss Horne leaped upon the podium with arms upstretched. It was the ultimate in vulgar crowd-pandering, and something I've never before witnessed and hope never to see again.

While the Boston Symphony players obviously adored their soloist, the same can not be said of their response to Henry Lewis. The orchestra performed perfunctorily at best except during the Mozart and Rossini, and in the brilliant Berlioz "Le Corsaire" overture and the banal "Francesca da Rimini" of Tchaikovsky the sound was more often than not coarse and uninteresting.

Under a more demanding and stylish assured baton I suspect Miss Horne could do much more justice to the Berlioz songs and might behave much less like the diva of a provincial opera company. For his part, I've watched Mr. Lewis since early and promising days in Los Angeles, and am sad to find that today his conducting seems to probe less deeply while seeking primarily for superficial effects. Both artists have far too much potential to settle for easy triumphs.

What satisfactions there were at Tanglewood as Erich Leinsdorf entered his final week as musical director of the usually aristocratic Bostonians, were in a repeat of the maestro's towering version of Alban Berg's powerful opera "Wozzeck."

Any work which tears so ferociously at the gut, blasts the mind so completely and sears the heart so savagely is something to experience. "Wozzeck" is such a work. The Tanglewood performances, featuring Alexandra Hunt and Richard Taylor, both superb in an excellent professional ensemble and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, brilliant beyond its years, have provided Mr. Leinsdorf with a departing triumph of magnificent proportions.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 471,961 SUN. 423,790

AUG 19 1969

At Tanglewood: Henry Lewis will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Aug. 17th at 2:30 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 14 1969

New England

At the Concert

Husband-Wife Team In Tanglewood Debuts

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — Vocal music highlighted Sunday afternoon's concert as the husband and wife team of conductor Henry Lewis and soprano Marilyn Horne made joint Tanglewood debuts.

Mr. Lewis is music director of the New Jersey Symphony and has guest-conducted the orchestras of Chicago, Detroit, and San Franscisco.

Miss Horne is internationally famous for her singing of the florid "bel canto" operas of Rossini. She has sung at La Scala and Covent Garden, and will make her Met debut during the coming season.

She formerly considered herself a mezzo-soprano, but her current status as a soprano is justified since her lower voice is quite weak and dependent on puffy chest tones.

MISS HORNE'S presence made possible the inclusion of Berlioz' rarely-heard song cycle, "Nuits d'ete." Six love poems of Theophile Gautier serve as the text.

The music is among Berlioz' most subtle and beautiful.

Miss Horne displayed a rich and powerful voice and extremely accurate intonation. Her singing was more appropriate for Italian opera than the French art song, however, for she neglected the expressive nunances that the music requires.

Mr. Lewis' accompaniment was alternately limp and metronomical.

The second half of the program began with two arias. Included were Parto, parto from Mozart's "La clemenza di Tito" and Cruda sorte from Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri."

Miss Horne was in her element here and revealed an agility which was remarkable for so large a voice. The Rossini especially was dazzling.

THE PURELY orchestral portion of the program included Berlioz' "Corsaire" Overture and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

The lyrical center section of Tchaikovsky's score is descriptive of Francesca's love for Paolo. The outer sections describe the "tortures and agonies of the condemned."

Mr. Lewis' account of "Francesca" was rather cool, but the playing he drew from the Boston Symphony was of a rare richness and unanimity.

Monday, August 18, 1969

The Voice of Marilyn Horne Thrills 5481 at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Wow! What a voice that Marilyn Horne has! She was at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon to sing some Berlioz songs and a couple arias from Mozart and Rossini with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Husband Conducts

Her husband, Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, was guest conductor. In the audience (5481) were hundreds of loyal Horne fans. It was like an opera house.

They shouted and screamed (when she was finished singing, of course) and kept calling her back on the stage.

Did she earn the adulation? Yes. She is a superb singer and she has one of the more phenomenal voices now on the concert circuit. Nominally listed as a soprano, she can move her voice down through the mezzo range into the contralto with apparent ease and obvious control and tonal beauty.

Her voice is deep and full and resonant when it is low, strong and clear and ringing when it is high. It is also nimble, as illustrated Sunday when she sang trills and runs in the Mozart "Parto, Parto" from "La Clemenza di Tito" (K. 621) and in the Rossini "Cruda Sorte" from "L'Italiana in Algeri."

And it is emotionally expressive, as it was Sunday when she personified romantic anguish while singing Berlioz six songs in "Les Nuits D'Ete" (Opus 7).

The Tchaikovsky "Francesca da Rimini" which followed, certainly an exciting musical report of the furies of Dante's Inferno, seemed almost anticlimactic.

* * *

Chamber Session

The chamber music session at 10 a.m. presented a couple of lovely traditional pieces and a couple of 20th century works of power and substance.

The composers, respectively, were Haydn and Beethoven and Riegger and Carter.

The Hayden was a string quartet (Opus 76, No. 2) the Beethoven, a trio for piano and strings (Opus 70 No. 1.). Both were as nice as the weather, especially the middle movement of the Beethoven Trio...pure charm.

The Riegger was titled "Concerto for Piano and Woodwind Quintet" (Opus 539) and was characterized by eccentric, lumpy rhythms and plenty of odd melodic fragments.

The Carter Woodwind Quintet (1948) was highly contrapuntal, sinuously interweaving melodic strains in constantly varying degrees of intensity and dissonance and texture and color. A serious and impressive work but a bit heavy for a langorous, sunny Sunday morning.

Next week end will wind up the 1969 Tanglewood season. Milton Katims, music director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor Friday; Erich Leinsdorf and Malcolm Frager, pianist, will present Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto Saturday night, and Sunday afternoon Leinsdorf will end his seven years as music director of the orchestra with a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the same work with which Charles Munch ended his 12 years at the head of the orchestra and the same work with which Koussevitzky ended many Tanglewood seasons.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 18 1969

Berlioz cycle sung with romantic air

LENOX — Sunday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert at Tanglewood provided an exceptionally beautiful performance of an exceptionally beautiful composition, Berlioz's song cycle, "Nuite d'Ete" (Summer Nights). It was sung by Marilyn Horne and conducted by Henry Lewis, her husband.

In the six songs, Berlioz works with exquisite poetic sensability to the partly-erotic, partly-elegiac content of Gauthier's poems, and the music is characteristically restrained, precise, and delicate.

He uses horns in only four of the songs, a harp in just one, and elsewhere makes do with seven, or even as few as four, woodwinds. Once he allows himself the luxury of the divided cello section. "Nuite d'Ete" is perhaps the most intimate of all romantic song cycles, with everything in it achieved by the most inflections of phrase, harmony, and color.

Marilyn Horne is most famous as a bravura singer of spectacular security and radiance, and after the intermission she satisfied the general blood lust scales, leaps, broken chords, and other sorts of passage work, brilliantly and to the audience's wild delight. What she sang was "Parto, parto," from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito" and "Cruda sorte," from Rossini's "L'italiana in Algeiri." Her singing of the show pieces was like exposure, an externalization for its own sake, of the marvelous mechanism that made possible the unobtrusive perfection of vocal art in the quiet Berlioz songs.

She is a performer in whom great vocal art is joined to great musical art, and her interpretations have grown finer in direct relation to her growing command of her technical resources. The most remarkable qualities of her singing of "nuite d'ete" were the sense of style with the awareness of Berlioz's closeness to the nobility and classicism of Gluck, the rich declamation and intensity, and that she sings words as well music (as well as, never instead of).

Henry Lewis and the orchestra produced a beautifully fashioned context for this singing. The orchestral playing was lovely in itself, but also part of a superlatively sensitive ensemble operation. The accompaniments to the Mozart and Rossini arias went well, too, though the clarinet obligato in "Parto, party," was marred by me crude accentuations. Lewis began the concert with Berlioz's "Consair" overture, I should call the performance solid rather than fiery, but it was an effective statement of that handsome piece. He ended with a sometimes rather rough ride through "Francesca da Rimini," which, in spite of lovely quiet writing in the middle section, is an unusually empty and noisy piece of Tchaikovsky.

Saturday night's concert was conducted by David Zinman, replacing Max Rudolph, who is ill. Zinman took on the program Rudolph had selected, doing Haydn's Symphony 83 in G minor instead of 91, but keeping Bartok's dance suite and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique."

Like Zinman's 18th century program at the second Tanglewood week-end, this concert, too, was an occasion of great musical pleasure. Everything moved naturally and freely, the rhythm was alive, and there was nice sense of character to everything. The orchestra's sounded alive and engaged, though some of it, especially the finale of the Haydn and a few pages of the Bartok, showed there had not been enough rehearsal time.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

AUG 18 1969

Music Review

Tanglewood Audience Acclaims Marilyn Horne

By JAY ROSENFELD

RARELY has an artist at Tanglewood been accorded acclaim to surpass that given Marilyn Horne yesterday afternoon at the final concert of the penultimate weekend of the season. Miss Horne's contributions were enclosed by two orchestral pieces but her part happily was by far the major portion of the program.

She sang the lyrically sentimental "Les Nuits d'Ete" of Berlioz and, after the intermission, the powerfully dramatic aria "Parto, parto" from Mozart's "La clemenza di Tito" and the "Cruda sorte" from Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri." There could not have been better pieces chosen to show the range and capabilities of her voice and her potential of graphic characterization.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Henry Lewis, the husband of Miss Horne, played the Berlioz overture "Le Corsaire" and Tchaikovsky's poem, "Francesca da Rimini." Miss Horne astounded anyone not familiar with her art with the remarkably secure coloratura bravado she displayed in her Mozart and Rossini, after having proven herself so thoroughly a chansonierre in the Berlioz.

* * *

IT IS ADMITTEDLY a futile speculation to hypothesize but it becomes evident on scant observation that, had Mozart been granted the biblical life allotment, he might have known the composers and heard the music of Rossini and Berlioz which Miss Horne sang. In such an event, Mozart would have been only 57 when Rossini wrote his "L'Italiana," and 78 when Berlioz composed his "Nuits." It is evident what the later composers learned from Mozart. One can only guess what such a sentient man as Mozart would have gleaned from the younger men.

Mr. Lewis was not firm in his direction to the musicians in the orchestral works and was not as clear and direct in the vocal accompaniments as he might have been. But the ease and quality of Miss Horne's voice, with its long sustained line, were outstanding factors. Her performance in the spectacular pyrotechnics in which she had a virtuoso dialogue with clarinetist Peter Hadcock was a memorable moment at Tanglewood. Her final "Oh Dio! consiglio?" on an ascending scale from the dominant to the tonic was a marvel of vocal incandescence.

* * *

THE TWO PRECEDING programs had been entirely orchestral. Erich Leinsdorf, the musical director of the orchestra, conducted the Friday night concert and David Zinman, the Saturday evening concert. Leinsdorf's program of two Beethoven symphonies was monumentally played.

Program construction must obviously choose one of two paths: either that of familiar favorites or that of unknown and unfamiliar territory. Near the end of a concert series, (the Tanglewood schedule comes to a close this coming week) there is an apparent moderate haste to include the immortal masterpieces and, at the same time, a sprinkling of works never before heard on this platform. This does not necessarily mean new and lately composed music.

It is not only remarkable but probably significant that such a thing as Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini" had never before been on a Tanglewood program in all its 35 years. Although, for some ears, a repetition after 35 more will be soon enough. We do not always remember that the entire catalogue of even the greatest composers is not equally effective.

* * *

THERE WOULD be more reason to wonder, however, why the Haydn Symphony in G Minor, No. 83, and the Bartok Dance Suite, which is by comparison only a youngster, having been composed as late as 1923, had never before been heard at Tanglewood. These were on Zinman's Saturday program.

Zinman played the program which was supposed to be conducted by Max Rudolf, who was obliged to cancel his engagement. It included one of the pyramids of orchestral literature, the Tchaikovsky B Minor Symphony, the "Pathetique." Before the season is over, we will have had all three of the big Tchaikovskys and a fraction short of half of the Beethoven nine.

LEINSDORF assigned himself but one of the weekend's three programs. He played two of the great Beethovens, the Pastoral and the Eroica. It is unfair to compare the salient points of artists; it is not quite a horse race. Nor is it even pertinent to mention the attributes of an experienced master such as Leinsdorf against the qualifications of a man only slightly more than half his age. Yet, Leinsdorf's poise and architectural sense are most evident in such music as the two great symphonies he played. They were major factors in the gratification his performances afforded the week's largest audience, the only concert which was favored with undisturbing weather.

Zinman brought a keen zip and verve to his evening. Everything he played had an extra exhilaration and if he erred, it was on the side of sparkle and brilliance. His Tchaikovsky was entirely unhackneyed. He just let the marvelous orchestra play in many of the most melodious sections and if he was impetuous and overheated in the scherzo, for instance, he made the indication read "vivace molten vivace." Another orchestra might have had a mad scramble at the pace Zinman took, but he made it come out with the musicians and some portion of the audience on the edge of their chairs.

The Bartok Dance Suite consists of six delightful rhythmic sections joined by a ritornello, much as are the "Pictures" of Moussorgsky joined by the "Promenade" in the gallery. Zinman proved himself as secure in the melodic lines as in the metric intricacies. The Haydn symphony was an exquisite miniature beside the larger-dimensioned later music on the program and was an excellent foil to the more involved and emotionally charged other sections. The menuet gave flutist James Pappoutsakis an opportunity to display his eloquent artistry.

Whitestone

Soloist Marilyn Horne acknowledges plaudits of the audience as husband Henry Lewis, who conducted Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon, stands proudly in back.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 18 1969

19,668 Attend Tanglewood Over Weekend

LENOX — Some 19,668 people attended three concerts and a morning rehearsal over the weekend at Tanglewood. The largest attendance was at Friday night's concert when Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two Beethoven symphonies.

Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony Orchestra before 7,227 people in Beethoven's "Pastoral" and "Eroica" for the benefit of the Berkshire Medical Center. In the prelude program at 7, five members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players presented Schubert's "The Trout" Quintet, Op. 114.

Some 2,074 attended an open rehearsal Saturday morning, and 4,886 attended the night program which featured as guest conductor David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra of Holland. Zinman took the place of Max Rudolf, who was scheduled but could not attend because of illness. Zinman conducted pieces by Haydn, Bartok and Tchaikovsky.

Marilyn Horne sang Sunday afternoon before 5,481 people. Cheering fans shouted and screamed and called her back on stage. Her husband, Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, was guest conductor.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 18 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 9 1969

Coming Events

Highlights of the Season

Week of August 17

TANGLEWOOD—Sunday, Aug. 17: BSO conducted by Henry Lewis in a program of Berlioz, Mozart, Rossini and Tchaikovsky . . . Friday, Aug. 22: BSO conducted by Milton Katims in a program of Rossini, Tchaikovsky, Vaughn Williams and Ravel . . . Saturday, Aug. 23: BSO conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in a program of Varese, Beethoven and Stravinsky.

THEATRE—Berkshire Theatre Festival: Encounters . . . Colonie: Burlesque Follies of '69 . . . Sharon Playhouse: Major Barbara . . . Storrowton: How Now, Dow Jones . . . Williamstown: You Know I Can't Hear You When the Water's Running.

DANCE—Jacob's Pillow: American Dance Company and the Jacob's Pillow Dancers, Aug. 21-23.

Week of August 24

TANGLEWOOD — Sunday, Aug. 24: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in a program of Berlioz and Beethoven.

THEATRE — Colonie: There's a Girl in My Soup . . . Sharon Playhouse: A Flea in Her Ear . . . Storrowton: Hello Sucker.

DANCE — Jacob's Pillow: Patricia McBride, Edward Villella, Nala Najan, Anuradha, and the Jacob's Pillow Dancers, Aug. 28-30.

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(E) 6,200

AUG 19 1969

Record Tanglewood Attendance

LENOX — The three concerts and morning rehearsal over the weekend at Tanglewood were attended by a record 19,668 people. The largest attendance was at Friday night's concert when Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two Beethoven symphonies.

Mr. & Mrs. Masters

70.

Marilyn Horne
. . . molten honey

Henry Lewis
. . . sizzling conductor

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — At Saturday morning's open rehearsal, Tanglewood visitors were startled to see the prima donna walk off stage and return with a towel for the hard-working conductor. Sopranos rarely treat the maestro with such solicitude.

In this case, it may have been natural, for the soprano, Marilyn Horne, is married to the conductor, Henry Lewis. And on Sunday afternoon they teamed up for a concert that delighted a gathering of 5,481.

Henry Lewis conducted the Boston Symphony in Berlioz' "Le Corsaire" overture and Tschaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," while his wife soloed in Berlioz' "Les nuits d'ete" and in arias by Mozart and Rossini.

The concert, in fact, nearly stopped after Marilyn's singing of the showy "Cruda sorte" from Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri," for she brought the house down with the kind of super-coloratura acrobatics which makes her more than a match for the likes of Joan Sutherland. This, combined with a voice like molten honey that encompasses an enormous range, makes Marilyn Horne a treasured artist.

She is a versatile and musical singer as well, having the power of a dramatic soprano, the flexibility of a coloratura, and a range that can dip down into extraordinarily vibrant low notes. She can thus toss off the embellishments of "Cruda sorte" or the lyric lines of "Parto, parto" from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito" with the same ease as she encompasses the interpretive problems and sustained lines as "Les nuits d'ete."

This setting of six poems by Theophile Gautier is subdued yet ardent Berlioz — softely perfumed, imaginative music presenting a formidable challenge for the singer, not least in its wide range. For sheer sensuosity, it would be hard to find a voice more suited in quality to match this music, and if some episodes seemed more cautious in performance than they were in rehearsal, Horne's warm, caressing tones and Lewis' expressive conducting provided radiant music-making.

Lest Henry Lewis be thought of only as the man who got the towel, and who smiled indulgently after the lengthy torrent of applause for his wife, he contributed more than accompaniment. The "Corsaire" overture sounded trim and spunky under his baton and "Francesca da Rimini" sizzled.

Both are gaudy works of orchestration, with sections of lyric repose amid the tumult and busy-work, which Lewis managed with poise and vigor. He gives a lot of dynamic impulse to the showy sound of Tschaikovsky, yet the softer cantabile passages are equally well managed with a fine sense of line and direction. Making "Francesca da Rimini" with its mashed-potato rhetoric sound good is a feat in itself!

Saturday night's conductor was David Zinman, young conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, who just a few weeks previously had led a baroque-classical program at Tanglewood. This time, Zinman was filling in for the ailing Max Rudolf, and took over most of Rudolf's program on a moist evening before 4,886.

This meant Zinman went beyond his supposed chamber music speciality, into the romantic and beyond. Haydn's pert Symphony No. 83 in g minor (called "The Hen" from the cluckings in strings and oboes in the first movement's second subject), presented the mobile, fast-moving conductor in the style in which he has previously directed at Tanglewood: a lively, gracefully-modeled performance with a fine sense of perspective and expressive use of dynamics.

But Zinman turned out to be more than a master of miniatures. His conceptions of Bartok's Dance Suite and Tschiakovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6 were enterprising, personal, sometimes exciting, and altogether interesting even if not in the same balance as his baroque-classical work.

In the opening sections of both works, there were passages broken into their phrase-components rather than read as parts of larger structural entities. But in neither case did this compartmentalization persist.

In the Bartok, Zinman let us clearly hear the metrical changes from bar to bar, making the music sound somewhat like Stravinsky. The ritornellos, which in their various guises separate and link the main dance movements, were beautifully done. And in exchange for an occasional lack of smoothness or balance Zinman contributed a good deal of energy and startling climaxes.

The Tschikovsky was more of a surprise. The introduction, somewhat cautious, classic-clear in sound and scrubbed of sentimentality, hardly prepared us far the later tumult. When the storm broke in that massive climax of the first movement, the chamber-music Zinman of the precise scale and scrupulous inflection seemed replaced by a hyper-romantic out of "Gotter dammerung." Zinman likes to move, sway and dip in balletic contortions; in this symphony he went into a caricature of over-conducting, even hissing — and at one point shouting — at the orchestra.

The result was a "Pathetique" quivering with energy, but not with the usual swoon and croon romanticism; one in which a passage could be presented with airy, unsentimental phrasing, but would be followed by an histrionic climax in which brass and percussion were out of balance; and one in which Zinman, for all his sense of rhythm, pushed the orchestra too hard in the march, resulting in ragged playing and wind intonation.

For sure, it wasn't dull.

In his next-to-last weekend as music director of the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf led an all-Beethoven program Friday night. It was a benefit concert for the Berkshire Medical Center and 7,227 attended.

Leinsdorf employed a juxtaposition of opposites in his program — the gentle "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6 and the mighty "Eroica" No. 3. Both were given shapely, well-played performances.

The "Pastoral" picked up strength and emotion as it progressed. Leinsdorf took the first two movements at a faster pace than customary. By the third movement, he was letting out the stops on his gestures, swinging and bouncing, and adding vocal huffs and puffs to the thunderstorm section. The woodwind playing was particularly noteworthy.

In the "Eroica," Leinsdorf sensibly avoided overpowering the first movement with its granitic chords, evoking a lean sound from the orchestra and intelligently molding the episodes of tension and relaxation.

In the second movement, there was an interesting touch when the fugal section was restrained within the character of the funeral march, taken slow and weighty instead of the quicker, brighter tempi many conductors favor.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

AUG 19 1969

A Great Voice

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I agree with your music critic in his review of Marilyn Horne's program at Tanglewood Aug. 17. Not since the days of the brilliant Conchita Supervia have we heard a voice like it. Such depth, such power, and yet such coloratura range. Some of your readers and listeners might like to get Madam Supervia's memorial Columbia masterwork record, and thrill to those 24 scale cadenzas as also performed by Miss Horne. She is surely destined for a great operatic career.

I think your critic was a little stingy in his praise for Henry Lewis. Quite apart from being the prima donna's husband, he matched his conducting skills admirably with her performance. In any case the whole orchestra was so magnificent, they sounded as if they could have romped through it all without a conductor. Lewis worked hard and inspiringly. All credit to him.

WALTER S. RYAN.
20 Park Place,
Lee.

Berkshire Eagle
8-20-'69

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 18 1969

Lewis, Marilyn Horne Excite Small Tanglewood Audience

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

Gazette Review

LENOX — Poor attendance continues to plague Tanglewood. Best showing for the weekend was Friday night when a Beethoven program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf drew 7,227. A factor was the use of the evening as a benefit event for Berkshire Medical Center. The Saturday concert under David Zinman (with threatening weather) attracted 4,886, and yesterday's program with Henry Lewis and Marilyn Horne and partially sunny skies had the surprisingly low total of 5,481.

Lewis (conductor of the New Jersey Symphony) made his first Boston appearance last spring, and he and his wife (she is slated for the Metropolitan Opera next season) were well received recently at Meadow Brook Music Festival in Michigan.

Marilyn Horne

Henry Lewis

Choral Works

Though Tanglewood has been rich in choral works with soloists, yesterday was the first major concert of the summer in which a vocalist appeared alone. Programming pitfalls were evident as Miss Horne first achieved moderate success in Berlioz's cycle of six songs, "Summer Nights," and then overwhelming applause for arias by Mozart and Rossini.

Lewis not only gave his wife the most considerate and attentive of accompaniments but also handled the Boston Symphony with ease and stunning results in Berlioz's "Corsaire" Overture and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

These were pieces into which the conductor could throw his entire and very considerable resources, ranging from the spinning of lovely tone in quiet sequences to the building of tremendous climaxes. Memorable among the lyric moments were those reached by the cellos in the Tchaikovsky when Lewis merely guided their big passage with a minimum of adjuring.

Basic instruments like the viols and the tuba and other brasses have a fine full sonority under Lewis. They are loud and they are wonderful.

Berlioz's overture on the pirate theme had its suitable moments of impudence and swagger, as well as sentimental interludes. The Tchaikovsky depiction of tragic Francesca involved more serious fare, with lost souls in the darkness of an eternal hereafter, and a tender recapitulation of the story of the wife who found her crippled husband less comely than his brother, and finally fell victim to the husband's dagger.

If Lewis achieved big sounds early in this work he saved the blockbuster for the end, when the orchestra and conductor seemed to explode in a spasm of tumult that was amazing.

Great Range

Marilyn Horne's voice has a great range, displayed marvelously in the arias, where she could leap from top notes to a firm and rich alto quality. The arias were "Parto, parto" from Mozart's "La clemenza di Tito" and "Cruda sorte" from Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri." After these, the audience went wild, and demanded at least half a dozen recalls.

The singer brought lovely tone and sensitive interpretation to Berlioz's "Nuits d'ete," but the first five songs were too much alike in mood, and the greater zest of the last did not lift the group to a really showy total. The net result was singing which a more intimate size and type of audience would enjoy. At times, the fine voice lacked penetration. No such limitations vexed the arias, and the ovation at that point was impressive, even for enthusiastic Tanglewood audiences.

Tanglewood Review

Music Talents Offer Exciting Afternoon

A most exciting afternoon of music making provided the climax to the penultimate weekend of the Berkshire Festival when Henry Lewis appeared as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Marilyn Horne, mezzo-soprano, took the stage as soloist.

There were so many riches that deserve acclamation and so many delights to enjoy that it is difficult to know where to begin, but I suppose that first things first might serve as an adequate method of organization.

Aside from the orchestra itself, which is, of course, a very fine instrument (yesterday) a little rough-sounding and thin in places for some reason, of obvious elan and accomplishment, there was really splendid conducting of this ensemble by Mr. Lewis. Forceful and authoritative, unafraid to use his body and his face to help pronounce his musical declamation (but not eccentric or flamboyantly acrobatic in the spirit of "show for show's sake," like others we could mention, but won't out of some sense of charity), he conducts with an admirable precision, neat, rhythmically crystalline, clear and controlled, but passionate as well. Such powers were bound to do ample justice to the Berlioz' overture, "Le Corsaire," and to the Tchaikovsky "Francesca da Rimini," which opened and closed the program, respectively, and they did. The Berlioz, for instance, a charming little work, was rendered with a flair that considerably extended its merit and the Tchaikovsky was given a no-holds barred, enthusiastic and expansive reading that underscored its lyricism and somehow minimized its moments of melodrama (even while it gave climaxes their due). It was in the lyrical sections that Mr. Lewis and the orchestra interacted to make their most effective points, for there the musical landscape allowed for the kind of spacious, vital, and beautifully flexible flow that each found especially congenial.

Miss Horne joined the orchestra for the Berlioz "Les Nuits d'ete" and the performance of two arias, "Parto, Parto" from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito" and "Cruda sorte" from Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algieri." Miss Horne" especial abilities and accomplishments are too well-known to need chronicle here, and what she did with all three composers was largely to verify fine impressions she had made earlier. She is a beautiful woman, she has a very lovely voice, that voice is shaped by a formidable technique, and that technique is guided by musicality and intelligence.

With all those virtues, it is all the more strange, to me at least, that the Berlioz was not more successful than it was. Some of the six songs in the cycle, it is true, were powerfully presented, representing a splendid wedding of text, music, and performer (it would be more accurate to say performers, for in such a work, one cannot dispense with the contributions of conductor and orchestra; but Miss Horne is my particular concern here). Such were, particularly the first song, "Villanelle," the fifth, "Au Cimetiere" and the final one, "L'Ile Inconnue," the last delivered with a kind of breathless and heightened animation that was entirely appropriate. Perhaps the performance of the whole was less than definitive, however, because the soloist often seemed tentative in manner with the text, even if her singing was secure and solid, and it might have been too that the absence of rapture and total identification mitigated against greatest effect. Such a song as "Absence" suffered particularly from an emphasis that arose, it seems to me, precisely from the lack of freedom and involved spontaneity that characterized much of her work in the cycle.

About the singing of the Mozart and the Rossini arias there can be no complaint. I am sure that Miss Horne is tired of hearing that pieces such as these are her specialty, and I will not add to her burden by so saying at any great length. But it is true that things like this she does remarkably well, and in both cases, the effect was stunning. The long, sustained lines, the rapid passages of roulades, runs, and complicated tonal configurations — it was all spectacular, even with a less than attractive tone or two, and the audience went wild. They recalled Miss Horne for bow after bow and I am sure that if encores were allowed, she would be singing them still.

The rest of the concerts during the weekend ranged from the all-Beethoven program Friday conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, to the evening of Haydn, Bartok and Tchaikovsky on Saturday, with David Zinman as guest conductor. Mr. Leinsdorf's work with the orchestra, and in particular his interpretations of Beethoven, do not need elaborate commentary here (the complete nine symphonies are available from the record company for which he and the orchestra have recorded), and I particularly enjoyed the quieter sections of the "Pastoral" and the Scherzo of the "Eroica." Some might question the eccentricities of some of Mr. Leinsdorf's readings, as in the more dramatic sections of both works, but for me they were not extreme and seemed, in fact, to serve the music he was delineating. And I should add that in the past I have felt (and said) that quite often Mr. Leinsdorf loses sight of the whole in his concern for the particular phrase, the small section. I am happy to say that this evening such stress, such isolated intensity or force, seemed quietly, effectively and entirely absorbed into a larger vision. It was, therefore, a very fine evening for both conductor and orchestra.

Such cannot be said, unfortunately, for the work of Mr. Zinman with the group. Not that the evening was a disaster, for it wasn't, but it varied so from good to less than that, that it must be accounted one of the lesser events at the festival. Perhaps most unsatisfactory was the Haydn which opened the program. Mr. Zinman made the mistake of appearing to take the work very lightly, as something to which he did not need to give his undivided attention or serious concern (and it is true that it is lesser Haydn, but thoroughly respectable nevertheless), and the result was that the "Allegro" was anything but "spiritoso," the "Andante" was soggy and the "Minuet and Trio" drooped, a wallflower, not a dance. The Bartok "Dance Suite" was a great deal better, because Mr. Zinman seemed to consider this more worthy of his metal, and he and the orchestra treated its complexities with admirable sonority and crispness. The Tchaikovsky was somewhere between the two, but not very comfortable in the middle ground, to which it had been consigned. The symphony ("The Pathetique") is not one of my favorites, but I found I liked it even less when Mr. Zinman got through with it than I did before.

Attendance this weekend was highest for Friday night, when 7,227 entered the grounds. There were 4,886 Saturday and 5,481 on Sunday afternoon. — B.D.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 19 1969

Mr. & Mrs. Masters

70.

Marilyn Horne
. . . molten honey

Henry Lewis
. . . sizzling conductor

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — At Saturday morning's open rehearsal, Tanglewood visitors were startled to see the prima donna walk off stage and return with a towel for the hard-working conductor. Sopranos rarely treat the maestro with such solicitude.

In this case, it may have been natural, for the soprano, Marilyn Horne, is married to the conductor, Henry Lewis. And on Sunday afternoon they teamed up for a concert that delighted a gathering of 5,481.

Henry Lewis conducted the Boston Symphony in Berlioz' "Le Corsaire" overture and Tschaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," while his wife soloed in Berlioz' "Les nuits d'ete" and in arias by Mozart and Rossini.

The concert, in fact, nearly stopped after Marilyn's singing of the showy "Cruda sorte" from Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri," for she brought the house down with the kind of super-coloratura acrobatics which makes her more than a match for the likes of Joan Sutherland. This, combined with a voice like molten honey that encompasses an enormous range, makes Marilyn Horne a treasured artist.

She is a versatile and musical singer as well, having the power of a dramatic soprano, the flexibility of a coloratura, and a range that can dip down into extraordinarily vibrant low notes. She can thus toss off the embellishments of "Cruda sorte" or the lyric lines of "Parto, parto" from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito" with the same ease as she encompasses the interpretive problems and sustained lines as "Les nuits d'ete."

This setting of six poems by Theophile Gautier is subdued yet ardent Berlioz — softly perfumed, imaginative music presenting a formidable challenge for the singer, not least in its wide range. For sheer sensuosity, it would be hard to find a voice more suited in quality to match this music, and if some episodes seemed more cautious in performance than they were in rehearsal, Horne's warm, caressing tones and Lewis' expressive conducting provided radiant music-making.

Lest Henry Lewis be thought of only as the man who got the towel, and who smiled indulgently after the lengthy torrent of applause for his wife, he contributed more than accompaniment. The "Corsaire" overture sounded trim and spunky under his baton and "Francesca da Rimini" sizzled.

Both are gaudy works of orchestration, with sections of lyric repose amid the tumult and busy-work, which Lewis managed with poise and vigor. He gives a lot of dynamic impulse to the showy sound of Tschaikovsky, yet the softer cantabile passages are equally well managed with a fine sense of line and direction. Making "Francesca da Rimini" with its mashed-potato rhetoric sound good is a feat in itself!

Saturday night's conductor was David Zinman, young conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, who just a few weeks previously had led a baroque-classical program at Tanglewood. This time, Zinman was filling in for the ailing Max Rudolf, and took over most of Rudolf's program on a moist evening before 4,886.

This meant Zinman went beyond his supposed chamber music speciality, into the romantic and beyond. Haydn's pert Symphony No. 83 in g minor (called "The Hen" from the cluckings in strings and oboes in the first movement's second subject), presented the mobile, fast-moving conductor in the style in which he has previously directed at Tanglewood: a lively, gracefully-modeled performance with a fine sense of perspective and expressive use of dynamics.

But Zinman turned out to be more than a master of miniatures. His conceptions of Bartok's Dance Suite and Tschiakovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6 were enterprising, personal, sometimes exciting, and altogether interesting even if not in the same balance as his baroque-classical work.

In the opening sections of both works, there were passages broken into their phrase-components rather than read as parts of larger structural entities. But in neither case did this compartmentalization persist.

In the Bartok, Zinman let us clearly hear the metrical changes from bar to bar, making the music sound somewhat like Stravinsky. The ritornellos, which in their various guises separate and link the main dance movements, were beautifully done. And in exchange for an occasional lack of smoothness or balance Zinman contributed a good deal of energy and startling climaxes.

The Tschikovsky was more of a surprise. The introduction, somewhat cautious, classic-clear in sound and scrubbed of sentimentality, hardly prepared us far the later tumult. When the storm broke in that massive climax of the first movement, the chamber-music Zinman of the precise scale and scrupulous inflection seemed replaced by a hyper-romantic out of "Gotter dammerung." Zinman likes to move, sway and dip in balletic contortions; in this symphony he went into a caricature of over-conducting, even hissing — and at one point shouting — at the orchestra.

The result was a "Pathetique" quivering with energy, but not with the usual swoon and croon romanticism; one in which a passage could be presented with airy, unsentimental phrasing, but would be followed by an histrionic climax in which brass and percussion were out of balance; and one in which Zinman, for all his sense of rhythm, pushed the orchestra too hard in the march, resulting in ragged playing and wind intonation.

For sure, it wasn't dull.

In his next-to-last weekend as music director of the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf led an all-Beethoven program Friday night. It was a benefit concert for the Berkshire Medical Center and 7,227 attended.

Leinsdorf employed a juxtaposition of opposites in his program — the gentle "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6 and the mighty "Eroica" No. 3. Both were given shapely, well-played performances.

The "Pastoral" picked up strength and emotion as it progressed. Leinsdorf took the first two movements at a faster pace than customary. By the third movement, he was letting out the stops on his gestures, swinging and bouncing, and adding vocal huffs and puffs to the thunderstorm section. The woodwind playing was particularly noteworthy.

In the "Eroica," Leinsdorf sensibly avoided overpowering the first movement with its granitic chords, evoking a lean sound from the orchestra and intelligently molding the episodes of tension and relaxation.

In the second movement, there was an interesting touch when the fugal section was restrained within the character of the funeral march, taken slow and weighty instead of the quicker, brighter tempi many conductors favor.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

AUG 19 1969

A Great Voice

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I agree with your music critic in his review of Marilyn Horne's program at Tanglewood Aug. 17. Not since the days of the brilliant Conchita Supervia have we heard a voice like it. Such depth, such power, and yet such coloratura range. Some of your readers and listeners might like to get Madam Supervia's memorial Columbia masterwork record, and thrill to those 24 scale cadenzas as also performed by Miss Horne. She is surely destined for a great operatic career.

I think your critic was a little stingy in his praise for Henry Lewis. Quite apart from being the prima donna's husband, he matched his conducting skills admirably with her performance. In any case the whole orchestra was so magnificent, they sounded as if they could have romped through it all without a conductor. Lewis worked hard and inspiringly. All credit to him.

WALTER S. RYAN.
20 Park Place,
Lee.

Berkshire Eagle
8-20-'69

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 18 1969

Lewis, Marilyn Horne Excite Small Tanglewood Audience

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

Gazette Review

LENOX — Poor attendance continues to plague Tanglewood. Best showing for the weekend was Friday night when a Beethoven program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf drew 7,227. A factor was the use of the evening as a benefit event for Berkshire Medical Center. The Saturday concert under David Zinman (with threatening weather) attracted 4,886, and yesterday's program with Henry Lewis and Marilyn Horne and partially sunny skies had the surprisingly low total of 5,481.

Lewis (conductor of the New Jersey Symphony) made his first Boston appearance last spring, and he and his wife (she is slated for the Metropolitan Opera next season) were well received recently at Meadow Brook Music Festival in Michigan.

Choral Works

Though Tanglewood has been rich in choral works with soloists, yesterday was the first major concert of the summer in which a vocalist appeared alone. Programming pitfalls were evident as Miss Horne first achieved moderate success in Berlioz's cycle of six songs, "Summer Nights," and then overwhelming applause for arias by Mozart and Rossini.

Lewis not only gave his wife the most considerate and attentive of accompaniments but also handled the Boston Symphony with ease and stunning results in Berlioz's "Corsaire" Overture and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

These were pieces into which the conductor could throw his entire and very considerable resources, ranging from the spinning of lovely tone in quiet sequences to the building of tremendous climaxes. Memorable among the lyric moments were those reached by the cellos in the Tchaikovsky when Lewis merely guided their big passage with a minimum of adjuring.

Marilyn Horne

Henry Lewis

Basic instruments like the viols and the tuba and other brasses have a fine full sonority under Lewis. They are loud and they are wonderful.

Berlioz's overture on the pirate theme had its suitable moments of impudence and swagger, as well as sentimental interludes. The Tchaikovsky depiction of tragic Francesca involved more serious fare, with lost souls in the darkness of an eternal hereafter, and a tender recapitulation of the story of the wife who found her crippled husband less comely than his brother, and finally fell victim to the husband's dagger.

If Lewis achieved big sounds early in this work he saved the blockbuster for the end, when the orchestra and conductor seemed to explode in a spasm of tumult that was amazing.

Great Range

Marilyn Horne's voice has a great range, displayed marvelously in the arias, where she could leap from top notes to a firm and rich alto quality. The arias were "Parto, parto" from Mozart's "La clemenza di Tito" and "Cruda sorte" from Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri." After these, the audience went wild, and demanded at least half a dozen recalls.

The singer brought lovely tone and sensitive interpretation to Berlioz's "Nuits d'ete," but the first five songs were too much alike in mood, and the greater zest of the last did not lift the group to a really showy total. The net result was singing which a more intimate size and type of audience would enjoy. At times, the fine voice lacked penetration. No such limitations vexed the arias, and the ovation at that point was impressive, even for enthusiastic Tanglewood audiences.

Tanglewood Review

Music Talents Offer Exciting Afternoon

A most exciting afternoon of music making provided the climax to the penultimate weekend of the Berkshire Festival when Henry Lewis appeared as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Marilyn Horne, mezzo-soprano, took the stage as soloist.

There were so many riches that deserve acclamation and so many delights to enjoy that it is difficult to know where to begin, but I suppose that first things first might serve as an adequate method of organization.

Aside from the orchestra itself, which is, of course, a very fine instrument (yesterday) a little rough-sounding and thin in places for some reason, of obvious elan and accomplishment, there was really splendid conducting of this ensemble by Mr. Lewis. Forceful and authoritative, unafraid to use his body and his face to help pronounce his musical declamation (but not eccentric or flamboyantly acrobatic in the spirit of "show for show's sake," like others we could mention, but won't out of some sense of charity), he conducts with an admirable precision, neat, rhythmically crystalline, clear and controlled, but passionate as well. Such powers were bound to do ample justice to the Berlioz' overture, "Le Corsaire," and to the Tchaikovsky "Francesca da Rimini," which opened and closed the program, respectively, and they did. The Berlioz, for instance, a charming little work, was rendered with a flair that considerably extended its merit and the Tchaikovsky was given a no-holds barred, enthusiastic and expansive reading that underscored its lyricism and somehow minimized its moments of melodrama (even while it gave climaxes their due). It was in the lyrical sections that Mr. Lewis and the orchestra interacted to make their most effective points, for there the musical landscape allowed for the kind of spacious, vital, and beautifully flexible flow that each found especially congenial.

Miss Horne joined the orchestra for the Berlioz "Les Nuits d'ete" and the performance of two arias, "Parto, Parto" from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito" and "Cruda sorte" from Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algieri." Miss Horne" especial abilities and accomplishments are too well-known to need chronicle here, and what she did with all three composers was largely to verify fine impressions she had made earlier. She is a beautiful woman, she has a very lovely voice, that voice is shaped by a formidable technique, and that technique is guided by musicality and intelligence.

With all those virtues, it is all the more strange, to me at least, that the Berlioz was not more successful than it was. Some of the six songs in the cycle, it is true, were powerfully presented, representing a splendid wedding of text, music, and performer (it would be more accurate to say performers, for in such a work, one cannot dispense with the contributions of conductor and orchestra; but Miss Horne is my particular concern here). Such were, particularly the first song, "Villanelle," the fifth, "Au Cimetiere" and the final one, "L'Ile Inconnue," the last delivered with a kind of breathless and heightened animation that was entirely appropriate. Perhaps the performance of the whole was less than definitive, however, because the soloist often seemed tentative in manner with the text, even if her singing was secure and solid, and it might have been too that the absence of rapture and total identification mitigated against greatest effect. Such a song as "Absence" suffered particularly from an emphasis that arose, it seems to me, precisely from the lack of freedom and involved spontaneity that characterized much of her work in the cycle.

About the singing of the Mozart and the Rossini arias there can be no complaint. I am sure that Miss Horne is tired of hearing that pieces such as these are her specialty, and I will not add to her burden by so saying at any great length. But it is true that things like this she does remarkably well, and in both cases, the effect was stunning. The long, sustained lines, the rapid passages of roulades, runs, and complicated tonal configurations — it was all spectacular, even with a less than attractive tone or two, and the audience went wild. They recalled Miss Horne for bow after bow and I am sure that if encores were allowed, she would be singing them still.

The rest of the concerts during the weekend ranged from the all-Beethoven program Friday conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, to the evening of Haydn, Bartok and Tchaikovsky on Saturday, with David Zinman as guest conductor. Mr. Leinsdorf's work with the orchestra, and in particular his interpretations of Beethoven, do not need elaborate commentary here (the complete nine symphonies are available from the record company for which he and the orchestra have recorded), and I particularly enjoyed the quieter sections of the "Pastoral" and the Scherzo of the "Eroica." Some might question the eccentricities of some of Mr. Leinsdorf's readings, as in the more dramatic sections of both works, but for me they were not extreme and seemed, in fact, to serve the music he was delineating. And I should add that in the past I have felt (and said) that quite often Mr. Leinsdorf loses sight of the whole in his concern for the particular phrase, the small section. I am happy to say that this evening such stress, such isolated intensity or force, seemed quietly, effectively and entirely absorbed into a larger vision. It was, therefore, a very fine evening for both conductor and orchestra.

Such cannot be said, unfortunately, for the work of Mr. Zinman with the group. Not that the evening was a disaster, for it wasn't, but it varied so from good to less than that, that it must be accounted one of the lesser events at the festival. Perhaps most unsatisfactory was the Haydn which opened the program. Mr. Zinman made the mistake of appearing to take the work very lightly, as something to which he did not need to give his undivided attention or serious concern (and it is true that it is lesser Haydn, but thoroughly respectable nevertheless), and the result was that the "Allegro" was anything but "spiritoso," the "Andante" was soggy and the "Minuet and Trio" drooped, a wallflower, not a dance. The Bartok "Dance Suite" was a great deal better, because Mr. Zinman seemed to consider this more worthy of his metal, and he and the orchestra treated its complexities with admirable sonority and crispness. The Tchaikovsky was somewhere between the two, but not very comfortable in the middle ground to which it had been consigned. The symphony ("The Pathetique") is not one of my favorites, but I found I liked it even less when Mr. Zinman got through with it than I did before.

Attendance this weekend was highest for Friday night, when 7,227 entered the grounds. There were 4,886 Saturday and 5,481 on Sunday afternoon. — B.D.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,000

AUG 19 1969

Portrait of a Busy Man

By CHARLES BRIEFER

TANGLEWOOD — Henry Lewis at Tanglewood last weekend was something akin to a treasure hunt: You'd go to where you were supposed to meet him, only to find a note pinned to the door directing you to the next place.

We finally collided at the entrance to an artist's room backstage at the shed — he was twenty minutes late and completely out of breath, simply from trying to squeeze 25 hours into a day.

He looked a little tense, so I broke the ice with the magic sentence I'd been preparing: "Captain Rodriguez wants to see you in his office right away!" A big grin broke through and we were off and away. I was a flutist with the Seventh Army Symphony Orchestra in Stuttgart 15 years ago, and I left Germany to return to the states just days before Henry Lewis arrived. But we'd both endured the minor tyranny of a narrow-minded, unimaginative commanding officer, and it formed a tenuous sort of bond between us.

LEWIS'S BOYISH looks can fool you — for behind them is a completely mature no-nonsense individual who knows what his goals are and how to achieve them and the breaks have not been all on his side; he made his debut as conductor of the New Jersey Symphony in June 1968, and eight months later a strike knocked the orchestra out of the picture.

It was only settled last month, with signing of a new contract that guarantees 22 weeks of work and a minimum of $161 per man per week by 1971. I was dubious about a small orchestra's ability to live with these conditions, but Lewis was enthusiastic.

He feels that good terms will attract good musicians, which will lead to more bookings and more money coming in. As a matter of fact he was supposed to be interviewing Tanglewood students for his orchestra at that very moment, and they were beginning to make their presences felt — in strong silent ways — just beyond the open door!

BOOKING AUDIENCES usually go to orchestras, but Lewis plans to reverse the procedure. "People aren't going to those big gray halls any more, because they don't live next to them the way they used to." He sees the movement of populations away from urban centers as setting a pattern orchestras must follow if they are to survive.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 21 1969

8th Week

Leinsdorf To Conduct Symphony At Tanglewood This Weekend

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf will conduct his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at 2:30 p.m. The principal work is Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and baritone Justino Diaz as soloists. Berlioz "The Royal Hunt" and "Storm from the Trojans" opens the program.

The opening concert of the eighth and final weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival is tonight at 9. Milton Katims, music director of the Seattle Symsini's "Gazza Ladra Overture," Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 4," Vaughan Williams "Fantasia on a Theme" by Thomas Tallis, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2."

Saturday evening at 8 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's "Piano Concerto No. 4" with Malcolm Frager as soloist. The program opens with Edgar Varese's "Deserts" for orchestra and tape recorder, and closes with Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite."

The weekend prelude, tonight at 7, one of the short concerts presented each week for Friday evening ticket holders who come early to enjoy the Tanglewood grounds, features the internationally acclaimed soprano Beverly Sills. Accompanied by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, Miss Sills sings music by Vivaldi, Strauss and Schubert. The two Vivaldi solo cantatas on the program have never been sung publicly in America, according to available records.

The weekend's open rehearsal for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund, is Saturday morning at 10:30. All seats for the open rehearsal are unreserved at $2.50 each.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 22 1969 New England

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 21 1969 New England

Concerts At Tanglewood

FRIDAY-AUGUST 15
by J.W.H.

The customary Friday night rain at Tanglewood held off until after the music this week, depriving this reviewer of any critical comments about the weather. The audience appeared to be well-dressed, well-behaved and no more nor less ridiculous than any other such gathering of music lovers, depriving me of any snide comments on the American public en masse. We turn, then, to the music:

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players with Gilbert Kalish as pianist played the weekend prelude. It consisted of Schubert's "Piano Trio no. 1" and his "Quintet in A," both were performed with skill and charm and provided a pleasant contrast to the larger works to come later on.

Leinsdorf brought out every romantic detail of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." It is a long and repetitive work, but the lush strings of the B.S.O. and the superb woodwinds provided variety and contrast to hold the listener's attention and to beguile him with the beauty of the Austrian countryside as well as the Berkshire hills.

In contrast, Maestro Leinsdorf, gave a stirring reading of "The Third Symphony "Eroica," of which one never tires. Two Beethoven symphonies in one evening is a lot of musical meat and potatoes, but the audience fattened happily and gave the Boston an ovation at the end.

SATURDAY-AUGUST 16
By D.S.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of guest conductor, David Zinman, played the Haydn Symphony No. 83 in G minor (The Hen), Bartok's Dance Suite (1923), and the Pathetique of Tchaikovsky. (Need we hear this again? Why not perform one of the Suites for Orchestra for a change?) Zinman's conducting was very distracting. He is not a bad conductor, in that he has his basic tools of conducting well in hand; but does he have to put so much "body English" into his work? He prodded, pushed, yelled, and shushed the orchestra in places of sudden contrast from loud to soft. These sounds were clearly audible midway in the shed. Does the BSO really need berating? This kind of behavior is hardly musical, not to speak of the lack of professionalism clearly exhibited by Zinman.

The orchestra played everything well. The Bartok was given a spirited reading; all six movements had excellent timbral qualities. The Haydn Symphony was equally exciting, and the Tchaikovsky was played with a high regard for the inherent contrasts. One comes to a concert expecting a high degree of musicality and the BSO met my expectations. They are such seasoned performers that all the pyrotechnics on "center stage" seemed extraneous.

SUNDAY-AUGUST 17
By C.N.D.

Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood was as noisy as an Italian opera house, if not the Yale Bowl, when Marilyn Horne stepped on the stage. Her fans are numerous, devoted and vocal. There is reason for this because hers is one of those great voices of a generation – a coloratura contralto of sensuous beauty and voluminous sound and as flexible as an acrobat. This was Marilyn Horne's day. Before the intermission she sang "Les Nuits d'Ete," six songs of Berlioz, which are milestones in the song literature of France. Like all French songs the words are of paramount importance and the music of considerable subtlety. It was a mistake to put these on a Tanglewood program – they are not for the great outdoors. But no matter, they were magnificently sung. After the intermission came two operatic arias by Mozart & Rossini that could be sung outdoors if the voice were a powerful one and these proved to be an unforgetable experience. I didn't time the applause but it must have lasted a full ten minutes after the Rossini aria. Henry Lewis, her husband, was the conductor and provided perfect support for her spectacular singing. He opened the program with Berlioz's overture to "LeCorsaire," a pure curtain raiser, but closed with a rousing performance of Francesca da Rimini by Tschaikowsky which, oddly enough, had never been played before at a Tanglewood festival concert.

Tanglewood Final Concert Weekend

Erich Leinsdorf conducts his final concert as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, August 24 at 2:30 p.m. The principal work is Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and baritone Justino Diaz as soloists. Berlioz' The Royal Hunt and Storm from the Trojans opens the program.

The opening concert of the eighth and final weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival is Friday, at 9 p.m. Milton Katims, Music Director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, conducts Rossini's Gazza Ladra Overture, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2.

Saturday evening, August 23 at 8 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with Malcolm Frager as soloist. The program opens with Edgar Varese's Deserts for orchestra and tape recorder, and closes with Stravinsky's Firebird Suite.

The weekend prelude, Friday, August 22 at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for Friday evening ticket holders who come early to enjoy the Tanglewood grounds, features the internationally acclaimed soprano Beverly Sills. Accompanied by Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, Miss Sills sings music by Vivaldi, Strauss and Schubert. The two Vivaldi solo cantatas on the program have never been sung publicly in America, according to available records.

The weekend's open rehearsal for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund, is Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. All seats for the open rehearsal are unreserved.

Friday

Friday, August 22, 7 p.m. Shed, Weekend prelude, Beverly Sills, soprano; Charles Wilson, pianist; Vivaldi: Sorge Vermiglia in Ciel La Bell Aurora Par Che' Tardo Oltre Il Costume. Strauss: Ich Schwebe OP. 48 No. 2. Amor Op. 68 No. 5, Breit' Uber Mein Humpt Op. 19 No. 2. Schubert: Der Hirt Auf Dem Felsen Op. 129.

9 p.m. Shed, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Milton Katims, conductor. Rossini: Gazza Ladra Overture, Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 4, Vaughan Williams: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, Ravel: Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2.

Saturday

Saturday, August 23, 10:30 a.m. Shed, BSO - Open rehearsal. 8 p.m. Shed, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, Malcolm Frager, pianist, Varese: Deserts, Beethoven: Piano Concerto No. 4, Stravinsky: Firebird Suite.

Sunday, August 24

2:30 p.m. Shed, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, Berlioz: Royal Hunt and Storm from 'The Trojans', Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, Beverly Sills, soprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, John Alexander, tenor, Justino Diaz, baritone.

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
(E) 17,055

AUG 16 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 17 1969

Final Concert By Leinsdorf Next Sunday

Erich Leinsdorf conducts his final concert as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, Aug. 24, at 2:30 p.m. The principal work is Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and baritone Justino Diaz as soloists, Berlioz' "The Royal Hunt" and "Storm from the Trojans".

The opening concert of the eighth and final weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival is Friday at 9 p.m. Milton Katims, Music Director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, conducts Rossini's "Gazza Ladra Overture," Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 4," Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme" by Thomas Tallis, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2."

Saturday at 8 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's "Piano Concerto No. 4" with Malcolm Frager as soloist. The program opens with Edgar Varese's "Deserts" for orchestra and tape recorder, and closes with Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite."

The weekend prelude, Friday at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for Friday evening ticket holders who come early to enjoy the Tanglewood grounds, features the internationally acclaimed soprano Beverly Sills.

TIMES
WOBURN, MASS.
(E) 9,470

AUG 11 1969

Leinsdorf's Finale

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, August 24, at 2:30 p.m. at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The concert, which will include works by Beethoven and Berlioz, will bring to a close the 1969 Berkshire Festival.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PARK EAST
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

AUG 14 1969

Portrait of a Busy Man

By CHARLES BRIEFER

TANGLEWOOD — Henry Lewis at Tanglewood last weekend was something akin to a treasure hunt: You'd go to where you were supposed to meet him, only to find a note pinned to the door directing you to the next place.

We finally collided at the entrance to an artist's room backstage at the shed — he was twenty minutes late and completely out of breath, simply from trying to squeeze 25 hours into a day.

He looked a little tense, so I broke the ice with the magic sentence I'd been preparing: "Captain Rodriguez wants to see you in his office right away!" A big grin broke through and we were off and away. I was a flutist with the Seventh Army Symphony Orchestra in Stuttgart 15 years ago, and I left Germany to return to the states just days before Henry Lewis arrived. But we'd both endured the minor tyranny of a narrow-minded, unimaginative commanding officer, and it formed a tenuous sort of bond between us.

LEWIS'S BOYISH looks can fool you — for behind them is a completely mature no-nonsense individual who knows what his goals are and how to achieve them and the breaks have not been all on his side; he made his debut as conductor of the New Jersey Symphony in June 1968, and eight months later a strike knocked the orchestra out of the picture.

It was only settled last month, with signing of a new contract that guarantees 22 weeks of work and a minimum of $161 per man per week by 1971. I was dubious about a small orchestra's ability to live with these conditions, but Lewis was enthusiastic.

He feels that good terms will attract good musicians, which will lead to more bookings and more money coming in. As a matter of fact he was supposed to be interviewing Tanglewood students for his orchestra at that very moment, and they were beginning to make their presences felt — in strong silent ways — just beyond the open door!

BOOKING AUDIENCES usually go to orchestras, but Lewis plans to reverse the procedure. "People aren't going to those big gray halls any more, because they don't live next to them the way they used to." He sees the movement of populations away from urban centers as setting a pattern orchestras must follow if they are to survive.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 21 1969

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 21 1969 New England

Concerts At Tanglewood

FRIDAY-AUGUST 15
by J.W.H.

The customary Friday night rain at Tanglewood held off until after the music this week, depriving this reviewer of any critical comments about the weather. The audience appeared to be well-dressed, well-behaved and no more nor less ridiculous than any other such gathering of music lovers, depriving me of any snide comments on the American public en masse. We turn, then, to the music:

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players with Gilbert Kalish as pianist played the weekend prelude. It consisted of Schubert's "Piano Trio no. 1" and his "Quintet in A," both were performed with skill and charm and provided a pleasant contrast to the larger works to come later on.

Leinsdorf brought out every romantic detail of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony." It is a long and repetitive work, but the lush strings of the B.S.O. and the superb woodwinds provided variety and contrast to hold the listener's attention and to beguile him with the beauty of the Austrian countryside as well as the Berkshire hills.

In contrast, Maestro Leinsdorf, gave a stirring reading of "The Third Symphony "Eroica," of which one never tires. Two Beethoven symphonies in one evening is a lot of musical meat and potatoes, but the audience fattened happily and gave the Boston an ovation at the end.

SATURDAY-AUGUST 16
By D.S.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of guest conductor, David Zinman, played the Haydn Symphony No. 83 in G minor (The Hen), Bartok's Dance Suite (1923), and the Pathetique of Tchaikovsky. (Need we hear this again? Why not perform one of the Suites for Orchestra for a change?) Zinman's conducting was very distracting. He is not a bad conductor, in that he has his basic tools of conducting well in hand; but does he have to put so much "body English" into his work? He prodded, pushed, yelled, and shushed the orchestra in places of sudden contrast from loud to soft. These sounds were clearly audible midway in the shed. Does the BSO really need berating? This kind of behavior is hardly musical, not to speak of the lack of professionalism clearly exhibited by Zinman.

The orchestra played everything well. The Bartok was given a spirited reading; all six movements had excellent timbral qualities. The Haydn Symphony was equally exciting, and the Tchaikovsky was played with a high regard for the inherent contrasts. One comes to a concert expecting a high degree of musicality and the BSO met my expectations. They are such seasoned performers that all the pyrotechnics on "center stage" seemed extraneous.

SUNDAY-AUGUST 17
By C.N.D.

Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood was as noisy as an Italian opera house, if not the Yale Bowl, when Marilyn Horne stepped on the stage. Her fans are numerous, devoted and vocal. There is reason for this because hers is one of those great voices of a generation — a coloratura contralto of sensuous beauty and voluminous sound and as flexible as an acrobat. This was Marilyn Horne's day. Before the intermission she sang "Les Nuits d'Ete," six songs of Berlioz, which are milestones in the song literature of France. Like all French songs the words are of paramount importance and the music of considerable subtlety. It was a mistake to put these on a Tanglewood program — they are not for the great outdoors. But no matter, they were magnificently sung. After the intermission came two operatic arias by Mozart & Rossini that could be sung outdoors if the voice were a powerful one and these proved to be an unforgetable experience. I didn't time the applause but it must have lasted a full ten minutes after the Rossini aria. Henry Lewis, her husband, was the conductor and provided perfect support for her spectacular singing. He opened the program with Berlioz's overture to "LeCorsaire," a pure curtain raiser, but closed with a rousing performance of Francesca da Rimini by Tschaikowsky which, oddly enough, had never been played before at a Tanglewood festival concert.

8th Week

Leinsdorf To Conduct Symphony At Tanglewood This Weekend

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf will conduct his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at 2:30 p.m. The principal work is Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and baritone Justino Diaz as soloists. Berlioz "The Royal Hunt" and "Storm from the Trojans" opens the program.

The opening concert of the eighth and final weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival is tonight at 9. Milton Katims, music director of the Seattle Symsini's "Gazza Ladra Overture," Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 4," Vaughan Williams "Fantasia on a Theme" by Thomas Tallis, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2."

Saturday evening at 8 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's "Piano Concerto No. 4" with Malcolm Frager as soloist. The program opens with Edgar Varese's "Deserts" for orchestra and tape recorder, and closes with Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite."

The weekend prelude, tonight at 7, one of the short concerts presented each week for Friday evening ticket holders who come early to enjoy the Tanglewood grounds, features the internationally acclaimed soprano Beverly Sills. Accompanied by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, Miss Sills sings music by Vivaldi, Strauss and Schubert. The two Vivaldi solo cantatas on the program have never been sung publicly in America, according to available records.

The weekend's open rehearsal for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund, is Saturday morning at 10:30. All seats for the open rehearsal are unreserved at $2.50 each.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 22 1969 New England

Tanglewood Final Concert Weekend

Erich Leinsdorf conducts his final concert as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, August 24 at 2:30 p.m. The principal work is Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and baritone Justino Diaz as soloists. Berlioz' The Royal Hunt and Storm from the Trojans opens the program.

The opening concert of the eighth and final weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival is Friday, at 9 p.m. Milton Katims, Music Director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, conducts Rossini's Gazza Ladra Overture, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2.

Saturday evening, August 23 at 8 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with Malcolm Frager as soloist. The program opens with Edgar Varese's Deserts for orchestra and tape recorder, and closes with Stravinsky's Firebird Suite.

The weekend prelude, Friday, August 22 at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for Friday evening ticket holders who come early to enjoy the Tanglewood grounds, features the internationally acclaimed soprano Beverly Sills. Accompanied by Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, Miss Sills sings music by Vivaldi, Strauss and Schubert. The two Vivaldi solo cantatas on the program have never been sung publicly in America, according to available records.

The weekend's open rehearsal for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund, is Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. All seats for the open rehearsal are unreserved.

Friday

Friday, August 22, 7 p.m. Shed, Weekend prelude, Beverly Sills, soprano; Charles Wilson, pianist; Vivaldi: Sorge Vermiglia in Ciel La Bell Aurora Par Che Tardo Oltre Il Costume. Strauss: Ich Schwebe OP. 48 No. 2. Amor Op. 68 No. 5, Breit' Uber Mein Humpt Op. 19 No. 2. Schubert: Der Hirt Auf Dem Felsen Op. 129.

9 p.m. Shed, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Milton Katims, conductor. Rossini: Gazza Ladra Overture, Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 4, Vaughan Williams: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, Ravel: Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2.

Saturday

Saturday, August 23, 10:30 a.m. Shed, BSO - Open rehearsal. 8 p.m. Shed, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, Malcolm Frager, pianist, Varese: Deserts, Beethoven: Piano Concerto No. 4, Stravinsky: Firebird Suite.

Sunday, August 24

2:30 p.m. Shed, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, Berlioz: Royal Hunt and Storm from 'The Trojans', Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, Beverly Sills, soprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, John Alexander, tenor, Justino Diaz, baritone.

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
(E) 17,055

AUG 16 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 17 1969

Final Concert By Leinsdorf Next Sunday

Erich Leinsdorf conducts his final concert as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, Aug. 24, at 2:30 p.m. The principal work is Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and baritone Justino Diaz as soloists, Berlioz' "The Royal Hunt" and "Storm from the Trojans".

The opening concert of the eighth and final weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival is Friday at 9 p.m. Milton Katims, Music Director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, conducts Rossini's "Gazza Ladra Overture," Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 4," Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme" by Thomas Tallis, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2."

Saturday at 8 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's "Piano Concerto No. 4" with Malcolm Frager as soloist. The program opens with Edgar Varese's "Deserts" for orchestra and tape recorder, and closes with Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite."

The weekend prelude, Friday at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for Friday evening ticket holders who come early to enjoy the Tanglewood grounds, features the internationally acclaimed soprano Beverly Sills.

TIMES
WOBURN, MASS.
(E) 9,470

AUG 11 1969

Leinsdorf's Finale

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, August 24, at 2:30 p.m. at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The concert, which will include works by Beethoven and Berlioz, will bring to a close the 1969 Berkshire Festival.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PARK EAST
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

AUG 14 1969

72.

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 141,842 SUN. 234,036

AUG 17 1969

Festival Closing

Next Sunday marks the closing of several other famous festivals, including the Boston Symphony concerts at Tanglewood. Marilyn Horne, soloist for the opening concert of the Nashville Symphony season, is soloist with the Bostonians today, under the direction of her husband, Henry Lewis.

Milton Katims, conductor of the Seattle Symphony, will be guest conductor next Friday,

The Music Scene

and Erich Leinsdorf ends his tenure as Boston Symphony Music Director with the Saturday and Sunday concerts.

Malcolm Frager, will be soloist Saturday in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G; and Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander, and Justino Diaz will join with the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir in the presentation of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to close the Festival.

The Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops Orchestra have just signed to record exclusively for Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft when their present long-standing commitment to RCA expires in August 1970. Such a development was not unexpected after RCA lured the Philadelphia Orchestra back into its fold this year after its more than two decades with Columbia.

The Boston Symphony recordings under Leinsdorf have been exceedingly spotty, varying from superb to really very bad, so sales have fallen off markedly. It will probably be to everyone's advantage to have this orchestra's recording image rehabilitated on another label with its new conductor. This will mark DGG's first recording venture in this country.

MILTON KATIMS will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Friday evening's concert at Tanglewood.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 17 1969 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 21 1969 New England

Leinsdorf's Final Concert

Eric Leinsdorf conducts his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, Aug. 24 at 2:30 p.m. The principal work is Beethoven's Symphony no. 9, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and baritone Justino Diaz as soloists. Berlioz' The Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans" opens the program.

The open concert of the eighth and final weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival is Friday, Aug. 22 at 9 p.m. Milton Katim, music director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, conducts Rossini's "Gazza Ladra" overture, Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 4, Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Taillis and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" no. 2.

Saturday evening, Aug. 23 at 8 p.m., Eric Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's Piano Concerto no. 4, with Malcolm Frager as soloist. The program opens with Edgar Varese's "Deserts," for orchestra and tape recorder, and closes with Stravinsky's "Firebird" suite.

The weekend prelude on Friday, Aug. 22 at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for Friday evening ticket holders, features the internationally acclaimed soprano Beverly Sills, accompanied by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Bymphony.

MALCOLM FRAGER

Miss Sills will sing music by Vivaldi, Strauss and Schubert. Two Vivaldi solo cantatas on the program have never been sung publicly in America, according to available records.

The weekend open rehearsal, for the benefit of the orchestra pension fund, is Saturday at 10:30 a.m. All seats are unreserved, at $2.50 each.

Eighth Week-end At Tanglewood

The eighth week-end Tanglewood offers a varied fare for music lovers.

The week-end prelude on Friday evening at 7:00 o'clock will be conducted by Charles Wilson and will include music by Vivaldi, Strauss and Schubert with Beverley Sills as soloist.

The regular Friday evening concert, starting at 9:00, will be conducted by Milton Katims and will consist of compositions by Rossini, Tschaikovsky, Vaughn Williams, and Ravel.

Saturdays program includes an open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony at 10 a. m.. At 8:00 p. m. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in works by Varese, Beethoven and Stradavinsky. The Beethovan will be his piano concerto No. 4 with Malcolm Prager as soloist, and the Stravinsky will be his "Firebirds" suite.

The week-end will be concluded on Sunday afternoon at 2:30 when Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in Berlioz' royal hunt and storm from 'The Trojans", and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. In the final number the orchestra will be augumented by four soloists, the Tanglewood Choir, and the Berkshire Chorus.

ATHENS, N. Y.
HERALD
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 500

AUG 21 1969

Erich Leinsdorf In His Final Tanglewood Concerts Aug. 23-24

Erich Leinsdorf conducts his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, Aug. 24 at 2:30 p.m. The principal work is Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and baritone Justino Diaz as soloists. Berlioz' The Royal Hunt and Storm from the Trojans opens the program. (A complete listing of Erich Leinsdorf's repertory as music director of the orchestra in a separate release to follow.)

The opening concert of the eigth and finel weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival is Friday, Aug. 22, at 9 p.m. Milton Katims, music director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, conducts Rossini's Gazza Ladra Overture, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2.

Saturday evening, Aug. 23 at 8 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with Malcolm Frager as soloist. The program opens with Edgar Varese's Deserts for orchestra and tape recorder, and closes with Stravinsky's Fierbird Suite.

The weekend prelude, Friday, Aug. 22 at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for Friday evening ticket holders who come early to enjoy the Tanglewood grounds, features the internationally acclaimed soprano Beverly Sills. Accompanied by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, Miss Sills sings music by Vivaldi, Strauss and Schubert. The two Vivaldi solo cantatas on the program have never been sung publicly in America, according to available records.

The weekend's open rehearsal for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund, is Saturday at 10:30 a.m. All seats for the open rehearsal are unreserved at $2.50 each.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

AUG 11 1969

Classical Becomes Near-Pops Music

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Milton Katims' program of well-known symphonic pieces at Tanglewood Friday night was presented in a colorful manner befitting its position as near-pops music.

Katims was guest conductor. He has been musical director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra since 1954 and has several impressive credentials in his professional portfolio (music study at Columbia University, viola player with Toscanini and the NBC Symphony) many times a guest conductor for Toscanini.

His program at Tanglewood Friday began with Rossini's peppery overture to "La Gazza Ladra," continued with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony (the one with the pizzicato third movement) before intermission and returned with Vaughn Williams' beautifully tranquil "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis" (for double string orchestra) before ending the evening with Ravel's "Dauphea et Chloe," Suite 2.'

Katims makes a business-like appearance on the pdium. His manner was much less colorful than the music he drew from the orchestra.

His right arm was constantly in wide-sweeping motion, setting speeds that varied widely (his left arm often was idle). His feet hardly ever moved but his body was constantly twisting, rocking, bending, bobbing and weaving like a stationary brokenfield runner.

His music indicated an unusual concern for varying speeds and phrase endings. Tchaikovsky's grand plan, rather than his dynamics, seemd of great concern to Katims, as did the lively action generated in Rossini's Overture by the snare drums and marching-band rhythms.

The Vaughn Williams and Stravinsky's "Firebird." Ravel works, in different ways, also provided opportunity to exploit aspects of orchestral color and constantly changing tempos.

Katims' view of this music was entertaining, and certainly popular with the 4898 who attended, but it seemd to be concerned with surface values at the expense of inner substance, a view which helped it take on apsects of a pops program.

* * *

The audience at the 7 p.m. prelude concert was probably largest of the season for any of the Friday preludes. It was at least 3000 and highly enthusiastic.

And well it might be. The soloist was Beverly Sills, a soprano who not only can do just about anything with her voice, but also does it with limitless beauty.

What's more, she pours forth an atmosphere of great love. She seems to love her work and she always gives the impression that she loves the people in the audience. Her grin is all - inclusive.

Three Strauss Songs

Her program included three songs by Strauss, Schubert's "Der Hirt Auf Dem Felsen" Opus 129, a song distinguished with a glowing middle section and a piano - clarinet accompaniment, and a couple of Vivaldi cantatas neve r before performed in the United States.

The cantatas were astonishing for the weath of their ornamentation and extremity of vocal range. . .but, of course, my favorite soprano met the challenge with sparkling agility as well as tonal beauty.

Tonight Leinsdorf will lead the orchestra in a program including Varese's "Deserts", a craggy work that drew boos from an audience in Washington, Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with Malcolm Frager as soloist, and

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 23 1969 New England Newsclip

MILTON KATIMS, who will conduct on Friday at Tanglewood.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 21 1969

At Tanglewood

MILTON KATIMS, music director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Friday.

MALCOLM FRAGER is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest pianist Saturday.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(M) 11,900

AUG 20 1969 New England

72

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 141,842 SUN. 234,036

AUG 17 1969

Festival Closing

Next Sunday marks the closing of several other famous festivals, including the Boston Symphony concerts at Tanglewood. Marilyn Horne, soloist for the opening concert of the Nashville Symphony season, is soloist with the Bostonians today, under the direction of her husband, Henry Lewis.

Milton Katims, conductor of the Seattle Symphony, will be guest conductor next Friday, and Erich Leinsdorf ends his tenure as Boston Symphony Music Director with the Saturday and Sunday concerts.

The Music Scene

Malcolm Frager, will be soloist Saturday in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G; and Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander, and Justino Diaz will join with the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir in the presentation of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony to close the Festival.

The Boston Symphony and the Boston Pops Orchestra have just signed to record exclusively for Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft when their present long-standing commitment to RCA expires in August 1970. Such a development was not unexpected after RCA lured the Philadelphia Orchestra back into its fold this year after its more than two decades with Columbia.

The Boston Symphony recordings under Leinsdorf have been exceedingly spotty, varying from superb to really very bad, so sales have fallen off markedly. It will probably be to everyone's advantage to have this orchestra's recording image rehabilitated on another label with its new conductor. This will mark DGG's first recording venture in this country.

MILTON KATIMS will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Friday evening's concert at Tanglewood.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 17 1969 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 21 1969 New England

Leinsdorf's Final Concert

Eric Leinsdorf conducts his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, Aug. 24 at 2:30 p.m. The principal work is Beethoven's Symphony no. 9, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and baritone Justino Diaz as soloists. Berlioz' The Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans" opens the program.

The open concert of the eighth and final weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival is Friday, Aug. 22 at 9 p.m. Milton Katim, music director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, conducts Rossini's "Gazza Ladra" overture, Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 4, Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Taillis and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" no. 2.

Saturday evening, Aug. 23 at 8 p.m., Eric Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's Piano Concerto no. 4, with Malcolm Frager as soloist. The program opens with Edgar Varese's "Deserts," for orchestra and tape recorder, and closes with Stravinsky's "Firebird" suite.

The weekend prelude on Friday, Aug. 22 at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for Friday evening ticket holders, features the internationally acclaimed soprano Beverly Sills, accompanied by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Bymphony.

MALCOLM FRAGER

Miss Sills will sing music by Vivaldi, Strauss and Schubert. Two Vivaldi solo cantatas on the program have never been sung publicly in America, according to available records.

The weekend open rehearsal, for the benefit of the orchestra pension fund, is Saturday at 10:30 a.m. All seats are unreserved, at $2.50 each.

Eighth Week-end At Tanglewood

The eighth week-end Tanglewood offers a varied fare for music lovers.

The week-end prelude on Friday evening at 7:00 o'clock will be conducted by Charles Wilson and will include music by Vivaldi, Strauss and Schubert with Beverley Sills as soloist.

The regular Friday evening, concert, starting at 9:00, will be conducted by Milton Katims and will consist of compositions by Rossini, Tschaikovsky, Vaughn Williams, and Ravel.

Saturdays program includes an open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony at 10 a. m.. At 8:00 p. m. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in works by Varese, Beethoven and Stradavinsky. The Beethovan will be his piano concerto No. 4 with Malcolm Prager as soloist, and the Stravinsky will be his "Firebirds" suite.

The week-end will be concluded on Sunday afternoon at 2:30 when Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in Berlioz' royal hunt and storm from 'The Trojans", and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. In the final number the orchestra will be augumented by four soloists, the Tanglewood Choir, and the Berkshire Chorus.

ATHENS, N. Y.
HERALD
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 500

AUG 21 1969

Erich Leinsdorf In His Final Tanglewood Concerts Aug. 23-24

Erich Leinsdorf conducts his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, Aug. 24 at 2:30 p.m. The principal work is Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and baritone Justino Diaz as soloists. Berlioz' The Royal Hunt and Storm from the Trojans opens the program. (A complete listing of Erich Leinsdorf's repertory as music director of the orchestra in a separate release to follow.)

The opening concert of the eigth and finel weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival is Friday, Aug. 22, at 9 p.m. Milton Katims, music director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, conducts Rossini's Gazza Ladra Overture, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2.

Saturday evening, Aug. 23 at 8 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with Malcolm Frager as soloist. The program opens with Edgar Varese's Deserts for orchestra and tape recorder, and closes with Stravinsky's Fierbird Suite.

The weekend prelude, Friday, Aug. 22 at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for Friday evening ticket holders who come early to enjoy the Tanglewood grounds, features the internationally acclaimed soprano Beverly Sills. Accompanied by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, Miss Sills sings music by Vivaldi, Strauss and Schubert. The two Vivaldi solo cantatas on the program have never been sung publicly in America, according to available records.

The weekend's open rehearsal for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund, is Saturday at 10:30 a.m. All seats for the open rehearsal are unreserved at $2.50 each.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

AUG 11 1969

Classical Becomes Near-Pops Music

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Milton Katims' program of well-known symphonic pieces at Tanglewood Friday night was presented in a colorful manner befitting its position as near-pops music.

Katims was guest conductor. He has been musical director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra since 1954 and has several impressive credentials in his professional portfolio (music study at Columbia University, viola player with Toscanini and the NBC Symphony) many times a guest conductor for Toscanini.

His program at Tanglewood Friday began with Rossini's peppery overture to "La Gazza Ladra," continued with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony (the one with the pizzicato third movement) before intermission and returned with Vaughn Williams' beautifully tranquil "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis" (for double string orchestra) before ending the evening with Ravel's "Dauphea et Chloe," Suite 2.'

Katims makes a business-like appearance on the pdium. His manner was much less colorful than the music he drew from the orchestra.

His right arm was constantly in wide-sweeping motion, setting speeds that varied widely (his left arm often was idle). His feet hardly ever moved but his body was constantly twisting, rocking, bending, bobbing and weaving like a stationary brokenfield runner.

His music indicated an unusual concern for varying speeds and phrase endings. Tchaikovsky's grand plan, rather than his dynamics, seemd of great concern to Katims, as did the lively action generated in Rossini's Overture by the snare drums and marching-band rhythms.

The Vaughn Williams and Stravinsky's "Firebird." Ravel works, in different ways, also provided opportunity to exploit aspects of orchestral color and constantly changing tempos.

Katims' view of this music was entertaining, and certainly popular with the 4898 who attended, but it seemd to be concerned with surface values at the expense of inner substance, a view which helped it take on apsects of a pops program.

* * *

The audience at the 7 p.m. prelude concert was probably largest of the season for any of the Friday preludes. It was at least 3000 and highly enthusiastic.

And well it might be. The soloist was Beverly Sills, a soprano who not only can do just about anything with her voice, but also does it with limitless beauty.

What's more, she pours forth an atmosphere of great love. She seems to love her work and she always gives the impression that she loves the people in the audience. Her grin is all - inclusive.

Three Strauss Songs

Her program included three songs by Strauss, Schubert's "Der Hirt Auf Dem Felsen" Opus 129, a song distinguished with a glowing middle section and a piano - clarinet accompaniment, and a couple of Vivaldi cantatas neve r before performed in the United States.

The cantatas were astonishing for the weath of their ornamentation and extremity of vocal range. . .but, of course, my favorite soprano met the challenge with sparkling agility as well as tonal beauty.

Tonight Leinsdorf will lead the orchestra in a program including Varese's "Deserts", a craggy work that drew boos from an audience in Washington, Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with Malcolm Frager as soloist, and

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 23 1969 New England Newsclip

MILTON KATIMS, who will conduct on Friday at Tanglewood.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 21 1969

At Tanglewood

MILTON KATIMS, music director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood Friday.

MALCOLM FRAGER is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest pianist

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.

AUG 20 1969 New England

MALCOLM FRAGER will appear at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony as guest pianist on Saturday, August 23rd, at 8 p.m.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 23 1969 New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., conclude season as follows: 8 tonight: Leinsdorf, Varese, Beethoven, Stravinsky program; 2:30 p.m. Sunday: Leinsdorf in Berlioz, Beethoven program featuring Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Tickets: $3.50-$8.50. Tickets to lawn sold before performance, $3. Aug. 30 and 31: Arthur Fiedler conducts Boston Pops Festival Orchestra. Ticket information: 1-413-637-1600.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 21 1969 New England

TOWN CRIER
WESTPORT, CONN.
(M) 11,050 (S) 9,100

AUG 23 1969 New England

Leinsdorf Programs Beethoven To Fill Musical Wasteland

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENO X— Erich Leinsdorf is a master programmer. One of his more impressive inspirations appeared at Tanglewood Saturday night, when he scheduled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play one of the world's most beautiful piano concertos immediately after playing one of the world's most repelling musical compositions.

Contrast

The concerto was Beethoven's Fourth and the soloist was Malcolm Frager. The other piece was Edgard Varese's "Deserts for Orchestra and Three Interpolations of Electronically Organized Sound (pre-recorded on tape.)"

Let's talk about "Deserts" first because nearly everyone knows how incredibly beautiful the fourth concerto can be and how accomplished an artist Malcolm Frager is.

"Deserts" was completed in 1954 when Varese was 71. In 1963, at a banquet honoring him, Varese was referred to as "really the first of the astronauts."

Musical Wasteland

The title of the piece is specific. It refers to the landscape Varese was attempting to recreate . . . All manner of deserts,) vast wastelands, endless emptiness, not only geographic but also sociological and personal (physical, social, mental).

To that end, he instructed 17 wind players, a pianist and six percussionists to create a soul-shaking sequence of sounds of ultimate bleakness . . . also boredom.

There were 22 minutes of it Saturday night, 22 minutes of shrieks and howls and moans and thumps and bangs and crashes, ticks and clanks, wheezes and squeals . . . also silences.

Let's Hear It!

There were dense sounds of the jungle and eerie sounds of space and uncannily disturbing sounds that reached way down inside you.

At the end the applause was half-hearted. It was punctuated by a few boos and bravos. Leinsdorf stood and grinned. Then he cupped his hands to his ears to hear better. It was a cue that he wanted to know the audience's opinion.

The boos and huzzahs erupted. They had been invited and they became a crescendo. After listening first with one ear and then another, Leinsdorf walked back to his players and consulted them. It was decided that the audience was equally divided.

But Leinsdorf invited more vocal opinion, and the shouting lasted five minutes. It might have lasted longer if he had asked for more. It lasted about the same length of time last spring in Washington and New York when the piece was played in those cities.

It was an entertaining experience . . . a startling piece of music from one of America's great innovators and an aroused audience. It should happen more often.

What happened immediately afterward also should happen more often . . . a sublimely beautiful musical work played by one of America's most gifted young pianists.

Frager not only is easily able to negotiate the most formidable piano works, as all first-class pianists can, but also is able to communicate sensitive insight into all musical styles.

He does Ravel and Rachmaniofff as convincingly as he does Mozart. Saturday he did Beethoven, and I have run short of superlatives for him.

After intermission the orchestra played Stravinsky's suite from the ballet, "The Firebird."

Undoubtedly there were those in the audience (5530) who found it more satisfying than either the deliberately ugly "Deserts" or the deliberately beautiful piano concerto.

It is a highly colorful and continuously exciting kaleidoscope of sound neither as traditional as the concerto nor as rebellious as "Deserts."

The orchestra played it with a fine gutsiness and flair.

Today at 2:30 Leinsdorf will mount the podium in front of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last time as its musical director. He will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the work with which Charles Munch also ended his tenure in 1962 as musical director of the orchestra.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

AUG 24 1969 New England

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

AUG 25 1969 New England

Tanglewood Triumph

Leinsdorf Given Ovation

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Loud and persistent booing of a Boston Symphony performance at Tanglewood was experienced for the first time at the Saturday night concert of the Berkshire Music Festival's eighth and final weekend.

The work that triggered thundering protest mixed with lusty bravos was Edgar Varese's "Deserts." That audience numbered 5,530.

Yesterday afternoon, Erich Leinsdorg received one of the greatest ovations in Tanglewood's 38-year history. A crowd of 14,120 cheered for eight solid minutes after Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. It was his final appearance as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf took five curtain calls. They were long ones. He was visibly moved.

Memorable Performance

The Beethoven Ninth received a memorable performance.

Everything seemed right. Leinsdorf's concept was built on a large scale. But there was no distortion. The orchestra made every effort possible to obey.

Phrases in the first, second and fourth movements were filled with strength, severed as if by a scythe and brilliantly punctuated by Everett Firth's timpani.

Tonal beauty of the slow movement was such that Leinsdorf's impulsive singing of melodies could be heard for several rows.

The mixed chorus of 100 voices sang the finale as if their lives depended on it.

Quartet Well Balanced

The solo quartet was well balanced. Beverly Sills didn't try to take over the ensembles by virtue of her high range. The result was a clear, rich contralto from Florence Kopleff, and John Alexander's tenor.

Bass Justino Diaz was sometimes out of his depth. His higher tones came through well enough, but the low ones were either weak or missing.

The opening work yesterday was Berlioz' "Royal Hunt and Storm" from "The Trojans."

Although the work has not outstanding value beyond its bravura attempts, Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave it credible semblance of power and breadth.

This marked Leinsdorf's 709th and final appearance as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony. During his seven years he performed 429 different works by 96 composers.

Many times he has been called upon to exercise courage. His explorations of contemporary music have been fairly frequent and sometimes risky.

His conducting of the baroque and classic works has been controversial. His treatment of operatic scores, notably Wagner's has been conceded to be supreme.

Never has Leinsdorf been more valiant than in selecting the Varese work for Saturday night's opening. Last season it received a most hostile reception in Washington, D.C. Leinsdorf defended his right to perform it.

"Deserts" had tempests of noises from 25 woodwind, brass and percussion players — and tape recorders spewing from six speakers.

Taped sounds were incomparable, unidentifiable and fascinating.

There were two courses to take — complete resignation (as to a tornado) or pretense that it was fun music.

A large segment of the audience failed to do either and expressed themselves in no uncertain terms.

Leinsdorf deliberately encouraged a contest of boos and bravos. He cupped his ears for more of both and seemed to derive great satisfaction from the noisy mixture.

Oasis of Peace

After "Deserts" Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto was an oasis of peace stunningly played by Malcolm Frager.

Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite sounded like a soothing balm.

Total attendance at the 1969 Berkshire Festival was 236,937. Attendance for the eight weekends only (24 concerts plus eight open rehearsals) was 175,468.

The 1968 attendance at all

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849

AUG 24 1969

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000

AUG 24 1969

Finale

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at the Tanglewood Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass. The principal work will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 with soloists Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander and Justino Diaz.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 28 1969 New England

73

Last Tanglewood Program

Friday, Aug. 22
by A.C.S.

Milton Katims, director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, made his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this evening. Well-known as a violist, Mr. Katims displays a thorough knowledge of his craft, an intelligent technique, and a musicanly approach to the music.

The program was a bit on the "pops" side. Surprisingly, the audience was conspicuously thin. After a spirited rendition of Rossini's overture to "La Gazza Ladra," it was disappointing to hear a rather tepid reading of the ever familiar Tchaikovsky "Symphony No. 4." Here, and elsewhere in the concert, the orchestra sounded under-rehearsed. With the season drawing to a close this is perhaps inevitable.

Vaughan Williams "Fantasia on an theme by Thomas Tallis" followed the intermission. The "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2" by Ravel was the closing number. Next to the Rossini overture, this work seemed most congenial to the conductor.

Saturday, Aug. 23
by D. D.

Tanglewood opened this evening with a fascinating, if not downright jolting piece of music, Edgard Varese's Deserts, calculated to punt the listener, at least the initiated, squarely out of his routine listening habits, if not out of his seat, and into a musical wilderness, a kind of sonic no-man's-land, where one felt constantly like an explorer charting unknown, eerie landscapes. Varese, already a classical figure in avant-garde music (Ionisations, Octandre), this time contrived an unearthly gigantic duet or duel between brass orchestra with percussion and a battery of six A R loudspeakers, from which emanated the most unusual sounds, taped, from grunts, gurglings, and thunder to shrieks and howlings. As an experiment in sonic possibilities, although already a dated combination of the conventional and the new, wholly synthesized music, it was a fascinating experience, a marvelous journey into sound. Mr. Leinsdorf took the chorus of boos in stride. Malcolm Frager next performed the Beethoven Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 4. A flawless reading throughout returned a restive audience to rapt attention. Stravinsky's Firebird provided an exciting finale. It is amusing to reflect how our ears now accept as commonplace what once aroused an elite Parisian audience to aggressive frenzy—the evolution in music from the Firebird to Deserts. Leinsdorf turned in a finely shaped, coherent performance of this now classic score.

Sunday, Aug. 24
by A.C.S.

This reviewer has never considered Beethoven's Ninth Symphony an audience drawer, and yet it has been used many times to close the Tanglewood season. Today there was an added reason for the enormous crowd which packed the shed and lawns of the Berkshire Music Center. This was Erich Leinsdorf's final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony. In his seven years of directorship he has revitalized the activities of the center, introduced many new works in the programs of the symphony, and set a standard of excellence which will be hard to match. So today' sellout was more a tribute to him than to Beethoven or the star cast of soloists employed for the occasion.

Berlioz "Royal hunt and storm from 'The Trojans' " was the opening work. As wonderfully as it was performed, it was merely the appetizer for the feast that followed. The soloists in the final movement were Beverly Sills, soprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, John Alexander, tenor, and Justino Diaz, bass. The Tanglewood Choir, the Berkshire Chorus, and the Chorus Pro Musica combined to give a large and thrilling choral sound. All the musicians seemed determined to give Leinsdorf a send-off he would remember. Certainly his reading this day is one this reviewer will not soon forget.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,906 SUN. 3,221,849

AUG 9 1969

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the afternoon of Aug. 24 at the Tanglewood Festival, Lenox, Mass. . . . The Jacobs Pillow Dance Festival, Lee, Mass., will offer a two-part program of ballet and ethnic African dance Tuesday through Saturday. The dancers will be six members of the American Ballet Theater.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 19 1969 New England

Erich Leinsdorf's farewell Tanglewood concert this weekend as music director of the Boston Symphony will be recorded by WGBH-TV for telecast over the "Sounds of Summer" at 10 p.m. Aug. 31. It will repeat the program Sept. 1-5 at 10:30 p.m. Steve Allen is host of the two-hour color special and will telecast nationally. To be called "Erich Leinsdorf's Farewell" it was produced for television by Symphony producer Jordan M. Whitelaw, who will interview Leinsdorf. The program is devoted to two works, Royal Hunt and Storm from Berlioz' "The Trojans" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Koleff and John Alexander tenor and Justino Diaz (both of the Met) will be soloists. The Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir will also be on hand.

Leinsdorf Swan Song On the Air

Erich Leinsdorf's final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on WGBH radio live and in stereo Sunday, August 24 from 2:30 - 4:30 p.m.

The program will be broadcast direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood in Lenox, and will conclude the Berkshire Festival season. First, Mr. Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony with the Berkshire Festival Chorus and soloists Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor and Justino Diaz, bass.

CHRONICLE SUN
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY 14,087

AUG 14 1969 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Concert to Be Heard Live

Erich Leinsdorf's career as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to a climactic close as he conducts a performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, to be heard live on WAMC-FM (90.3 mc) Sunday, beginning at 2:30 p.m.

* * *

The program, which will be broadcast direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., also marks the conclusion of the 1969 Berkshire Music Festival.

Joining the orchestra for the Beethoven performance are soloists Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor; and Justino Diaz, bass. The concert begins with Berlioz's Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans".

* * *

WAMC, FM station o fthe Albany Medical College is providing exclusive broadcast coverage of all orchestral concerts this season at Tanglewood.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

AUG 19 1969

Movies TV Art

Final Leinsdorf Concert To Be Broadcast Live

Erich Leinsdorf's final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast live and in stereo from the Tanglewood Shed over radio station WGBH. The two-hour concert will be Sunday at 2:30 p.m.

The program, which also marks the conclusion of the 1969 Berkshire Festival season, features Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, and the Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans" by Berlioz. The Beethoven Symphony was played at the opening of Tanglewood's Music Shed on Aug. 4, 1938. Joining the BSO for the choral finale of the Beethoven piece will be the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir with soloists Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor, and Justino Diaz, bass. Mr. Alexander and Mr. Diaz are members of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Television Tape

The following Sunday, Aug. 31, a tape of the concert will be televised nationwide over Channel 2 in Boston. Steve Allen will host the special, recorded by WGBH-TV. John M. Whitelaw, symphony producer, will interview Mr. Leinsdorf.

The program will also be repeated throughout the week of Sept. 1 at 10:30 p.m.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 19 1969

MALCOLM FRAGER will appear at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony as guest pianist on Saturday, August 23rd, at 8 p.m.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 23 1969 New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS AT TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., conclude season as follows: 8 tonight: Leinsdorf, Varese, Beethoven, Stravinsky program; 2:30 p.m. Sunday: Leinsdorf in Berlioz, Beethoven program featuring Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Tickets: $3.50-$8.50. Tickets to lawn sold before performance, $3. Aug. 30 and 31: Arthur Fiedler conducts Boston Pops Festival Orchestra. Ticket information: 1-413-637-1600.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 21 1969 New England

TOWN CRIER
WESTPORT, CONN.
(M) 11,050 (S) 9,100

AUG 23 1969 New England

Leinsdorf Programs Beethoven To Fill Musical Wasteland

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENO X— Erich Leinsdorf is a master programmer. One of his more impressive inspirations appeared at Tanglewood Saturday night, when he scheduled the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play one of the world's most beautiful piano concertos immediately after playing one of the world's most repelling musical compositions.

Contrast

The concerto was Beethoven's Fourth and the soloist was Malcolm Frager. The other piece was Edgard Varese's "Deserts for Orchestra and Three Interpolations of Electronically Organized Sound (pre-recorded on tape.)"

Let's talk about "Deserts" first because nearly everyone knows how incredibly beautiful the fourth concerto can be and how accomplished an artist Malcolm Frager is.

"Deserts" was completed in 1954 when Varese was 71. In 1963, at a banquet honoring him, Varese was referred to as "really the first of the astronauts."

Musical Wasteland

The title of the piece is specific. It refers to the landscape Varese was attempting to recreate . . . All manner of deserts,) vast wastelands, endless emptiness, not only geographic but also sociological and personal (physical, social, mental).

To that end, he instructed 17 wind players, a pianist and six percussionists to create a soul-shaking sequence of sounds of ultimate bleakness . . . also boredom.

There were 22 minutes of it Saturday night, 22 minutes of shrieks and howls and moans and thumps and bangs and crashes, ticks and clanks, wheezes and squeals . . . also silences.

Let's Hear It!

There were dense sounds of the jungle and eerie sounds of space and uncannily disturbing sounds that reached way down inside you.

At the end the applause was half-hearted. It was punctuated by a few boos and bravos. Leinsdorf stood and grinned. Then he cupped his hands to his ears to hear better. It was a cue that he wanted to know the audience's opinion.

The boos and huzzahs erupted. They had been invited and they became a crescendo. After listening first with one ear and then another, Leinsdorf walked back to his players and consulted them. It was decided that the audience was equally divided.

But Leinsdorf invited more vocal opinion, and the shouting lasted five minutes. It might have lasted longer if he had asked for more. It lasted about the same length of time last spring in Washington and New York when the piece was played in those cities.

It was an entertaining experience . . . a startling piece of music from one of America's great innovators and an aroused audience. It should happen more often.

What happened immediately afterward also should happen more often . . . a sublimely beautiful musical work played by one of America's most gifted young pianists.

Frager not only is easily able to negotiate the most formidable piano works, as all first-class pianists can, but also is able to communicate sensitive insight into all musical styles.

He does Ravel and Rachmaniofff as convincingly as he does Mozart. Saturday he did Beethoven, and I have run short of superlatives for him.

After intermission the orchestra played Stravinsky's suite from the ballet, "The Firebird."

Undoubtedly there were those in the audience (5530) who found it more satisfying than either the deliberately ugly "Deserts" or the deliberately beautiful piano concerto.

It is a highly colorful and continuously exciting kaleidoscope of sound neither as traditional as the concerto nor as rebellious as "Deserts."

The orchestra played it with a fine gutsiness and flair.

Today at 2.30 Leinsdorf will mount the podium in front of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last time as its musical director. He will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the work with which Charles Munch also ended his tenure in 1962 as musical director of the orchestra.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

AUG 24 1969 New England

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,030,906 SUN. 3,221,849

AUG 9 1969

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the afternoon of Aug. 24 at the Tanglewood Festival, Lenox, Mass. . . . The Jacobs Pillow Dance Festival, Lee, Mass., will offer a two-part program of ballet and ethnic African dance Tuesday through Saturday. The dancers will be six members of the American Ballet Theater.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 19 1969 New England

Erich Leinsdorf's farewell Tanglewood concert this weekend as music director of the Boston Symphony will be recorded by WGBH-TV for telecast over the "Sounds of Summer" at 10 p.m. Aug. 31. It will repeat the program Sept. 1-5 at 10:30 p.m. Steve Allen is host of the two-hour color special and will telecast nationally. To be called "Erich Leinsdorf's Farewell" it was produced for television by Symphony producer Jordan M. Whitelaw, who will interview Leinsdorf. The program is devoted to two works, Royal Hunt and Storm from Berlioz' "The Trojans" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Koleff and John Alexander tenor and Justino Diaz (both of the Met) will be soloists. The Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir will also be on hand.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

AUG 25 1969 New England

Tanglewood Triumph

Leinsdorf Given Ovation

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Loud and persistent booing of a Boston Symphony performance at Tanglewood was experienced for the first time at the Saturday night concert of the Berkshire Music Festival's eighth and final weekend.

The work that triggered thundering protest mixed with lusty bravos was Edgar Varese's "Deserts." That audience numbered 5,530.

Yesterday afternoon, Erich Leinsdorg received one of the greatest ovations in Tanglewood's 38-year history. A crowd of 14,120 cheered for eight solid minutes after Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. It was his final appearance as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Leinsdorf took five curtain calls. They were long ones. He was visibly moved.

Memorable Performance

The Beethoven Ninth received a memorable performance.

Everything seemed right. Leinsdorf's concept was built on a large scale. But there was no distortion. The orchestra made every effort possible to obey.

Phrases in the first, second and fourth movements were filled with strength, severed as if by a scythe and brilliantly punctuated by Everett Firth's timpani.

Tonal beauty of the slow movement was such that Leinsdorf's impulsive singing of melodies could be heard for several rows.

The mixed chorus of 100 voices sang the finale as if their lives depended on it.

Quartet Well Balanced

The solo quartet was well balanced. Beverly Sills didn't try to take over the ensembles by virtue of her high range. The result was a clear, rich contralto from Florence Kopleff. and John Alexander's tenor.

Bass Justino Diaz was sometimes out of his depth. His higher tones came through well enough, but the low ones were either weak or missing.

The opening work yesterday was Berlioz' "Royal Hunt and Storm" from "The Trojans."

Although the work has not outstanding value beyond its bravura attempts, Leinsdorf and the orchestra gave it credible semblance of power and breadth.

This marked Leinsdorf's 709th and final, appearance as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony. During his seven years he performed 429 different works by 96 composers.

Many times he has been called upon to exercise courage. His explorations of contemporary music have been fairly frequent and sometimes risky.

His conducting of the baroque and classic works has been controversial. His treatment of operatic scores, notably Wagner's has been conceded to be supreme.

Never has Leinsdorf been more valiant than in selecting the Varese work for Saturday night's opening. Last season it received a most hostile reception in Washington, D.C. Leinsdorf defended his right to perform it.

"Deserts" had tempests of noises from 25 woodwind, brass and percussion players — and tape recorders spewing from six speakers.

Taped sounds were incomparable, unidentifiable and fascinating.

There were two courses to take — complete resignation (as to a tornado) or pretense that it was fun music.

A large segment of the audience failed to do either and expressed themselves in no uncertain terms.

Leinsdorf deliberately encouraged a contest of boos and bravos. He cupped his ears for more of both and seemed to derive great satisfaction from the noisy mixture.

Oasis of Peace

After "Deserts" Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto was an oasis of peace stunningly played by Malcolm Frager.

Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite sounded like a soothing balm.

Total attendance at the 1969 Berkshire Festival was 236,937. Attendance for the eight weekends only (24 concerts plus eight open rehearsals) was 175,468.

The 1968 attendance at all

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000

AUG 24 1969

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849

AUG 24 1969

Finale

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at the Tanglewood Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass. The principal work will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 with soloists Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander and Justino Diaz.

Leinsdorf Swan Song On the Air

Erich Leinsdorf's final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on WGBH radio live and in stereo Sunday, August 24 from 2:30 - 4:30 p.m.

The program will be broadcast direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood in Lenox, and will conclude the Berkshire Festival season. First, Mr. Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony with the Berkshire Festival Chorus and soloists Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor and Justino Diaz, bass.

CHRONICLE SUN
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY 14,087

AUG 14 1969 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Concert to Be Heard Live

Erich Leinsdorf's career as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to a climactic close as he conducts a performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, to be heard live on WAMC-FM (90.3 mc) Sunday, beginning at 2:30 p.m.

* * *

The program, which will be broadcast direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., also marks the conclusion of the 1969 Berkshire Music Festival.

Joining the orchestra for the Beethoven performance are soloists Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor; and Justino Diaz, bass. The concert begins with Berlioz's Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans".

* * *

WAMC, FM station o fthe Albany Medical College is providing exclusive broadcast coverage of all orchestral concerts this season at Tanglewood.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

AUG 19 1969

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 28 1969 New England

Last Tanglewood Program

Friday, Aug. 22
by A.C.S.

Milton Katims, director of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, made his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony this evening. Well-known as a violist, Mr. Katims displays a thorough knowledge of his craft, an intelligent technique, and a musicanly approach to the music.

The program was a bit on the "pops" side. Surprisingly, the audience was conspicuously thin. After a spirited rendition of Rossini's overture to "La Gazza Ladra," it was disappointing to hear a rather tepid reading of the ever familiar Tchaikovsky "Symphony No. 4." Here, and elsewhere in the concert, the orchestra sounded under-rehearsed. With the season drawing to a close this is perhaps inevitable.

Vaughan Williams "Fantasia on an theme by Thomas Tallis" followed the intermission. The "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2" by Ravel was the closing number. Next to the Rossini overture, this work seemed most congenial to the conductor.

Saturday, Aug. 23
by D. D.

Tanglewood opened this evening with a fascinating, if not downright jolting piece of music, Edgard Varese's Deserts, calculated to punt the listener, at least the initiated, squarely out of his routine listening habits, if not out of his seat, and into a musical wilderness, a kind of sonic no-man's-land, where one felt constantly like an explorer charting unknown, eerie landscapes. Varese, already a classical figure in avant-garde music (Ionisations, Octandre), this time contrived an unearthly gigantic duet or duel between brass orchestra with percussion and a battery of six A R loudspeakers, from which emanated the most unusual sounds, taped, from grunts, gurglings, and thunder to shrieks and howlings. As an experiment in sonic possibilities, although already a dated combination of the conventional and the new, wholly synthesized music, it was a fascinating experience, a marvelous journey into sound. Mr. Leinsdorf took the chorus of boos in stride. Malcolm Frager next performed the Beethoven Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 4. A flawless reading throughout returned a restive audience to rapt attention. Stravinsky's Firebird provided an exciting finale. It is amusing to reflect how our ears now accept as commonplace what once aroused an elite Parisian audience to aggressive frenzy–the evolution in music from the Firebird to Deserts. Leinsdorf turned in a finely shaped, coherent performance of this now classic score.

Sunday, Aug. 24
by A.C.S.

This reviewer has never considered Beethoven's Ninth Symphony an audience drawer, and yet it has been used many times to close the Tanglewood season. Today there was an added reason for the enormous crowd which packed the shed and lawns of the Berkshire Music Center. This was Erich Leinsdorf's final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony. In his seven years of directorship he has revitalized the activities of the center, introduced many new works in the programs of the symphony, and set a standard of excellence which will be hard to match. So today' sellout was more a tribute to him than to Beethoven or the star cast of soloists employed for the occasion.

Berlioz "Royal hunt and storm from 'The Trojans' " was the opening work. As wonderfully as it was performed, it was merely the appetizer for the feast that followed. The soloists in the final movement were Beverly Sills, soprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, John Alexander, tenor, and Justino Diaz, bass. The Tanglewood Choir, the Berkshire Chorus, and the Chorus Pro Musica combined to give a large and thrilling choral sound. All the musicians seemed determined to give Leinsdorf a send-off he would remember. Certainly his reading this day is one this reviewer will not soon forget.

Movies TV Art

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 19 1969

Final Leinsdorf Concert To Be Broadcast Live

Erich Leinsdorf's final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be broadcast live and in stereo from the Tanglewood Shed over radio station WGBH. The two-hour concert will be Sunday at 2:30 p.m.

The program, which also marks the conclusion of the 1969 Berkshire Festival season, features Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, and the Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans" by Berlioz. The Beethoven Symphony was played at the opening of Tanglewood's Music Shed on Aug. 4, 1938. Joining the BSO for the choral finale of the Beethoven piece will be the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir with soloists Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor, and Justino Diaz, bass. Mr. Alexander and Mr. Diaz are members of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Television Tape

The following Sunday, Aug. 31, a tape of the concert will be televised nationwide over Channel 2 in Boston. Steve Allen will host the special, recorded by WGBH-TV. John M. Whitelaw, symphony producer, will interview Mr. Leinsdorf.

The program will also be repeated throughout the week of Sept. 1 at 10:30 p.m.

74

Leinsdorf Inspires Unequaled Concert

By GEORGE W. STOWE

An overflow crowd of 14,120 persons turned out for Erich Leinsdorf's farewell concert as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood.

Not since the early 50's when Leonard Bernstein conducted at the Berkshire Festival have I seen anything to rival the mass of humanity gathered here. The Music Shed was filled to capacity and the lawn was covered with music lovers, some of them sprawled near the shade of trees to the pervading humidity and heat.

The Beethoven Ninth Symphony, traditionally given as the finale each year, took on a special significance on this occasion. And I must admit that Leinsdorf inspired a performance that has not been equaled in my experience here. Both orchestra and chorus were vibrantly alive to the music and the soloists were in top form.

Moreso than in the immediate past, Leindorf brought an intensity to this beloved score that often reminded me of Toscanini. This was particularly true of the second movement an dthe choral finale.

The Berkshire Chorus and the Chorus Pro Musica, a huge assemblage of choristers, sang with an unanimity of attach and cohesion, that was more than ordinarily exhailarating.

And the distinguished array of soloists—Beverly Stills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander, and Justino Diaz—shared in the triumph. The difficult opening bass solo was thrust forth with youthful authority by Diaz and his colleagues worked together with exemplary rapport in this challenging music.

Only the slow movement suffered from that great bugaboo of outdoor concerts—the difficulty of sustaining the mood throughout an extended movement. Nevertheless, Leinsdorf never allowed the music to drag or get pulled out of shape

Berlioz' Royal Hunt and Storm (from "The Trojan") opened the program in a reading that had a controlled passion that was always admirable. The conductor used the chorus for the brief contribution that the composer inserted into the score.

At the end of the stirring choral finale of the Beethoven the audience rose in an instantaneous tribute to the conductor and brought him back and forth for a 15-minute ovation. It was obviously in emotion-laden situation.

Leinsdorf, in his seven seasons with the Boston Symphony, has improved the technical caliber of the playing and has brought a much greater diversity to the program-making. He will be missed by many, including this writer.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

AUG 25 1969

Concert Broadcast

Erich Leinsdorf's final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on WGBH radio live and in stereo on Sunday, August 24, from 2:30 to 4:30 p.m.

The program will be broadcast direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood in Lenox, and will conclude the Berkshire Festival season. First, Mr. Leinsdorf leads the Boston Symphony with the Berkshire Festival Chorus and soloists Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor; and Justino Diaz, bass.

The Symphony producer is Jordan Whitelaw; William Pierce is the symphony announcer.

ASSABET VALLEY BEACON
MAYNARD, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,950

FREE PRESS
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800

AUG 21 1969

AUG 21 1969

INDEPENDENT
LITTLETON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,250

AUG 21 1969

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

AUG 27 1969

Tanglewood: Leinsdorf's farewell

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Erich Leinsdorf, who has been music director of the Boston Symphony since 1962, relinquished that post after Sunday afternoon's concert at Tanglewood — his 709th with the orchestra. The day was warm and clear, the Shed was sold out, lawn-sitters tended to hug the shade, and the official count of well over 14,000 established a record for a live concert by the BSO.

Although Sunday's was the last concert "officially" by the orchestra in its Tanglewood season (there will be Pops, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, on Aug. 30 at 8 p.m. and Aug. 31 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed), the departing music director was obviously the focus of attention. Mr. Leinsdorf received a thunderous salvo of applause at his first appearance of the afternoon, and when the concert was over, he was singled out from among soloists and the other musicians who had put this large program together, for a long loud standing ovation, in which orchestra and chorus members joined. Television cameras were busy too—the proceedings, taped by WGBH-TV, Boston, will be shown nationally during the week of Aug. 31.

No tears

Outward show of emotion has never been a podium characteristic of Mr. Leinsdorf, at least as far as the audience is concerned, and it cannot be said that Sunday's concert aroused any extreme reactions in performers or listeners. It was not a tear-flecked occasion. After all, he will be returning to conduct the Boston, and the admiration he commands from a wide circle of listeners has never been complicated by the kind of mystique which has clothed some of his legendary colleagues. Sunday's roof-raising vote of appreciation indicated that there is still quite a public for auraless conductors.

Superlative

The afternoon began with the Royal Hunt and Storm music from Berlioz's "Les Troyens," segments which can stand, if not a little flamboyance, at least a measure of introspection. The sound was beautiful, however, and made one long for at least a concert performance of this work which could do it full justice — closer than London, Buenos Aires, or San Francisco, one might add.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was the main business of the day, and Mr. Leinsdorf's reading of it built to a stunning climax in the fourth movement. There was an excellent quartet of soloists—Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor, and Justino Diaz, bass—all of whom contributed solid individualistic performances to a whole which, more often than not, emerges as something of a vocal scramble. The choruses — the Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus, and the Chorus Pro Musica of Boston — sang with what seemed like an especially fervent recognition of the occasion. And the great orchestra paid Mr. Leinsdorf the final compliment of playing its very best for him, which as everyone knows, is superlative indeed.

Throughout the concert, Mr. Leinsdorf's air of relaxation gave rise to the speculation that the afternoon represented welcome relief from heavy administrative burdens, a happy return to fields of former activity (he is announced to conduct opera at the Colon in Buenos Aires and at the Metropolitan during the next few seasons), and a not-goodbye-but-auf Wiedersehen atmosphere in which to take leave of a group of distinguished colleagues.

Mr. Leinsdorf's departure leaves the BSO in charge of William Steinberg as music director for the 1969-70 season, with Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller sharing responsibility as artistic directors during the summer of 1970 at Tanglewood. Leonard Bernstein will be adviser for next year's Tanglewood season, which runs from July 3 to Aug. 23.

Whitestone Photo

A conductor leaves

The last concert to be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony took place at the end of the Tanglewood season, and is discussed in the columns above.

SUN
WESTERLY, R. I.
(E) 9,900 (S) 9,950

AUG 25 1969

New England Newsclip

TIMES REPORTER
BELLOWS FALLS, VERMONT
4,768

AUG 25 1969

New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
(E) 14,465

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
(E) 41,946

AUG 25 1969

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
(E) 38,693

AUG 25 1969

AUG 25 1969

New England

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, MAINE
(E) 30,034

AUG 25 1969

New England Newsclip

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(E) 150,082

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 25 1969

CALL
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
(E) 30,774

AUG 25 1969

TELEGRAPH
NASHUA, N. H.
(E) 19,203

AUG 25 1969

HERALD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
(E) 33,513

AUG 25 1969

Final Concert Is Conducted By Erich Leinsdorf

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Erich Leinsdorf ended his career as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday at Tanglewood with Beethoven's Ninth.

Some 14,129 persons attended the concert, 3,000 more than came to hear Van Cliburn this summer. The biggest attraction of the season was the concert Aug. 12 by the Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King and the Who, who performed for 21,500 persons.

Leinsdorf will be replaced as conductor of the BSO by William Steinberg.

When the symphony ended, Leinsdorf received an 8-minute, 47-second standing ovation.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 25 1969

—Associated Press Wirephoto

LAST BOW — Erich Leinsdorf waves to audience at Tanglewood after finishing his last performance with Boston Symphony Orchestra. He ended seven years as music director of the orchestra by conducting Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

STANDARD TIMES
HYANNIS, MASS.
(E) 22,520 (S) 14,725

AUG 25 1969

New Eng

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

AUG 27 1969

'Royal Hunt and Storm'

Traditionally, Tanglewood ends its summer season of music with the joyous Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. So it was this year, but perhaps the short opening work of the closing program was more appropriate for this occasion. The work was the "Royal Hunt and Storm" by Berlioz.

The reason it was more appropriate? The concert marked the last appearance of Erich Leinsdorf as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The storm that led to his departure had been kept both quiet and polite, but it was none-the-less there. The hunt had been for his successor. It must be noted that Mr. Leinsdorf is being succeeded by not one but by three men. William Steinberg will direct the orchestra during its regular season. Gunther Schuller and Seiji Ozawa will direct the summer Tanglewood season.

And there, perhaps, was the source of the difficulties Mr. Leinsdorf encountered. He simply had too much to do. His critics charged the quality of the orchestra suffered. His programming was sometimes questioned.

But Mr. Leinsdorf brought that orchestra to new things, set it in new directions even as he encountered difficulties. He was the proper conductor for that orchestra in his time. He deserves the well wishes of Boston and of we Metroland residents who heard him at Tanglewood in his new and far-ranging undertakings.

Whitestone

FINALE: BSO Conductor Erich Leinsdorf acknowledges the ovation given him at yesterday's final concert.

Retiring Leinsdorf Cheered by 14,000

By JAY ROSENFELD

SOME 14,120 voices shouted and cheered Erich Leinsdorf yesterday afternoon as he brought to a close a performance of the Beethoven choral symphony, the Tanglewood summer schedule, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his own tenure as its musical director for the past seven years.

* * *

IN AN INSTITUTION where demonstrations of enthusiasm are normal at ordinary events, it becomes difficult to grade and qualify one event from another. Yet the combination of Beethoven's 9th symphony, performed with exaltation before a huge audience, the largest of the season in the orchestra's schedule, plus perfect Berkshire weather and the valedictory of Leinsdorf, all combined to make the occasion a memorable and indelibly impressive one.

At moments when musicians need the musical equivalent of the Scriptures, one of the first pages they turn to is Beethoven's final symphony. And at moments when composers need to express sublimity, they turn to the greatness of simplicity. A composer cannot know when he has reached the loftiest peak of his journey through life. Yet men such as Wagner in his "Parsifal" and Beethoven in this symphony found that no harmonic grandeur would serve the glory which was bursting within their hearts and minds. So, at least in these two instances, they turned to the unaffected purity of unison for the introductions of their masterpieces. When, in the final movement the voices enter, Beethoven writes in a sequence that doesn't move beyond one step and the contiguous note.

A formidable quartet of vocal soloists was enlisted for yesterday's performance: Beverly Sills, soprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, John Alexander, tenor, and Justino Diaz, bass. Diaz's mighty proclamation, "O Friends and Brothers" was delivered with powerful majesty. The chorus, the combined Tanglewood choir and the Berkshire Chorus with Charles Wilson, director, and the Chorus Pro Musica, Alfred Nash Patterson, director, sang as though each one

Leinsdorf's Last Concert
Continued on Page 5

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,000

AUG 28 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF'S final concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be televised in a taped broadcast from the Tanglewood Music Festival on Channel 2, WGBH-TV, Sunday, Aug. 31 on Sounds of Sumer at 8 p.m.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 25 1969

Leinsdorf's Last Concert

Continued from Page 1

realized the importance of the occasion. Unforgettable was the episode "O Ye Millions, Now Embrace Ye."

* * *

THE ORCHESTRAL portions of the Saturday evening concert, conducted by Leinsdorf, were by composers born within hailing distance of each other at the beginning of the 1880s. Edgar Varese was born in Paris in 1885. He lived in America after 1916 when he was discharged from the French Army following a serious illness. He lived to be a few days short of 80. His "Deserts" with which Leinsdorf opened the evening, is an antiphonal composition for wind instruments and percussion, alternating with electronic-organized sound. Although "Deserts" was written when he was past 70, Varese had always believed that normal musical instruments are obsolete and that music should be written exclusively for electrotonic instruments.

Leinsdorf played the work on tour last season and drew boos and hisses everywhere he went. He was prepared for such a reception Saturday. Indeed, he solicited and encouraged such a reaction. The audience was moved by either bewilderment or amusement. The piece was written primarily for the basis of a film which was to be made after the music.

Varese's potential classmate, Stravinsky whose "Firebird" closed the program, wrote his work for ballet. Both compositions, when played on a concert platform, demand greater concentration by the audience than older music which entertains or moves us rather than exciting us by sadistic tonal flagellation.

* * *

THE VARESE ELECTRONIC portions were produced by oscillators and generators, and conveyed through amplifiers and loudspeakers. These, one assumed, were faithfully reproduced. The live instrumentalists were punctual. Varese's music has always scandalized audiences. The extreme dissonance per se is less unconventional than the new paths of rhythm and timbre he disposes.

The opposition that practically all musical pioneers encountered with subsequent acceptance, is usually quoted as a model and proof that current strange sounds and combinations which are submitted as music will, in their proper day, win recognition. Varese's early works, such as "Octandre" and "Poeme Electronique," do not seem to have made any progress in their 40-odd years of existence. At a testimonial dinner which the Koussevitzky Foundation tendered the composer in 1963, he was reserved about the emotional content of his work, insisting that it must speak for itself. Leinsdorf should be commended for allowing it to be heard and, surely, under the best circumstances. Up to now, it has satisfied very few people in any degree.

MALCOLM FRAGER was soloist in the Beethoven piano concerto No. 4, in G, Opus 58. His playing had a quality of precious metal without meretricious plate. His opening declaration was understated with poetic reticence and, where feasible, he avoided opportunities for ostentation in favor of sincerity.

Friday night, a guest new to Tanglewood, made a fine impression in an appealing and popular program. Milton Katims, once a musician in Toscanini's orchestra, and now the longtime musical director of the Seattle Symphony, brought a baton technique reminiscent of his early maestro. His style of conducting might serve as a paradigm for some flailers who feel they must dramatize every emotion and indicate every progression. His musical insight was as mature as his methods of directing.

* * *

THE ROSSINI overture to "La Silken Ladder," the Tchaikovsky 4th symphony, the Vaughan Williams Fantasia on a theme of Thomas Tallis and the second suite of Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe" were calculated as cannily as anything that could have been chosen to please a huge audience yet Katims' many recalls were demonstrably attributable to the color and contour with which he invested his work rather than to the appeal the familiar choices normally exert.

EAGLE-TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
(M&E) 45,050

AUG 25 1969

Director Retires

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Erich Leinsdorf ended his career as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday at Tanglewood with Beethoven's Ninth.

75

LEINSDORF CONDUCTS TANGLEWOOD FINALE

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 25—One of the largest audiences to attend a Boston Symphony concert at Tanglewood in the seven years of Erich Leinsdorf's regime as musical director—14,120 people—heard him conduct the Beethoven Ninth Symphony yesterday to close the 1969 Berkshire Festival. At the performance's end, Mr. Leinsdorf was given a five-minute standing ovation.

The concert was Mr. Leinsdorf's 709th as head of the Boston Symphony, from which he has resigned effective at the end of the Tanglewood season. During his seven years, he conducted 429 different works by 96 composers, including 13 world premieres. He will be succeeded in the fall by William Steinberg.

Attendance for all 39 events at Tanglewood this summer totaled 236,937, compared with last year's total of 222,293. The summer's largest crowd—21,500—was attracted by a rock concert.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

AUG 25 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

AUG 25 1969 New England

Leinsdorf Cheered By 14,000 at Farewell

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

LENOX—Two hours before concert time yesterday afternoon, westbound traffic at the Tanglewood exit of the Massachusetts Turpike was backed up nearly a mile from the toll booth.

It was a beautiful afternoon and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was on the program, though what drew the enormous crowd to Tangelwood was Erich Leinsdorf's last concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Attendance was reported at 14,129. That is one of the largest audiences ever to hear a Boston Symphony concert. It even outnumbered Van Cliburn's audience this Summer by 3000. (The biggest crowd of the season, 21,500, came to hear the Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King and The Who on August 12.)

Yesterday's audience responded with a standing ovation eight minutes 47 seconds long—shared by all the performers, joined in by many of them, but addressed principally to Leinsdorf.

The occasion marked the departure not only of Leinsdorf, who will be succeeded in the Fall by William Steinberg, but also of Charles Wilson, assistant conductor who will become principal resident conductor of the New York City Opera. Succeeding him is Michael Tilson Thomas.

Others leaving the symphony include harpist Olivia Luetcke, who leaves to raise chinchillas; violinist George Zazofsky, who left to begin teaching in Florida; and cellist Carol Procter, who leaves temporarily to participate in one-year exchange program with the Japan Philarmonic Symphony Orchestra.

Beethoven's Ninth Leinsdorf's Finale

★ LEINSDORF

Continued from Page 1

Leinsdorf began yesterday's program with the Royal Hunt and Storm from Berlioz's "The Trojans at Carthage," enhanced by being done for once with its choral parts, and a pleasure to hear even in this less than magical performance.

The Beethoven Ninth is becoming established as the piece with which Boston Symphony conductors make their farewells. Leinsdorf ended his last Winter season with it in [illegible]il, and the Tanglewood performance was much like the Boston one, energetic in its quick movements, straight and rather unrhetorical, though visually showy. It was better played this time, but a bit more driven, a bit more desperate in tempo.

A curious detail: In the Scherzo, Leinsdorf this time used the Wagnerian orchestral retouchings that he had eschewed in April and at his previous Boston performance in 1966.

Different singers were present this time. Soprano Beverly Sills was a considerable improvement upon Jane Marsh, and alto Florence Kopleff, besides endearing herself by singing along in all the choral parts, was more effective than her predecessor, Josephine Veasey. Justino Diaz was a sonorous replacement for Sherrill Milnes, and John Alexander did a competent job with the tenor part.

The choruses were the Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus, prepared by Charles Wison and John Oliver, and the chorus Pro Musica, prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson. They added excellent effects.

76.

Erich Leinsdorf Ends Seven Years With BSO

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

Erich Leinsdorf concluded his seven years as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday afternoon with a majestic performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Appearing with the orchestra for the last time at Tanglewood, he bowed out with the same work with which he closed his final home season in Boston last spring.

Soloists Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander and Justine Diaz joined with the Tanglewood Chorus and Berkshire Choir in the jubilant farewell.

ERICH LEINSDORF

LEINSDORF SUCCEEDED Charles Munch as conductor of the Boston Symphony, coming to Boston from the Metropolitan Opera. The selection of the Choral Symphony seemed most appropriate as finale, not only because of its celebrational charcter but also because of its vocal usage, prominent mark in Leinsdorf programming.

Among the many marks which Leinsdorf has made on the institution of Tanglewood was the formation of the Berkshire Choir made up of amateur singers from the western Massachusetts and eastern New York region particularly for Tanglewood concerts. In the past three seasons the chorus has performed with the orchestra and Tanglewood Choir on numerous occasions in the concert operas and oratorios that are almost invariably highlights of the summer season.

THE BUOYANT playing of the BSO on Sunday afternoon and Leinsdorf's particularly spirited attack were simple reflections of the unusually musically successful season being culminated. Plagued a year ago by some sort of performance doldrums, the orchestra was often lackluster in presentation but it has quite reversed the effect during the current summer.

Leinsdorf, who is retiring because he found the fulltiime duties of a musical director too demanding, will spend the immediate future in pursuing many of his musical interests which have necessarily been neglected while in Boston. He is particularly interested in guest conducting and will include the BSO in future performance schedules.

HE IS BEING succeeded by William Steinberg who is also conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, a position he will retain. But the direction of Tanglewood is being passed on to Gunther Schuller and Seiji Ozawa under the advisorship of Leonard Bernstein and it is in this group of successors that new directions for the future are indicated.

While Leinsdorf was extremely interested in and worked tirelessly for the broadening of performace with the BSO and at Tanglewood, he was not entirely in sympathy with some of the latest innovations in programming.

THE IDEA of the Weekend Preludes given on Friday night's during the summer was Leinsdorf's as a means of offering more intensive study of various reperoires to the smaller more specialized audience that wished it, thereby enhancing the entire weekend, even the broader but more superficial appeal of other concerts.

He pursued the cooperation of theater and dance organizations within the area and used the talents of both in BSO concerts last season.

He pursued the cooperation of theater and dance organizations within the area and used the talents of both in BSO concerts last season.

But Leinsdorf does not actually approve of the Contemporary Trends concerts which were introduced at Tanglewood a year ago, bringing the first rock concerts into the Music Shed. The Contemporary Trends, advocated by Schuller who has been serving under Leinsdorf in the Berkshire Music Center, are a practical reality.

In an interview three years ago during the first season of the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Leinsdorf pointed out that Tanglewood had a manageable deficit of $100,000 annually and that beyond that, as long as the business manager was smiling, he was not concerned with that end of the business.

SINCE THEN the Boston Symphony in Boston as well as at Tanglewood has run into financial difficulties ranging from rising costs to a couple of rainy summers.

Following the Saratoga Performing Arts Center by a year, Tanglewood introduced rock and pop programming for its increased revenue and because of its appeal to different segments of the audience not generally reached by the standard, somewhat conservative programming necessary in a summer festival that needs to play to 6000 a concert.

In recent seasons Leinsdorf has changed his opinion of the talents necessary to direct a summer music festival, now finding that those of a musician are not necessarily most apt.

Leinsdorf's contributions at Tanglewood were often those of the classical purist, quite desirable from the artistic standpoint, but somewhat out of joint at a time when directions of interest are changing and the emphasis is on numbers, both money and people.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 25 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 25 1969

Leinsdorf Gets Rousing Farewell

LENOX—One of the largest audiences ever to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra attended the final concert directed by Erich Leinsdorf at Tanglewood yesterday. Attendance was announced as 14,129.

At the conclusion, the audience gave Leinsdorf and the Symphony players a standing ovation lasting almost nine minutes. It was regarded as principally a tribute to the conductor.

Leinsdorf will be succeeded as musical director this fall by William Steinberg. Also leaving the Boston group will be Charles Wilson, assistant conductor, who will go to the New York City Opera. Succeeding Wilson will be Michael Tilson Thomas.

Musicians for whom it was the final Boston Symphony concert were Olivia Luetcke, harpist, George Zazofsky, violinist, and Carol Proctor, cellist.

Leinsdorf Ends Boston Years

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Erich Leinsdorf ended his career as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday at Tanglewood with Beethoven's Ninth.

Some 14,129 persons attended the concert, 3,000 more than came to hear Van Cliburn this summer.

DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
(E) 36,500

AUG 25 1969

ENTERPRISE
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
(E) 4,700

AUG 25 1969

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 25 1969

Leinsdorf Farewell Is Beethoven's Ninth

LENOX, Mass. (UPI)—In tradition, Eric Leinsdorf said farewell with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The more than 14,000 persons in the audience said farewell with a standing ovation lasting nearly nine minutes.

Leinsdorf conducted his last concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Sunday before 14,129 persons at Tanglewood. It was the largest crowd ever to hear a Boston Symphony concert.

At Tanglewood

Leinsdorf Earns Farewell Ovation; Beethoven Provides Grand Exit

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There were 14,120 in the audience at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon to join the roars of approval at the conclusion of Erich Leinsdorf's 709th and last appearance on the podium with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as its music director.

He will return as a guest conductor, but in the meantime, judging by the mass attitude in the great shed Sunday afternoon, there will be many who are sorry to see him go. He was given a real ovation.

The performance he conducted of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony deserved it. I don't believe I have heard it done with more impact.

The music under almost any circumstance is music of great grandeur. Under the guidance of Leinsdorf Sunday it was masterly. It was especially successful in the area of least notice but most importance — structural plan and pacing.

The first movement is a dramatic one which must establish suspense. The second must create an almost unbearable electric tension; the third must assuage the tension while sustaining the suspense, one of the neatest tricks in the business; and that tremendous fourth (choral) movement must be a climax of sufficient power to justify all the nervous buildup during the first three.

All of these requirements were delivered with near perfection by about 250 musicians under Leinsdorf's guidance on the hottest day of the Tanglewood season. It was taped by a television crew and will be broadcast over the educational network several times beginning Aug. 31.

On stage with Leinsdorf and the 100-plus members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were four soloists and about 150 members of the Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus and Chorus Pro Musica.

The soloists were Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor, and Justino Diaz, bass.

Once more I must express approval of the approach Leinsdorf takes toward Beethoven. There are listeners who feel that his approach is overly subdued. I disagree.

It seems to me that Leinsdorf considers Beethoven to be the last of the great classicists rather than the first of the great romanticists. Certainly he was transitional and can be heard happily from both directions.

I'm with Leinsdorf and the classic approach this time. It worked with beautiful success Sunday . . . a truly memorable performance.

The large audience Sunday brought the season's total for the 39 big events to 236,937, compared to 222,293 for 37 comparable concerts in 1968. Totals for the 24 basic, orchestra weekend concerts plus eight Saturday open rehearsals were 175,468 this summer and 188,734 in 1968.

* * *

Chamber Finale

The final 10 a.m. chamber music program by the Music Center's advanced fellowship students included a wind quintet by Samuel Barber, a Brahms trio for piano, violin and horn and a Beethoven string quartet, Opus 130.

The session was distinguished by magnificent weather and variable music.

The Barber piece, "Summer Music," Opus 51, was dulcet for a 20th century wind work and aptly titled; the Brahms' trio was a bit overweighted by the pianist (it's not one of his best little pieces anyway), and the Beethoven quartet had some truly beautiful sections. It is long, complex and difficult work, however, and the performance lacked strength, partly because it is a formidable piece for even the most experienced professional quartet and partly, perhaps, because the players have been too busy during their eight weeks of studies to have given it enough preparation.

Next Weekend

Next weekend (this is Tanglewood's first nine-week season) there will be Boston Pops programs conducted by Arthur Fiedler Saturday at 8 and Sunday at 2.30.

The best moments of the regular 24-concert series of the orchestra (for me) came from Eschenbach's Mozart concerto July 4, Mozart's opera, "The Abduction From the Seraglio," July 12, Watts' Brahms concerto July 25, Verdi's opera, "Otello" July 26, Wilson's Sibelius symphony and Ashkenazy's Beethoven concerto July 27, Barenboim's and Dupre's Elgar concerto Aug. 3, Weill's "Three Penny Opera" suite Aug. 9, the Varese-Beethoven combination Aug. 23 and Sunday's Beethoven's Ninth.

There were many others, of course, but I don't keep score.

Tanglewood Farewell

Leinsdorf Steps Down As Music Director

By ROB AUTHIER
T-T Staff Reporter

Some 14,120 persons, the largest assemblage yet to gather at Tanglewood during the 1969 season, gave Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf a thunderous farewell applause Sunday which lasted nearly a full five-minutes. It marked Leinsdorf's final appearance as music director with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The heartwarming ovation from fans of all ages concluded Leinsdorf's seven year tenure with the BSO. He will return as guest conductor, but Sunday's performance was a strong indication that Leinsdorf's most memorable gifts to Massachusetts audiences have already been delivered. His reputation can only be perpetrated.

The concert opened with "The Royal Hunt and Storm," music from Berlioz' "The Trojans," in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the composer's death.

A penertating rendition of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 9" terminated the afternoon program. The entire performance was taped by a Boston television station and will be telecast nationally during the week of Aug. 31.

Music director since 1962, Leinsdorf has conducted 429 works by 96 different composers. He numbers 13 world premieres of major works to his credit and seven Grammy Awards. Sunday's concert marked the 709th appearance of the combined talents of the Boston Symphony and the popular maestro. This figure accounts for the regular Symphony Hall series in Boston, Tanglewood performances, special concerts, benefits, the New York and the Philadelphia concert series and several tours.

Over 225,000 music enthusiasts have visited the Berkshire Music Festival this summer to hear 24 Boston Symphony concerts, eight open rehearsals, five Contemporary Trends concerts and several special music programs.

The total attendance record to date stands at 236,937. This figure also incorporates a Boston Pops Concert held Aug. 5 and the all-day Tanglewood On Parade on Aug. 19.

The Boston Pops will perform in the Music Shed Saturday and Sunday under the baton of Arthur Fiedler.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

AUG 26 1969

Erich Leinsdorf

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 25 1969

Erich Leinsdorf Says Goodby

By JOHN F. KYES

LENOX — They came out yesterday, 14,120 of them, for Erich Leinsdorf's final concert at Tanglewood, and set up an attendance figure which ranks among the few really big ones in Berkshire Festival's history. The audience in the shed gave Leinsdorf a nine-minute standing ovation, during which fervent applause was also accorded the four vocal soloists and the directors of the magnificent chorus.

Total attendance this summer rose to 236,937 as against 222,293 a year ago, thanks to five Tuesday "Contemporary Trends" concerts. Attendance at the eight weekends (24 major concerts and eight open rehearsals) dropped from 188,734 to 175,468.

Rising costs of producing the festival this year were almost certainly offset by total income, since admission fees were increased one-sixth for the lawn and about one-tenth for reserved seats.

Beethoven's Ninth

Leinsdorff chose as the finale of his seven-year tenure the work which Koussevitzky and Munch performed so often at climactic moments, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The performance was a triumph for all concerned. Especially impressive were the contributions of the 120-voice chorus and the quartet of soloists.

Earlier in the program, Berlioz's "Royal Hunt and Storm" from "The Trojans" was a pleasant opener, starting softly and using the chorus and the orchestras full resources at the climax of the fervent but tuneful depiction of the raging elements.

The Ninth Symphony is a tough assignment for even the best soloists. Leinsdorf used good judgment in waiting to have his quartet come on stage between the second and third movements of the symphony, minimizing their wait. He also seated them in front of the chorus, behind the orchestra, and the projection of tone, both as individuals and as a quartet, was excellent.

Gazette Review

The cruelly high, but brilliant tessitura of the choral parts, was negotiated with confidence and splendid tone by the chorus made up by combining the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus trained by Charles Wilson and John Oliver, also the Chorus Pro Musica of which Alfred Nash Patterson is the director.

Against massive orchestral phrases, the chorus held its own, achieving volume without loss of quality. The lingering, high-held notes at certain vital points were spine-tinglers.

Slow Build-Up

Leinsdorf built up the symphony gradually. The entire performance from first to last note took one hour and seven minutes, including pauses between movements.

This is a work which always seems fresh in spite of oft-repeated hearings. The developments are such as the average listener can follow, frmo robust beginnings, through the driving triplets of the second movement and the alternately sentimental and almost churchly pronouncements of the third.

Finally, in the fourth movement, after several tentative themes have been offered and rejected, comes the true theme. Leinsdorf seized this opportunity to have his players utter the merest breath of sound.

Justino Diaz's bass led off the vocal climax of the work, and soon Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff and John Alexander were weaving the magic measures.

None of their artistry however could surpass the long and wonderful phrases of the chorus.

We hope this great music will echo in Leinsdorf's hall of memory for many years after other dedicated hands have taken over the reins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ENTERPRISE & TIMES
BROCKTON, MASS.
(E) 53,254

AUG 25 1969

LENOX. (AP)—Erich Leinsdorf ended his career as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday at Tanglewood with Beethoven's Ninth. Some 14,129 persons attended the concert, 3,000 more than came to hear Van Cliburn this summer. The biggest attraction of the season was the concert Aug. 12 by the Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King and the Who, who performed for 21,500 persons.

Enthusiasm Marks Erich Leinsdorf's Final Appearance

A tremendous warmth of appreciation and enthusiasm mingled with sadness seemed to pervade the more than 14,000 audience recently at Tanglewood, Mass. when Erich Leinsdorf, music director and conductor of the Boston Symphony for the past seven years, and head of the Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center in summer for equally as long, ended his tenure in these capacities.

With a triumphal presentation of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony, with assisting artists, the Tanglewood Choir, the Berkshire Chorus, and the Chorus Pro Musica as a grande finale to not only a successful season of varied offerings, both in the choral and concerto areas, as well as the great symphonies of the past, and more recent and modern programs, the final notes had scarce reached the auditor's ear, when a thunderous round of applause, and continued on-stage calls greeted the great maestro to assure him of their love, confidence and appreciation.

Tradition Noted

A tradition for the Tanglewood fare is the Beethoven Ninth as its closing piece de resistance; only on rare occasions has this schedule been other. It seems to draw its largest crowds and in that alone, together with a superb rendition, may be accounted for the acclamation in part; but surely from the tempo of the clapping, and the vociferous bravos that hailed all through the hall—it was to the man of the podium in particular, that the resounding thanks was given. Then, too, the rich full-bodied unity of the orchestral whole was a fit vehicle for supporting the four extremely able soloists.

Beverly Sills, soprano, whose debut in 1956 has been followed by a continuous succession of operatic and concert accomplishments; Florence Kofleff, who began with the Robert Shaw chorale, as the group's contralto soloist, also has appeared with major orchestras and in opera; John Alexander, a leading tenor with the Metropolitan opera, made his debut with the Vienna opera in 1967; Justino Diaz, baritone, made his debut in a leading role in Puerto Rico at the age of 17, and has been a leading singer with the Met, La Scala, Milan, and with leading symphony orchestras. The Tanglewood Choir is made up of vocal fellowship students at the Berkshire Music Center, selected by audition. It was their fifth appearance with the Symphony this summer. The Berkshire Chorus is a group of trained singers, from a large geographical area, auditioned, and directed during the winter by Charles Wilson and John Oliver. They have likewise sung in earlier performances this year. The Pro Musica Chorus was founded in 1949 at Cambridge and have many times appeared with the Boston Symphony and have made several recordings of their works together.

It is to the mighty work of Beethoven that this thoroughly trained and highly skilled grouping of vocal and instrumental personnel lends some of its greatest, and most joyful, yet arduous tasks—for neither the playing nor the singing of the sustained almost ethereal notes is an easy thing. The adagio in the strings, counterbalanced by the vari - tones and moods throughout is one of the most lyrical, yet sad and haunting melodies of all of Beethoven's works. The little lady who always comes through victoriously with tremendous support on the flute, Dorio Dwyer, again comes through in the usual excellent form.

The program opened with Berlioz Royal Hunt and storm from Les Troyens. The Saturday evening program likewise offered a Beethoven favorite, when Malcolm Frager was soloist in the Piano Concerto No. 4 in G. Frager, a friend of Tanglewood audiences, from his several appearances, has been a soloist since he was 10, making his debut with the St. Louis Symphony. He studied in New York with Carl Friedberg, who had been a pupil of Clara Schumann and Johannes Brahms. He has been a continual prizewinner in International competition. No wonder he has been soloist with the world's major orchestras, and countless recitals in major cities. He's a magnificent medium for Beethoven, which only the mightiest can meet.

It was a well chosen feast of much sustenance, since it was programed betwen two modern composers. While the Stravinsky suite from the Fire Bird is more familiar, it is a study in contrasts, tender, powerful, and exciting. It in turn is almost traditional in contrast to the opening Varese composition, termed "Deserts for orchestra and three interpolations of electronically organized sound—prerecorded on tape," and merged into the orchestral playing at stated intervals. Varese, who was a famous personage, died in 1965; his paths had crossed through doors of Mahler, Debussy, Busoni, Richard Strauss, Schoenberg, all in his youth. In his later years, unhappy with the limitations of sound, in reproduction, he rejoiced when science came forth with the electronic medium, to express what he had heard in his own imagination. His score, Deserts, came forth in 1954, when he was 71, a concert version of a motion picture. Weird and raging storms, metal against metal, a mechanical voice, sound against sound in rapid, stuccato succession, almost a lion's roar, fear, dread, something ominous — a desert of wilderness, as the film suggests—earth, heavens, outerspace, and in man's mind, hopelessness, sadness and despair.

It deafens, yet entrances; somehow in it you are caught

(Continued On Next Page)

HOUR
NORWALK, CONN.
(E) 22,150
AUG 27 1969
New England Newsclip

Enthusiasm

(Continued From Preceding Page)

in the chaos, waiting to get out yet fascinated with the very thing you hear and hate, holding you. It isn't, now, whether you like it or not (electronic music, sounds we've never heard called music)—it is—that it exists. How much we accept it how far it will go forth—or how far "out?" It's a new "now" world in art, ethics, morals, behaviorism. How much of the old and the beautiful can we yet hold on to and still advance with the untried that is yet to be? In the changing pattern music is taking a strong stride Are you listening?

—R.E.H

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900
AUG 25 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, August 25, 1969

Leinsdorf tenure ends

Lenox, Mass.

Erich Leinsdorf ended his career as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday at Tanglewood with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Some 14,129 persons, a record audience this summer, attended the farewell concert which ended with an eight-minute, 47-second standing ovation for Mr. Leinsdorf, who will be succeeded as conductor by William Steinberg.

Compiled from Associated Press and staff dispatches.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
AUG 26 1969

LAST BOW — Conductor Erich Leinsdorf waves to audience at Tanglewood after finishing his last performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Leinsdorf ended seven years as music director of the orchestra by conducting Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the famed music center. (AP Wirephoto)

More Than 14,000 At Music Center

As music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center, Erich Leinsdorf brought his career to a close, Sunday, at Tanglewood in Lenox. The dynamic conductor chose Berlioz' Royal hunt and storm from "The Trojans" and Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony as a fitting finale.

More than 14,000 persons attended the concert, 3,000 more than those who clamored to hear Van Cliburn earlier this summer.

Biggest attraction, numerically, was the Tanglewood Trends program of Aug. 12 by the Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, the Who, and the Joshua Light Show, performing for 21,500.

Leinsdorf was given an eight-minute, 47-second standing ovation, by audience and orchestra, at the symphony's end. William Steinberg will replace Leinsdorf as conductor of the BSO.

M. deB. B.

77.

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — Erich Leinsdorf ended his term as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Sunday afternoon's concert at Tanglewood.

Mr. Leinsdorf's seven years in Boston were somewhat controversial. In attempting an assessment, his tenure can be divided into two periods. During the first few years of his directorship, he obtained splendid orchestral playing and offered interpretations which were highly structured and integrated, but rather coolly uninvolved.

In recent seasons, those of Mr. Leinsdorf's interpretations which have misfired have been in the direction of vehement overemphasis, and the orchestra's playing has become rather coarse.

One contributing factor to this change may have been the great strain imposed by Mr. Leinsdorf's many responsibilities. Aside from his administrative and teaching duties at the Berkshire Music Center, he was required to conduct more concerts throughout the year than the director of any other American symphony orchestra.

THE BOSTON Symphony went on a 52-weeks-a-year schedule during Mr. Leinsdorfs' tenure, and the result may have been a tired conductor and a tired orchestra.

At his best, which has been more frequent than ever this summer, he has given exceptional performances of works by Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Richard Strauss, Wagner, and Prokofiev.

Mr. Leinsdorf's greatest contribution to the orchestra was as a programmer. Given his heavy schedule, it would have been easy to repeat the same works year after year. He did not.

At the Concert

In his seven years with the Boston Symphony, Mr. Leinsdorf performed 429 different works. In contrast, Toscanini led about 470 different scores in his twenty-six years as music director of the New York Philharmonic and NBC Symphony.

The question of programming is more than just whether to play "Modern Music" or the old classics. Mr. Leinsdorf played more than his share of the music of this century, but he also explored many forgotten works of the past.

RATHER than merely repeat the "New World," Mr. Leinsdorf dug out a number of Dvorak's early symphonies. He performed early as well as late Haydn, and conducted many of the Bach cantatas.

He gave many operas in concert versions, including the first American performances of the uncut "Lohengrin" and the original version of Beethoven's "Fidelio."

Mr. Leinsdorf's record as a programmer could stand as an example to all conductors.

Mr. Leinsdorf took his farewell yesterday with the Royal Hunt and Strom from Berlioz' "The Trojans" and the Symphony No. 9 in D Minor, Op. 125 of Beethoven.

The Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir assisted in both works. The soloists in the Beethoven were Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander, and Justino Diaz.

THE PERFORMANCE of the Beethoven was extraordinary. Mr. Leinsdorf conducted the score as one great arch which led logically and consistently from the first note to the last.

The highpoint of the performance was the slow movement, which although rather fast-pasted, was plastically phrased and subtly nuanced.

Mr. Leinsforf's interpretation of the long choral movement was conceived along broad architectual lines. Its many climazes never lacked drama, yet the joyous conclusion did not sound anti-climactic.

The orchestra's playing was of the best-warm yet lucid.

The concert brought Erich Leinsdorf's years with the Boston Symphony to a brilliant conclusion.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144
AUG 25 1969
Bulletin

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900
AUG 27 1969
New England Newsclip

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
AUG 26 1969
New Engl News

—Associated Press Wirephoto

LAST BOW — Erich Leinsdorf waves to audience at Tanglewood after finishing his last performance with Boston Symphony Orchestra. He ended seven years as music director of the orchestra by conducting Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

End Of Berkshire Festival

A program featuring a short work by Berlioz and a long one by Beethoven was presented by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the final program of the 1969 Berkshire Festival season at Tanglewood. The concert also marked the end of Mr. Leinsdorf's tenure as music director of the BSO.

In light of the day's double significance, it would be a pleasure to report that performances accorded the "Royal Hunt and Storm" from Berlioz' opera "Les Troyens" and the Symphony No. 9 by Beethoven were unqualified successes, but such, unfortunately, was not the case.

The Berlioz was not that badly served, but it is not a very significant piece of music, whatever its history or function in the opera. There are, of course, many of the composer's usual felicities in the orchestral writing, including some splendid effects with horns and woodwinds and a clever deployment of choral color. Mr. Leinsdorf and his forces, which included three choruses (the Tanglewood choir, the Berkshire and Pro Musica choruses), gave the score a sympathetic reading, lessened only by a lack of liveliness and impact which made the whole seem somehow less than the sum of its parts.

A similar indisposition marred at least half of the Beethoven. It may have been the temperature (one of the bass players, in fact, had to leave because of the oppressive heat--made more oppressive by the banks of lights installed for the purposes of taped telecast) or it may have been the solemnity of the occasion, but Beethoven's choral symphony suffered from a sogginess that threatened to dissolve the first two movements in a wash of heavy solemnity.

The opening of the Allegro was not nearly abrasive enough, and the whole of the section seemed almost unbearably ponderous, the drama of the music perceptibly diminished by a permeating pallidity and monochromaticism.

The second movement was not much better. The "Vivace" was scarcely molto (heavy and earnest, rather); and even the "Presto" reflected little of the lightness which characterizes that music.

From there, things took a decisive turn for the better; one might evey say the best. The third and fourth movements were eminently satisfying, for reasons which suggest that the lesser effectiveness of first and second were due not to either one of the reasons ascribed above but rather to Mr. Leinsdorf's particular affinities, many of which relate to the melodic impulse inherent in the adagio and choral sections of the Beethoven. The conductor seems happiest in delineating a lyric line, and the third movement accordingly was expansively and sensitively arched. (at times one could hear him singing as he led the musicians). The artistic ascent thus begun culminated in a powerful presentation of the rousing fourth movement. It was this section that proved, in its most felicitous conjunction of musical content and conductorial compatibility, an appropriate and memorable farewell for Mr. Leinsdorf. It is true that the music director was fortunate in his collaborators. The orchestra was its usual responsive and resplendent self. The combined choruses enumerated previously produced well-balanced sound of great sonority wedded to an obvious awareness of text. Finally, the solo quartet, comprising Beverly Sills, soprano, Florence Kopleff, contralto, John Alexander, tenor, and Justino Diaz, bass, coped as bravely and as satisfactorily with their imposing (I almost said impossible) assignments as one could reasonably expect.

The audience, numbering more than 14,000 recalled them and the conductor for bow after bow at the concert's conclusion. It was a tribute, I am sure, as much to Mr. Leinsdorf's work with the orchestra in the past seven years as it was to the quality of much of what they had heard during the afternoon.

B.D.

78.

Leinsdorf Honored By Musicians

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented Erich Leinsdorf, their departing music director, a first edition of the Simrock printing of Beethoven's third symphony. A rare edition, it includes Beethoven's original comments (in Italian) informing the conductor and orchestra that "the Symphony is longer than usual and should be played at the beginning or end of a concert; after an aria or overture; but not too late because the listener will be lost by then."

In presenting the gift, Robert Ripley, cellist and chairman of the players' committee, said, "The members of the orchestra present this first edition in appreciation of seven years of memorable music-making and for the high standards of the orchestra maintained by Mr. Leinsdorf during that time." He extended the orchestra's wish that Mr. Leinsdorf have future success.

Leinsdorf Moved

The retiring conductor replied, "I am moved by the thoughtfulness of the orchestra and will cherish this fine gift and the memories of the last seven years."

The edition was inscribed: "To Erich Leinsdorf with appreciation and affection from the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, August 1969."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 25 1969

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

AUG 26 1969

Tempo for Musicians Now Is Presto

By HENRY RAYMONT
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 25 — For most people the summer vacations may be ending. But for conductors, symphony orchestras and concert soloists they have not even begun.

Once an interval during which musicians replenished drained energies and prepared new repertories for the coming season, summers have now come to mean a time of frantic travel and a time of coping with humidity, mosquitoes and airline schedules.

The cause of all this is the proliferation of outdoor summer festivals, each trying to outdo the other by featuring famous concert stars, big orchestras and innovative programs. What made it possible, of course, is the jet plane, which all summer long has been shuttling artists from coast to coast and continent to continent.

As Erich Leinsdorf ended the Tanglewood Music Festival's 1969 season here last night—and his seven-year directorship — with a rousing performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, musicians were scattering to all parts of the world.

Headed for Argentina

Mr. Leinsdorf is off this weekend for Buenos Aires to begin rehearsals Sept. 3 for 15 performances of the famed Teatro Colón Opera House, of "Der Rosenkavalier," "Wozzeck" and "Parsifal."

Leafing through a bulky notebook, Mr. Leinsdorf listed aloud his summer schedule, including his concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here and earlier appearances in Europe:

"Since July I conducted 15 different programs and 16 rehearsals with the Boston, as well as two performances of 'Wozzeck' with 13 rehearsals by the Berkshire Music Center. The two last weeks of June, I was in England to lead the London Symphony Orchestra in its 65th anniversary concert at Festival Hall. They say there's no rest for the wicked and musicians must be very wicked."

Lilian Kallir, the attractive brunette concert pianist who played the first recital of the season here and taught master classes at the Berkshire Music Center, left tonight for Rio de Janeiro to join her husband, Claude Frank, the pianist, who is on a South American concert tour. The trip will be her first rest in the year.

"My summer," Miss Kallir recounted, "began with five concerts in Switzerland and Austria and two concerts with the National Symphony Orchestra's festival outside Washington before I came to Tanglewood. Claude had just completed recording the 32 Beethoven sonatas for RCA in New York before he came here. He played two concerts and then we taught together until the first week of August when he left for Bogotá."

Associated Press

Erich Leinsdorf responding to the audience at Tanglewood Monday night after conducting his last concert with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Leinsdorf, who is resigning as the orchestra's music director, was given a standing ovation.

Back From Australia

Malcolm Frager, the piano soloist in Saturday night's concert, had just arrived from a nine-week Australian tour a day earlier, just in time for a 10 A.M. rehearsal.

"It was not really tiring. I had a marvelous 27-hour flight from Sydney and felt quite refreshed when I arrived," Mr. Frager said.

The Romeros, a Spanish classic guitar quartet made up of Celedonio Romero and his three sons, were less fortunate when they tried to get to Saratoga Springs, N.Y., from Los Angeles to play a concert with Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra two weeks ago. The 30-hour journey from Los Angeles was described by Celin Romero, one of the sons:

"The trouble began when we had to circle over Kennedy Airport Friday night and missed our connecting flight to Albany. So we rented a car from Alexander's at about 10 P.M., about 12 hours after we left Los Angeles. We drove up the New York Thruway in a torrential rain and at 3 in the morning, pum, we had a flat tire. But what a terrible thing, there was no spare. For three hours we sat in the car, crammed, without guitars.

"I can't tell you what we said. There were some special Spanish words which don't translate. Then at 6 in the morning cars began to pass and somebody must have called for help because half an hour later a tow truck took us to Albany where everybody was very friendly."

"Imagine," Angel Romero interrupted. "Cars breaking down in America and people so friendly, when in Spain we think no machines ever break down in America and people have no time to be friendly."

Henri Dauman

Jacqueline du Pré

At a luncheon for some patrons of the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Mr. Ormandy chuckled over a typical summer music festival incident.

Errant Mosquito Smitten

"I was rehearsing with Gina Bachauer in the open auditorium during a particularly humid day," he said. "Suddenly I heard a crashing chord which wasn't in the score. A mosquito which had been bothering her fell on the keyboard and she was determined to get it."

Two of the most widely traveled musicians on the summer circuit are Daniel Barenboim, the Israeli-born pianist and conductor, and his wife, the English cellist Jacqueline du Pré.

On July 28 they arrived from London to perform at Tanglewood. A week later they appeared in Saratoga Springs, 80 miles away. But in between Mr. Barenbolm had to conduct a concert with the Los Angeles Symphony at the Hollywood Bowl.

On Aug. 10, Mr. Barenboim and Miss du Pré flew back to London where they directed the South Bank Music Festival, a three-week event crammed with chamber music. (In one performance last week Zubin Mehta, the conductor, played double bass in Schubert's "Trout" Quintet.)

Stern's Itinerary

Isaac Stern, the violinist renowned for his prodigious travel schedule, began the summer with more than 30 appearances in chamber music and symphony concerts in England, Switzerland, Belgium, Spain and Portugal. After spending a month in New York recording Beethoven sonatas with Mr. Istomin, he flew back to France last week to begin a cruise of the eastern Mediterranean with concerts in Rhodes, Naples, and Dubrovnik, Yugoslavia.

"There was a time when artists did not want to play during the summer," Martin Feinstein of the Sol Hurok concert management said in New York the other day. "One of the problems was that they did not want to play with amplification as we had in Lewisohn Stadium in New York a few years ago. Another was travel.

"Now that we have good conditions for summer concerts and jet planes that can bring them from Europe or the West Coast to such places as Tanglewood, Saratoga, Rochester and Detroit, famous artists are no longer averse to playing there.

"The summers have become as hectic as the rest of the year."

Farewell to Leinsdorf

Retroviseur

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE VIEW of time is not equal in both directions. We can look backwards by several means among which are books and archives, magnifying glasses and memory. More immediately, there is a rear-view mirror, the French call it a retroviseur (a backward looker) which for our present purpose is a more exactly focused word.

There is no method of equal reliability to look ahead. There have been men of great wisdom and great vision. There have been Mother Shipton, the Oracle of Delphi, Nostradamus, Jules Verne, Edward Bellamy and George Orwell, but there is or was little element of certainty in their perceptions.

* * * *

TOMORROW Erich Leinsdorf will come to the terminal of his tenure as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is the seventh summer he has been in command at Tanglewood — as well as the seventh year he has had the responsibility of organizing the schedule for the entire year in Boston. He has not conducted all of the programs, to be sure, but by far the major share.

Leinsdorf went to Boston in the fall of 1962 and to Tanglewood in the summer of '63. Charles Munch had been the incumbent from 1949 and Serge Koussevitzky, in Boston from 1924, came to the Berkshires with the orchestra for its initial season in 1936.

Anyone whose musical experience has spanned the epoch of the Boston orchestra in the Berkshires has portraits in his mind of the three leaders. This is not a mental etching of them as conductors only — but of men who have assumed and executed the responsibilities of chiefs and commanders of an important segment of music in America — music which had a material effect worldwide. In many minds, these three men stand as prominently as though their accomplishments in profile were cut in relief in granite in a musical Mt. Rushmore. Each one, naturally and fortunately, has been a personality enlightened by his own proper attributes. Together, they have been links in a chain of epic musical history.

* * * *

WHAT IS THE measure of a conductor? Indeed, what is the measure of a man? There are those who are quite smug in their convictions that they have discharged their duties and obligations as citizens by paying their taxes, providing food and shelter for their families and driving on the right side of the road. Others would maintain that the obligations of today's society require more from a man. The renewal of a subscription once a week to the brotherhood of man is not sufficient. Albert Schweitzer once wrote:

"It is an uncomfortable doctrine which the true ethic whispers in my ear. You are happy, it says, therefore you are called upon to give much. Whatever more than others you have received in health, natural gifts, working capacity, success, beautiful childhood, harmonious family circumstances, you must not accept as being a matter of course. You must pay a price for them. You must show more than an ordinary devotion to life."

It is by such standards that the three men who have resided among us for these 30-odd summers should be measured. The record would show how they have championed talent, advocated progress and occupied special niches in the larger community.

LEINSDORF will be coming back as guest conductor but for his valedictory tomorrow, he has chosen the only work which fits the occasion: the Beethoven ninth, the choral symphony in which Schiller's "Ode to Joy" is used to express the sublime aspirations of the composer. The music does not convey a sad farewell but a hopeful look ahead.

Scholars have found that Schiller first considered writing his ode to freedom (Freiheit) then settled on joy (Freude). The former sentiment would probably have suited Beethoven better, knowing how fondly his republican nature cherished that quality. Well-known is his repugnance to the step Napoleon took in having himself crowned emperor. That prompted Beethoven to withdraw the dedication of the "Eroica" symphony. Equally recorded is the sympathy with which Beethoven wrote the incidental music for Goethe's "Egmont" in which he would have supported the Low Countries against the intolerance of Spain.

* * * *

AGAIN one asks, what is the measure of a conductor? Does he, as he stands before the musicians, "read" a symphony, "interpret" it, "revive" it? Does he inspire his performers or stimulate them? This is a useless descent into semantics. Yet, the fact remains that one doesn't bid auf Weidersehen to a person whose vocation necessarily endears himself to all those into whose sentience he has become such a lofty symbol. The show must go on, no matter whether we bow our heads and bemoan, "The king is dead," and then raise them and shout with renewed vigor, "Long live the king."

A man, such as Leinsdorf, has been a teacher, a comforter and an artistic leader and companion these past seven years. It is not without pangs of regret that we realize he is moving on.

EAGLE
CLAREMONT, N. H.
(E) 6,709

AUG 23 1969

Erich Leinsdorf Retires From BSO

Erich Leinsdorf conducts his final concert as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at 2.30 p.m. The principal work will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander, and baritone Justino Diaz as soloists. Berlioz' "The Royal Hunt and Storm" from "The Trojans" opens the program.

Mr. Leinsdorf was born in Vienna, Austria, in 1912. He came to the United States in 1937 and became a citizen in 1942. Among his many awards he holds an honorary degree from Williams College which he received in 1966.

Before becoming Musical Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962, Mr. Leinsdorf was the Assistant Conductor of the Salzburg Festival from 1934-37; conductor of the Metropolitan Opera until 1943 and in that year conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra; Music Director of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Rochester from 1947-56; Director of the New York City Center Opera in 1956 and the Metropolitan Opera from 1957-61. He has also made guest appearances all over the United States and Europe. He was a member of the executive committee of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, and has written for several publications including the New York Times and the Saturday Review.

Mr. Leinsdorf lives with his wife in Brookline, Mass. He has four children.

ERIC LEINSDORF

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 22 1969

MILWAUKEE (WIS) JRL E. 249,703 S. 542,109
MONDAY, AUGUST 25, 1969

Leinsdorf's Farewell Witnessed by 14,129

Lenox, Mass. –U P I– Erich Leinsdorf said farewell to the Boston Symphony orchestra in tradition Sunday by conducting Beethoven's ninth symphony before the largest audience ever to attend a Boston Symphony concert.

PAPILLION, NEBR.
GRETNA BREEZE
W. 940

AUG 21 1969

"NET Festival", seen Tuesday, August 26 at 8 p.m. will feature maestro Erich Leinsdord, music director of the Boston Symphony.

The color program, "Leinsdorf Recreates," shows young players of the senior orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music in rehearsal under the direction of Mr. Leinsdorf.

Symphonic Farewell

LENOX (UPI) — In traditional style Eric Leinsdorf said farewell with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The more than 14,000 persons in the audience at Tanglewood on Sunday said farewell with a standing ovation lasting nearly nine minutes.

Leinsdorf conducted his last concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Sunday before 14,129 persons. It was the largest crowd ever to hear a Boston Symphony concert.

The occasion also marked the departure of Charles Wilson, the assistant conductor who will become principal resident conductor of the New York Opera.

Leinsdorf will be succeeded in the fall by William Steinberg.

Leinsdorf began the program with the Royal Hunt and Stern from "The Trojans at Carthage" by Berlioz.

Beethoven's Ninth has become the traditional departure piece for Boston Symphony conductors, and at its conclusion, the orchestra and audience stood and gave Leinsdorf an ovation lasting 8 minutes, 47 seconds.

QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

AUG 29 1969

78

Leinsdorf Honored By Musicians

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented Erich Leinsdorf, their departing music director, a first edition of the Simrock printing of Beethoven's third symphony. A rare edition, it includes Beethoven's original comments (in Italian) informing the conductor and orchestra that "the Symphony is longer than usual and should be played at the beginning or end of a concert; after an aria or overture; but not too late because the listener will be lost by then."

In presenting the gift, Robert Ripley, cellist and chairman of the players' committee, said, "The members of the orchestra present this first edition in appreciation of seven years of memorable music-making and for the high standards of the orchestra maintained by Mr. Leinsdorf during that time." He extended the orchestra's wish that Mr. Leinsdorf have future success.

Leinsdorf Moved

The retiring conductor replied, "I am moved by the thoughtfulness of the orchestra and will cherish this fine gift and the memories of the last seven years."

The edition was inscribed: "To Erich Leinsdorf with appreciation and affection from the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, August 1969."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 25 1969

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

AUG 26 1969

Tempo for Musicians Now Is Presto

By HENRY RAYMONT

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 25 — For most people the summer vacations may be ending. But for conductors, symphony orchestras and concert soloists they have not even begun.

Once an interval during which musicians replenished drained energies and prepared new repertories for the coming season, summers have now come to mean a time of frantic travel and a time of coping with humidity, mosquitoes and airline schedules.

The cause of all this is the proliferation of outdoor summer festivals, each trying to outdo the other by featuring famous concert stars, big orchestras and innovative programs. What made it possible, of course, is the jet plane, which all summer long has been shuttling artists from coast to coast and continent to continent.

As Erich Leinsdorf ended the Tanglewood Music Festival's 1969 season here last night—and his seven-year directorship — with a rousing performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, musicians were scattering to all parts of the world.

Headed for Argentina

Mr. Leinsdorf is off this weekend for Buenos Aires to begin rehearsals Sept. 3 for 15 performances of the famed Teatro Colón Opera House, of "Der Rosenkavalier," "Wozzeck" and "Parsifal."

Leafing through a bulky notebook, Mr. Leinsdorf listed aloud his summer schedule, including his concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here and earlier appearances in Europe:

"Since July I conducted 15 different programs and 16 rehearsals with the Boston, as well as two performances of 'Wozzeck' with 13 rehearsals by the Berkshire Music Center. The two last weeks of June, I was in England to lead the London Symphony Orchestra in its 65th anniversary concert at Festival Hall. They say there's no rest for the wicked and musicians must be very wicked."

Lilian Kallir, the attractive brunette concert pianist who played the first recital of the season here and taught master classes at the Berkshire Music Center, left tonight for Rio de Janeiro to join her husband, Claude Frank, the pianist, who is on a South American concert tour. The trip will be her first rest in the year.

"My summer," Miss Kallir recounted, "began with five concerts in Switzerland and Austria and two concerts with the National Symphony Orchestra's festival outside Washington before I came to Tanglewood. Claude had just completed recording the 32 Beethoven sonatas for RCA in New York before he came here. He played two concerts and then we taught together until the first week of August when he left for Bogotá."

Associated Press

Erich Leinsdorf responding to the audience at Tanglewood Monday night after conducting his last concert with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Leinsdorf, who is resigning as the orchestra's music director, was given a standing ovation.

Back From Australia

Malcolm Frager, the piano soloist in Saturday night's concert, had just arrived from a nine-week Australian tour a day earlier, just in time for a 10 A.M. rehearsal.

"It was not really tiring. I had a marvelous 27-hour flight from Sydney and felt quite refreshed when I arrived," Mr. Frager said.

The Romeros, a Spanish classic guitar quartet made up of Celedonio Romero and his three sons, were less fortunate when they tried to get to Saratoga Springs, N.Y., from Los Angeles to play a concert with Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra two weeks ago. The 30-hour journey from Los Angeles was described by Celin Romero, one of the sons:

"The trouble began when we had to circle over Kennedy Airport Friday night and missed our connecting flight to Albany. So we rented a car from Alexander's at about 10 P.M., about 12 hours after we left Los Angeles. We drove up the New York Thruway in a torrential rain and at 3 in the morning, pum, we had a flat tire. But what a terrible thing, there was no spare. For three hours we sat in the car, crammed, without guitars.

"I can't tell you what we said. There were some special Spanish words which don't translate. Then at 6 in the morning cars began to pass and somebody must have called for help because half an hour later a tow truck took us to Albany where everybody was very friendly."

"Imagine," Angel Romero interrupted. "Cars breaking down in America and people so friendly, when in Spain we think no machines ever break down in America and people have no time to be friendly."

At a luncheon for some patrons of the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Mr. Ormandy chuckled over a typical summer music festival incident.

Errant Mosquito Smitten

"I was rehearsing with Gina Bachauer in the open auditorium during a particularly humid day," he said. "Suddenly I heard a crashing chord which wasn't in the score. A mosquito which had been bothering her fell on the keyboard and she was determined to get it."

Two of the most widely traveled musicians on the summer circuit are Daniel Barenboim, the Israeli-born pianist and conductor, and his wife, the English cellist Jacqueline du Pré.

On July 28 they arrived from London to perform at Tanglewood. A week later they appeared in Saratoga Springs, 80 miles away. But in between Mr. Barenbolm had to conduct a concert with the Los Angeles Symphony at the Hollywood Bowl.

On Aug. 10, Mr. Barenboim and Miss du Pré flew back to London where they directed the South Bank Music Festival, a three-week event crammed with chamber music. (In one performance last week Zubin Mehta, the conductor, played double bass in Schubert's "Trout" Quintet.)

Stern's Itinerary

Isaac Stern, the violinist renowned for his prodigious travel schedule, began the summer with more than 30 appearances in chamber music and symphony concerts in England, Switzerland, Belgium, Spain and Portugal. After spending a month in New York recording Beethoven sonatas with Mr. Istomin, he flew back to France last week to begin a cruise of the eastern Mediterranean with concerts in Rhodes, Naples, and Dubrovnik, Yugoslavia.

"There was a time when artists did not want to play during the summer," Martin Feinstein of the Sol Hurok concert management said in New York the other day. "One of the problems was that they did not want to play with amplification as we had in Lewisohn Stadium in New York a few years ago. Another was travel.

"Now that we have good conditions for summer concerts and jet planes that can bring them from Europe or the West Coast to such places as Tanglewood, Saratoga, Rochester and Detroit, famous artists are no longer averse to playing there.

"The summers have become as hectic as the rest of the year."

Henri Dauman

Jacqueline du Pré

Farewell to Leinsdorf

Retroviseur

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE VIEW of time is not equal in both directions. We can look backwards by several means among which are books and archives, magnifying glasses and memory. More immediately, there is a rear-view mirror, the French call it a retroviseur (a backward looker) which for our present purpose is a more exactly focused word.

There is no method of equal reliability to look ahead. There have been men of great wisdom and great vision. There have been Mother Shipton, the Oracle of Delphi, Nostradamus, Jules Verne, Edward Bellamy and George Orwell, but there is or was little element of certainty in their perceptions.

* * * *

TOMORROW Erich Leinsdorf will come to the terminal of his tenure as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is the seventh summer he has been in command at Tanglewood — as well as the seventh year he has had the responsibility of organizing the schedule for the entire year in Boston. He has not conducted all of the programs, to be sure, but by far the major share.

Leinsdorf went to Boston in the fall of 1962 and to Tanglewood in the summer of '63. Charles Munch had been the incumbent from 1949 and Serge Koussevitzky, in Boston from 1924, came to the Berkshires with the orchestra for its initial season in 1936.

Anyone whose musical experience has spanned the epoch of the Boston orchestra in the Berkshires has portraits in his mind of the three leaders. This is not a mental etching of them as conductors only — but of men who have assumed and executed the responsibilities of chiefs and commanders of an important segment of music in America — music which had a material effect worldwide. In many minds, these three men stand as prominently as though their accomplishments in profile were cut in relief in granite in a musical Mt. Rushmore. Each one, naturally and fortunately, has been a personality enlightened by his own proper attributes. Together, they have been links in a chain of epic musical history.

* * * *

WHAT IS THE measure of a conductor? Indeed, what is the measure of a man? There are those who are quite smug in their convictions that they have discharged their duties and obligations as citizens by paying their taxes, providing food and shelter for their families and driving on the right side of the road. Others would maintain that the obligations of today's society require more from a man. The renewal of a subscription once a week to the brotherhood of man is not sufficient. Albert Schweitzer once wrote:

"It is an uncomfortable doctrine which the true ethic whispers in my ear. You are happy, it says, therefore you are called upon to give much. Whatever more than others you have received in health, natural gifts, working capacity, success, beautiful childhood, harmonious family circumstances, you must not accept as being a matter of course. You must pay a price for them. You must show more than an ordinary devotion to life."

It is by such standards that the three men who have resided among us for these 30-odd summers should be measured. The record would show how they have championed talent, advocated progress and occupied special niches in the larger community.

LEINSDORF will be coming back as guest conductor but for his valedictory tomorrow, he has chosen the only work which fits the occasion: the Beethoven ninth, the choral symphony in which Schiller's "Ode to Joy" is used to express the sublime aspirations of the composer. The music does not convey a sad farewell but a hopeful look ahead.

Scholars have found that Schiller first considered writing his ode to freedom (Freiheit) then settled on joy (Freude). The former sentiment would probably have suited Beethoven better, knowing how fondly his republican nature cherished that quality. Well-known is his repugnance to the step Napoleon took in having himself crowned emperor. That prompted Beethoven to withdraw the dedication of the "Eroica" symphony. Equally recorded is the sympathy with which Beethoven wrote the incidental music for Goethe's "Egmont" in which he would have supported the Low Countries against the intolerance of Spain.

* * * *

AGAIN one asks, what is the measure of a conductor? Does he, as he stands before the musicians, "read" a symphony, "interpret" it, "revive" it? Does he inspire his performers or stimulate them? This is a useless descent into semantics. Yet, the fact remains that one doesn't bid auf Weidersehen to a person whose vocation necessarily endears himself to all those into whose sentience he has become such a lofty symbol. The show must go on, no matter whether we bow our heads and bemoan, "The king is dead," and then raise them and shout with renewed vigor, "Long live the king."

A man, such as Leinsdorf, has been a teacher, a comforter and an artistic leader and companion these past seven years. It is not without pangs of regret that we realize he is moving on.

EAGLE
CLAREMONT, N. H.
(E) 6,700

AUG 23 1969

Erich Leinsdorf Retires From BSO

Erich Leinsdorf conducts his final concert as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at 2.30 p.m. The principal work will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander, and baritone Justino Diaz as soloists. Berlioz' "The Royal Hunt and Storm" from "The Trojans" opens the program.

Mr. Leinsdorf was born in Vienna, Austria, in 1912. He came to the United States in 1937 and became a citizen in 1942. Among his many awards he holds an honorary degree from Williams College which he received in 1966.

Before becoming Musical Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962, Mr. Leinsdorf was the Assistant Conductor of the Salzburg Festival from 1934-37; conductor of the Metropolitan Opera until 1943 and in that year conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra; Music Director of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Rochester from 1947-56; Director of the New York City Center Opera in 1956 and the Metropolitan Opera from 1957-61. He has also made guest appearances all over the United States and Europe. He was a member of the executive committee of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, and has written for several publications including the New York Times and the Saturday Review.

Mr. Leinsdorf lives with his wife in Brookline, Mass. He has four children.

ERIC LEINSDORF

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 22 1969

Symphonic Farewell

LENOX (UPI) — In traditional style Eric Leinsdorf said farewell with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The more than 14,000 persons in the audience at Tanglewood on Sunday said farewell with a standing ovation lasting nearly nine minutes.

Leinsdorf conducted his last concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Sunday before 14,129 persons. It was the largest crowd ever to hear a Boston Symphony concert.

The occasion also marked the departure of Charles Wilson, the assistant conductor who will become principal resident conductor of the New York Opera.

Leinsdorf will be succeeded in the fall by William Steinberg.

Leinsdorf began the program with the Royal Hunt and Stern from "The Trojans at Carthage" by Berlioz.

Beethoven's Ninth has become the traditional departure piece for Boston Symphony conductors, and at its conclusion, the orchestra and audience stood and gave Leinsdorf an ovation lasting 8 minutes, 47 seconds.

QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

AUG 29 1969

MILWAUKEE (WIS) JRL 5,512,709 5,512,109
MONDAY, AUGUST 25, 1969

Leinsdorf's Farewell Witnessed by 14,129

Lenox, Mass. –U P I– Erich Leinsdorf said farewell to the Boston Symphony orchestra in tradition Sunday by conducting Beethoven's ninth symphony before the largest audience ever to attend a Boston Symphony concert.

PAPILLION, NEBR.
GRETNA BREEZE
W 940

AUG 21 1969

"NET Festival", seen Tuesday, August 26 at 8 p.m. will feature maestro Erich Leinsdord, music director of the Boston Symphony.

The color program, "Leinsdorf Recreates," shows young players of the senior orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music in rehearsal under the direction of Mr. Leinsdorf.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

AUG 28 1969 New England Newsclip

TURNING THE PAGE: Look for a significant announcement within the next week concerning the imminent start of a new UHF station (Channel 50) in Boston. The programming concept of this one is supposed to represent quite a departure from existing TV station formats . . . Erich Leinsdorf's emotion-charged farewell concert as music director of the Boston Sympony Orchestra was taped at the Tanglewood Shed by Channel 2, and it will be televised nationally on NET's Sounds of Summer program next Sunday from 10 p. m. to midnight. In addition to carrying the Sunday-night presentation, Channel 2 will repeat the concert next Monday through rFiday at 10:0 p. m. The host for this one, as for other programs in the NET musical series, will be Steve Allen.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
RALEIGH-BARTLETT STAR
W. 2,331

AUG 28 1969

FAREWELL CONCERT . . . of Enrich Leinsdorf will be a color feature of WKNO Channel 10 Sunday at 7 p.m. Maestro Leinsdorf will leave the Boston Symphony Orchestra after seven years.

GARLAND, TEXAS
NEWS
D. 9,500

AUG 29 1969

Leinsdorf gives final concert

Erich Leinsdorf's farewell appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented on NET's "Sounds of Summer" series Sunday, at 7 p.m. and Wednesday at 9 p.m. on KERA - TV Channel 13.

Leinsdorf's final concert features two works: a portion of Act II, Part II, of Berlioz's opera "The Trojans," and a complete performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. It was this latter work that inaugurated the opening of the Music Shed at Tanglewood on Aug. 4, 1938.

MODESTO, CALIF.
BEE
D. 45,000 S. 48,000

AUG 24 1969

Leinsdorf Program Is Set On NET

Erich Leinsdorf's farewell appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented on NET's "Sounds of Summer" series next Sunday at 8 p.m. on Channel 6. The two-hour color concert will be followed by another Leinsdorf program on NET Festival, in which the maestro rehearses the young players of the senior orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music.

The "Sounds of Summer" concert will be filmed today at the Berkshire Music Festival on the Tanglewood Estate, Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston orchestra.

Concert Selections

Leinsdorf, who has been at the helm of the orchestra since 1962, announced his decision to resign the post at the end of the 1969 season. His final concert features two works: a portion of Act II, Part II, of Berlioz's opera "The Trojans" and a complete performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Joining the orchestra will be the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir. The combined choral preparation is being done by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, assisted by John Oliver.

LAS VEGAS, NEV.
REVIEW-JOURNAL
D. 52,000 S. 55,500

AUG 24 1969

NET Records Leinsdorf's Final Orchestra Showing

"I want to get out of routine conducting. I want to do less work and better work. That was the crux of the Boston situation. I didn't want to go on conducting 100 concerts a year, and they thought it had to be that way. But, really, the job of musical director is every day more and more an absurdity, and not only in Boston."

These are the words of Maestro Erich Leinsdorf, commenting last February in a New York Times interview on his decision to relinquish the top post as music director of one of the world's great ensembles—the Boston Symphony Orchestra Aug. 24, Leinsdorf, who has been at the helm for seven years, will make his final appearance with the orchestra at the Berkshire Music Festival, on the Tanglewood estate, Lenox, Massachusetts, 32-year-old summer home of the orchestra.

NET will record this most memorable event for its "Sounds of Summer" series, to be seen Sunday, Aug. 31, at 8 p.m. on TV-10.

Leinsdorf in the same interview noted the hazards of being a musical director. There was at Boston "a steady erosion of rehearsal time in contractual negotiations with the orchestra committee." Any musical decision today is met with a "built-in veto" from extra-musical sources. For instance, last winter he planned to present Varese's "Deserts," a work for tape and large percussion forces, on the orchestra's East Coast tour. "It was discovered, unfortunately, that an extra truck would be needed for the percussion, so "Deserts" will be done only in New York and Washington. Before a composer writes anything nowadays, he would be wise to communicate with Jimmy Hoffa as musical consultant."

As to his future plans he remarked, "I may write a book. I already have the opening sentence—'A conductor is a man who stands in front of an orchestra slicing up air.'"

Erich Leinsdorf became the eleventh maestro to lead the Boston Symphony and made his debut as music director at the initial concert of the orchestra's eighty-second season.

"Sounds of Summer" will present conductor Erich Leinsdorf's farewell appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in color Sunday, Aug. 31 at 8 p.m.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003

AUG 26 1969 New Engl

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 22 1969 New England Newsclip

A New Look for Boston Symphony?

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Tanglewood's 32nd season is nearly over, and while another month will elapse before the symphony's 89th season starts in Boston,, the end of Erich Leinsdorf's seven-year regime makes one think in terms of fresh beginnings.

One might casually assume that when William Steinberg (of Pittsburgh) begins his three-year interim conductorship at Symphony Hall on Sept. 26, all will be new. Or, that when Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller (with Leonard Bernstein as adviser) present their verion of Tanglewood from July 3 to August 23, 1970, it will be radically different and perhaps startling.

Actually, no such complete cleavages can occur. Aside from the influence of tradition, there are powerful financial considerations. The cost of rehearsal time is a potent shaper of programs.

Any new conductor familiarizes himself with an orchestra's existing repertoire. There are well-known pieces, which require a minimum of rehearsal. Others, performed in the more distant past, require more time.

New compositions are a luxury, since they encroach seriously on the limited budget of costly rehearsal time.

At Boston this winter and at Tanglewood next summer, there will be much middle-of-the-road music. There has to be.

Critics and audiences will also hear things not so familiar to them. Reactions will include, as always, a mingling of applause as well as protest.

Without doubt, Leinsdorf cooperated with Steinberg and Boston officials in working out plans for the coming months.

One instance, too felicitous to be accidental, began with the Tanglewood performance Aug. 10 under Josef Krips of the Schubert Ninth Symphony.

Rudolf Serkin

This work will be the principal one in Steinberg's Sept. 26 concert at Boston, and this symphony will soon be recorded by the B.S.O., under Steinberg, for RCA.

Strategic use of rehearsal time is evident in these successive events.

The coming season, however, also has many novel facets.

Steinberg will omit one week of B.S.O. touring, and beginning April 6 the orchestra will observe the 200th anniversary year of Beethoven's fifth with a festival of five concerts, sold separately from the main season. Isaac Stern will play the Beethoven violin concerto, Rudolf Serkin all five of the piano concertos, and there will be a choral climax to the week in the "Missa Solemnis."

Another birthday will be celebrated on Dec. 17, 1969, when Arthur Fiedler becomes 75 and conducts a special program of the Boston Symphony.

Several massive works will be conducted by Steinberg this season. Mahler's "The Song of the Earth" and Symphony No. 10, the "Faust Symphony" of Liszt, Bartok's "Bluebeard's Castle," and Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" are high on the list.

William Steinberg

Ozawa will conduct Orff's "Carmina Burana." Colin Davis will offer Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 2 and Elgar's Symphony No. 1.

Guest Conductors

Other guest conductors will be Claudio Abbado, Carlo Maria Giulini and Erich Leinsdorf.

Michael Tilson Thomas, new assistant conductor at Boston, will conduct several regular concerts.

Boston occasionally takes a sentimental backward look. The orchestra, during a week of touring this October, will help the University of Virginia celebrate its 150th anniversary, and will visit the Lyric Theater in Baltimore, to commemorate the concert there by the B.S.O. 75 years ago, when that showplace was opened.

'Final' Tanglewood Weedend

LENOX — The eighth and "final" weekend at Tanglewood will wind up activities at Berkshire Music Center, and witness Erich Leinsdorf's last concerts as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A "ninth" weekend, a novelty this year, will find Arthur Fiedler conducting Boston "Pops" programs in the music shed at Tanglewood at 8 p.m., Aug. 30 and 2:30 p.m. Aug. 31.

The BSO concert at 9 p.m. tonight will be conducted by Milton Katims of Seattle, featuring the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony.

Leinsdorf will conduct at 8 tomorrow, with Malcolm Frager as soloist in the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto, and on Sunday at 2:30, presenting eminent vocal soloists and the chorus in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Ch. 2, 8 p.m., Last Sunday Erich Leinsdorf took his final bow after seven years as conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony. Sounds of Summer presents his last concert in "Leinsdorf's Farewell at Tanglewood."

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

AUG 30 1969

WGBH to Air Leinsdorf Farewell Concert

Erich Leinsdorf's emotion-charged farewell concert, as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on public television coast to coast Sunday, Aug. 31, 10 p.m., in Boston on Channel 2.

WGBH recorded the 2 hour color special at the Tanglewood Shed in Lenox, Mass. Aug. 24 especially for "Sounds of Summer" and Channel 2 will repeat the program Monday - Friday, Sept. 1 - 5 at 10:30 p.m. Steve Allen is host.

The program is devoted to two works: Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans" by Berlioz and Symphony No. 9 by Beethoven. It was this same Beethoven Symphony that inaugurated the opening of the Music Shed at Tanglewood on August 4, 1938. Joining the orchestra for the choral finale of the Beethoven will be the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir, and a quartet of soloists who are among the finest musicians performing today: Beverly Sills, considered by many to be this country's foremost soprano; Florence Kopleff, a contralto who has appeared often with the Boston Symphony; John Alexander, tenor and Justino Diaz, bass, both of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

JOURNAL & PRESS
SOMERVILLE, MASS.
WEEKLY 13,286

AUG 28 1969

PRESS
WATERTOWN, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,913

AUG 28 1969 New England

Erich Leinsdorf's emotion-charged farewell concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on public television coast to coast Sunday, Aug. 31, 10 p.m., in Boston on Channel 2.

WGBH recorded the 2 hour color special at the Tanglewood Shed in Lenox, on Aug. 24 especially for "Sounds of Summer" and Channel 2 will repeat the program Monday - Friday, Sept. 1 - 5 at 10:30 p.m. Steve Allen is host.

The program is devoted to two works: Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans" by Berlioz and Symphony No. 9 by Beethoven. It was this same Beethoven Symphony that inaugurated the opening of the Music Shed at Tanglewood on August 4, 1938. Joining the orchestra for the choral finale of the Beethoven will be the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir, and a quartet of soloists who are among the finest musicians performing today: Beverly Sills, considered by many to be this country's foremost soprano; Florence Kopleff, a contralto who has appeared often with the Boston Symphony; John Alexander, tenor and Justino Diaz, bass, both of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

AUG 30 1969 New England

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

AUG 21 1969 New England

Leinsdorf Farewell Concert on Channel 2

Erich Leinsdorf's farewell concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on public television coast to coast Sunday, Aug. 31, 10 p.m., in Boston on Channel 2. Repeat Monday-Friday, Sept. 1-5 at 10:30 p.m.

Program is devoted to two works: Royal Hunt and Storm, from "The Trojans" by Berlioz and Symphony No. 9 by Beethoven. Joining the orchestra for the choral finale of the Bethoven will be the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. Soloists are, Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor and Justino Diaz, bass.

So.

LAS VEGAS, NEV.
REVIEW-JOURNAL
D. 52,000 S. 55,500

AUG 3 1 1969

THE TELEVISION musical attraction of the summer will be Sunday from 7 to 9 p.m., as KAET, Channel 8, presents "Leinsdorf Farewell at Tanglewood." From Tanglewood, Erich Leinsdorf makes his farewell appearance conducting the Boston Symphony in Berlioz' "The Trojans: Royal Hunt and Storm" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Vocal soloists are Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander and Justino Diaz.

The Phoenix Gazette
D. 92,030

AUG 29 1969

DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE
D. 55,000 S. 79,500

AUG 3 1 1969

Erich Leinsdorf Bids Farewell

Erich Leinsdorf's farewell appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented on NET's "Sounds of Summer" series Sunday, Aug. 31 at 8 p.m. on TV-10.

The concert took place on August 24 at the Berkshire Music Festival, on the Tanglewood estate, Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leinsdorf, who has been at the helm of the Orchestra since 1963, announced his decision to resign his post at the end of the 1969 season. One of America's most acclaimed conductors, he has made a significant contribution to this country's musical life. Under his leadership the Boston Symphony Orchestra has introduced to America the best contemporary music, including such milestones as Barber's Piano Concerto, and Britten's "War Requiem." Many premieres—world and American—have been given, and many long forgotten works revived.

Leinsdorf's final concert features two works: a portion of Act II, Part II, of Berlioz's opera "The Trojans," and a complete performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. It was this latter work that inaugurated the opening of the Music Shed at Tanglewood on August, 4, 1938.

Soloists in the choral finale of the Beethoven work are Beverly Sills, considered America's foremost soprano; contralto Florence Kopleff, a well-known concert performer; tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz, both of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950

AUG 31 1969

Ch. 8 to Air Leinsdorf's Boston Farewell Concert

Erich Leinsdorf's farewell concert with the Boston Symphony will be presented on the "Sounds of Summer" series at 7 p.m. today on Channel 8.

The concert took place last week at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston orchestra. Leinsdorf headed the orchestra for seven years.

The concert features two works: a portion of Berlioz's opera "The Trojans," and a complete performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Soloists in the choral finale of the Beethoven work are Beverly Sills, considered America's foremost soprano; contralto Florence Kopleff; tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz, both of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Born and educated in Vienna, Leinsdorf established himself as an outstanding musician in Europe before coming to New York in 1937 as assistant conductor of the Metropolitan Opera. Two seasons later he became the Met's principal German conductor.

After four years with the Met, he was appointed music director of the Cleveland Orchestra, becoming at 31, the youngest man ever to direct a major American orchestra. Later, Leinsdorf served as conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic and as director of the New York City Opera before rejoining the Met prior to his Boston Symphony affiliation which began in 1962.

ERICH LEINSDORF

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 2 1969

Erich Leinsdorf's farewell concert with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood on Ch. 2 Sunday night was one of the long weekend's television highlights. It was excellently produced, and the emotion was contagious . . . Foreign visitors to the U.S. in the first six months of this year totalled 715,507, an increase of 13.4 per cent over the same period in 1968. Britain sent the most, followed by Japan.

LEINSDORF

Most folk-singing groups have odd names. The latest to come across this desk is "The Four Scent Stamps," headed by Paul Gross, abetted by Charles Ortolani, Ed Winter and the

Record Tanglewood Audience Hears Leinsdorf's Farewell

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

It was a touching tribute paid Erich Leinsdorf last Sunday at Tanglewood, for more than 14,000 people—a season's record for a concert of serious music—came to hear him lead his last program as Music Director of the Boston Symphony.

The crowd was drawn both by the importance of the moment—the sense of history implicit in the event itself—and by the opportunity of hearing the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the most theatrical finale for which Leinsdorf could have wished. And even if the performance was less than totally engrossing, it at least gave one time to think back on the changes that Leinsdorf has made.

Three things seem of special significance. Leinsdorf, first of all, rerouted the orchestra's programming philosophy along the Germanic lines that it had abandoned under Charles Munch, his predecessor. We got relatively little of the modern Frenchmen so favored by Munch—Honegger and Roussel, say—men whose music doesn't seem to age very well, and in their place a good deal of solid standard fare: Mozart, Beethoven, Haydn, Schumann, Bruckner, Mahler.

★

The scope was at times narrow (what orchestra dares spice its season with nearly enough of the unfamiliar?), but there was an awareness on Leinsdorf's part of the vast repertory as yet unexplored, and a willingnes to venture.

We saw, too, over these past seven years, a confrontation with the new and a proper emphasis placed on native composers. With repeated performances of Berg, Webern, and Schoenberg—although not nearly enough for either audience or players to become really familiar with the scores—the modern Viennese school started to assume its rightful place. Hopefully William Steinberg, Leinsdorf's successor, will continue on this tack.

On the home front, the list is impressive: Barber, Berger, Bernstein, Carter . . . through Ruggles, Schuller, Schuman, Sydeman — these were among the close to two dozen Americans heard during Leinsdorf's reign.

Lastly, Leinsdorf heavily and wisely invested in the future when he expanded and professionalized the Berkshire Music Center, the Tanglewood-based school run by members of the Boston orchestra. The quality of students has risen enormously these last few years, as has the seriousness and earnestness of the presentations.

★

Even 10 years ago, for instance, during the last years of Munch's directorship, I can't imagine that the combined student forces would have had the skill or sheer stamina to rehearse intensively and present Alban Berg's "Wozzeck". A few weeks ago, under Leinsdorf's direction, that is what they did.

For these reasons, then, Leinsdorf leaves the musical climate clearer than it was when he arrived. And when he returns next season as guest conductor, we'll hopefully see a continuation of the policies he so wisely introduced.

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
(E) 7,498

AUG 30 1969

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
(E) 9,230

AUG 30 1969

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

AUG 30 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF'S final concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be televised in a taped broadcast from the Tanglewood Music Festival on Channel 2, WGBH-TV, Sunday, Aug. 31 on Sounds of Sumer at 8 p.m.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL—At Tanglewood, Mass.—Beethoven's Ninth Symphony is the work with which the music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra traditionally bids farewell to his orchestra at both Symphony Hall and their Tanglewood summer home. It is an ideal choice for such an occasion because of its emotional force, its affirmation of life, and its boundless depths which allow for all manner of interpretation. Maestro Leinsdorf chose to mark a momentous day with a monumental reading. A performance carved out of granite—rugged, intense, and unsparing of the resources at his command. Vivacity, lyricism, delicacy, the beautiful sound of this orchestra—all were minimized in a performance which started in high gear and moved inexorably to a powerful but insensitive last movement. It is an interesting concept, but one which, for this listener, overwhelmed without enriching. And it demanded more than the performers could provide. The orchestra's usually incomparable brass got puffy; the chorus got muddy; and the quartet of soloists got nowhere near Beethoven's inspiration. Mr. Leinsdorf and this orchestra have created more than a few of the great musical moments of the past decade. This, unhappily, was not one of them.

—STANLEY NEWMAN

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

SEP 6 1969

Concert Features Leinsdorf

Erich Leinsdorf conducted his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Aug. 24 at the Tanglewood Music Festival at Lenox, Mass. The concert included Berlioz' "Royal Hunt and Storm" from the Trojans and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. The concert was Leindorf's 709th as music director of the orchestra during the regular subscription series.

In addition to the Beethoven's Ninth, the last weekend included a concert conducted by Milton Katims, music director of the Seattle Symphony and a Saturday evening concert in which Leinsdorf conducted Varese's "Deserts" for orchestra, Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite" and Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with Malcolm Frager as soloist.

About 26,900 attended the closing weekend of concerts and Sunday's performance was taped live for national telecasting this week. More than 225,000 people came to Tanglewood in 1969 for the 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, open rehearsals and special events, including the Contemporary Trends Concerts.

An audience of 21,500, largest in Tanglewood's history, came to the Fillmore at Tanglewood program, fifth and last of the highly successful Contemporary Trends concerts. Inaugurated in 1968 under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center, the five Tuesday evening concerts brought Folk, Jazz, Soul, Acid Rock, Gospel Music and a psychedelic-light shows to Tanglewood.

Leinsdorf has had a spectacular career in his seven years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He became music director in 1962. During his tenure he conducted 429 works by 96 composers. These included 13 world premieres of major works including Samuel Barber's Piano Concerto; Elliot Carter's Piano Concerto; two works by John Huggler-Music in two parts Opus 64 and Sculptures Opus 39; Benjamin Lees' Piano Concerto No. 2 and Violin Concerto; Robert Moeve's "Et Occidentem Illustra;" Walter Piston's Symphony No. 8; Gunther Schuller's "Diptych for brass quintet and orchestra"; Roger Sessions' Psalm 140 for soprano and orchestra; works by William Sydeman and Ernst Toch's Fifth Symphony.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted U.S. Premieres of Benjamin Britten's Symphony for cello and orchestra and "War Requiem"; Haydn's "Cantata Applausus"; Leo Janacek's Suite from the "Cunning Little Vixen"; and Richard Strauss' "Ariadne Auf Naxos" (original 1912 version).

A distinguished opera conductor, Leinsdorf has conducted six full-length concert performances of operas including: Beethoven's "Fidelio"; Verdi's "Othello"; Mozart's "The Abduction From the Seraglio" and "The Magic Flute"; and Wagner's "Lohengrin."

He has also conducted excerpts from: Berg's "Wozzeck"; Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust"; Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice"; Puccini's "La Boheme"; Schumann's "Faust"; Strauss' "Salome"; Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung"; "Die Meistersinger"; "Die Walkure"; "Parsifal" and "Siegfried."

Leinsdorf developed his and the orchestra's long association with Prokofiev's music by performing 20 of the Russian composer's major works, including his five piano concertos, the viglin concertos and the symphonies.

He has varied his repertoire between class, and contemporary composers, although it is Mozart who leads in works performed, with 66. Leinsdorf has also conducted 29 works by Beethoven, 22 by Haydn, 20 by Prokofiev, 21 by Bach, 17 each by Brahms and Strauss and 15 by Wagner.

The 1969 Berkshire Festival, which opened on July 4 and closed Aug. 24, consisted of 24 concerts, three on each of the festival's eight weekends. The first two weekends were devoted to Mozart and the Baroque.

Leinsdorf, pianist Earl Wild, and the orchestra repeated their much-discussed performance of the first piano concerto of Xavier Scharwenka, which they revived and recorded last winter after it had not been played by the Boston Symphony for over a half-century. Wild played the concerto on a electronic grand piano.

This year the Festival has been extended for the first time and will present two special Boston Pops Concerts with the Festival Orchstra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler today at 2:30 p.m.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

AUG 31 1969

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

SEP 1 0 1969

sills and symphony

Final weekend of soaring notes

by Rodney N. Myrvaagnes

A mind blowing experience was provided for Sillsophiles at the last Weekend Prelude, Friday, August 22. The great Beverly did the U. S. premiere performances of two Vivaldi secular cantatas for soprano and continuo, recently dug up in European archives by Sister Meneve Dunham. According to the program notes, her edition is based on the more demanding of two manuscripts, and they might have been written specifically to let Miss Sills do her thing.

The first, "Sorge vermiglin in ciel la bella aurora," consisted of two recitatives andtwo arias, all eminently worth listening to even without knowing Italian. The first aria exercised Sills' range and powerful high end, and occasioned one awkward breathing pause, which seemed unavoidable. The concluding aria was a breathtaking display of vocal fireworks, flawlessly executed, which occasioned a fairly loud "Jesus Christ" from a man who had shouted "Brava" before she ever sang anything. The other cantata was more of the same. The accompaniment, realized from the figured bass by Sister Magdalen Mageau, and played by Charles Wilson, harpsichord and Martin Holerman, cello, was satisfactory in the recitatives, but too sparsely ornamented in aria introductions. Wilson started thumping the jacks against the bumper rail on several occasions, a typical problem with pianists trying to play the harpsichord. It was still far better than if he had used a piano.

The remainder of the Sills program was devoted to R. Strauss and Schubert songs, all of a sentimental nature, beautifully sing and sympathetically accompanied. Gino Cioffi joined Mr. Wilson with a clarinet in the Schubert. (Strauss' "Amor" thoroughly deserves its warhouse status.)

The orchestral program, conducted by Milton Katims displayed the orchestra in fine shape, the best I have heard it this summer. The Rossini overture to 'La gazza ladra' sounded the way curtainraisers should, if operas had unlimited budgets. The horns were perfect in their brief but spectacular bits.

The Tchaikovsky Fourth was everything this grand chestnut should be, loud, dramatic and well played.

Vaughn Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tullis" is a somber, intriguing piece for strings only (large orchestra, nonet, and first desk solos) which being neither flashy nor bombastic is a difficult change of mood after the Tchaikovsky, but Katims and the string players carried it off successfully.

The concluding piece, the second Daphnis and Chloe suite of Ravel, was reminiscent of a type of music more common on B.S.O. programs under Munch than more recently,

Tanglewood Music Shed

So

LAS VEGAS, NEV.
REVIEW-JOURNAL
D. 52,000 S. 55,500

AUG 3 1 1969

THE TELEVISION musical attraction of the summer will be Sunday from 7 to 9 p.m., as KAET, Channel 8, presents "Leinsdorf Farewell at Tanglewood." From Tanglewood, Erich Leinsdorf makes his farewell appearance conducting the Boston Symphony in Berlioz' "The Trojans: Royal Hunt and Storm" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Vocal soloists are Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander and Justino Diaz.

The Phoenix Gazette
D. 92,030

AUG 29 1969

Erich Leinsdorf Bids Farewell

Erich Leinsdorf's farewell appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented on NET's "Sounds of Summer" series Sunday, Aug. 31 at 8 p.m. on TV-10.

The concert took place on August 24 at the Berkshire Music Festival, on the Tanglewood estate, Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leinsdorf, who has been at the helm of the Orchestra since 1962, announced his decision to resign his post at the end of the 1969 season. One of America's most acclaimed conductors, he has made a significant contribution to this country's musical life. Under his leadership the Boston Symphony Orchestra has introduced to America the best contemporary music, including such milestones as Barber's Piano Concerto, and Britten's "War Requiem." Many premieres—world and American—have been given, and many long forgotten works revived.

Leinsdorf's final concert features two works: a portion of Act II, Part II, of Berlioz's opera "The Trojans," and a complete performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. It was this latter work that inaugurated the opening of the Music Shed at Tanglewood on August, 4, 1938.

Soloists in the choral finale of the Beethoven work are Beverly Sills, considered America's foremost soprano; contralto Florence Kopleff, a well-known concert performer; tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz, both of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950

AUG 31 1969

DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE
D. 55,000 S. 79,500

AUG 31 1969

Ch. 8 to Air Leinsdorf's Boston Farewell Concert

Erich Leinsdorf's farewell concert with the Boston Symphony will be presented on the "Sounds of Summer" series at 7 p.m. today on Channel 8.

The concert took place last week at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston orchestra. Leinsdorf headed the orchestra for seven years.

The concert features two works: a portion of Berlioz's opera "The Trojans," and a complete performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Soloists in the choral finale of the Beethoven work are Beverly Sills, considered America's foremost soprano; contralto Florence Kopleff; tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz, both of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Born and educated in Vienna, Leinsdorf established himself as an outstanding musician in Europe before coming to New York in 1937 as assistant conductor of the Metropolitan Opera. Two seasons later he became the Met's principal German conductor.

After four years with the Met, he was appointed music director of the Cleveland Orchestra, becoming at 31, the youngest man ever to direct a major American orchestra. Later, Leinsdorf served as conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic and as director of the New York City Opera before rejoining the Met prior to his Boston Symphony affiliation which began in 1962.

ERICH LEINSDORF

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 2 1969

Erich Leinsdorf's farewell concert with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood on Ch. 2 Sunday night was one of the long weekend's television highlights. It was excellently produced, and the emotion was contagious . . . Foreign visitors to the U.S. in the first six months of this year totalled 715,507, an increase of 13.4 per cent over the same period in 1968. Britain sent the most, followed by Japan.

LEINSDORF

Most folk-singing groups have odd names. The latest to come across this desk is "The Four Scent Stamps," headed by Paul Gross, abetted by Charles Ortolani, Ed Winter and the

Record Tanglewood Audience Hears Leinsdorf's Farewell

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

It was a touching tribute paid Erich Leinsdorf last Sunday at Tanglewood, for more than 14,000 people—a season's record for a concert of serious music—came to hear him lead his last program as Music Director of the Boston Symphony.

The crowd was drawn both by the importance of the moment—the sense of history implicit in the event itself—and by the opportunity of hearing the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the most theatrical finale for which Leinsdorf could have wished. And even if the performance was less than totally engrossing, it at least gave one time to think back on the changes that Leinsdorf has made.

Three things seem of special significance. Leinsdorf, first of all, rerouted the orchestra's programming philosophy along the Germanic lines that it had abandoned under Charles Munch, his predecessor. We got relatively little of the modern Frenchmen so favored by Munch—Honegger and Roussel, say—men whose music doesn't seem to age very well, and in their place a good deal of solid standard fare: Mozart, Beethoven, Haydn, Schumann, Bruckner, Mahler.

★

The scope was at times narrow (what orchestra dares spice its season with nearly enough of the unfamiliar?), but there was an awareness on Leinsdorf's part of the vast repertory as yet unexplored, and a willingnes to venture.

We saw, too, over these past seven years, a confrontation with the new and a proper emphasis placed on native composers. With repeated performances of Berg, Webern, and Schoenberg—although not nearly enough for either audience or players to become really familiar with the scores—the modern Viennese school started to assume its rightful place. Hopefully William Steinberg, Leinsdorf's successor, will continue on this tack.

On the home front, the list is impressive: Barber, Berger, Bernstein, Carter . . . through Ruggles, Schuller, Schuman, Sydeman — these were among the close to two dozen Americans heard during Leinsdorf's reign.

Lastly, Leinsdorf heavily and wisely invested in the future when he expanded and professionalized the Berkshire Music Center, the Tanglewood-based school run by members of the Boston orchestra. The quality of students has risen enormously these last few years, as has the seriousness and earnestness of the presentations.

★

Even 10 years ago, for instance, during the last years of Munch's directorship, I can't imagine that the combined student forces would have had the skill or sheer stamina to rehearse intensively and present Alban Berg's "Wozzeck". A few weeks ago, under Leinsdorf's direction, that is what they did.

For these reasons, then, Leinsdorf leaves the musical climate clearer than it was when he arrived. And when he returns next season as guest conductor, we'll hopefully see a continuation of the policies he so wisely introduced.

NEWS
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
(E) 7,498

AUG 30 1969

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
(E) 9,230

AUG 30 1969

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

AUG 30 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF'S final concert as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be televised in a taped broadcast from the Tanglewood Music Festival on Channel 2, WGBH-TV, Sunday, Aug. 31 on Sounds of Sumer at 8 p.m.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL—At Tanglewood, Mass.—Beethoven's Ninth Symphony is the work with which the music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra traditionally bids farewell to his orchestra at both Symphony Hall and their Tanglewood summer home. It is an ideal choice for such an occasion because of its emotional force, its affirmation of life, and its boundless depths which allow for all manner of interpretation. Maestro Leinsdorf chose to mark a momentous day with a monumental reading. A performance carved out of granite—rugged, intense, and unsparing of the resources at his command. Vivacity, lyricism, delicacy, the beautiful sound of this orchestra—all were minimized in a performance which started in high gear and moved inexorably to a powerful but insensitive last movement. It is an interesting concept, but one which, for this listener, overwhelmed without enriching. And it demanded more than the performers could provide. The orchestra's usually incomparable brass got puffy; the chorus got muddy; and the quartet of soloists got nowhere near Beethoven's inspiration. Mr. Leinsdorf and this orchestra have created more than a few of the great musical moments of the past decade. This, unhappily, was not one of them.

—STANLEY NEWMAN

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

SEP 6 1969

Concert Features Leinsdorf

Erich Leinsdorf conducted his final concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Aug. 24 at the Tanglewood Music Festival at Lenox, Mass. The concert included Berlioz' "Royal Hunt and Storm" from the Trojans and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. The concert was Leindorf's 709th as music director of the orchestra during the regular subscription series.

In addition to the Beethoven's Ninth, the last weekend included a concert conducted by Milton Katims, music director of the Seattle Symphony and a Saturday evening concert in which Leinsdorf conducted Varese's "Deserts" for orchestra, Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite" and Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with Malcolm Frager as soloist.

About 26,900 attended the closing weekend of concerts and Sunday's performance was taped live for national telecasting this week. More than 225,000 people came to Tanglewood in 1969 for the 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, open rehearsals and special events, including the Contemporary Trends Concerts.

An audience of 21,500, largest in Tanglewood's history, came to the Fillmore at Tanglewood program, fifth and last of the highly successful Contemporary Trends concerts. Inaugurated in 1968 under the auspices of the Berkshire Music Center, the five Tuesday evening concerts brought Folk, Jazz, Soul, Acid Rock, Gospel Music and a psychedelic-light shows to Tanglewood.

Leinsdorf has had a spectacular career in his seven years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He became music director in 1962. During his tenure he conducted 429 works by 96 composers. These included 13 world premieres of major works including Samuel Barber's Piano Concerto; Elliot Carter's Piano Concerto; two works by John Huggler-Music in two parts Opus 64 and Sculptures Opus 39; Benjamin Lees' Piano Concerto; Robert Moeve's "Et Occidentem Illustra;" Walter Piston's Symphony No. 8; Gunther Schuller's "Diptych for brass quintet and orchestra"; Roger Sessions' Psalm 140 for soprano and orchestra; works by William Sydeman and Ernst Toch's Fifth Symphony.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted U.S. Premieres of Benjamin Britten's Symphony for cello and orchestra and "War Requiem"; Haydn's "Cantata Applausus"; Leo Janacek's Suite from the "Cunning Little Vixen"; and Richard Strauss' "Ariadne Auf Naxos" (original 1912 version).

A distinguished opera conductor, Leinsdorf has conducted six full-length concert performances of operas including: Beethoven's "Fidelio"; Verdi's "Othello"; Mozart's "The Abduction From the Seraglio" and "The Magic Flute"; and Wagner's "Lohengrin."

He has also conducted excerpts from: Berg's "Wozzeck"; Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust"; Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice"; Puccini's "La Boheme"; Schumann's "Faust"; Strauss' "Salome"; Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung"; "Die Meistersinger"; "Die Walkure"; "Parsifal" and "Siegfried."

Leinsdorf developed his and the orchestra's long association with Prokofiev's music by performing 20 of the Russian composer's major works, including his five piano concertos, the viglin concertos and the symphonies.

He has varied his repertoire between class, and contemporary composers, although it is Mozart who leads in works performed, with 66. Leinsdorf has also conducted 29 works by Beethoven, 22 by Haydn, 20 by Prokofiev, 21 by Bach, 17 each by Brahms and Strauss and 15 by Wagner.

The 1969 Berkshire Festival, which opened on July 4 and closed Aug. 24, consisted of 24 concerts, three on each of the festival's eight weekends. The first two weekends were devoted to Mozart and the Baroque.

Leinsdorf, pianist Earl Wild, and the orchestra repeated their much-discussed performance of the first piano concerto of Xavier Scharwenka, which they revived and recorded last winter after it had not been played by the Boston Symphony for over a half-century. Wild played the concerto on a electronic grand piano.

This year the Festival has been extended for the first time and will present two special Boston Pops Concerts with the Festival Orchstra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler today at 2:30 p.m.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

AUG 31 1969

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

SEP 10 1969

sills and symphony

Final weekend of soaring notes

by Rodney N. Myrvaagnes

A mind blowing experience was provided for Sillsophiles at the last Weekend Prelude, Friday, August 22. The great Beverly did the U. S. premiere performances of two Vivaldi secular cantatas for soprano and continuo, recently dug up in European archives by Sister Meneve Dunham. According to the program notes, her edition is based on the more demanding of two manuscripts, and they might have been written specifically to let Miss Sills do her thing.

The first, "Sorge vermiglin in ciel la bella aurora," consisted of two recitatives andtwo arias, all eminently worth listening to even without knowing Italian. The first aria exercised Sills' range and powerful high end, and occasioned one awkward breathing pause, which seemed unavoidable. The concluding aria was a breathtaking display of vocal fireworks, flawlessly executed, which occasioned a fairly loud "Jesus Christ" from a man who had shouted "Brava" before she ever sang anything. The other cantata was more of the same. The accompaniment, realized from the figured bass by Sister Magdalen Mageau, and played by Charles Wilson, harpsichord and Martin Holerman, cello, was satisfactory in the recitatives, but too sparsely ornamented in aria introductions. Wilson started thumping the jacks against the bumper rail on several occasions, a typical problem with pianists trying to play the harpsichord. It was still far better than if he had used a piano.

The remainder of the Sills program was devoted to R. Strauss and Schubert songs, all of a sentimental nature, beautifully sing and sympathetically accompanied. Gino Cioffi joined Mr. Wilson with a clarinet in the Schubert. (Strauss' "Amor" thoroughly deserves its warhouse status.)

The orchestral program, conducted by Milton Katims displayed the orchestra in fine shape, the best I have heard it this summer. The Rossini overture to 'La gazza ladra' sounded the way curtainraisers should, if operas had unlimited budgets. The horns were perfect in their brief but spectacular bits.

The Tchaikovsky Fourth was everything this grand chestnut should be, loud, dramatic and well played.

Vaughn Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tullis" is a somber, intriguing piece for strings only (large orchestra, nonet, and first desk solos) which being neither flashy nor bombastic is a difficult change of mood after the Tchaikovsky, but Katims and the string players carried it off successfully.

The concluding piece, the second Daphnis and Chloe suite of Ravel, was reminiscent of a type of music more common on B.S.O. programs under Munch than more recently,

Tanglewood Music Shed

STILLWATER, OKLA.
NEWS-PRESS
D. 7,500

SEP 7 1969

FOOTNOTES AND FANCIES

Leinsdorf Comments On Symphony Future

By JAMES C. STRATTON
News-Press Fine Arts Editor

Among the more articulate of contemporary conductors is Erich Leinsdorf, and in an interview which was a part of the program of last Sunday's Sounds of Summer NET series, he zeroed in on his target.

The program itself was taped at Tanglewood during the concert which marked Leindorf's last appearance as musical director of the Boston orchestra. That all concerned outdid themselves in a reading of the Beethoven Ninth was most apparent.

As a matter of fact, Leinsdorf has been most voluble in his reasons for withdrawing from the helm of the Boston ensemble. In the drive to maintain the personnel of the major orchestras under a full 12-month salary of some substance, the chores of the musical director have increased as well. Leinsdorf has frankly said that he was wearing out from the sheer physical — and emotional, I suspect — demands.

In the course of the interview, he almost dropped a remark to the effect that it was good to leave while ahead but this was a bit of hyperbole as no criticism of his tenure has been sounded and the ensemble has obviously performed with affection.

Leinsdorf touched several bases in the course of the interview, but I was most impressed with his comment to the effect that the traditional subscription series approach to programming a concert symphonic organization is in serious trouble and that a host of new ideas and fresh programming is overdue.

The conductor sounded initially his concept that possibly three ensembles are in order — or the revamping of personnel into what he termed "the Mozart orchestra;" the group to perform the great body of music from the Romantics; and an ensemble able to handle modern scores as well as early music. The pairing of the latter indicates present trends.

Another interesting view from Leinsdorf emphasized that support of the arts including forms other than symphony must remain an obligation of the wealthy, a concept which might suggest that Leinsdorf has tossed in the towel on public support. He was quite vocal in opposition to subsidy from the national governmental level.

However, I found Leinsdorf's observations on programs and audience most perky in that he feels the need for a study of motivations as to why audiences are what they are. Our own views on the composition of audiences and the need for research in this area have been sounded often enough.

Leinsdorf indicated impatience with the subscription series idea and suggested that if the pulse of the programs was sluggish on occasions, the reason might be laid at the door of the audience which could take the ensemble and the music pretty much for granted. The conductor was enthusiastic on the makeup of his audiences in the Boston Symphony's programs at Carnegie hall.

This group is variable and volatile, one gathers, and the occasions brought stimulation both to the conductor and the members of the symphony. Leinsdorf underlined that programs from the great scores of the 19th century drew younger folk complete with scores in hand in addition to buffs who still remained loyal to the combined canons.

In contrast, however, programs of early music or contemporary music attract more younger music lovers. One gathers that Leinsdorf is impressed by the new scores and the response from new listeners. The idea suggests fascinating vistas for speculation on audiences.

Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung
10-10-69

Leinsdorfs Bostoner Abschied

Nach siebenjähriger Tätigkeit als Leiter des Boston Symphony Orchestra hat Erich Leinsdorf sich mit einer Wiedergabe von Beethovens neunter Symphonie verabschiedet. Das Konzert beschloß das Musikfest in Tanglewood, dem Sommerheim des Bostoner Orchesters. Über 14 000 Zuhörer bereiteten dem Dirigenten am Schluß stehend eine Ovation. Leinsdorf war auch Leiter der dem Orchester angeschlossenen Musikschule, die unter seiner Führung eine höchst eindrucksvolle Konzertaufführung des „Wozzek" brachte.

Mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra bot Leinsdorf während der achtwöchigen Sommersaison Werke von Bach bis Varèse und Strawinsky. Mit besonderem Recht wurde seine Konzertaufführung des „Otello" bejubelt. Richard Casilly sang ausdrucksvoll die Titelpartie — er hat sich seit seiner Tätigkeit an der New Yorker City Center Opera erheblich entwickelt. Überragend wie immer Sherill Milnes als Jago.

Leinsdorf, der von Tanglewood aus sofort nach Buenos Aires zur Leitung der Opernsaison flog, wird auch weiterhin als Gastdirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra tätig sein, und New York freut sich heute schon auf seine Rückkehr an die Met, wo er 1971 den „Tristan" dirigieren wird. W. Str.

Music

Leinsdorf farewell: fantastic Beethoven

By RAYMOND HENAGOW

WHILE IT IS true that television sets do not provide sound systems suited to the needs of symphonic broadcasting, more and more attractive programs of serious music make it worthwhile and almost mandatory that we who care watch and listen.

Such a program was the "Leinsdorf Farewell at Tanglewood," aired recently on Channel 11's Sounds of Summer after being taped the week before.

A SUMPTUOUS performance of the Beethoven Ninth symphony by the host Boston Symphony orchestra with the Berkshire chorus and Tanglewood choir was preceded by the Royal Hunt and Storm from Berlioz' opera "The Trojans."

Orchestra and chorus did a dramatic rendition of the operatic scene depicting Dido and Aeneas engaged in a hunt and suddenly overtaken by a storm.

This, however, was mainly a prefatory bonus for the Beethoven "Choral." Between the two works Leinsdorf, in an interview, spoke of his joy and satisfaction in his seven years with the orchestra and his disdain of government support of symphony or opera as sometimes encountered in Europe.

SOPRANO Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz joined the other forces in giving beautiful meaning to choral passages in that almost impossible finale that are usually merely declaimed or screamed.

I am one of those who think that the real greatness of the Beethoven Ninth lies in the first three movements, certainly some of the most remarkable music ever written.

Often have I wished that the mighty Ludwig had left the Schiller "Ode to Joy" idea in the germinal form in which the composer had originally utilized it—the Fantasia in C minor for piano, orchestra and chorus, Op. 80.

BUT SUCH TRANSCENDENT forces as Leinsdorf mustered for his farewell override any compunctions I usually have about the "Choral Finale."

It is interesting to reflect that Leinsdorf assisted Toscanini in the preparation of the Ninth for the Salzburg festival of 1935. He had also worked with Bruno Walter at the Florence May festival in the same period.

Leinsdorf came to the Boston Symphony after conducting and directing the Metropolitan and New York City Opera companies. Previously he led the Cleveland and Rochester orchestras. He now returns to the Met as a director and consultant.

STEVE ALLEN, who narrates the Sounds of Summer series, read an assessment of Leinsdorf and his orchestra that once more fostered the idea that the Boston Symphony is probably the greatest in America.

Bostonians are even more provincial and snobbish than New Yorkers and Philadelphians, and their cities have pretty good orchestras, too. So do Cleveland and Chicago, even if they are in the Midwest.

I'd like to see more of that provincial pride spread to this area. After all, the Chicago Symphony need bow to none.

SKOKIE, ILL.
LIFE
W 10 437

SEP 7 1969

WFTL To Feature Conductor Leinsdorf

WFTL-FM will feature Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony at 8 p.m. Sunday.

The program opens with Rossini's "Overture to L'Italiana in Algeri," followed by Scharwenka's "Piano Concerto No. 1 in B Flat Minor, Op. 32 with Earl Wild as guest soloist. The program concludes with Stravinsky's "Le Sacre Du Printemps" (The Rite of Spring) parts 1 and 2.

★ ★ ★

The works of Ralph Vaughn Williams, Arthur Benjamin, and Johannes Brahms will be featured on the Studio Concert at 8 p.m. Monday on WFTL-FM.

The program opens with Morton Gould conducting the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra in William's "Romance for Harmonica and String Orchestra" followed by Benjamin's "Concerto for Harmonica and Orchestra" with Larry Adler playing the harmonica.

The program concludes with Herbert Von Karajan conducting the Berlin Philharmonic in Brahms' "Concerto No. 2 in B Flat for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 83 with Hans Richter-Haaser as pianist.

★ ★ ★

Tuesday night at 8, WFTL-FM will feature "The Glenn Miller Serenade" with the Glenn Miller Army-Air Force Band and famous vocalists of the late '30's and '40's. The band will play "Song of the Volga Boatman" and "Pearls on Velvet." Vocalist Johnny Desmond and The Crew Chiefs will sing "I've Got a Heart Filled with Love."

Fort Lauderdale News
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
D. 83,376
SEP 5 1969

80a

—Star Photographer Bernie Boston

LAST CONCERT

Erich Leinsdorf's final Tanglewood appearance as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be seen tonight at 8 o'clock on Channel 26.

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 362,408
AUG 31 1969

FINALE—Conductor Erich Leinsdorf's farewell concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Mass., will be presented on NET's Sounds of Summer at 8 PM Sunday (Ch. 17).

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, August 30, 1969

Music

By Lester Hebbard

Erich Leinsdorf made his farewell appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood last week with a performance of "The Royal Hunt" and Storm from "The Trojans" by Berlioz and Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." This concert ended his seven year reign as conductor and musical director of the great orchestra.

I hesitate to review a televised event involving music, but the importance of the occasion outweighs all contrary arguments. Furthermore, TV has proved to be its own exclusive medium. Vladimir Horowitz's TV piano recital last year is an example. Rubinstein, Gilel and Rostopovich will all be heard on exclusive TV recital programs soon.

Leinsdorf made the "Ninth" exciting and inspiring. He has always seemed to be a cool and uninspired director. But here he rose to the event and shared his glory with Beethoven. There were a few monotonous phrases, but not in the finale, which was outstanding for its character and brilliance.

The Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir were superb. The soloists, Beverly Sills, soprano, who searched for too many tones, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander, and bass Justino Diaz were splendid, with an added accolade for the latter.

HEWLETT, N. Y.
SOUTH SHORE
RECORD
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 7.000

SEP 4 1969

---

concert

Eric Leinsdorf's final appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra — recorded at the Berkshire Music Festival—will be viewed and heard via ETV this Sunday with a telecast from the regular "Sounds of Summer" series at 6 p.m. on KHET.

Star-Bulletin & Advertiser
HONOLULU, HAWAII
D. 166,171
SEP 7 1969

The final telecast of Ch. 2's Tell It Like It Was, at 1:30 p.m. Saturday, will pay a special tribute to Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. . . . Same station, at 2:30 p.m. Saturday, features finalists at the 31st international convention of the Society for the Preservation and Encouragement of Barbershop Quartet Singing in America. . . .Conductor Erich Leinsdorf makes his final appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Ch. 11's Sounds of Summer at 7 p.m. Sunday.

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 540,570 SUN. 712,125
AUG 30 1969

STILLWATER, OKLA.
NEWS-PRESS
D. 7,500

SEP 7 1969

FOOTNOTES AND FANCIES

Leinsdorf Comments On Symphony Future

By JAMES C. STRATTON
News-Press Fine Arts Editor

Among the more articulate of contemporary conductors is Erich Leinsdorf, and in an interview which was a part of the program of last Sunday's Sounds of Summer NET series, he zeroed in on his target.

The program itself was taped at Tanglewood during the concert which marked Leindorf's last appearance as musical director of the Boston orchestra. That all concerned outdid themselves in a reading of the Beethoven Ninth was most apparent.

As a matter of fact, Leinsdorf has been most voluble in his reasons for withdrawing from the helm of the Boston ensemble. In the drive to maintain the personnel of the major orchestras under a full 12-month salary of some substance, the chores of the musical director have increased as well. Leinsdorf has frankly said that he was wearing out from the sheer physical — and emotional, I suspect — demands.

In the course of the interview, he all dropped a remark to the effect that it was good to leave while ahead but this was a bit of hyperbole as no criticism of his tenure has been sounded and the ensemble has obviously performed with affection.

Leinsdorf touched several bases in the course of the interview, but I was most impressed with his comment to the effect that the traditional subscription series approach to programming a concert symphonic organization is in serious trouble and that a host of new ideas and fresh programming is overdue.

The conductor sounded initially his concept that possibly three ensembles are in order — or the revamping of personnel into what he termed "the Mozart orchestra;" the group to perform the great body of music from the Romantics; and an ensemble able to handle modern scores as well as early music. The pairing of the latter indicates present trends.

Another interesting view from Leinsdorf emphasized that support of the arts including forms other than symphony must remain an obligation of the wealthy, a concept which might suggest that Leinsdorf has tossed in the towel on public support. He was quite vocal in opposition to subsidy from the national governmental level.

However, I found Leinsdorf's observations on programs and audience most perky in that he feels the need for a study of motivations as to why audiences are what they are. Our own views on the composition of audiences and the need for research in this area have been sounded often enough.

Leinsdorf indicated impatience with the subscription series idea and suggested that if the pulse of the programs was sluggish on occasions, the reason might be laid at the door of the audience which could take the ensemble and the music pretty much for granted. The conductor was enthusiastic on the makeup of his audiences in the Boston Symphony's programs at Carnegie hall.

This group is variable and volatile, one gathers, and the occasions brought stimulation both to the conductor and the members of the symphony. Leinsdorf underlined that programs from the great scores of the 19th century drew younger folk complete with scores in hand in addition to buffs who still remained loyal to the combined canons.

In contrast, however, programs of early music or contemporary music attract more younger music lovers. One gathers that Leinsdorf is impressed by the new scores and the response from new listeners. The idea suggests fascinating vistas for speculation on audiences.

Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung
10-10-69

Leinsdorfs Bostoner Abschied

Nach siebenjähriger Tätigkeit als Leiter des Boston Symphony Orchestra hat Erich Leinsdorf sich mit einer Wiedergabe von Beethovens neunter Symphonie verabschiedet. Das Konzert beschloß das Musikfest in Tanglewood, dem Sommerheim des Bostoner Orchesters. Über 14 000 Zuhörer bereiteten dem Dirigenten am Schluß stehend eine Ovation. Leinsdorf war auch Leiter der dem Orchester angeschlossenen Musikschule, die unter seiner Führung eine höchst eindrucksvolle Konzertaufführung des „Wozzek" brachte.

Mit dem Boston Symphony Orchestra bot Leinsdorf während der achtwöchigen Sommersaison Werke von Bach bis Varèse und Strawinsky. Mit besonderem Recht wurde seine Konzertaufführung des „Otello" bejubelt. Richard Casilly sang ausdrucksvoll die Titelpartie — er hat sich seit seiner Tätigkeit an der New Yorker City Center Opera erheblich entwickelt. Überragend wie immer Sherill Milnes als Jago.

Leinsdorf, der von Tanglewood aus sofort nach Buenos Aires zur Leitung der Opernsaison flog, wird auch weiterhin als Gastdirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra tätig sein, und New York freut sich heute schon auf seine Rückkehr an die Met, wo er 1971 den „Tristan" dirigieren wird. W. Str.

Star-Bulletin & Advertiser
HONOLULU, HAWAII
D. 166,171
SEP 7 1969

Music

Leinsdorf farewell: fantastic Beethoven

By RAYMOND HENAGOW

WHILE IT IS true that television sets do not provide sound systems suited to the needs of symphonic broadcasting, more and more attractive programs of serious music make it worthwhile and almost mandatory that we who care watch and listen.

Such a program was the "Leinsdorf Farewell at Tanglewood," aired recently on Channel 11's Sounds of Summer after being taped the week before.

A SUMPTUOUS performance of the Beethoven Ninth symphony by the host Boston Symphony orchestra with the Berkshire chorus and Tanglewood choir was preceded by the Royal Hunt and Storm from Berlioz' opera "The Trojans."

Orchestra and chorus did a dramatic rendition of the operatic scene depicting Dido and Aeneas engaged in a hunt and suddenly overtaken by a storm.

This, however, was mainly a prefatory bonus for the Beethoven "Choral." Between the two works Leinsdorf, in an interview, spoke of his joy and satisfaction in his seven years with the orchestra and his disdain of government support of symphony or opera as sometimes encountered in Europe.

SOPRANO Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz joined the other forces in giving beautiful meaning to choral passages in that almost impossible finale that are usually merely declaimed or screamed.

I am one of those who think that the real greatness of the Beethoven Ninth lies in the first three movements, certainly some of the most remarkable music ever written.

Often have I wished that the mighty Ludwig had left the Schiller "Ode to Joy" idea in the germinal form in which the composer had originally utilized it—the Fantasia in C minor for piano, orchestra and chorus, Op. 80.

BUT SUCH TRANSCENDENT forces as Leinsdorf mustered for his farewell override any compunctions I usually have about the "Choral Finale."

It is interesting to reflect that Leinsdorf assisted Toscanini in the preparation of the Ninth for the Salzburg festival of 1935. He had also worked with Bruno Walter at the Florence May festival in the same period.

Leinsdorf came to the Boston Symphony after conducting and directing the Metropolitan and New York City Opera companies. Previously he led the Cleveland and Rochester orchestras. He now returns to the Met as a director and consultant.

STEVE ALLEN, who narrates the Sounds of Summer series, read an assessment of Leinsdorf and his orchestra that once more fostered the idea that the Boston Symphony is probably the greatest in America.

Bostonians are even more provincial and snobbish than New Yorkers and Philadelphians, and their cities have pretty good orchestras, too. So do Cleveland and Chicago, even if they are in the Midwest.

I'd like to see more of that provincial pride spread to this area. After all, the Chicago Symphony need bow to none.

concert

Eric Leinsdorf's final appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra — recorded at the Berkshire Music Festival—will be viewed and heard via ETV this Sunday with a telecast from the regular "Sounds of Summer" series at 6 p.m. on KHET.

The final telecast of Ch. 2's Tell It Like It Was, at 1:30 p.m. Saturday, will pay a special tribute to Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. . . . Same station, at 2:30 p.m. Saturday, features finalists at the 31st international convention of the Society for the Preservation and Encouragement of Barbershop Quartet Singing in America. . . .Conductor Erich Leinsdorf makes his final appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Ch. 11's Sounds of Summer at 7 p.m. Sunday.

SKOKIE, ILL.
LIFE
W 0 437

SEP 7 1969

WFTL To Feature Conductor Leinsdorf

WFTL-FM will feature Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony at 8 p.m. Sunday.

The program opens with Rossini's "Overture to L'Italiana in Algeri," followed by Scharwenka's "Piano Concerto No. 1 in B Flat Minor, Op. 32 with Earl Wild as guest soloist. The program concludes with Stravinsky's "Le Sacre Du Printemps" (The Rite of Spring) parts 1 and 2.

★ ★ ★

The works of Ralph Vaughn Williams, Arthur Benjamin, and Johannes Brahms will be featured on the Studio Concert at 8 p.m. Monday on WFTL-FM.

The program opens with Morton Gould conducting the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra in William's "Romance for Harmonica and String Orchestra" followed by Benjamin's "Concerto for Harmonica and Orchestra" with Larry Adler playing the harmonica.

The program concludes with Herbert Von Karajan conducting the Berlin Philharmonic in Brahms' "Concerto No. 2 in B Flat for Piano and Orchestra, Op. 83 with Hans Richter-Haaser as pianist.

★ ★ ★

Tuesday night at 8, WFTL-FM will feature "The Glenn Miller Serenade" with the Glenn Miller Army-Air Force Band and famous vocalists of the late '30's and '40's. The band will play "Song of the Volga Boatman" and "Pearls on Velvet." Vocalist Johnny Desmond and The Crew Chiefs will sing "I've Got a Heart Filled with Love."

Fort Lauderdale News
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
D. 83,376
SEP 5 1969

FINALE—Conductor Erich Leinsdorf's farewell concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Mass., will be presented on NET's Sounds of Summer at 8 PM Sunday (Ch. 17)

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, August 30, 1969

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 570 SUN. 712,125
AUG 30 1969

80a

—Star Photographer Bernie Boston

LAST CONCERT

Erich Leinsdorf's final Tanglewood appearance as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be seen tonight at 8 o'clock on Channel 26.

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 362,408
AUG 31 1969

Music

By Lester Hebbard

Erich Leinsdorf made his farewell appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood last week with a performance of "The Royal Hunt" and Storm from "The Trojans" by Berlioz and Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony." This concert ended his seven year reign as conductor and musical director of the great orchestra.

I hesitate to review a televised event involving music, but the importance of the occasion outweighs all contrary arguments. Furthermore, TV has proved to be its own exclusive medium. Vladimir Horowitz's TV piano recital last year is an example. Rubinstein, Gilel and Rostopovich will all be heard on exclusive TV recital programs soon.

Leinsdorf made the "Ninth" exciting and inspiring. He has always seemed to be a cool and uninspired director. But here he rose to the event and shared his glory with Beethoven. There were a few monotonous phrases, but not in the finale, which was outstanding for its character and brilliance.

The Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir were superb. The soloists, Beverly Sills, soprano, who searched for too many tones, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander, and bass Justino Diaz were splendid, with an added accolade for the latter.

HEWLETT, N. Y.
SOUTH SHORE
RECORD
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 7,000

SEP 4 1969

806

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Saturday, August 30, 1969

047

Leinsdorf's Farewell on Channel 17

Erich Leinsdorf's farewell appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented on Channel 17 Sunday, August 31, at 8.

* * *

The concert took place Aug. 24 at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leinsdorf, who has been at the helm of the orchestra since 1962, announced his decision to resign his post at the end of the 1969 season. One of America's most acclaimed conductors, he has made a significant contribution to this country's musical life. Under his leadership the Boston Symphony has introduced to America the best contemporary music, including such milestones as Barber's Piano Concerto, and Britten's "War Requiem." Many premieres—world and American—have been given, and many long forgotten works revived.

Leinsdorf's final concert features two works: a portion of Act II, Part II, of Berlioz's opera "The Trojans," and a complete performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. It was this latter work that inaugurated the opening of the Music Shed at Tanglewood on August 4, 1938.

* * *

Soloists in the choral finale of the Beethoven work are Beverly Sills, considered America's foremost soprano; contralto Florence Kopleff, a well-known concert performer; tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz, both of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Joining the orchestra will be the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir. The combined choral preparation is by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony. He is assisted by John Oliver.

The program will be repeated Saturday, Sept. 6 at 7 on the educational TV station.

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, August 30, 1969

047

Leinsdorf Tribute

Served the Masters

By DELOS SMITH

Now that Erich Leinsdorf is no longer music director of the Boston Symphony and merely another entry on the list of available guest conductors, it is time to wonder about his future as a recording conductor.

His tenure as head music man in Boston put him among the most prolific recorders but the record-maker, RCA, has always done much with the orchestra regardless of who was the music director. It may well be that Leinsdorf will now have fewer recording opportunities.

But whatever his future, his recent past as recorder is a glorious one, a fact underlined by the newly released record completing his series devoted to Prokofieff's five piano concertos, with John Browning as soloist (3121).

It is of the fifth concerto and again you are given the conviction that conductor and soloist understood the composer precisely the same way and better probably than any other conductor-soloist combination ever did. Leinsdorf's strength is in conveying unquestioned authority.

Presumably he has completed the project of recording all the Prokofieff symphonies with the Boston. The 3d, 5th, and 6th he has done and the 2d is newly released (3061).

Also newly at hand are his interpretations of Beethoven's 1st and 8th symphonies, on one record (3098).

But he served all the masters, modern and classical, well in Boston and may the recordings long survive!

* * *

SIR JOHN Barbirolli is a new torchbearer for oddball Frederick Delius who has had no outstanding popularizer since Sir Thomas Beecham died. Beecham devoted many an album to his music.

In these long-play days Barbirolli needed only one record to survey the tedious but often exquisitely lovely Delius output.

Included are "In a Summer Garden" and "A Song Before Sunrise." Barbirolli conducted them with perhaps a little too much sentiment with the Halle Orchestra (Angel-36588).

* * *

A RECOMMENDED listening experience: The eloquent baritone, Hermann Prey, singing from Johannes Brahms' collection of German folk songs, "All Mein Gedanken" (Deutsche Grammophon 139375).

81

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

SEP 7 1969 New England

A Note on Leinsdorf's Farewell

Steve Allen's Sounds of Summer, which has been doing yeoman service on TV during the summer months and has been an oasis in a desert of mediocrity, came up with another rewarding program last week—the presentation of Erich Leinsdorf's farewell appearance, at Tanglewood, as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was an emotion-packed evening. At the end of the program, which included the Royal Hunt and Storm Scene from Berlioz's "Les Troyans" and Beethoven's great "Symphony No. 9," Leinsdorf, obviously deeply moved by the audience ovation, shouts of "bravo," and spontaneous cheering, kissed concertmaster Joseph Silverstein on the cheek, blew kisses to the orchestra and soloist, and, with tear in his eyes, acknowledged the deafening applause.

Between selections, Jordan Whitelaw interviewed Leinsdorf — and Leinsdorf has never been more candid. I received the impression that Leinsdorf is not particularly happy about leaving the orchestra; he complained about the difficulty of arranging programs for Boston's subscription [illegible] take the orchestra for granted, and noted, too, that one sometimes has to compromise in program-making because of financial limitations. Leinsdorf has a busy year before him as guest conductor not only of the Boston group but of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw in January and February and of several other major ensembles. This month he goes to Buenos Aires to conduct three operas in the Teatro Colon.

Leinsdorf believes that there are really three types of audiences—that which enjoys music of the 18th and 20th Centuries, that which favors the 19th-Cenutry romantics, and that which delights in music of an experimental nature. He thinks that an orchestra should be divided into three groups—each able to perform these three types of music and that a season's concerts should include all three types of programs.

Having watched Leinsdorf conduct and heard his results with the orchestra regularly for the last seven years, I am sorry to see him go. He is one of the outstaanding musical minds of our time, blessed with a phenomenal memory, a depth of scholarship, and absolute dedication to the conducting art. His attention to concert versions of opera, his remarkable readings of Mahler and Bruckner, his restoration of discipline to an orchestra which needed it—all these made his stay in Boston a profitable one.

ON THE COVER

Conductor at Work—

A Man and His Music

Now starting his seventh and last season as director of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is the stepping-down conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, shown in a series of interesting studies while conducting musicians who have helped him greatly enlarge and popularize the summer festival in the picturesque Berkshires. For an intimate, behind-the-scenes visit with the famed maestro, see the story on Page 10 by George Gelles.

• Cover colorphotos by staff photographer Bob Howard, using Nikon camera with 135 mm. lens; setting 1/60th second at F-3.5; high speed Ektachrome film (type B).

BOSTON Sunday Advertiser pictorial Living June 1, 1969

BOSTON
Sunday Advertiser
pictorial Living
June 1, 1969

A Note on Leinsdorf's Farewell

Steve Allen's Sounds of Summer, which has been doing yeoman service on TV during the summer months and has been an oasis in a desert of mediocrity, came up with another rewarding program last week—the presentation of Erich Leinsdorf's farewell appearance, at Tanglewood, as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was an emotion-packed evening. At the end of the program, which included the Royal Hunt and Storm Scene from Berlioz's "Les Troyens" and Beethoven's great "Symphony No. 5," Leinsdorf, obviously deeply moved by the audience ovation, shouts of "bravo," and spontaneous cheering, kissed concertmaster Joseph Silverstein on the cheek, blew kisses to the orchestra and soloist, and, with tears in his eyes, acknowledged the deafening applause.

Between selections, Jordan Whitelaw interviewed Leinsdorf . . . and Leinsdorf has never been more candid. I received the impression that Leinsdorf is not particularly happy about leaving the orchestra; he complained about the difficulty of arranging programs for Boston's subscription . . . orchestra—for granted, and noted, too, that one sometimes has to compromise in program-making because of financial limitations. Leinsdorf has a busy year before him as guest conductor not only of the Boston group but of the Amsterdam Concertgebouw in January and February and of several other major ensembles. This month he goes to Buenos Aires to conduct three operas in the Teatro Colon.

Leinsdorf believes that there are really three types of audiences—that which enjoys music of the 18th and 20th Centuries, that which favors the 19th-Century romantics, and that which delights in music of an experimental nature. He thinks that an orchestra should be divided into three groups—each able to perform these three types of music and that a season's concerts should include all three types of programs.

Having watched Leinsdorf conduct and heard his results with the orchestra regularly for the last seven years, I am sorry to see him go. He is one of the outstanding musical minds of our time, blessed with a phenomenal memory, a depth of scholarship, and absolute dedication to the conducting art. His attention to concert versions of opera, his remarkable readings of Mahler and Bruckner, his restoration of discipline to an orchestra which needed it—these made his stay in Boston a profitable one.

ON THE COVER

Conductor at Work—

A Man and His Music

Now starting his seventh and last season as director of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is the stepping-down conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, shown in a series of interesting studies while conducting musicians who have helped him greatly enlarge and popularize the summer festival in the picturesque Berkshires. For an intimate, behind-the-scenes visit with the famed maestro, see the story on Page 10 by George Gelles.

Cover colorphotos by staff photographer Bob Howard, using Nikon camera with 135 mm. lens; setting 1/60th second at F-3.5; high speed Ektachrome film (type B).

82

COVER STORY

The beautiful Berkshires form background for Erich Leinsdorf on the lawn at Tanglewood

Photo by Clemens Kalisch

ra in the Music Shed at Tanglewood

Photo by Whitestone Photos

ERICH LEINSDORF... A Farewellewood

By GEORGE GELLES

AFTER a morning's rehearsal, he was sitting under a print of Gustav Mahler in a corner of his suite at Symphony Hall, hidden behind wrap-around sun glasses and fidgeting with his gold fob, heavy with keys and initialed E. L.—Erich Leinsdorf, 57 years old, eleventh permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and third Music Director of Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, which now, on the brink of his seventh and last season at its helm, is by his own admission a nicer place to be:

"I'll tell you, I can say with some justifiable pride that I am very proud of what I have done there. We really have three Tanglewoods: the estate, the series of concerts played by the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center."

This third Tanglewood, educational adjunct of the BSO, has been most on Leinsdorf's mind these past half dozen years, and his concern has been—and remains—to open up new horizons.

"I've tried to intensify the Center, and to concentrate on what I call the transition repertory. By this I mean works from the early years of this century—Schoenberg, Webern, and so on. Without a knowledge of these pieces it is impossible for anyone to know what is going on today.

"I remember reading in a book review, by Anthony Burgess, I think, this wonderful comment; he was asked if the works of James Joyce are still of use to this generation, and he answered 'of course; they haven't really been used yet at all.'

"I have taken this as my motto for the transition repertory."

It's true, Leinsdorf's most lasting impression will be left on the structure and quality of the Music Center, but it's also true that Symphony concerts in the 6000-seat Shed are more diversified and of a higher quality than before his reign began.

"We've kept things basically the same, but there have been changes, of course. You see, to some extent both the conductor and his orchestra are trapped in an economic dilemma; it takes time to learn new pieces while rehearsing and conducting during the season. The time I take to look at new music, I feel I steal it. Yet, I know conductors who must study a score for half a year before they feel ready to go on stage with it. It's not incredible, as you say, but certainly regrettable, that the Boston orchestra played Mozart's B flat Piano Concerto (K. 595) for the first time this year, and that conductors generally won't play any symphony by Haydn except one of the last 20 or so.

"You must remember that much of this repertory has become known only recently. Look at the 30s. People were still playing Resphigi and big transcriptions of Bach by Stokowski—Schoenberg even made some. But that music was played for so long a time that we were forced to look elsewhere at new music. You can't use the same three Weber overtures to open concerts forever."

SO adventure, then, is the word, and helps explain Leinsdorf's programming choices for the summer mass audience of "Deserts" by Edgard Varese and Arnold Schoenberg's "Survivor from Warsaw."

This search for the new is central, too, to Leinsdissent, there was never much more than a working relation. Lacking charisma or magic or call it what you will, Leinsdorf, for all his good intentions, inspired little affection or real respect or attention, either from players or public. And so, in a very healthy sense, his parting from the BSO is in the best interest of both parties, for Leinsdorf will once again be his own man, and the Symphony is free again to find its "ideal" leader.

THOUGH it is unlikely that the successor, no matter who he be, will see a period of Festival growth comparable to that of the past six years. Tanglewood's location, a mile outside picture-book Lenox in western Massachusetts, adds immeasurably to its success, which Leinsdorf fully realizes.

"When I was a student in Vienna," he says, "there was a possible audience of 30,000 if every seat was filled for every performance by somebody different. But do you realize the potential number of people we can play for now? With Boston and New York and Albany and smaller cities so near, we should be able to reach a million people."

He then went on to speak warmly of his first Tanglewood, the beautiful estate and gardens given the Symphony by heirs of the late Boston banker William Aspinwall Tappan. Before coming to Boston, Leinsdorf had visited Tanglewood only once, about 20 years ago; now, about to make his exit at the summer's end, he has chosen as poetically apt a swan song as possible, the Beethoven Ninth Symphony, for this was the inaugural work led in the Shed back in 1938.

And, finally, he spoke of what many regard the miracle of Tanglewood, making reference to "that Goethe poem, do you know it, which tells how 'Das Gras springt auf.' It's just like that at Tanglewood, and I'll never know how the lawns are kept so lovely and green with all the crowds there."

And it is amazing, for last summer over a quarter million people—individually, en famille, with camp groups—visited, toured, picnicked at Tanglewood. The Festival this year, which runs eight weeks from the Fourth of July, will undoubtedly draw more, as it continues taking the Leinsdorf tack—musical diversity in unmatched surroundings.

Boston Sunday Advertiser 6-1-69

82

COVER STO

The beautiful Berkshires form b

ERICH

By GEO

AFTER a morning's rehea
under a print of Gustav Mahler suite at Symphony Hall, hidden sun glasses and fidgeting with with keys and initialed E. L.—
years old, eleventh permanent co ton Symphony Orchestra, and th of Berkshire Festival at Tangl on the brink of his seventh and helm, is by his own admission a ni

"I'll tell you, I can say wi pride that I am very proud of there. We really have three Ta tate, the series of concerts pla
Symphony and the Berkshire Musi

This third Tanglewood, educ
the BSO, has been most on Lei past half dozen years, and his c and remains—to open up new hori

"I've tried to intensify the C

THE EXPERTS SPEAK

A New Look At Ghetto Education

By ALICE FLEMING

● Why do disadvantaged youngsters fail to learn?

"Usually it's the result of school failure."

"It's impossible to provide a meaningful school experience for any disadvantaged child—black or white—until we stop placing the blame for his failure to learn on his mode of life, his economic condition or his lack of motivation," says Dr. Sol Gordon, associate professor of psychology and education at Yeshiva University in New York.

● What should we do?

"Educators have to abandon some longstanding attitudes about the disadvantaged child, discard some of the sacred commandments and 'accepted' rules of education—in short start relying on creative teaching, rather than innovations in the curriculum; on early prevention, rather than later remediation, to reach children with limited backgrounds and opportunities."

" . . . teachers get blamed for failing programs they had nothing to do with . . ."

● What are some of the things that should be discarded?

"Remedial reading programs for one. They have been remarkably ineffective in almost every part of the country and yet every school with a federal budget includes them for expansion. One of the reasons why most ghetto schools have failed to teach almost a third of their children to read is that educators have failed to recognize that there are many reasons why children do not learn. Although most give lip service to this obvious point, they fail to offer a differential teaching approach which recognizes these differences."

● What else?

"Another myth is that schools need more psychologists. Teachers and administrators in inne unanimous in t played by psy psychiatrists, r like. Yet educati
the problem is services. What rather new mod are beginning t maladjusted chi fied by teachers
Mental health to devote their ful area of cre climate that fos

● How abo

"That's an general thinkin
ing programs
versity profess that teachers at all levels o cluding federal disadvantaged are the ones programs they
the first place."

● Is integr education?

"Only if it's that isn't poss serving people
Ideally both sc planned simul
the first prior Black children schools. Such to integration
10,000 to 20,00
the city conve
park or the id
bused to subu seems almost tions in our so
tion in the firs

● Are the insurmountable

"That's the
The task isn't we're tied to the ideas of th
to the fear of
The real key academic prog edge that all quickly. Wher they want to ers to help th

Copyrig

Boston Sunday Advertiser 6-1-69.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed at Tanglewood

Photo by Whitestone Photos

at Tanglewood

dorf's whole philosophy, personal as well as musical, and helps in small part to explain why he has chosen to leave Boston and not to accept any other year-round conducting position.

To borrow Sir William Schwenck Gilbert's dictum on policemen, "The permanent conductor's lot is not a happy one." In Boston, Leinsdorf lived most of his reign under a Board of Trustees strongly in favor of the traditional and equally wary of the new; it expected him to prepare and conduct all but very few of the season's concerts, both in town and at Tanglewood, and left him little time for guest engagements where a more adventurous repertory—"transition" or other—might have been probed.

Conflicts developed on all fronts. Half the public was alienated because a few unfamiliar works were played, the other half because more were not; record sales of Symphony releases slipped, as Leinsdorf never really captured public fancy; and perhaps most centrally of concern to the quality of the product, the Symphony men themselves became disaffected, and though there was never open dissent, there was never much more than a working relation. Lacking charisma or magic or call it what you will, Leinsdorf, for all his good intentions, inspired little affection or real respect or attention, either from players or public. And so, in a very healthy sense, his parting from the BSO is in the best interest of both parties, for Leinsdorf will once again be his own man, and the Symphony is free again to find its "ideal" leader.

THOUGH it is unlikely that the successor, no matter who he be, will see a period of Festival growth comparable to that of the past six years. Tanglewood's location, a mile outside picture-book Lenox in western Massachusetts, adds immeasurably to its success, which Leinsdorf fully realizes.

"When I was a student in Vienna," he says, "there was a possible audience of 30,000 if every seat was filled for every performance by somebody different. But do you realize the potential number of people we can play for now? With Boston and New York and Albany and smaller cities so near, we should be able to reach a million people."

He then went on to speak warmly of his first Tanglewood, the beautiful estate and gardens given the Symphony by heirs of the late Boston banker William Aspinwall Tappan. Before coming to Boston, Leinsdorf had visited Tanglewood only once, about 20 years ago; now, about to make his exit at the summer's end, he has chosen as poetically apt a swan song as possible, the Beethoven Ninth Symphony, for this was the inaugural work led in the Shed back in 1938.

And, finally, he spoke of what many regard the miracle of Tanglewood, making reference to "that Goethe poem, do you know it, which tells how 'Das Gras springt auf.' It's just like that at Tanglewood, and I'll never know how the lawns are kept so lovely and green with all the crowds there."

And it is amazing, for last summer over a quarter million people—individually, en famille, with camp groups—visited, toured, picnicked at Tanglewood. The Festival this year, which runs eight weeks from the Fourth of July, will undoubtedly draw more, as it continues taking the Leinsdorf tack—musical diversity in unmatched surroundings.

THE AISLE SEAT

Mr. Leinsdorf

By BERNARD DECKER

NE

LENOX, Mass.—The high-pitched whine pierced the air, penetrating the very walls of the Shed at Tanglewood.

A grey Mustang swirled up to the back of the Shed. Out stepped Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, casual in black semi-turtleneck jersey, blue blazer and light light colored slacks.

"What is that noise?" he asked, a look of almost pain contorting his face. Such unmelodic sounds are not customary at the summer home of his orchestra.

He was informed that equipment was being tested for the performance that night of the Contemporary Trends concert featuring the Jefferson Airplane, the Who and B. B. King. Mr. Leinsdorf strode towards the stage.

"How long will this continue" Mrs. Leinsdorf asked a young man standing on the stage.

"How much longer?" the young man called out to the middle of the Shed.

"You'll have to ask John," a young man called back.

"How much longer, John?"

"About 15 minutes," a voice called back.

Mr. Leinsdorf turned and strode back offstage.

"Off the grounds. We will go off the grounds."

In his car, he noted: "I don't believe in serving all people at all times."

"I approve of a bathing suit and a full-dress suit. But I don't wear a full-dress suit when I swim or a bathing suit when I conduct."

"I don't wish to have any credit for bringing them here," Mr. Leinsdorf concluded in reference to the rock groups that would be playing at Tanglewood that night.

THE DRIVE was a short one, to Avaloch, a restaurant-hotel sitting above Tanglewood. In its gazebo, a waitress served coffee and Danish pastries.

"Put it on my son Gregor's bill," Mr. Leinsdorf said.

"He will pay it . . . and charge me 18 per cent interest."

(His son, he explained, was up from New York City to attend the rock concert that night.)

Since Mr. Leinsdorf had but two weeks to go as musical director of the Boston Symphony, the obvious question was what he felt he had achieved in his seven years with the Boston Symphony.

"I have broadened its repertoire, for one thing. The orchestra can play many types of music, more so than in the past.

This is a problem, Mr. Leinsdorf noted. Newer works need rehearsals. Yet musicians don't like to rehearse and rehearsals cost money.

With the newer works, you have to achieve more in less time today. And you can because the personnel is so much more accomplished.

"I can remember when it took one of the greatest orchestras in the world 34 rehearsals for one work. I rehearsed the orchestra 13 times.

ERICH LEINSDORF CONDUCTING

Like all conductors and directors for symphony orchestras, Mr. Leinsdorf has been faced in his tenure with the problem of balancing old and new in his programs.

"The well-known pieces have to be protected. People can get tired of them. Familiarity breeds contempt."

In Boston, he had no problem. Since the season is based on a subscription series that is virtually sold out year after year, Mr. Leinsdorf said he was "freer" in his choice of music. At Tanglewood, it has been another matter.

"When an auditorium holds 6,000 people, you hope you will have 6,000 people. This is unreasonable, but we are unreasonable people."

HE DESCRIBED audiences in terms of "concentric circles," each circle containing a certain percentage with whom you do certain things.

"We know precisely who will sell what."

There is no such thing as a soloist who can guarantee a sell-out. Jascha Heifitz' name is synonymous with "sell-out," but when he played a concert of William Walton some years ago, he did not sell out the auditorium.

"Van Cliburn? Perhaps. They do not come to hear him so much as to come and bring homage . . ."

Mr. Leinsdorf believes Tanglewood could be sold out every Saturday and Sunday of the season. (Friday nights could never be sold out because of the transportation problems people have in getting there.) "But is this our only task?"

He noted that the concertbouw in Amsterdam divides its programs into series. In one of them, only 18th- and 20-century works are played.

"This may be the answer. I haven't found it to my satisfaction."

All this time a fly has been buzzing persistently about the Danish pastries. Mr. Leinsdorf had shooed him away several times.

"I detest flies."

The fly lighted on the paper napkin lying in front of Mr. Leinsdorf on the table. Rap Mr. Leinslorf wielded the flat of a knife with all the adeptness of a baton. The fly bothered him no more.

Would the sound of the Boston Symphony change with his departure and the ascendancy of a new conductor?

He said he thought it would, though he does not subscribe to the theory that a conductor imparts a certain "sound"t o an orchestra.

"That is like saying you should have orange sauce on ice cream, on steak . . . Any actor who played the role of King Lear the same as he played a role in a Thornton Wilder work or one by Tennessee Williams would not be a great actor.

"The sound for Mozart is not the sound for Albert Berg."

"In one of Albert Berg's work, you use the wooden part of the violin bow. If you did that for Mozart, people would say 'What the hell is this?' . . ."

What will he miss upon leaving the Boston Symphony and Tanglewood? (He will serve as guest conductor a number of times.)

"The Berkshire Music Center . . . the kids . . . very much. Some of the special things difficult for a guest conductor . . . And there are affectionate bonds with people . . . There will be twinges of nostalgia."

What wouldn't he miss?

The "mental agility" required. In his seven years with the orchestra, a statistician has informed him, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted 709 concerts at which 429 different works has been performed.

"In two days last week, I rehearsed the "Soldier's Tale" of Stravinsky, the opera "Wozzeck" and several works by Debussey."

If you get the impression Mr. Leinsdorf intends to spend his retirement lying in a hammock reading, forget it. When he concludes the season at Tanglewood, he will travel to Buenos Aires, where he will conduct opera for several weeks. Upon his return to this country, he is scheduled for several guest appearances with the Chicago Symphony. By that time, the Boston Symphony will be starting its Boston season. After that . . .

Retirement, as you can gather, is a relative word.

ERICH LEINSDORF IN CONTEMPLATION

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, August 16, 1969

Distaff Side of the BSO

83

By ELIZABETH W. ALSOP

Some men claim that since the first part of the century when they got the vote, women have been taking over the world. There are women jockeys, female reporters, female senators and now, even the big symphony orchestras are beginning to accept more women as long as they can make good music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the five biggest in the United States, now has four female musicians, two of whom have been with the BSO for more than 15 years.

Ann de Guichard, the first woman ever to join the orchestra, came in 1945 as a replacement for a bassoon player who was serving in the Army. She left again in 1947 when the bassoonist returned from the war.

The next female face to appear, in 1951, was Olivia Luetcke, harpist. One of five children who are musicians, she began to play the harp at the age of 6. She studied four years with the National Orchestral Association and soloed with the San Antonio Symphony and at the Boston Pops concerts before joining the BSO. She plans to resign in the fall.

Doriot Dwyer, principal flutist, joined the orchestra 17 years ago. Born in Streator, Ill., she studied at the Eastman School of Music, Rochester, N.Y., and with private teachers, including her mother. She won scholarships to study with Georges Barrere at the Eastman School and at Interlochen Music Camp. She played with the CBS and NBC orchestras, the Standard Symphony, Los Angeles, and the Los Angeles Philharmonic and Hollywood Bowl orchestras as well as with the Massine Ballet.

Piccolo Player

Lois Schaefer, who has played the piccolo with the BSO for four years, says that "the larger-ranking orchestras gave in last. The smaller midwestern orchestras have always relied rather heavily on women." Miss Schaefer who was born in Yakima, Wash., started playing the piano at the age of 5 and the flute at 12. She was assistant flutist for the Chicago Symphony and first flutist with the New York City Opera before she joined the Boston Symphony four years ago.

The female cellist, Carol Ann Procter, is leaving for a year to join the Japanese Philharmonic on an exchange program. Born in Dedham, Carol graduated from the Eastman School and the New England Conservatory. She turned down a Fulbright scholarship to Rome four years ago so that she could join the BSO.

The reactions of the men to the advance of women in their profession are varied. Some think it's wonderful and others resent it.

Fewer Men in Music

Harry Ellis Dickson, first violinist, who is publishing a book in the fall on his 30 years with the orchestra, looks at it this way:

"Emotionally, men resent the women for no logical reason. These women get into the orchestra because they play better than anybody else at the auditions. Anyway, more and more women are going into professions and fewer men are going into music. Suddenly, it's science and medicine instead.

"And besides, because they're in the minority, women in the orchestra have to be more conscientious than the men."

George Zazofsky, another first violinist and a member of the International Conference of Symphony and Opera Musicians, is very interested in the question of more women in large orchestras.

"In the beginning, the reaction of the men to women coming into the orchestra was very intense. Many of the men were very much against it at first, but the prejudice seems to be disappearing since the women have shown themselves to be very proficient in their field," he says.

"Orchestras have had to take on women for many reasons," he adds. "For one thing, the supply of first-class males, especially in strings, has dropped sharply. The men are going into other professions. Also, children of professional musicians have generally been discouraged by their parents from going into symphony orchestras. There is disillusionment in the musical profession, as in many others."

Whitestone

Lois Schaefer, piccoloist, and Carol Ann Procter, cellist, play with the BSO.

Whitestone

Doriot Anthony Dwyer is BSO first flutist.

New Replacements

In place of the two women who are leaving, the orchestra has hired two other women who will begin in September. They are Ikuko Mizuno, a Japanese violinist, and Ann Hobson, a harpist who has been with the Washington Symphony for three years.

And then, when Carol Procter gets back from Japan, there will be five women in the BSO. As far as the musical profession goes, it looks like women are here to stay.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 22 1969

84

Ward Gaston, Retired Supt. Of Tanglewood's Grounds

Ward J. Gaston

Ward J. Gaston, 81, of 386 South St., retired superintendent of grounds at Tanglewood, died this morning at the Pittsfield General unit, BMC.

Well-known in this area for his Masonic activities over the years, Mr. Gaston served as grounds superintendent at Tanglewood for 30 years until retiring in 1958. After his retirement, he became a familiar sight on South Street, where he set up a free public information booth for tourists in front of his house. In 1963, he was recognized for this volunteer service by being made an honorary member of the Berkshire Hills Conference.

Last August, Mr. Gaston also made medical history in Berkshire County when he became the first patient here to have a successful "pacemaker" operation, performed at Pittsfield General, which resulted in an implanted transvenous pacemaker to regulate his heart.

A native of West Stockbridge, Mr. Gaston went to work for Supt. of Grounds Alexander M. MacConnachie in 1928 when Tanglewood was the home of Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan, who had lived there since Civil War days, and her niece, Mrs. Gorman Brooks.

Mr. Gaston was promoted to superintendent in 1931 and remained in the post when Tanglewood became the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1937. In fact, a news release from the BSO some years later stated that the BSO had always been grateful to Miss Tappan and Mrs. Brooks for the gift of Tanglewood "and not the least part of the gift was Ward and Jennie (Mrs.) Gaston, to whom the orchestra, the public and the Berkshires should be very grateful indeed."

Upon Mr. Gaston's retirement in 1958, he was honored at a dinner by the BSO and presented an engraved silver tray on behalf of the BSO by Thomas D. Perry Jr., its manager, who said, "Tanglewood is as famous for the beauty of its grounds as for the beauty of its music."

In his many years of active Masonic service, Mr. Gaston was past master of the Wisdom Lodge of Masons of West Stockbridge, past patron of Wisdom Chapter No. 130, Order of Eastern Star of West Stockbridge, and a charter member and past watchman of the Shepherd of the Guiding Star Chapter, Order of White Shrine. A 32nd degree Mason, he was a member of all the Scottish Rite bodies, the Melha Shrine and the Connecticut Valley Consistory.

He and his wife, the former Jennie Peterson Hanson, observed their 55th wedding anniversary last August.

Besides his wife, he leaves a son, Howard J. of Granby, Conn.

Friends may call at the Newton & Barnfather Funeral Home tomorrow from 2 to 4 and 7 to 9. Members of the Wisdom Lodge of Masons will hold a memorial service tomorrow night at 8.

Services will be Saturday afternoon at the funeral home.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

MAY 22 1969

Ward J. Gaston, Retired Supt. of Tanglewood

PITTSFIELD—Ward J. Gaston, 81, retired superintendent of Tanglewood in Lenox, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died yesterday at Pittsfield General Hospital.

A native of West Stockbridge, he was first superintendent at Tanglewood when it was the summer home of Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan, who donated the property to the BSO. He retired from the Tanglewood post in 1958.

Well known in area Masonic activities, he was past master of Wisdom lodge of West Stockbridge, past patron of Wisdom chapter, Order of the Eastern Star; 32nd degree mason and a member of all the Scottish Rite bodies, the Melha Shrine and the Connecticut Valley Consistory.

Surviving besides his wife is a son Howard J. of Granby, Conn. Funeral services will be held at the Newton and Barnfather Funeral Home Saturday afternoon.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

MAY 23 1969

Boston Sinfonietta Is Art Center Fourth

MANCHESTER — The Boston Sinfonietta will be featured in the fourth concert of the music series being presented by the Southern Vermont Art Center on Sunday evenings. The concert will take place Sunday, August 17 at 8:30 p.m. in the Music Pavilion.

This small string symphony was founded in 1947 by the late Joseph Zimbler, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was one of the first such groups to perform without a conductor. The musicians are all members of the Boston Symphony and the Sinfonietta is one of eleven ensembles formed within the orchestra to encourage the performance of chamber music. They have made numerous recordings, giving concerts in Jordan Hall, Boston, in Tanglewood and many colleges and universities.

George Zazofsky is music director and concertmaster with Gottfried Wilfinger, John Korman, Christopher Kimber, Harry Dickson, Herman Silberman, Stanley Benson, violins; Earl Hedberg Yizhak Schotten, violas; Robert Ripley, Ronald Feldman, cellos; Henry Portnoi, bass. Their program includes the Divertimento in F major K. 138 by Mozart; the Concerto for Two Violins in D minor by Bach; the Concerto grosso in A minor opus 6 no. 4 by Handel; the Waltz from the Serenade for Strings by Volkman and Trauermusik for viola and strings by Hindemith.

Single tickets for the performance are $4; $3.50; $2.50 and $1.50 and are reserved. The art galleries are open one hour before the concert and during intermission. The box office is open daily from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.; Sunday 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. (802-362-1405).

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(E) 6,200

AUG 12 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 5 1969

BSO Member Recovers Violin Just in Time

Albert Masiero of 1070 Holmes Road turned in a violin Sunday morning that he found on the street outside his home. The owner of the violin was Roger Shermont of Brookline, a member of the violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Shermont came to the police station in an extremely agitated state since he had no other instrument with him for the Sunday afternoon concert. He had offered a reward before the desk sergeant was able to tell him the violin had been found.

REFORMER
BRATTLEBORO, VERMONT
(E) 8,700

AUG 14 1969

Will Perform This Sunday

MANCHESTER — The Boston Sinfonietta will be featured in the fourth concert of the music series being presented by the Southern Vermont Art Center on Sunday evenings. The concert will take place Aug. 17 at 8:30 p.m. in the Music Pavilion.

This small string symphony was founded in 1947 by the late Joseph Zimbler, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was one of the first such groups to perform without a conductor. The musicians are all members of the Boston Symphony and the Sinfonietta is one of 11 ensembles formed within the orchestra to encourage the performance of chamber music. They have made numerous recordings, giving concerts in Jordan Hall, Boston, in Tanglewood and many colleges and universities.

The program includes the Divertimento in F major K.138 by Mozart; the Concerto for Two Violins in D minor by Bach; the Concerto grosso in A minor opus 6 no. 4 by Handel; the Waltz from the Serenade for Strings by Volkmann and Trauermusik for viola and strings by Hindemith.

The art galleries are open one hour before the concert and during intermission. The Box Office is open daily from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.; Sunday 1 p.m. to 5 p.m.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

AUG 12 1969

Author Tells Inside Life With BSO

"Gentlemen, More Dolce Please!," a humorous, first-hand insight into the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Harry Ellis Dickson, is due for publication in early November by Beacon Press.

The book, illustrated with photos and drawings, is based on the memories and observations of Mr. Dickson, who was a musician with the BSO for 30 years. The stories are about not only the 105-member orchestra but also its many trustees, staff and guests. The title of the book is based on the complaint, once made to the BSO by its longtime conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, "Gentlemen, it is awfully not togedder. Gentlemen more dolce please!"

The Boston Symphony spends its summers in residence at Tanglewood in Lenox.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 9 1969

Dickson dreams, writes

By PAUL F. KNEELAND

LENOX — Most all of us have dreams, but Harry Ellis Dickson, associate conductor of the Boston Pops and first violinist with the Boston Symphony Orrchestra, has nightmares.

"One night I woke up in a cold sweatz; I thought I had been playing Beethoven's Fifth Symphony — it was the second movement, andante con moto—when suddenly I stood up and went into a chorus of 'The Virginia Reel,' In another dream I was conducting an Esplanade concert and my baton suddenly transformed itself into a flyswatter."

Could this be a put-on? Dickson denies it.

"Didn't you know?" he asked the other day — we were talking with him between rehearsals at The Shed in Tanglewood where the B.S.O. holds its annual Berkshire Festival. "Musicians are the world's greatest story-tellers." (Tall stories? —Editor's Note.)

Incidentally, Dickson is one of the merriest of members of the B.S.O., and it's a happily enlightening approach to the orchestra that he's taken in his first book, "Gentlemen, More Dolce Please," that's sure to make it a favorite of music lovers. The title, by the way, comes from Serge Koussevitsky's colorful complaint to his orchestra: "Gentlemen, it is awfully not togedder. Gentlemen, more dolce please."

Rather than simply stringing together a series of anecdotes in the vein of the dozens of the "I-Knew-Toscanini's Godfather" and "Tommy - Beecham - Was No - Pill" books, Dickson has come up with a rounded portrait of what life is like symphony season after symphony season at Mass. and Huntington avenues.

"An orchestra is more than 105 players and a conductor — trustees, staff, and guests are part of the picture, too," he says.

The book took two years to write, and every word is Harry's own.

"I typed it, too," rather proudly. "The hunt-and-peck, one-finger method."

What about some observations about musicians in general?

"Will you settle for musicians in particular?" Dickson asks. "Besides playing too loud, cellists are the troublemakers of the orchestra. Flute players think they're dandies, horn players are always grumbling about pay, and trombone players generally resemble ministers."

For a preview of the book, which will be published Nov. 3 by Beacon Press, the public is invited to hear Dickson speak at the second annual New England Book Festival to be held at Suffolk Downs Sept. 12-13-14.

The Salt Lake Tribune
SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
D. 108,270 SUN. 188,699

AUG 31 1969

Tanglewood Fair

Former Utah Musicians Play at Lenox

By Lowell Durham

LENOX (TANGLEWOOD), MASS. — Larry Thorstenberg and Paula Skolnick "are alive and well and living in Lenox." The former is a seasoned pro; the latter, one of the Berkshire Music Festival's brightest young luminaries.

Both are former Salt Lakers. Each has carved an enviable niche; one on east, one on the west coast.

Larry "owns" the English horn chair of the Boston Symphony — and has done so far over a decade — a distinction held by no other Utah instrumentalist. A former student of Louis W. Booth he is a former Utah Symphony member.

I wandered over to the "Shed" 20 minutes before a Boston Symphony rehearsal. The rehearsal stage filled gradually as Boston members warmed up. Larry arrived next-to-last among the 100—barely preceding the concertmaster!

Time Was Short

He caught my eye, and although time was short, we exchanged pleasantries. "How are things going?" was my parting shot. "Not much better," as he hurried to his seat. Translated: William Steinberg's appointment as Leinsdorf's successor is no permanent solution to a problem created 20 years ago by the death of charismatic Serge Koussevitsky. The Boston has never "been the same," in spite of the brilliance of his successor, Charles Munch, whose tragic demise shook the music world a year ago.

Steinberg, longtime conductor of the Pittsburgh orchestra and one of the scene's most respected baton wielders, will retain his Steel City post while adding the Boston podium, assisted by several guest conductors. A "permanent" conductor is still to be found for what was "the world's greatest orchestra" in pre-World War II days.

And the Pazzazz

Prominent in speculation are: Mehta (Los Angeles), Ozawa (San Francisco), Foss (Buffalo), Boulez (New York Philharmonic), Previn (London Symphony) — all young men with both the know-how and pazzazz.

Miss Knolnick graduated from Highland High where her cellistic artistry as a teenager stamped her as a comer. Her bachelor's degree was awarded from Stanford last spring — in painting.

At Tanglewood she was selected by Leinsdorf as assistant principal cellist in the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and awarded the Paul Fromm Foundation Fellowship. She plowed through Wozzeck's intricacies like child's play under Leinsdorf's baton.

The following night we chatted for 30 minutes prior to Paula's appearance on a Gunther Schuller-engineered Contemporary Trends Concerts, of which the Jefferson Airplane rock concert was also was a featured event.

The only cellist in the eight-member ensemble, Paula played a new Luciano Berio work for Instruments and Electronic Tape. Following the eight-week Tanglewood Fellowship, she goes on to graduate study at the University of Southern California next month. This time, it will be her "first love"—music; her goal, a Master of Music degree in performance.

Pops at Tanglewood

Boston Pops at Tanglewood Features 'Old Timers' Night

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The annual Tanglewood appearance of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund is this coming Tuesday at 8 p. m. in Tanglewood's 6000-seat music shed.

"Old Timers Night"

For the first time at Tanglewood, Fiedler and the Pops present an "Old Timers Night", program, the lighthearted sing-along looked forward to as a regular part of the Pops Symphony Hall season in Boston. Song sheets with lyrics to the two old timers song medleys are given to the audience with their pgorams, and Fiedler leads the singing. Both medleys feature the kind of standard old-time hits that are all but folk music by now, ranging from "Sweet Rosie O'Grady" to "God Bless America."

Joan Kennedy, wife of Massachusetts Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, will narrate Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," as she did with great success in Boston this spring.

The program follows:

Pomp and Circumstance No. 1 — Elgar
"Raymond" Overture — Thomas
"Cavalleria Rusticana", Intermezzo — Mascagni
Dancing through the years — arr. Hayman

Intermission

"Peter and the Wolf" — Prokofiev
Joan Kennedy narrator
Old Timers' Night at the Pops — arr. Lake
Ta-r-r-boom-de-ay, The Bowery, Sidewalks of New York, Sweet Rosie O'Grady, Daisy, The Band Played On, After the Ball, A Hot Time In the Old Town Tonight.

Intermission

Waltzes from "The Merry Widow" — Lehar
Those were the days — Raskin
America Sings — arr. Bodge
A Hot Time In the Old Town Tonight, I've Been Working on the Railroad, Down By the Old Mill Stream, In the Good Old Summer Time, Jingle Bells, When Irish Eys Are Smiling, God Bless Aermica.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

AUG 3 1969

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 4 1969

HARVARD PROF. John Kenneth Galbraith was not among the brains who hurried to Hyannis Port when Sen. Ted Kennedy was in trouble. Galbraith's office here says he was ill and was in Vermont . . . Despite her ordeal, incidentally, the senator's wife, Joan, hasn't yet canceled her scheduled date to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" Tuesday evening at Tanglewood.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,200

AUG 2 1969

Tanglewood

Joan Kennedy To Narrate At Tanglewood

LENOX — The annual Tanglewood appearance of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund is at 8 p.m. tomorrow in Tanglewood's 6,000-seat Music Shed.

Joan Kennedy, wife of Massachusetts Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, will narrate Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf," as she did with great success in Boston this spring.

For the first time at Tanglewood, Fiedler and the Pops present an "Old Timers Night" program, the lighthearted sing-along looked forward to as a regular part of the Pops Symphony Hall season in Boston. Song sheets with lyrics to the two old timers song medleys are given to the audience with their programs, and Mr. Fiedler leads the singing. Both medleys feature the kind of standard old-time hits that are all but folk music by now, ranging from "Sweet Rosie O'Grady" to "God Bless America."

Tickets are now on sale at Tanglewood, from $4 to $6.50 (for box seats). Admission to the lawn, on sale at 6 p.m. the day of the concert, is $3.

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
(E) 38,093

AUG 5 1969

Joan Kennedy encores at Tanglewood

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Globe Staff

If you didn't get to sing-along with Joan Kennedy at Symphony Hall when a Pops full-house rocked to "Sweet Rosie O'Grady" and "God Bless America," you can still medley in with the Boston Symphony and the Senator's wife if you hurry up to the Berkshires tomorrow.

It'll be a first time at Tanglewood for the "Old Timers Night" program which adds up to dimes and dollars for the BSO's Pension Fund.

On the same cone-lighted stage in the famed Shed where her husband narrated "The Lincoln Portrait" a season ago, Joan Kennedy will repeat her Boston version of the text for Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf." Arthur Fiedler will again put Mrs. Kennedy through the paces of the Russian folk story, and afterwards turn his baton right to "Ta-Ra-Ra-Boom-De-Ay", The Band-Played On" and other senior-set tunes.

It was a long, warm weekend even under the tall cool pines of Lenox for the Board of Overseers as they dined from Friday to Sunday. They heard the Berkshire Boys Choir, the Music Center chamber group, watched retiring conductor Leinsdorf rehearse the BSO, and picnic-suppered in the new tent with its gorgeous fuchsias and excellent catering. BSO manager Tom Perry Jr. and his friendly wife, who have probably established the all-time entertaining-at-Tanglewood record (their picnics on the lawn are fabulous), gave the Board a yummy Sunday lunch. They also had tea with Mrs. Koussevitzky, whose late great husband, Serge, interested the Brooks family in giving all those beautiful woods and fields to the Boston Symphony and lived to see this long-cherished dream become a happy hunting ground for music lovers the world over.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

AUG 4 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 5 1969

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
(E) 14,465

AUG 5 1969

Joan Kennedy Repeats 'Peter and Wolf' Tonight

LENOX — Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, is scheduled to appear tonight with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a repeat performance of "Peter and the Wolf."

Mrs. Kennedy related the ancient fairy tale to the Prokofiev music at Symphony Hall last Mother's Day, May 12, as a benefit performance for the BSO Pension Fund.

She will repeat the performance tonight, again with Arthur Fiedler conducting the orchestra. In the earlier appearance of the 25-minute musical narrative, she scored a resounding success. Her husband and two older children were in attendance.

Mrs. Kennedy made her initial appearance as narrator two years ago with the National Symphony Orchestra. It was Fiedler's idea to request her to appear for the pension fund in Boston and also in Tanglewood.

The Boston Pops Orchestra plays one Tanglewood concert each summer as a pension fund benefit.

Mrs. Kennedy Has Top Billing With Boston Pops Tonight

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her first public appearance since her husband was involved in a fatal auto accident July 18, had top billing as narrator for tonight's Boston Pops Orchestra production of Tchaikovski's Peter and the Wolf.

Mrs. Kennedy, expecting a child next February, arrived at the lush 200-acre Tanglewood compound Monday night. She attended closed rehearsals with tht orchestra this morning.

Mrs. Kennedy remained in seclusion after her arrival in Lenox.

Aides said she was staying at the home of friends,

Mrs. Kennedy, 33, has appeared in productions of Peter and the Wolf twice before—once with the Washington National Symphony in 1967, and then with the Boston Pops last April.

Tonight's performance, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, is part of an annual program designed to raise money for the orchestra's pension fund.

Although there was sporadic rainfall throughout the morning, orchestra officials said there would be covered seating for up to 7,000 persons.

Joan Kennedy Appearing At Boston Pops

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her first public appearance since her husband was involved in a fatal auto accident July 18, had top billing as narrator for tonight's Boston Pops Orchestra production of Tchaikovski's Peter and the Wolf.

Mrs. Kennedy, expecting a child next February, arrived at the lush 200-acre Tanglewood compound Monday night. She attended closed rehearsals with the orchestra this morning.

Mrs. Kennedy remained in seclusion after her arrival in Lenox.

Aides said she was staying at the home of friends.

Mrs. Kennedy, 33, has appeared in productions of Peter and the Wolf twice before—once with the Washington National Symphony in 1967, and then with the Boston Pops last April.

Tonight's performance, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, is part of an annual program designed to raise money for the orchestra's pension fund.

Although there was sporadic rainfall throughout the morning, orchestra officials said there would be covered seating for up to 7,000 persons.

HERALD
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
(E) 16,596

AUG 5 1969

Mrs. Kennedy To Narrate

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her first public appearance since her husband was involved in a fatal auto accident July 18, had top billing as narrator for tonight's Boston Pops Orchestra production of Tchaikovski's Peter and the Wolf.

Mrs. Kennedy, expecting a child next February, arrived at the lush 200-acre Tanglewood compound Monday night. She attended closed rehearsals with the orchestra this morning.

Mrs. Kennedy remained in seclusion after her arrival in Lenox.

Aides said she was staying at the home of friends.

Mrs. Kennedy, 33, has appeared in productions of Peter and the Wolf twice before—once with the Washington National Symphony in 1967, and then with the Boston Pops last April.

Joan Kennedy To Narrate Tonight At Tanglewood

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 5 1969

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her first public appearance since her husband was involved in a fatal auto accident July 18, had top billing as narrator for tonight's Boston Pops Orchestra production of Tchaikowski's Peter and the Wolf.

Mrs. Kennedy, expecting a child next February, arrived at the lush 200-acre Tanglewood compound Monday night. She attended closed rehearsals with the orchestra this morning.

Mrs.Kennedy remained in seclusion after her arrival in Lenox.

Aides said she was staying at the home of friends.

Mrs. Kennedy, 33, has appeared in productions of Peter and the Wolf twice before—once with the Washington National Symphony in 1967, and then with the Boston Pops last April.

Tonight's performance, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, is part of an annual program designed to raise money for the orchestra's pension fund.

Although there was sporadic rainfall throughout the morning, orchestra officials said there would be covered seating for up to 7,000 persons.

86

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 6 1969

8058 Hear Joan at Tanglewood

(Associated Press Wirephoto)

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy rehearses for Tuesday night's performance of Tchaikowski's "Peter and the Wolf" with Boston Pops Orchestra at Tanglewood.

By THOMAS A. CRAWFORD
Union Staff Writer

LENOX — Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Massachusetts Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Tuesday night narrated Sergei Prokofiev's symphonic tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," to a Tanglewood crowd of 8058 which consisted preponderantly of curious adults.

They saw an attractive blonde in a white, short-sleeved minidress, with two large pink flowers in her hair.

It was her first coming out, barring attendance at a funeral and a church since her husband's July 18 accident which took a young secretary's life. She maintained complete composure throughout the performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, in a concert for the orchestra's pension fund.

She was narrating a story of Peter, the little Russian boy (now adopted internationally) who manages to tie up the wolf even before the hunters come through the woods to the rescue.

There was a missed cue or two, and one instance when it appeared Mrs. Kennedy lost her place. But the voice was very attractive, perhaps a little too much so for an audience to envision birds, ducks, cats, wolves and hunters, as Prokofiev's music helped to do.

There were some in the audience looking for signs of Mrs. Kennedy's recently announced pregnancy, but this reporter must confess not noting any, although they may have been there.

One way or the other, she cut a neat figure.

After the narration, Mrs. Kennedy did a modest curtsy, and refused to come out for a curtain call without conductor Fiedler, who was subsequently rewarded with a hand kiss.

The audience, about half of which had risen to greet Mrs. Kennedy when she first came on stage, responded appreciatively.

Fiedler had some difficulty

See 8058 HEAR
Page Five

(Associated Press Wirephoto)

Mrs. Kennedy, conductor Arthur Fiedler study script.

Joan at Tanglewood

Continued From Page 1

getting the evening under way.

Dozens of lawn - sitters decided late to buy tickets to get into the shed and out of possible rain as some sprinkling began.

The Pops was into its third number, and still no respectful hush would come over the audience to allow him to continue.

At one time, he made a half turn and seemed to mumble "shut up" to the listeners, but under that venerable white moustache, it could well have been something else.

Then he commenced with the intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" by Mascagni, which he took seriously, and the audience finally noticed, and did likewise.

Part one ended with a medley of dance numbers.

No other members of the Kennedy family or entourage attended the concert.

Drives From Cape

Mrs. Kennedy was driven to Western Massachusetts from the Cape Monday night by an aide, and participated with the orchestra in a run-through rehersal in the morning.

That was her only rehearsal with the orchestra since her narration at Symphony Hall in Boston last spring.

Officials said the Tanglewood appearance was a companion to her appearance in Symphony Hall. It was arranged months ago, and a question of whether she would appear or be able to appear after the July 18 accident never came up.

Shortly after the accident, it was revealed that she was pregnant for the sixth time.

Joan Kennedy Narrates Classic At Tanglewood

By MARTHA deB. BEAVER

For the fourth time, Mrs. Joan Kennedy narrated the now classic Prokoviev's "Peter and the Wolf." It was her second with the Boston Pops Orchestra and Arthur Fiedler. At Tanglewood, during a press interview after the 25-minute performance last night Mr. Fiedler noted and Mrs. Kennedy agreed that "it gets more and more settled every time."

Looking radiant in a cap-sleeved short white gown, Mrs. Kennedy said that she was very happy with the audience's reception. "They came here to have a good time, and enjoyed it as much as I did it seems." She and friends joined the enthusiastic audience for the final third of the written program.

Her first public appearance since a fatal auto accident involving her senator husband July 18, Mrs. Kennedy arrived at Tanglewood in Lenox Monday night, where she was a guest at Serenak, home of Madame Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the former BSO conductor.

For her Tanglewood performance, "Madame Koussevitsky," Joan offered earlier, "picked these lovely gladiolus blossoms from her garden." They were glowing pink against long blonde tresses.

Mrs. Kennedy planned to be in the "Washington domain" today to observe Senate voting on the controversial ballistic missile.

"I'm going back to Washington to be with my husband, Ted, and I'll be up there, in the family gallery when this very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said. Picture on page 3.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(M) 14,900
AUG 6 1969

Joan Kennedy Narrates

MRS. EDWARD KENNEDY, shown during rehearsal Tuesday, as she narrated Peter and the Wolf as Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Orchestra.
AP Wirephoto

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
AUG 6 1969
E

SHE REPEATS A SUCCESSFUL ENGAGEMENT

Joan Tells 'Peter and Wolf' Like It Was

By GEORGE GELLIS
Music Critic

LENOX—Languishing Tanglewood, a prey of the rains that have dampened things so thoroughly, got the pickup it needed last night when the Kennedy charisma made itself felt.

Joan Kennedy, wife of Massachusetts Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, repeated her successful in-season engagement, and again, accompanied by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops, narrated Sergei Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf."

It's fairly easy to miss the point of the appearance, yet equally obvious that Mrs. Kennedy was chosen for reasons other than artistic alone. The Senator's wife is, of course, a symbol and, when we view her, a part of the public domain.

As I see it, her reading had such great value — interpretative judgment aside — because it briefly let us glimpse an essentially private side of an intensely private person. At the same time, it was a selfless and generous act for Mrs. Kennedy was giving an unofficial, off-the-record-view of herself, telling Prokofieff's tale to us as she might to her family.

Yet, low-keyed though it was, her interpretation had a quiet warmth and understanding, a responsiveness to the varying fortunes of her young protagonist, and it easily earned Mrs. Kennedy both the generous applause that greeted her coming on stage and those at the close of "Peter."

The rest of the evening followed the format familiar to fans of Fiedler and his Pops. The heftier fare—Elgar's first "Pomp and Circumstance" march and the intermezzo from Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana"—gave way to the frothier — some "Merry Widow Waltzes" and "Those Were The Days" — and since it was an Old Timers' Night there was communal singing that took us from "The Bowery" to "The Old Millstream."

And no matter what you thought of the music Fiedler made, it was impossible not to respect the genius of the man for drawing over 8000 fans to the Shed, for making music the most popular spectator sport around.

Mrs. Edward Kennedy narrated "Peter and the Wolf" at Tanglewood last night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.
AP Wirephoto

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
AUG 6 1969
E

87.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
(E) 48,850 (S) 39,575

AUG 6 1969

UPI Telephoto

At festival

Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, made an apperance at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. Mrs. Kennedy is shown reciting the old-time fairy tale "Peter and the Wolf" to the accompaniment of the Boston Pops Orchestra.

8000 cheer Joan at Lenox

By MARY ELLEN MYRENE
Associated Press Writer

LENOX (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today in time to observe Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance here Tuesday night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

Mrs. Kennedy in her second performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at the orchestra's summer quarters at Tanglewood.

CLASPING hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance looking relaxed and pretty in a short, simply tailored white dress.

"I love it here," she said after the concert. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone did."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her senator husband July 18.

Arriving here by car Monday night, Mrs. Kennedy stayed at the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the founder of the Tanglewood festival and conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949.

Mrs. Kennedy, a college music major when she met her husband, appeared in the same production with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

STANDARD TIMES
HYANNIS, MASS.
(E) 22,520 (S) 1

AUG 7 1969

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

AUG 6 1969

—[United Press International Photo]

nedy, wife of Sen. Edward e at the Berkshire Festival at ire Mrs. Kennedy is shown reciting the and the Wolf" to the ac-
ps Orchestra. (UPI Telephoto)

Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward

FAIRY TALE RECITAL — Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Senator Edward Kennedy, made an appearance at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., late Tuesday. She is reciting the old-time fairy tale "Peter and the Wolf" to the accompaniment of the Boston Pops Orchestra. (UPI Telephoto) mad

ECIT
own
n P

LENOX, MASS.—Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, made an appearance at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood here late Tuesday. Mrs. Kennedy is shown reciting the old-time fairy tale "Peter and the Wolf" to be accompaniment of the Boston Pops Orchestra. (UPI Telephoto)

JOURNAL AND INQUIRER
ROCKVILLE, CONN.
(M) 9,880

AUG 6 7 1969

New Engla

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,924 SUN. 1,131,752

AUG 7 1969

[UPI Telephoto]

Joan at Tanglewood

Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, narrates "Peter and the Wolf" to accompaniment of Boston Pops orchestra.

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 6 (AP)—Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her second performance with the Boston Pops orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at Tanglewood Tuesday night.

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her husband July 18.

PASTE OVER

88

Joan Kennedy Scores Lenox Triumph

By JIM DRONEY
HT Staff Reporter

LENOX — Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, repeated her Boston triumph here last night as narrator of "Peter and the Wolf" with Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Mrs. Kennedy's appearance attracted the largest crowd thus far in this rainy season at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

The weather helped the attendance, particularly in the large area outside the covered Music Shed.

Officials of the Festival announced the crowd as 8,058, a few thousand of them being children whose parents brought them to hear the charming Prokofiev narrative musical fable of Peter and the animals, with various musical instruments portraying the sounds of the birds and beasts.

As she walked on the stage, Mrs. Kennedy was greeted with a tumultuous round of applause and several hundred persons rose to their feet. She wore an off-white semi-mini dress of bawneen wool, silver slippers and two lavendar azaleas, one behind each ear.

She stood at a lectern as she read the familiar tale, which lasted, along with the musical accompaniment, about 25 minutes.

She received an even greater round of applause as she walked off the stage, followed by Fiedler. The two walked to the wings and then returned to center stage for a second bow.

MRS KENNEDY bowed to Fiedler. He bowed to her. She bowed to the various segments of the orchestra behind her and then bowed once again to the audience before daparting from the stage.

This is Mrs. Kennedy's third appearance as narrator of musical classics. Two years ago she made her debut in the role with the National Company in Washington. Last Mother's Day, May 12, she appeared with Fiedler and the Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

Her appearances with the Pops at Symphony Hall and here were both benefits for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund.

Her voice was cool, she was calm and she performed in a highly professional manner. Her voice has the low-range quality that is typical of many actresses.

MRS. KENNEDY arrived in this area Monday night, rehearsed for an hour and a half yesterday morning with Fiedler and the orchestra and spent considerable time this morning moving around the grounds of the Festival site.

Mrs. Kennedy was the guest of Madame Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the former Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor. The flowers were picked for her by Mrs. Koussevitzky, she said.

AFTER THE concert, Mrs. Kennedy was asked how she felt, "Delighted and excited," she replied. "I think I had a better time tonight than anyone."

She disclosed that Sen. Kennedy had appeared two years ago as narrator for Aaron Copland and his Lincoln Portrait. She and her husband were invited to appear as a team at a San Francisco concert, she said, but the dates could not be arranged.

Mrs. Kennedy said she would be in the Senate gallery in Washington today for the vote on the ABM deployment. "It will be a historic vote," she said.

(Herald Traveler Staff Photo by George Dixon)

NARRATOR AND CONDUCTOR for "Peter and the Wolf" at Berkshire Music Festival, Lenox, last night were Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of the senator, and Arthur Fiedler. Mrs. Kennedy pauses during musical passage.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 6 1969

MPLS (MINN) STAR E. 280,895
WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 6, 1969

THE MINNEAPOLIS STAR
Wed., Aug. 6, 1969 5A

Kennedy's wife hailed on narration

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her second performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at Tanglewood Tuesday night.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance.

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her husband July 18.

The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she told reporters after the performance.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377 (E) 194,700
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

Boston Evening Globe — Wednesday, August 6, 1969 25

Ted's Wife There to Watch Senate Voting on ABM Bill

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today to witness the Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill which her hsuband has vehemently opposed.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance Tuesday with the Boston Pops Orchestra at Tanglewood.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

"Joan's always there when there's an important decision to make," a close Kennedy associate has said. "She's not a Senate wife in the normal sense, but she's always there for the working (important) issues." Mrs. Kennedy was in the Senate gallery when her husband was elected majority "whip" this year.

Close friends and Kennedy aides have admitted privately that Mrs. Kennedy, who is expecting her fourth child in February, was opposed to her husband's seeking the presidency in 1972. Mrs. Kennedy has said she will "of course campaign for Ted's reelection to the Senate in '70."

In her second appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, the attractive blond wife of the Democratic senator narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8000 at the orchestra's Summer quarters at Tanglewood.

"I love it here," Mrs. Kennedy said after the performance. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone else."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Joan Bennet Kennedy since the fatal auto accident involving her husband July 18.

Mrs. Kennedy, who prefers to remain out of the public eye except for occasional charitable appearances, gave the same performance with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

Joan Kennedy: Narrator

Joan Kennedy narrated Prokofiev's Peter and the Wolf at a Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood in Lennox, Mass. last night and won a warm reception from the crowd of about 6,000. She wore a white mini-dress, looked a little bit pregnant and was kissed on the hand at the end of her performance by Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler. Mrs. Kennedy arrived under a state police escort without her husband, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, and left just after her performance. Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
(E) 14,465
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

ENTERPRISE & TIMES
BROCKTON, MASS.
(E) 53,254
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

Mrs. Kennedy Scores Hit As Music Narrator

LENOX, Mass. (UPI) — The largest crowd at the Tanglewood Music Festival this season saw Joan Kennedy, the wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, narrate Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox, Mass., last night.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance.

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her husband July 18.

The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she told reporters after the performance.

KENNEBEC JOURNAL
AUGUSTA, MAINE
(M) 15,774
AUG 6 1969

Ted's Wife Appears With Boston Pops

SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
(E) 21,000
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111
AUG 6 1969

Mrs. Kennedy Plans to Be In Washington to Observe Senate Voting on ABM

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today in time to observe Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance Tuesday night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

"Joan's always there when there's an important decision to make," a close Kennedy associate has said. "She's not a Senate wife in the normal sense, but she's always there for the working (important) issues." Mrs. Kennedy was in the Senate gallery when her husband was elected majority "whip" this year.

Close friends and Kennedy aides have admitted privately that Mrs. Kennedy, who is expecting her fourth child in February, was opposed to her husband's seeking the presidency in 1972. Mrs. Kennedy has said she will "of course campaign for Ted's reelection to the Senate in '70."

In her second appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, the attractive blond wife of the Democratic senator narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8000 at the orchestra's Summer quarters at Tanglewood.

"I love it here," Mrs. Kennedy said after the performance. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone else."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Joan Bennet Kennedy since the fatal auto accident involving her husband July 18.

Mrs. Kennedy, who prefers to remain out of the public eye except for occasional charitable appearances, gave the same performance with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

SUN
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
(E) 14,200
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

HERALD
RUTLAND, VERMONT
(M) 21,834
AUG 6 1969 New England

Throng Hears Mrs. Kennedy At Concert

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her second performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at Tanglewood Tuesday night.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance.

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her husband July 18.

The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she told reporters after the performance.

Performs At Tanglewood — Ted's Wife In Capitol To See ABM Voting

Mrs. Joan Kennedy Views ABM Polling

By MARY ELLEN MYRENE
Associated Press Writer

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today in time to observe Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance here Tuesday night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

Mrs. Kennedy in her second performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox, Mass., last night.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance looking relaxed and pretty in a short, simply tailored white dress.

"I love it here," she said after the concert. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone else."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her senator husband July 18.

Arriving here by car Monday night, Mrs. Kennedy stayed at the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the founder of the Tanglewood festival and conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949.

Mrs. Kennedy, a college music major when she met her husband, appeared in the same production with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

FOSTER'S DEMOCRAT
DOVER, N. H.
(E) 15,150
AUG 6 1969

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(E) 150,082
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

Mrs. Kennedy to See Senate Vote on ABM

Lenox, Mass. — (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today in time to observe Senate voting on the controversial antiballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance last night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

Mrs. Kennedy, in her second performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox, Mass., last night.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance looking relaxed and pretty in a short, simply tailored white dress.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance here Tuesday

PASTE OVER

88

Joan Kennedy Scores Lenox Triumph

By JIM DRONEY
HT Staff Reporter

LENOX — Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, repeated her Boston triumph here last night as narrator of "Peter and the Wolf" with Arthur Fiedler conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Mrs. Kennedy's appearance attracted the largest crowd thus far in this rainy season at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

The weather helped the attendance, particularly in the large area outside the covered Music Shed.

Officials of the Festival announced the crowd as 8,058, a few thousand of them being children whose parents brought them to hear the charming Prokofiev narrative musical fable of Peter and the animals, with various musical instruments portraying the sounds of the birds and beasts.

As she walked on the stage, Mrs. Kennedy was greeted with a tumultuous round of applause and several hundred persons rose to their feet. She wore an off-white semi-mini dress of bawneen wool, silver slippers and two lavendar azaleas, one behind each ear.

She stood at a lectern as she read the familiar tale, which lasted, along with the musical accompaniment, about 25 minutes.

She received an even greater round of applause as she walked off the stage, followed by Fiedler. The two walked to the wings and then returned to center stage for a second bow.

MRS KENNEDY bowed to Fiedler. He bowed to her. She bowed to the various segments of the orchestra behind her and then bowed once again to the audience before daparting from the stage.

This is Mrs. Kennedy's third appearance as narrator of musical classics. Two years ago she made her debut in the role with the National Company in Washington. Last Mother's Day, May 12, she appeared with Fiedler and the Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

Her appearances with the Pops at Symphony Hall and here were both benefits for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund.

Her voice was cool, she was calm and she performed in a highly professional manner. Her voice has the low-range quality that is typical of many actresses.

MRS. KENNEDY arrived in this area Monday night, rehearsed for an hour and a half yesterday morning with Fiedler and the orchestra and spent considerable time this morning moving around the grounds of the Festival site.

Mrs. Kennedy was the guest of Madame Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the former Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor. The flowers were picked for her by Mrs. Koussevitzky, she said.

AFTER THE concert, Mrs. Kennedy was asked how she felt, "Delighted and excited," she replied. "I think I had a better time tonight than anyone."

She disclosed that Sen. Kennedy had appeared two years ago as narrator for Aaron Copland and his Lincoln Portrait. She and her husband were invited to appear as a team at a San Francisco concert, she said, but the dates could not be arranged.

Mrs. Kennedy said she would be in the Senate gallery in Washington today for the vote on the ABM deployment. "It will be a historic vote," she said.

(Herald Traveler Staff Photo by George Dixon)

NARRATOR AND CONDUCTOR for "Peter and the Wolf" at Berkshire Music Festival, Lenox, last night were Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of the senator, and Arthur Fiedler. Mrs. Kennedy pauses during musical passage.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 6 1969

MPLS (MINN) STAR E. 290,895
WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 6, 1969

THE MINNEAPOLIS STAR
Wed., Aug. 6, 1969 5A

Kennedy's wife hailed on narration

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her second performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at Tanglewood Tuesday night.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance.

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her husband July 18.

The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she told reporters after the performance.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
AUG 6 1969

Boston Evening Globe — Wednesday, August 6, 1969 25

Ted's Wife There to Watch Senate Voting on ABM Bill

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today to witness the Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill which her hsuband has vehemently opposed.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance Tuesday with the Boston Pops Orchestra at Tanglewood.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

"Joan's always there when there's an important decision to make," a close Kennedy associate has said. "She's not a Senate wife in the normal sense, but she's always there for the working (important) issues." Mrs. Kennedy was in the Senate gallery when her husband was elected majority "whip" this year.

Close friends and Kennedy aides have admitted privately that Mrs. Kennedy, who is expecting her fourth child in February, was opposed to her husband's seeking the presidency in 1972. Mrs. Kennedy has said she will "of course campaign for Ted's reelection to the Senate in '70."

In her second appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, the attractive blond wife of the Democratic senator narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8000 at the orchestra's Summer quarters at Tanglewood.

"I love it here," Mrs. Kennedy said after the performance. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone else."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Joan Bennet Kennedy since the fatal auto accident involving her husband July 18.

Mrs. Kennedy, who prefers to remain out of the public eye except for occasional charitable appearances, gave the same performance with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

ENTERPRISE & TIMES
BROCKTON, MASS.
(E) 53,254
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

Joan Kennedy: Narrator

Joan Kennedy narrated Prokofiev's Peter and the Wolf at a Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood in Lennox, Mass. last night and won a warm reception from the crowd of about 6,000. She wore a white mini-dress, looked a little bit pregnant and was kissed on the hand at the end of her performance by Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler. Mrs. Kennedy arrived under a state police escort without her husband, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, and left just after her performance. Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
(E) 14,465
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 479,644 SUN. 626,111
AUG 6 1969

Mrs. Kennedy Scores Hit As Music Narrator

LENOX, Mass. (UPI) — The largest crowd at the Tanglewood Music Festival this season saw Joan Kennedy, the wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, narrate Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at Tanglewood last night.

KENNEBEC JOURNAL
AUGUST, MAINE
(M) 15,774
AUG 6 1969

Ted's Wife Appears With Boston Pops

SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
(E) 21,000
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today in time to observe Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance Tuesday night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

"Joan's always there when there's an important decision to make," a close Kennedy associate has said. "She's not a Senate wife in the normal sense, but she's always there for the working (important) issues." Mrs. Kennedy was in the Senate gallery when her husband was elected majority "whip" this year.

Close friends and Kennedy aides have admitted privately that Mrs. Kennedy, who is expecting her fourth child in February, was opposed to her husband's seeking the presidency in 1972. Mrs. Kennedy has said she will "of course campaign for Ted's reelection to the Senate in '70."

In her second appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, the attractive blond wife of the Democratic senator narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8000 at the orchestra's Summer quarters at Tanglewood.

"I love it here," Mrs. Kennedy said after the performance. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone else."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Joan Bennet Kennedy since the fatal auto accident involving her husband July 18.

Mrs. Kennedy, who prefers to remain out of the public eye except for occasional charitable appearances, gave the same performance with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(E) 150,062
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

Mrs. Kennedy Plans to Be In Washington to Observe Senate Voting on ABM

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today in time to observe Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance last night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

Mrs. Kennedy, who in her performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at the orchestra's summer quarters at Tanglewood.

ATTLEBORO, MASS.
(E) 14,200
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

HERALD
RUTLAND, VERMONT
(M) 21,834
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

Throng Hears Mrs. Kennedy At Concert

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her second performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at Tanglewood Tuesday night.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance.

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her husband July 18.

The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she told reporters after the performance.

Performs At Tanglewood —

Ted's Wife In Capitol To See ABM Voting

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her second performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at Tanglewood Tuesday night.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance.

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her husband July 18.

Arriving here by car Monday night, Mrs. Kennedy stayed at the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the founder of the Tanglewood festival and conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949.

Mrs. Kennedy, a college music major when she met her husband, appeared in the same production with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

FOSTER'S DEMOCRAT
DOVER, N. H.
(E) 15,150
AUG 6 1969

Mrs. Kennedy Takes Step Into Limelight

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward Kennedy, ending her three weeks seclusion, appeared with the Boston Pops Orchestra in a benefit concert last night.

And while her reception was friendly, the drama of the audience and performer appeared strictly theatrical. Mrs. Kennedy, appearing with conductor Arthur Fiedler, the long-time friend of the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before a crowd of more than 8,000 persons at the orchestra's summer quarters at Tanglewood.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance looking relaxed and pretty in a short, simply tailored white dress.

"I love it here," she said after the concert. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone did."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her senator husband July 18.

Arriving here by car Monday night, Mrs. Kennedy stayed at the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the founder of the Tanglewood festival and conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949.

Mrs. Kennedy, a college music major when she met her husband, appeared in the same production with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

HERALD
PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
(E) 16,596
AUG 6 1969 New England Newsclip

Mrs. Kennedy Will Observe ABM Voting

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today in time to observe Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance Tuesday night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

NEWS
GARDNER, MASS.
(E) 7,904
AUG 6 1969

Mrs. Kennedy Going To Senate For ABM Vote

By MARY ELLEN MYRENE
Associated Press Writer

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today in time to observe Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance here Tuesday night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

Mrs. Kennedy, who in her performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at the orchestra's summer quarters at Tanglewood.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance looking relaxed and pretty in a short, simply tailored white dress.

"I love it here," she said after the concert. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone did."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her senator husband July 18.

Arriving here by car Monday night, Mrs. Kennedy stayed at the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the founder of the Tanglewood festival and conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949.

Mrs. Kennedy, a college music major when she met her husband, appeared in the same production with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

Ted's Wife Appears With Boston Pops

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward Kennedy, ending her three weeks seclusion, appeared with the Boston Pops Orchestra in a benefit concert last night.

And while her reception was friendly, the drama of the audience and performer appeared strictly theatrical. Mrs. Kennedy, appearing with conductor Arthur Fiedler, the long-time friend of the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before a crowd of more than 8,000 persons at the orchestra's summer quarters at Tanglewood.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance looking relaxed and pretty in a short, simply tailored white dress.

"I love it here," she said after the concert. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone did."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her senator husband July 18.

Arriving here by car Monday night, Mrs. Kennedy stayed at the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the founder of the Tanglewood festival and conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949.

Mrs. Kennedy, a college music major when she met her husband, appeared in the same production with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

Mrs. Joan Kennedy Views ABM Polling

By MARY ELLEN MYRENE
Associated Press Writer

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today in time to observe Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance here Tuesday night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

Mrs. Kennedy, who in her performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at the orchestra's summer quarters at Tanglewood.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance looking relaxed and pretty in a short, simply tailored white dress.

"I love it here," she said after the concert. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone did."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her senator husband July 18.

Arriving here by car Monday night, Mrs. Kennedy stayed at the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the founder of the Tanglewood festival and conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949.

Mrs. Kennedy, a college music major when she met her husband, appeared in the same production with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

AUG 6 1969

New England

Mrs. Kennedy to Watch Safeguard Vote

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today in time to observe Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance here Tuesday night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

25-minute performance [illegible] warm applause that prompted [illegible] second bow. A scattering of [illegible] ple stood in tribute.

But it remained, more [illegible] anything, a cautious re-[illegible] into the public limelight for [illegible] 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy, who [illegible] night, she remained in the [illegible]

[illegible] anything, a cautious re-entry [illegible] into the public limelight for the [illegible] 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy, who [illegible] is expecting her fourth child in February.

Arriving here by car Monday [illegible] return to [illegible]

Whitestone

SING ALONG at Boston Pops at Tanglewood last night had, among some 8,000 others, Mrs. Joan Kennedy, right, joining in. Flowers in Mrs. Kennedy's hair are gladioli blossoms from the gardens of Madame Serge Koussevitzky, whose house guest Mrs. Kennedy was at Seranac. At left is Mrs. Kathy Beatey of Cohasset.

Weather Unfavorable

'Pops', Joan Kennedy Draw Mere 8,058 to Tanglewood

By FRANK V. McCARTHY

TANGLEWOOD — Although the annual "Boston Pops" concert here last night offered a performance by a national celebrity, Joan (Mrs. Ted) Kennedy, as a drawing card, the turnout at the soggy Tanglewood grounds was a mere 8,058.

The largely middle-aged audience gave more enthusiastic applause to such numbers as "Dancing Through the Years" than to Mrs. Kennedy's narration, with Arthur Fieldler conducting, of "Peter and the Wolf." The cool response to the latter number, however, might have been due more to a poor performance by the aging Fiedler (see today's music review on Page 19), or to a technical goof that cut off the sound as Mrs. Kennedy met her final cue.

Attendance at the 1965 Pops concert, when Duke Ellington was featured, was 14,428; in 1967 when an all-Gershwin program was featured, 14,000; and last year, when the soloist was Peter Nero, a piano player, about 10,000. So the attendance has been decreasing over the years, which bodes ill for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund. Proceeds from the Pops concerts go to that fund.

Figures Unavailable

Gross receipts from last night's concert were unavailable this morning from the Tanglewood press office or the box office, although such figures have been made available in other years.

There are probably two reasons for the lower attendance at last night's concert. The first was the weather. It rained again last night.

The second is that the Tanglewood Trends concerts, held every Tuesday and featuring contemporary music, have been drawing a lot of the children from area camps. They were present last night in much smaller numbers than for Pops concerts in former years.

There were many empty seats in the Shed last night. The Shed is already sold out, on the other hand, for next Tuesday's performance of "The Jefferson Airplane," which is apparently the sort of thing this year's campers are spending their money on.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 6 1969

The Plain Dealer
Cleveland, O.
A.M.-circ. 403,498
Sun.-circ. 542,922

AUG-7-69

The mother of Beverly McKittrick, the Miami secretary who says she will be married to comedian Jackie Gleason, reacted cooly to the announcement. Mrs. Edward Hunteman of Easton, Md., said: "Well, there's nothing we can do about it. I hope she'll be happy." Hunteman commented, "Oh, yeah. I like his show all right. Sometimes it's not as good as it could be."

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her first public appearance since the fatal auto accident involving her husband, the senator, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" with the Boston Pops Orchestra Tuesday night. . .

Joan Kennedy Narrates At Music Festival

LENOX, Mass. (UPI) —The largest crowd at the Tanglewood Music Festival this season saw Joan Kennedy, the wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, narrate Peter and the Wolf Tuesday night.

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra accompanied Mrs. Kennedy.

The pretty, blonde wife of the state's senior senator received prolonged and enthusiastic applause from the crowd of 8,000 when she walked on the stage.

The applause was even greater when she completed the reading of the familiar Prokofiev children's tale.

She walked off the stage, followed by Fiedler, and returned for a second bow.

Mrs. Kennedy performed in a professional manner. Her voice was cool and she was calm.

She wore an off-white semi-mini dress of bawneen wool, silver slippers and two lavender azaleas, one behind each ear.

This is Mrs. Kennedy's second reading of the narrative musical fable. Last May, she joined with Fiedler at Symphony Hall in Boston to narrate the tale as a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

NEWS
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
(E) 5,742

AUG 8 1969

The Knickerbocker News Photo by Clem Kinnicutt

TELLING A TALE—Joan Kennedy, wife of Massachusetts senator Edward M. Kennedy, relates the fairy tale "Peter and the Wolf" while Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Tanglewood Pays Tribute To a Genuine Trouper

By JAY AMBROSE

LENOX, Mass. — She's known to get splitting headaches when she has to appear before an audience. And she's four months pregnant. But Joan Kennedy is also the wife of a politician — and the show must go on.

The show went on at the Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood here last night. It was Mrs. Kennedy's first public appearance since her husband Senator Edward M. Kennedy was involved in a tragic accident a little over two weeks ago.

And when she came on the stage during part of the program to narrate "Peter and the Wolf," it was the quietest moment of the evening.

PEOPLE BEGAN arriving early at the scenic concert site. Cars were forced to park on the neatly trimmed lawns. Many of the people, dressed in everything from sandals and sweaters to business suits, brought picnic suppers.

There was a cool summer breeze, and no one seemed bothered by the slight threat of rain.

As showtime neared, the large crowd began wandering toward the concert shell. Many sprawled out on blankets on the grass. One small boy, who couldn't wait for the music to start, ran around playing a paper and comb.

THE CONCERT began — and the crowd seemed filled with the fun-loving enthusiasm of a crowd at a football game.

They tried to clap in rhythm to the music — unsuccessfully.

When the orchestra broke into a rendition of "Turkey in the Straw," they broke into loud, happy cheers.

And, while Arthur Fiedler conducted "Pomp and Circumstance" in his pugnaciously majestic style, one group of students from the Berkshire School of Music merrily swigged wine from a bottle.

Intermission came. The applause was thunderous.

THEN INTERMISSION was over, and Mrs. Kennedy walked out in her white minidress, a red flower in her long blond hair. The crowd was hushed.

Without being introduced — and in a voice which quivered only slightly — the 32-year-old mother of three children, who once studied music at Manhattenville, began her narration.

Before her performance at the charity concert, there had been some empty seats in the shell. Now there were none. Here and there in the audience, people stood up to get a better look. Standing behind a music stand next to Mr. Fiedler, she was out of sight of some.

She was telling the child's story of how the wolf captured the duck, a pet of Peter's. "And then with one gulp he swallowed her," she said, clearly enunciating her words.

AND SHE TOLD of how Peter cleverly captured the wolf, slipping a rope over him from a tree. "But the grandfather grumbled, 'What if Peter had not caught the wolf, what then?' "

The story, of course, has a happy ending. It turns out that the wolf "swallowed the duck alive without harming a feather."

There was restrained applause when she was finished. Mrs. Kennedy, continuously wearing a bright smile, walked off stage with Mr. Fieldler as is customary, and walked back on, shaking hands with the concert master.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

AUG 6 1969

AT TANGLEWOOD: Tuesday night, the star attraction at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Lenox, Mass., was Joan Kennedy. She did "Peter And The Wolf" . . . her second reading of the work with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops. The night was humid and the crowd was thin but Joan arrived smiling and ready a few minutes before performance time, with "Boston friend" Mrs. Paul Beatty. A white silk and wool mini showed off her tan and her silver accessories.

Backstage after the performance, Joan told everyone about the lavender flowers pinned in her hair — they are "gladioli given to me by my hostess," said Joan, who stayed at Seranak, estate of Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the conductor. But Joan left for Washington Wednesday to "be with Ted."

"She did a wonderful job," said white-haired maestro Fiedler. "I was asked in San Francisco if she'd read with me there." "Maybe another time," whispered Joan.

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 63,813

AUG 7 1969

Mrs. Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy who narrated "'Peter and the Wolf" at Tanglewood last night is greeted by Arthur Fiedler, conductor of Boston Pops Orchestra. Her appearance drew largest crowd of summer. (Other photo and story on page 5.) (AP Photo)

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 6 1969

Music Review

Joan Kennedy and the Pops

By JAY ROSENFELD

THE ANNUAL pension fund concert for the Boston Symphony Orchestra was played at Tanglewood last night by the Boston Pops orchestra with Arthur Fiedler conductor. The "Pops" orchestra is the Boston Symphony without one or two of its principal section leaders, but with Fiedler.

We don't know what the contrary of a "pops" concert is, but all one needs to know is that infallibly it delights its audience. This was witnessed last night when over 8,000 well-behaved but happy extroverts ignited repeatedly whenever a spark from the stage was kindled.

* * *

THE PROGRAM was entirely of familiar and beloved favorites. The evening was divided into three parts, and into each part was inserted an especially flammable number: First, "Dancing Through the Years," in which a dozen of the old one-time rages (Tango, Rumba and such) were ingeniously linked in sequence to the uninhibited elation of everyone.

In the other segments of the program the audience was invited to use the sheets handed out by the ushers and participate in the "Old Timers' night at the Pops" and, to end the evening, "America Sings." The first potpourri had a wonderful recollection of about eight ballads which included "Sweet Rosie O'Grady," "Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay," "Sidewalks of New York" and "A Hot Time in the Old Town tonight." The second included an equal number. Some of the favorites were "I've Been Working on the Railroad," "Down by the Old Mill Stream," "Jingle Bells" and "God Bless America," for which, incidentally, everyone gleefully but automatically stood.

* * *

MR. FIEDLER needs very little help in choosing music that he knows will please his audience nor is he surpassed in presenting it in either a rousing spirit or with properly sentimental appeal. The part of the program most expectantly anticipated, however, had all the wit and buoyancy of a wet dish-rag. For the entire evening except for the Prokofieff "Peter and the Wolf," Fiedler had the scores in his head. For the old-time fairy tale he had his head in the score and there was a constant presentiment the vehicle would run out of gas or be derailed.

The handsome guest narrator, Joan Kennedy, made an alluring appearance although from where we sat we noticed mainly a glamorous blonde hair arrangement with two colorful flowers like small parking lights. But she was evidently not inspired by Fiedler's plodding pace nor capable alone of raising the ordinarily gay yarn off the ground. She was consequently but unfortunately accorded only a succés d'estime.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 6 1969

Whitestone

SING ALONG at Boston Pops at Tanglewood last night had, among some 8,000 others, Mrs. Joan Kennedy, right, joining in. Flowers in Mrs. Kennedy's hair are gladioli blossoms from the gardens of Madame Serge Koussevitzky, whose house guest Mrs. Kennedy was at Seranac. At left is Mrs. Kathy Beatey of Cohasset.

The Knickerbocker News Photo by Clem Kinnicutt

TELLING A TALE—Joan Kennedy, wife of Massachusetts senator Edward M. Kennedy, relates the fairy tale "Peter and the Wolf" while Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Mrs. Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy who narrated "Peter and the Wolf" at Tanglewood last night is greeted by Arthur Fiedler, conductor of Boston Pops Orchestra. Her appearance drew largest crowd of summer. (Other photo and story on page 5.) (AP Photo).

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 6 1969

Weather Unfavorable

'Pops', Joan Kennedy Draw Mere 8,058 to Tanglewood

By FRANK V. McCARTHY

TANGLEWOOD — Although the annual "Boston Pops" concert here last night offered a performance by a national celebrity, Joan (Mrs. Ted) Kennedy, as a drawing card, the turnout at the soggy Tanglewood grounds was a mere 8,058.

The largely middle-aged audience gave more enthusiastic applause to such numbers as "Dancing Through the Years" than to Mrs. Kennedy's narration, with Arthur Fieldler conducting, of "Peter and the Wolf." The cool response to the latter number, however, might have been due more to a poor performance by the aging Fiedler (see today's music review on Page 19), or to a technical goof that cut off the sound as Mrs. Kennedy met her final cue.

Attendance at the 1965 Pops concert, when Duke Ellington was featured, was 14,428; in 1967 when an all-Gershwin program was featured, 14,000; and last year, when the soloist was Peter Nero, a piano player, about 10,000. So the attendance has been decreasing over the years, which bodes ill for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pension fund. Proceeds from the Pops concerts go to that fund.

Figures Unavailable

Gross receipts from last night's concert were unavailable this morning from the Tanglewood press office or the box office, although such figures have been made available in other years.

There are probably two reasons for the lower attendance at last night's concert. The first was the weather. It rained again last night.

The second is that the Tanglewood Trends concerts, held every Tuesday and featuring contemporary music, have been drawing a lot of the children from area camps. They were present last night in much smaller numbers than for Pops concerts in former years.

There were many empty seats in the Shed last night. The Shed is already sold out, on the other hand, for next Tuesday's performance of "The Jefferson Airplane," which is apparently the sort of thing this year's campers are spending their money on.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 6 1969

Joan Kennedy Narrates At Music Festival

LENOX, Mass. (UPI) —The largest crowd at the Tanglewood Music Festival this season saw Joan Kennedy, the wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, narrate Peter and the Wolf Tuesday night.

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra accompanied Mrs. Kennedy.

The pretty, blonde wife of the state's senior senator received prolonged and enthusiastic applause from the crowd of 8,000 when she walked on the stage.

The applause was even greater when she completed the reading of the familiar Prokofiev children's tale.

She walked off the stage, followed by Fiedler, and returned for a second bow.

Mrs. Kennedy performed in a professional manner. Her voice was cool and she was calm.

She wore an off-white semi-mini dress of bawneen wool, silver slippers and two lavendar azaleas, one behind each ear.

This is Mrs. Kennedy's second reading of the narrative musical fable. Last May, she joined with Fiedler at Symphony Hall in Boston to narrate the tale as a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

NEWS
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
(E) 5,742

AUG 8 7 1969

Tanglewood Pays Tribute To a Genuine Trouper

By JAY AMBROSE

LENOX, Mass. — She's known to get splitting headaches when she has to appear before an audience. And she's four months pregnant. But Joan Kennedy is also the wife of a politician — and the show must go on.

The show went on at the Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood here last night. It was Mrs. Kennedy's first public appearance since her husband Senator Edward M. Kennedy was involved in a tragic accident a little over two weeks ago.

And when she came on the stage during part of the program to narrate "Peter and the Wolf," it was the quietest moment of the evening.

PEOPLE BEGAN arriving early at the scenic concert site. Cars were forced to park on the neatly trimmed lawns. Many of the people, dressed in everything from sandals and sweaters to business suits, brought picnic suppers.

There was a cool summer breeze, and no one seemed bothered by the slight threat of rain.

As showtime neared, the large crowd began wandering toward the concert shell. Many sprawled out on blankets on the grass. One small boy, who couldn't wait for the music to start, ran around playing a paper and comb.

THE CONCERT began — and the crowd seemed filled with the fun-loving enthusiasm of a crowd at a football game.

They tried to clap in rhythm to the music — unsuccessfully.

When the orchestra broke into a rendition of "Turkey in the Straw," they broke into loud, happy cheers.

And, while Arthur Fiedler conducted "Pomp and Circumstance" in his pugnaciously majestic style, one group of students from the Berkshire School of Music merrily swigged wine from a bottle.

Intermission came. The applause was thunderous.

THEN INTERMISSION was over, and Mrs. Kennedy walked out in her white minidress, a red flower in her long blond hair. The crowd was hushed.

Without being introduced — and in a voice which quivered only slightly — the 32-year-old mother of three children, who once studied music at Manhattenville, began her narration.

Before her performance at the charity concert, there had been some empty seats in the shell. Now there were none. Here and there in the audience, people stood up to get a better look. Standing behind a music stand next to Mr. Fiedler, she was out of sight of some.

She was telling the child's story of how the wolf captured the duck, a pet of Peter's. "And then with one gulp he swallowed her," she said, clearly enunciating her words.

AND SHE TOLD of how Peter cleverly captured the wolf, slipping a rope over him from a tree. "But the grandfather grumbled, 'What if Peter had not caught the wolf, what then?' "

The story, of course, has a happy ending. It turns out that the wolf "swallowed the duck alive without harming a feather."

There was restrained applause when she was finished. Mrs. Kennedy, continuously wearing a bright smile, walked off stage with Mr. Fieldler as is customary, and walked back on, shaking hands with the concert master.

The Plain Dealer
Cleveland, O.
A.M.-circ. 403,498

AUG-7-69

The mother of Beverly McKittrick, the Miami secretary who says she will be married to comedian Jackie Gleason, reacted cooly to the announcement. Mrs. Edward Hunteman of Easton, Md., said: "Well, there's nothing we can do about it. I hope she'll be happy." Hunteman commented, "Oh, yeah. I like his show all right. Sometimes it's not as good as it could be."

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her first public appearance since the fatal auto accident involving her husband, the senator, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" with the Boston Pops Orchestra Tuesday night. . .

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,628

AUG 6 1969

WOMEN'S DIARY
NEW YORK
D. 63,

AUG 7 1969

AT TANGLEWOOD: Tuesday night, the star attraction at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Lenox, Mass., was Joan Kennedy. She did "Peter And The Wolf" . . . her second reading of the work with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops. The night was humid and the crowd was thin but Joan arrived smiling and ready a few minutes before performance time, with "Boston friend" Mrs. Paul Beatty. A white silk and wool mini showed off her tan and her silver accessories.

Backstage after the performance, Joan told everyone about the lavender flowers pinned in her hair — they are "gladioli given to me by my hostess," said Joan, who stayed at Seranak, estate of Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, widow of the conductor. But Joan left for Washington Wednesday to "be with Ted."

"She did a wonderful job," said white-haired maestro Fiedler. "I was asked in San Francisco if she'd read with me there." "Maybe another time," whispered Joan.

Music Review

Joan Kennedy and the Pops

By JAY ROSENFELD

THE ANNUAL pension fund concert for the Boston Symphony Orchestra was played at Tanglewood last night by the Boston Pops orchestra with Arthur Fiedler conductor. The "Pops" orchestra is the Boston Symphony without one or two of its principal section leaders, but with Fiedler.

We don't know what the contrary of a "pops" concert is, but all one needs to know is that infallibly it delights its audience. This was witnessed last night when over 8,000 well-behaved but happy extroverts ignited repeatedly whenever a spark from the stage was kindled.

* * *

THE PROGRAM was entirely of familiar and beloved favorites. The evening was divided into three parts, and into each part was inserted an especially flammable number: First, "Dancing Through the Years," in which a dozen of the old one-time rages (Tango, Rumba and such) were ingeniously linked in sequence to the uninhibited elation of everyone.

In the other segments of the program the audience was invited to use the sheets handed out by the ushers and participate in the "Old Timers' night at the Pops" and, to end the evening, "America Sings." The first potpourri had a wonderful recollection of about eight ballads which included "Sweet Rosie O'Grady," "Ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay," "Sidewalks of New York" and "A Hot Time in the Old Town tonight." The second included an equal number. Some of the favorites were "I've Been Working on the Railroad," "Down by the Old Mill Stream," "Jingle Bells" and "God Bless America," for which, incidentally, everyone gleefully but automatically stood.

* * *

MR. FIEDLER needs very little help in choosing music that he knows will please his audience nor is he surpassed in presenting it in either a rousing spirit or with properly sentimental appeal. The part of the program most expectantly anticipated, however, had all the wit and buoyancy of a wet dish-rag. For the entire evening except for the Prokofieff "Peter and the Wolf," Fiedler had the scores in his head. For the old-time fairy tale he had his head in the score and there was a constant presentiment the vehicle would run out of gas or be derailed.

The handsome guest narrator, Joan Kennedy, made an alluring appearance although from where we sat we noticed mainly a glamorous blonde hair arrangement with two colorful flowers like small parking lights. But she was evidently not inspired by Fiedler's plodding pace nor capable alone of raising the ordinarily gay yarn off the ground. She was consequently but unfortunately accorded only a succés d'estime.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 6 1969

90.

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 461,357 SAT. 453,757
AUG 6 1969

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
AUG 6 1969

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 217,494 SAT. 169,405
AUG 6 1969

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 318,026 SUN. 362,408
AUG 6 1969

—UPI Photo

RECITAL—Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, recites fairy tale "Peter and the Wolf" at the Berkshire musical festival at Tanglewood, Mass. Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops orchestra.

Joan Kennedy Performs

By MARY ELLEN MYRENE
Associated Press Writer

LENOX, Mass. — Mrs. Edward Kennedy, ending her three weeks seclusion, appeared with the Boston Pops Orchestra in a benefit concert last night.

And while her reception was friendly, the drama for both audience and performer appeared strictly theatrical.

Mrs. Kennedy, appearing on stage with conductor Arthur Fiedler, a long-time friend, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before a crowd of more than 8,000 concert-goers at the orchestra's summer headquarters in Tanglewood.

Wearing a simple white dress and looking refreshed and smiling, Mrs. Kennedy ended the 25-minute performance amid warm applause that prompted a second bow. A scattering of people stood in tribute.

It was a cautious re-entry into the public limelight for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy, who is expecting her fourth child in February.

Arriving here by car Monday night, she remained in the home of friends most of yesterday, arriving at the Tanglewood compound after the evening's performance had begun. Her recitation was the second of three segments in a program to benefit the orchestra's pension fund.

Aides said she was going to return to Washington this morning.

Chicago
today
American
Always on Top of the News
D. 436,893 SUN. 483,418
AUG 6 1969

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900
AUG 7 1969

Encore, Maestro h Encore

Joan Kenn Wolf" at T ovation, pl

Conductor Arthur Fiedler, of the Boston Pops Orchestra, kiss M. Kennedy, wife of the Massachusetts senator, after she n the Wolf" at Tanglewood Tuesday night in Lenox, Mass. (A

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
AUG 6 1969

SUN
WESTERLY, R. I.
(E) 9,900 (S) 9,950
AUG 7 1969

AP Wirephot

PAGE ONE

senator, receives a tor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, of the Boston Pops
after her reading of "Peter and the in recital at Lenox,

A KISS FOR JOAN 24-7 Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops orchestra, kisses Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy's hand after she had narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. (AP Wirephoto)

Concert Review

Boston Pops Orchestra Presents Prokofiev's "Peter And The Wolf'

MARTHA deB. BEAVER

They weren't the vibrant and vivid tones of Basil Rathbone we've always associated with Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf." But they were effective in their quite natural projection.

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy's New Hampshire-Boston twang evoked a picture of any devoted mother reading to her children an oft-repeated and familiar story. The lovely blonde narrated this classic fairy tale for the second time with the Boston Pops Orchestra, skillfully guided by the endearing Arthur Fiedler, at Tanglewood Tuesday evening. It was her fourth performance in this role. And as Mr. Fiedler later remarked, "It gets more settled each time." During an intermission following the reading, he also noted sympathetically that Mrs. Kennedy was a "very brave woman," with which this reviewer and her companion concurred.

Dress in a short, cap-sleeved white gown, Mrs. Kennedy spoke the evocative words in a moderate tone, with great simplicity, and few inflections until the actual capture of the wolf and the reassuring "in his haste he (the wolf) swallowed the duck alive without harming a feather!" These held all the soft, breathless wonder reflected in a child's starry eyes.

Reaction from the audience of 8058 was elated and prolonged, with Mrs. Kennedy and Mr. Fiedler graciously accepting the vociferous applause and including the orchestra each time.

After an intermission, Mrs. Kennedy and friends joined the enthusiastic crowd for the final third of the written program. This included Lehar's "Merry Widow" waltzes, Raskin's "Those were the days," and a second sing-along, "America Sings."

Song sheets had been provided for those who didn't know the words to "A hot time in the old town tonight — I've been working on the railroad — Down by the old mill stream — and God Bless America," which drew everyone to their feet.

As usual at most of the Boston Pops concerts, the listeners, relaxed and joyful, become participators in more than just the "sing-alongs." It was no different this time; clapping, stamping, singing, in rhythm, and off-beat too, with the familiar selections. Caught up in the mood, a rag-tag group with hands at salute, marched up an aisle and across the stage front to the concluding and stirring sounds of the "Stars and Stripes" encore; at whom Mr. Fiedler turned in a kind of admonitory, though smiling welcome, bringing down his baton with the final chord almost on top of their heads.

Considered by many to be the star of the evening, Joan Kennedy would probably agree that she was really just one among the sparkling firmament Mr. Fiedler manages to evoke with a paternal and knowing concern for his listeners' happy involvement. It was a fun evening, and musically valid.

During a brief visit with the cordial Mrs. Kennedy, a college music major when she met Ted, we were, for some reason, pleased to learn that she was now "keeping up her piano," a skill that had been set aside when we last chatted, five years ago.

The Knickerbocker News Photo by Clem Kinnicutt

Mrs. Edward M. (Ted) Kennedy

On stage last night at Tanglewood

Tanglewood Pays Tribute

PAGE ONE

A Genuine Trouper, That Joan Kennedy

By JAY AMBROSE

LENOX, Mass. — She's known to get splitting headaches when she has to appear before an audience. And she's four months pregnant. But Joan Kennedy is also the wife of a politician — and the show must go on.

The show went on at the Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood here last night. It was Mrs. Kennedy's first public appearance since her husband Senator Edward M. Kennedy was involved in a tragic accident a little over two weeks ago.

And when she came on the stage during part of the program to narrate "Peter and the Wolf," it was the quietest moment of the evening.

PEOPLE BEGAN arriving early at the scenic concert site. Cars were forced to park on the neatly trimmed lawns. Many of the people, dressed in everything from sandals and sweaters to business suits, brought picnic suppers.

There was a cool summer breeze, and no one seemed bothered by the slight threat of rain.

As showtime neared, the large crowd began wandering toward the concert shell. Many sprawled out on blankets on the grass. One small boy, who couldn't wait for the music to start, ran around playing a paper and comb.

A Profile on Joan Kennedy
ON PAGE 1-C

THE CONCERT began — and the crowd seemed filled with the fun-loving enthusiasm of a crowd at a football game.

They tried to clap in rhythm to the music — unsuccessfully.

When the orchestra broke into a rendition of "Turkey in the Straw," they broke into loud, happy cheers.

And, while Arthur Fiedler conducted "Pomp and Circumstance" in his pugnaciously majestic style, one group of students from the Berkshire School of Music merrily swigged wine from a bottle.

Intermission came. The applause was thunderous.

THEN INTERMISSION was over, and Mrs. Kennedy walked out in her white minidress, a red flower in her long blond hair. The crowd was hushed.

Without being introduced — and in a voice which quivered only slightly — the 32-year-old mother of three children, who

Continued on Page 10-A

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144
AUG 6 1969

The Knickerbocker News Photo by Clem Kinnicutt

TELLING A TALE—Joan Kennedy, wife of Massachusetts senator Edward M. Kennedy, relates the fairy tale "Peter and the Wolf" while Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Trouper Joan Kennedy--

From Page 1

once studied music at Manhattenville, began her narration.

Before her performance at the charity concert, there had been some empty seats in the shell. Now there were none. Here and there in the audience, people stood up to get a better look. Standing behind a music stand next to Mr. Fiedler, she was out of sight of some.

She was telling the child's story of how the wolf captured the duck, a pet of Peter's. "And then with one gulp he swallowed her," she said, clearly enunciating her words.

AND SHE TOLD of how Peter cleverly captured the wolf, slipping a rope over him from a tree. "But the grandfather grumbled, 'What if Peter had not caught the wolf, what then?' "

The story, of course, has a happy ending. It turns out that the wolf "swallowed the duck alive without harming a feather."

There was restrained applause when she was finished. Mrs. Kennedy, continuously wearing a bright smile, walked off stage with Mr. Fiedler as is customary, and walked back on, shaking hands with the concert master.

SHE HAS narrated the story at numerous concerts before, always for the benefit of charity.

Another intermission followed. People roamed the aisles and talked.

"She was very courageous tonight," said one woman. "It took a lot of courage."

Others weren't so kind. One woman said her only comments were "unfavorable." One man voiced suspicions about the Kennedy accident.

Then the concert, billed as "Old Timers' Night," got back underway. There was group singing, and the first song, sung heartily, was "ta-ra-ra-boom-de-ay."

JOAN KENNEDY and Arthu concert at Tanglewood. (AP)

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 6 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
AUG 6 1969
N
Eng

SENTINEL
WATERVILLE, MAINE
(M) 21,324
AUG 6 1969
En

MRS. EDWARD M. KENNEDY AT TANGLEWOOD

. . . with Arthur Fiedler before performance. (AP)

Joan Kennedy performs at concert

Associated Press

LENOX, Mass. — Mrs. Edward Kennedy, ending three weeks seclusion, appeared with the Boston Pops Orchestra in a benefit concert last night.

Andw hile her reception was friendly, the drama for both audience and performer appeared strictly theatrical.

Mrs Kennedy, appearing on stage with conductor Arthur Fiedler, a long-time friend, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before a crowd of more than 8000 concertgoers at the orchestra's Summer headquarters in Tanglewood.

Wearing a simple white dress and looking refreshed and smiling, Mrs. Kennedy ended the 25-minute performance amid warm applause that prompted a second bow. A scattering of people stood in tribute.

But it remained, more than anything, a cautious re-entry into the public likelight for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy, who is expecting her fourth child in February.

Arriving here by car Monday night, she remained in the home of friends yesterday, arriving at the Tanglewood compound after the evening's performance had begun.

Her recitation was the second of three segments in a program to benefit the orchestra's pension fund.

Aides xsaid she was going to return to Washington this morning.

TIMES
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
(E) 38,693
AUG 6 1969
New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 298,349
AUG 6 1969

Joan Kennedy Narrates At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, in her second performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" Tuesday night before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at the orchestra's summer quarters at Tanglewood.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance looking relaxed and pretty in a short, simply tailored white dress.

"I love it here," she said after the concert. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone did."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her senator-husband July 18.

Narrating 'Peter and the Wolf,' accompanied by the Boston Pops Orchestra at the Tanglewood Music Festival at Lenox last night was Mrs. Joan Kennedy. She is shown going over the script with Arthur Fiedler, director, yesterday afternoon.

—Associated Press Wirephoto

Practice Session For Joan

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy and Boston Pops Orchestra conductor Arthur Fiedler go over script Tuesday for production in the evening of Tchaikowski's "Peter and the Wolf" at Tanglewood Theater in Lenox, Mass. It was her first stage appearance since the case involving her senator husband developed. (AP Wirephoto)

AP Wirephoto

STUDYING CONCERT SCRIPT — Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy and Arthur Fiedler go over a script at Lenox, Mass., in preparation for the Boston Pops Orchestra presentation of Tchaikowsky's "Peter and the Wolf" before the performance at Tanglewood Tuesday night.

92

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
(E) 41,946
AUG 6 1969

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500
AUG 6 1969

PREPARING FOR PERFORMANCE: Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy and Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler preparing for Tanglewood concert. She narrated Peter and the Wolf. AP Wirephoto

Performs with Boston Pops

LENOX, (AP)—Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today in time to observe Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance here Tuesday night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said. Mrs. Kennedy in her second performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at the orchestra's summer quarters at Tanglewood.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance looking relaxed and pretty in a short, simply tailored white dress. 047

"I love it here," she said after the concert. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone did."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her senator husband July 18.

Arriving here by car Monday night, Mrs. Kennedy stayed at the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the founder of the Tanglewood festival and conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949.

Mrs. Kennedy, a college music major when she met her husband, appeared in the same production with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

TRIUMPHANT PERFORMANCE — Arthur Fiedler, conductor of Boston Pops Orchestra, bends to kiss Mrs. Kennedy's hand after her performance last night at Tanglewood where she narrated "Peter and the Wolf." (AP photo)

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy at Tanglewood, rehearsing 'Peter and the Wolf' with the Boston Pops Orchestra. Associated Press Wirephoto

Joan Kennedy at Tanglewood:

'Everybody Came and Had a Good Time'

(Photo on Page One)

"Everybody came and had a good time, and I had a better time than anyone did," said 33-year-old Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy after her performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra last night at Tanglewood.

Mrs. Kennedy, in her first public appearance since her husband's July 18 accident which took the life of a young secretary, narrated Prokofiev's symphonic tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf" before 8,058 people, the largest crowd thus far in this rainy summer at Tanglewood.

Tumultous applause greeted her as she walked onto the stage in an off-white semimini dress. She then narrated the musical fable of Peter and the animals with various musical instruments portraying the sounds of the birds and the beasts.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance, looking relaxed and pretty.

Wearing silver slipper and two lavendar azaleas, one behind each ear, she stood at a lecturn to read the familiar tale.

Pleased Critics

Her performance also pleased the critics. The Boston Herald Traveler said that "Her voice was cool, she was calm and she performed in a highly professional manner. Her voice has the low-range quality that is typical of many actresses."

The Springfield Union said "there was a missed cue or two, and one instance when it appeared Mrs. Kennedy lost her place. But the voice was very attractive . . ."

Mrs. Kennedy made her third appearance last night as narrator of musical classics. Two years ago she made her debut in the role with the National Company in Washington. Last Mother's Day, May 12, she appeared with Fiedler and the Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston.

To Benefit Fund

Both of her appearances with the Pops, last night and in May, were benefits for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund.

A college music major, Mrs. Kennedy arrived at Lenox by car yesterday and stayed at the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the founder of the Tanglewood festival. He conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1924 to 1949.

She planned to be in Washington today to observe the Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance last night.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(E) 150,082
AUG 6 1969

FREE PRESS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800
AUG 9 1969
New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

About eight thousand persons attended a Boston Pops concert in which Joan Kennedy, wife of the Massachusetts Senator, narrated "Peter and the Wolf," the Russian Fairy Tale. Also in the same performance were two sing-along arrangements to honor "Old Timers Night." It was not until Mrs. Kennedy came on that a respectful silence came over the audience.

On Tuesday, Aug. 12, the Tanglewood Contemporary Trends Program will feature "The Fillmore at Tanglewood" starring The Jefferson Airplane, The Who, B. B. King, and the Joshua Light Show.

Joan Kennedy Featured at Tanglewood

By JAKE SHERMAN

The Boston Pops Orchestra gave its traditional Old Timers' Concert at Tanglewood Tuesday night with a program that featured Joan Kennedy narrating "Peter and the Wolf."

Mrs. Kennedy, who was making her first public apearance since her husband, Massachusetts Senator Edward M. Kennedy, was involved in a fatal and controversial accident two weeks ago, was inevitably the focus of attention. But if the huge crowd had expected her to offer them some clue as to how she was reacting to the ordeal, she didn't.

Instead, she provided a very pleasant rendering of the Prokofieff children's classic. Looking radiant in a white minidress with two pink roses in her blonde hair, she read less like an actress on stage than a mother telling her children a bed-time story.

She was poised throughout, reacting immediately to the cues which came from the left hand of conductor Arthur Fiedler and adjusting her voice to suit the needs of the music.

The Boston Pops offered an impeccable performance of "Peter and the Wolf" which was the only work on the program which succeeded in keeping the bubbly and restive audience quiet from start to finish.

The remainder and the bulk of the program consisted of the traditional mixture of light classics and favorite old American songs to which the audience was invited to sing along.

The first part of the program included Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" and Mascagni's "Intermezzo" from "Cavalieria Rusticana," ran through smoothly and routinely. This portion concluded with a medley entitled "Dancing through the Years" that began with the cakewalk and ended with rock 'n roll. To represent the latter, the 80-coed musicians in the orchestra endured their way through several bars of "Tequila."

The audience was provided with songsheets bearing the lyrics of such tunes as "A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," "I've been Working on the Railroad," etc. Except for "Daisy," the audience which had chatted so animatedly through "Pomp and Circumstance" proved decidedly unenthusiastic singers.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
AUG 7 1969

Tanglewood Series Ends

By CHARLES F. HARRIS

Gazette Review

LENOX — Tanglewood was the scene of an exceptionally fine performance last night, concluding the official Tuesday "trend" concerts.

An excellent reading of "Peter and the Wolf" by Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy was largely overshadowed by an evening of most enjoyable music by the Boston Pops Orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler.

Fiedler and his Pops in the opening moments swung into a medley from "Dancing Through the Years" that included the Charleston, Polka, jitterbug-swing, as well as rock and roll.

A dignified but none the-less appreciative capacity audience begrudgingly yielded to intermission.

Mrs. Kennedy proved quite adept at narrating "Peter and the Wolf" to the accompaniment of the Pops, but unfortunately much of her performance was lost in the magnificence of the Pops.

Mrs. Kennedy, expecting a child next February, had arrived at the lush 200-acre Tanglewood compoundi Monday night. She attended closed rehearsals with the orchestra yesterday morning.

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
AUG 6 1969

Mrs. Kennedy remained in seclusion after her arrival in Lenox.

Aides said she was staying at the home of friends.

Third Appearance

Mrs. Kennedy, 33, has appeared in productions of Peter and the Wolf twice before — once with the Washington National Symphony in 1967, and then with the Boston Pops last April.

Selections from "Old Timers' Night at the Pops" brought a tear to many an eye as the audience verbally joined the Pops in a memory lane stroll that included "after the Ball", "The Bowery", "The Band Played On," and "The Sidewalks of New York."

For a while, save for the bright lights and the much larger, superior orchestra, many of those in attendance were almost transported back to the park band concerts held a generation ago.

The inclement weather failed to dampen the audience of 6,000's reaction to "America Sings"; a medley of all-time favarites from "Down by the Old Mill Stream" to "A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight" to "God Biess America."

Applause was so intense at the conclusion of "America Sings" that Fiedler returned to direct a 10-minute unscheduled encore of John Phillip Souza arrangements, which itself was followed by a 10-minute standing ovation.

Next Tuesday in a special concert Tanglewood will present the Jefferson Airplane, The Who, and B.B. King.

92

HERALD NEWS
FALL RIVER, MASS.
(E) 41,946

AUG 6 1969

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 6 1969

PREPARING FOR PERFORMANCE: Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy and Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler preparing for Tanglewood concert. She narrated Peter and the Wolf. AP Wirephoto

Performs with Boston Pops

LENOX, (AP)—Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy planned to be in Washington today in time to observe Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance here Tuesday night with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said. Mrs. Kennedy in her second performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra, narrated Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" before an overflow crowd of more than 8,000 persons at the orchestra's summer quarters at Tanglewood.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows ~~after the 25~~ minute performance looking relaxed and pretty in a short, simply tailored white dress. 044

"I love it here," she said after the concert. "Everybody came and had a good time. And I had a better time than anyone did."

It was the first public appearance for the 33-year-old Mrs. Kennedy since a fatal auto accident involving her senator husband July 18.

Arriving here by car Monday night, Mrs. Kennedy stayed at the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the founder of the Tanglewood festival and conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1924 to 1949.

Mrs. Kennedy, a college music major when she met her husband, appeared in the same production with the Boston Pops last April. The Tanglewood performance was a benefit for the orchestra's pension fund.

TRIUMPHANT PERFORMANCE — Arthur Fiedler, conductor of Boston Pops Orchestra, bends to kiss Mrs. Kennedy's hand after her performance last night at Tanglewood where she narrated "Peter and the Wolf." (AP photo)

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy at Tanglewood, rehearsing 'Peter and the Wolf' with the Boston Pops Orchestra. Associated Press Wirephoto

Joan Kennedy at Tanglewood:

'Everybody Came and Had a Good Time'

(Photo on Page One)

"Everybody came and had a good time, and I had a better time than anyone did," said 33-year-old Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy after her performance with the Boston Pops Orchestra last night at Tanglewood.

Mrs. Kennedy, in her first public appearance since her husband's July 18 accident which took the life of a young secretary, narrated Prokofiev's symphonic tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf" before 8,058 people, the largest crowd thus far in this rainy summer at Tanglewood.

Tumultous applause greeted her as she walked onto the stage in an off-white semimini dress. She then narrated the musical fable of Peter and the animals with various musical instruments portraying the sounds of the birds and the beasts.

Clasping hands with conductor Arthur Fiedler, she took two bows after the 25-minute performance, looking relaxed and pretty.

Wearing silver slipper and two lavendar azaleas, one behind each ear, she stood at a lecturn to read the familiar tale.

Pleased Critics

Her performance also pleased the critics. The Boston Herald Traveler said that "Her voice was cool, she was calm and she performed in a highly professional manner. Her voice has the low-range quality that is typical of many actresses."

The Springfield Union said "there was a missed cue or two, and one instance when it appeared Mrs. Kennedy lost her place. But the voice was very attractive . . ."

Mrs. Kennedy made her third appearance last night as narrator of musical classics. Two years ago she made her debut in the role with the National Company in Washington. Last Mother's Day, May 12, she appeared with Fiedler and the Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston.

To Benefit Fund

Both of her appearances with the Pops, last night and in May, were benefits for the Boston Symphony Orchestra Pension Fund.

A college music major, Mrs. Kennedy arrived at Lenox by car yesterday and stayed at the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the founder of the Tanglewood festival. He conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1924 to 1949.

She planned to be in Washington today to observe the Senate voting on the controversial anti-ballistic missile bill.

"I'll be up in the family gallery when the very historic vote takes place," Mrs. Kennedy said in a brief talk with reporters after her appearance last night.

"I'll be going back to Washington to be with Ted," she said.

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(E) 150,082

AUG 6 1969

FREE PRESS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800

AUG 9 1969

New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

About eight thousand persons attended a Boston Pops concert in which Joan Kennedy, wife of the Massachusetts Senator, narrated "Peter and the Wolf," the Russian Fairy Tale. Also in the same performance were two sing-along arrangements to honor "Old Timers Night." It was not until Mrs. Kennedy came on that a respectful silence came over the audience.

On Tuesday, Aug. 12, the Tanglewood Contemporary Trends Program will feature "The Fillmore at Tanglewood" starring The Jefferson Airplane, The Who, B. B. King, and the Joshua Light Show.

Joan Kennedy Featured at Tanglewood

By JAKE SHERMAN

The Boston Pops Orchestra gave its traditional Old Timers' Concert at Tanglewood Tuesday night with a program that featured Joan Kennedy narrating "Peter and the Wolf."

Mrs. Kennedy, who was making her first public appearance since her husband, Massachusetts Senator Edward M. Kennedy, was involved in a fatal and controversial accident two weeks ago, was inevitably the focus of attention. But if the huge crowd had expected her to offer them some clue as to how she was reacting to the ordeal, she didn't.

Instead, she provided a very pleasant rendering of the Prokofieff children's classic. Looking radiant in a white minidress with two pink roses in her blonde hair, she read less like an actress on stage than a mother telling her children a bed-time story.

She was poised throughout, reacting immediately to the cues which came from the left hand of conductor Arthur Fiedler and adjusting her voice to suit the needs of the music.

The Boston Pops offered an impeccable performance of "Peter and the Wolf" which was the only work on the program which succeeded in keeping the bubbly and restive audience quiet from start to finish.

The remainder and the bulk of the program consisted of the traditional mixture of light classics and favorite old American songs to which the audience was invited to sing along.

The first part of the program included Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" and Mascagni's "Intermezzo" from "Cavalieria Rusticana," ran through smoothly and routinely. This portion concluded with a medley entitled "Dancing through the Years" that began with the cakewalk and ended with rock 'n roll. To represent the latter, the 80-coed musicians in the orchestra endured their way through several bars of "Tequila."

The audience was provided with songsheets bearing the lyrics of such tunes as "A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," "I've been Working on the Railroad," etc. Except for "Daisy," the audience which had chatted so animatedly through "Pomp and Circumstance" proved decidedly unenthusiastic singers.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 7 1969

Tanglewood Series Ends

By CHARLES F. HARRIS

Gazette Review

LENOX — Tanglewood was the scene of an exceptionally fine performance last night, concluding the official Tuesday "trend" concerts.

An excellent reading of "Peter and the Wolf" by Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy was largely overshadowed by an evening of most enjoyable music by the Boston Pops Orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler.

Fiedler and his Pops in the opening moments swung into a medley from "Dancing Through the Years" that included the Charleston, Polka, jitterbug-swing, as well as rock and roll.

A dignified but none the-less appreciative capacity audience begrudgingly yielded to intermission.

Mrs. Kennedy proved quite adept at narrating "Peter and the Wolf" to the accompaniment of the Pops, but unfortunately much of her performance was lost in the magnificence of the Pops.

Mrs. Kennedy, expecting a child next February, had arrived at the lush 200-acre Tanglewood compoundi Monday night. She attended closed rehearsals with the orchestra yesterday morning.

Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 6 1969

Mrs. Kennedy remained in seclusion after her arrival in Lenox.

Aides said she was staying at the home of friends.

Third Appearance

Mrs. Kennedy, 33, has appeared in productions of Peter and the Wolf twice before — once with the Washington National Symphony in 1967, and then with the Boston Pops last April.

Selections from "Old Timers' Night at the Pops" brought a tear to many an eye as the audience verbaliy joined the Pops in a memory lane stroll that included "after the Ball", "The Bowery", "The Band Played On," and "The Sidewalks of New York."

For a while, save for the bright lights and the much larger, superior orchestra, many of those in attendance were almost transported back to the park band concerts held a generation ago.

The inclement weather failed to dampen the audience of 6,000's reaction to "America Sings"; a medley of all-time favarites from "Down by the Old Mill Stream" to "A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight" to "God Bless America."

Applause was so intense at the conclusion of "America Sings" that Fiedler returned to direct a 10-minute unscheduled encore of John Phillip Souza arrangements, which itself was followed by a 10-minute standing ovation.

Next Tuesday in a special concert Tanglewood will present the Jefferson Airplane, The Who, and B.B King.

CHICAGO
SUN-TIMES
D. 546,570 SUN. 712,125
AUG 6 1969

Narration by Joan Kennedy

In rehearsal Tuesday at Lenox, Mass., Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy narrates Peter and the Wolf as Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Orchestra. The orchestral fairy tale is one of the most popular of composer Serge Prokofiev's shorter works. The narrator explains how each character is represented by a different instrument. (AP)

TIMES REPORTER
BELLOWS FALLS, VERMONT
4,768
AUG 6 1969
New England Newsclip

JOAN KENNEDY NARRATES - Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, shown during rehearsal this morning, as she narrated "Peter and the Wolf" as Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Pops Orchestra at Lenox, Mass. (AP)

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,080,906 SUN. 3,221,849
AUG 6 1969

A Word From Joan Kennedy

Associated Press Wirephoto

Mrs. Ted Kennedy, wife of the Massachusetts senator, takes her cue from conductor Arthur Fiedler during rehearsal of the Boston Pops Orchestra at Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox, Mass. Mrs. Kennedy did narration at performance of "Peter and the Wolf."

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,089
AUG 6 1969

93

New role

Mrs. Edward Kennedy, wife of the senator, waits for a cue from Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, as she rehearses her role as narrator of "Peter and the Wolf" at the Tanglewood Festival in Lennox, Mass. Associated Press Photo

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, August 6, 1969

FOSTER'S
DEMOCRAT
DOVER, N. H.
(E) 15,450
AUG 6 1969

MRS. KENNEDY NARRATES—Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, wife of the senator, rehearses her narration for "Peter and the Wolf" at Tanglewood. Before her is Arthur Fiedler, conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra. The concert was Tuesday night. (AP Wirephoto)

MRS. EDWARD M. KENNEDY is shown during rehearsal this morning as she narrated Peter and the Wolf with Arthur Fielder conducting the Boston Pops Orchestra.

94

down their offices in 10 cities...When the new Civic center is completed in Springfield the Municipal auditorium will be turned into offices. The City Hall is badly in need of additional space...Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra will wind up the season at Tanglewood with performances Aug. 30 and 31...The most famous of all summer attractions in Western Massachusetts are the Tanglewood concerts....The Justice Department's special organized crime task force in Boston will go before a grand jury within the next three or four weeks to seek indictments on charges of loan sharking and narcotics violations...A statewide text to determine the accuracy of odometers, hubodometers, and taximeters will be instituted shortly by the State Division of Stanlards...The

FREE PRESS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800

AUG 16 1969 New England

Tanglewood Pops Concerts Tuneful and Peppy

Worcester Telegram Monday, Sept. 1, 1969 13

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The two Labor Day weekend concerts by the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra at Tanglwood were loud, tuneful, peppy and thoroughly relished by combined audiences of 14,554.

Box-office receipts for Saturday night and yesterday afternoon were about $45,000.

This makes possible a factual attendance and financial report for the 1969 Berkshire Music Festival to refute the rumor that persistently bad weather and increased ticket prices caused a decline.

Total attendance for the festival's 41 events was 251,491, or 29,198 more than in 1968.

Orchestra Gave Much

These 41 events brought in a total of nearly $800,000, which is nearly 17 per cent more than in any other year in Tanglewood history.

Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler was in fine fettle for both weekend concerts. No one makes such a practical, business-like appearance.

Weather was quite bearable Saturday night. But for yesterday's hot, humid afternoon, conductor, orchestra and piano soloist Anthony Paratore did their jobs in shirt sleeves.

Although Fiedler is an efficient rather than emotional type, his cues were prolific, prompt and necessary.

Many of the same players who gave their all for Erich Leinsdorf in Beethooen's Ninth Symphony a week ago were just as intent for Feidler with "In the Mood" and Waldteufel's wrinkled chestnut, "Skaters' Waltz."

Grandiose Solo

Even in Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto Saturday night, lack of subtlety was supplemented with brazen effort.

Unfortunately soloist Horacio Gutierrez hammered his way through the old war-horse like a fighter in the ring. This time it was a TKO in favor of Tchaikovsky.

The 21 year-old Cuban has more than enough technique to last him a lifetime. But some fingers got in the way of others and nearly ran off the keyboard in the finale.

Dashing starts and crash finishes were the format for most of the orchestral fare.

Music Reviews

Gershwin — in Jazz Style

Tchaikovsky's Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" did have a brief recess of light treatment. The Overture to Offenbach's "Orpheus in Hades" was quietly attacked and smartly vanquished.

A medley from "Fiddler on the Roof" was streamlined, polished to a sheen, and a melody smash.

Yesterday afternoon Paratore sat in the spotlight with the Gershwin Piano Concerto. He also had an ample supply of technique but expended it on Gershwin rather than himself.

It was a slick performance, tailored to the jazz idiom. Paratore's note-playing was accurate and accomplished without histrionics.

Wagner Brassy Ear-Getter

Fiedler and the men gave him a gingery, rhapsodic accompaniment, heavy in spots but inciting and incisive.

Yesterday's audience was also wowed from the start.

Wagner's Tannhauser March was brassy, ear-getting and pompous. The strings sounded well when they could be heard. Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra" went from a grand march to typical operatic buffoonery. It sounded every bit as well as played by the regular Boston Symphony under Milton Katims about ten days ago.

Fiedler followed his admirable custom of bowing briefly with his left side to the audience and making the orchestra stand for the lion's share of the credit.

The weekend's most startling contrast was Vaughn Williams' Fantasia on "Greensleeves." Fiedler, strings and woodwinds prodded the tune along sentimentally.

By comparison with the rest it was quite quiet.

PROGRAMS

Boston Pops Festival Orchestra
Arthur Fiedler, conductor
Saturday Night

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" — Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Orpheus in Hades" — Offenbach
The Skaters, Waltzes — Waldteufel
Rhapsody Espana — Chabrier
Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, Opus 23 — Tchaikovsky
Horacio Gutierrez, pianist
Selections from "Fiddler on the Roof" — Bock
Yellow Submarine — Lennon-McCartney
Consider Yourself, from "Oliver" — Bart

Sunday Afternoon

Entrance of the Guests, from "Tannhauser" — Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" — Rossini
Fantasia on "Greensleeves" — Vaughn Williams
Suite from "Gaite Parisienne" — Offenbach
Piano Concerto in F — Gershwin
Anthony Paratore, pianist
Selections from "Chitty Chitty Bang Bang" — Sherman
Eleanor Rigby — Lennon-McCartney
Up, Up and Away — Webb

14,554 Attend 'Pops' Concerts At Tanglewood

A total of 14,554 persons attended the two Boston Pops concerts held at Tanglewood over the weekend with Arthur Fielder conducting.

Attendance Saturday night was 7,518 and Sunday it was 7,036. Guest pianist Sunday, Anthony Paratore, a graduate of Boston University and the Juilliard School of Music, played Gershwin's Concerto in F. Saturday night, it was Horacio Gutierrez, 21, a native of Cuba and also a Juilliard School graduate, who played Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto. Both were well-received.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

SEP 1 1969 New England

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

SEP 2 1969

Labor Day Concert Set For Tanglewood

For the first time two special Labor Day Weekend Concerts will be given at Tanglewood-in-Lenox by the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra, with Arthur Fiedler conducting.

The first, on Saturday at 8 p.m., will offer Tchaikovsky's Eugene-Onegin Polonaise, Offenbach's Orpheus Overture, Walteufel's Skaters Waltz, Chabrier's Espana Rhapsody, and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, with Horacio Gutierrez, pianist.

Bock's Fiddler on the Roof, Lennon-McCartney's Eleanor Rigby and Bart's Consider Yourself will conclude the program.

Sunday afternoon's concert at 2:30 p.m. will feature another pianist, Anthony Paratore in Gershwin's Piano Concerto in F, and include Wagner's Tannhauser March, Rossini's La Gazza Ladra Overture; Vaughan Williams' Greensleeves, Offenbach's Gaite Parisienne, Sherman-Sherman's Chitty Chitty, Bang Bang; Lennon - McCartney's Yellow Submarine and Webb's Up, Up and Away.

Tickets are now on sale at Tanglewood's box office and paid admission to the lawn will be available two hours before each concert.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 26 1969

IN TANGLEWOOD CONCERT . . . One of Belmont's fine young talents, concert pianist Anthony Paratore, Jr. of 142 Chilton st. will appear at the Tanglewood

ANTHONY PARATORE

Music Festival this Sunday afternoon August 31 at 2:30 p.m. He will perform with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra. Anthony will return to B.U. in the fall to work for his doctorate. His brother, Joe, also a talented pianist is a senior at B.U.

HERALD
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,000

AUG 28 1969

Attendance at 236,937 for Nine Weeks

Pops Concert Ends Tanglewood Season

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

It was like an old-time band concert in the park. Or was it It is unlikely that any band in the park could play with the zest and elan which are the predominant characteristics of the Boston Pops.

For the first time in its history, Tanglewood extended its season to nine weeks, adding a weekend of pops at the end of the usual eight-week season of orchestra concerts. Over 8000 were present on a hot but generally ideal Sunday afternoon to hear Arthur Fiedler conduct the Boston Pops in a three-part program.

Picnics and family groups abounded as the music drifted far over the grounds. Opening with Wagner's Entrance of the Guests from "Tanhauser," the orchestra played a half hour of light classical selections ranging from Offenbach's "Gaite Parisienne" to Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on "Greensleeves."

BETWEEN intermissions, pianist Anthony Paradore joined the orchestra in playing the American classic, Gershwin's Piano Concerto in F. The sure light touch, declaring that music should be fun, marked the playing of Paratore as it did that of the musicians for whom the Pops are the lighter side of their Boston Symphony obligations.

Winding up, Fiedler went all-out pops. Pioneering the orchestration of rock and music of the Beatles with pieces like "I Want to Hold Your Hand" many years ago, Fiedler on Sunday presented another Beatle tune, Lenon and McCartney's "Eleanor Rigby" as well as selections from the Disney film, "Chitty Chitty Bang Bang." The official conclusion came with "Up, Up and Away" but was quickly followed by a roaring encore of "Those Were the Days" and more.

ARTHUR FIELDER

Sunday's concert was the second of two for the holiday weekend. Fiedler also conducted the pops on Saturday night with guest soloist pianist Horacio Gutierrez.

THE CONCERTS marked the end of all activity at the Berkshire Music Festival for the 1969 season in which total attendance at all performances and open rehearsals except this weekend was 236,937.

Attendance at the 24 weekend concerts and 8 open rehearsals totaled 175,468, down nearly 13,000 from a year ago. This can at least partially be attributed to rain. But overall attendance was up nearly 15,000 with concerts like the "Fillmore at Tanglewood," part of the Contemporary Trends series, playing to 21,500 in one night, a Tanglewood record.

ERICH LEINSDORF retired as conductor of the Boston Symphony and musical director of Tanglewood at the final Boston Symphony Orchestra concert a week ago with the celebrational Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. It was his 709th concert as music director of the Boston Symphony, according to figures released by the Boston Symphony on Monday.

During his seven-year tenure, Leinsdorf conducted 429 works by 96 composers, including 13 world premieres of major works. He also made 65 recordings with the orchestra for RCA Victor, including the complete "Lohengrin" by Wagner. (The orchestra, now under William Steinberg, has a new recording contract announced last month with Deutsche Grammaphon.)

Mozart led in numbers in Leinsdorf's Boston repertoire as he did in this past summer season. Opening with an all-Mozart weekend in July, the season embraced 12 Mozart compositions. Beethoven followed with eight; Tchaikowsky seven and Bach five. Twenty-five other composers were represented at least once.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

SEP 2 1969

94

down their offices in 10 cities...When the new Civic center is completed in Springfield the Municipal auditorium will be turned into offices. The City Hall is badly in need of additional space...Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra will wind up the season at Tanglewood with performances Aug. 30 and 31...The most famous of all summer attractions in Western Massachusetts are the Tanglewood concerts....The Justice Department's special organized crime task force in Boston will go before a grand jury within the next three or four weeks to seek indictments on charges of loan sharking and narcotics violations...A statewide text to determine the accuracy of odometers, hubodometers, and taximeters will be instituted shortly by the State Division of Stanlards...The

FREE PRESS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800

AUG 16 1969 New England

Tanglewood Pops Concerts Tuneful and Peppy

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The two Labor Day weekend concerts by the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra at Tanglwood were loud, tuneful, peppy and thoroughly relished by combined audiences of 14,554.

Box-office receipts for Saturday night and yesterday afternoon were about $45,000.

This makes possible a factual attendance and financial report for the 1969 Berkshire Music Festival to refute the rumor that persistently bad weather and increased ticket prices caused a decline.

Total attendance for the festival's 41 events was 251,491, or 29,198 more than in 1968.

Orchestra Gave Much

These 41 events brought in a total of nearly $800,000, which is nearly 17 per cent more than in any other year in Tanglewood history.

Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler was in fine fettle for both weekend concerts. No one makes such a practical, business-like appearance.

Weather was quite bearable Saturday night. But for yesterday's hot, humid afternoon, conductor, orchestra and piano soloist Anthony Paratore did their jobs in shirt sleeves.

Although Fiedler is an efficient rather than emotional type, his cues were prolific, prompt and necessary.

Many of the same players who gave their all for Erich Leinsdorf in Beethooen's Ninth Symphony a week ago were just as intent for Feidler with "In the Mood" and Waldteufel's wrinkled chestnut, "Skaters' Waltz."

Grandiose Solo

Even in Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto Saturday night, lack of subtlety was supplemented with brazen effort.

Unfortunately soloist Horacio Gutierrez hammered his way through the old war-horse like a fighter in the ring. This time it was a TKO in favor of Tchaikovsky.

The 21 year-old Cuban has more than enough technique to last him a lifetime. But some fingers got in the way of others and nearly ran off the keyboard in the finale.

Music Reviews

Dashing starts and crash finishes were the format for most of the orchestral fare.

Gershwin — in Jazz Style

Tchaikovsky's Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" did have a brief recess of light treatment. The Overture to Offenbach's "Orpheus in Hades" was quietly attacked and smartly vanquished.

A medley from "Fiddler on the Roof" was streamlined, polished to a sheen, and a melody smash.

Yesterday afternoon Paratore sat in the spotlight with the Gershwin Piano Concerto. He also had an ample supply of technique but expended it on Gershwin rather than himself.

It was a slick performance, tailored to the jazz idiom. Paratore's note-playing was accurate and accomplished without histrionics.

Wagner Brassy Ear-Getter

Fiedler and the men gave him a gingery, rhapsodic accompaniment, heavy in spots but inciting and incisive.

Yesterday's audience was also wowed from the start.

Wagner's Tannhauser March was brassy, ear-getting and pompous. The strings sounded well when they could be heard. Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra" went from a grand march to typical operatic buffoonery. It sounded every bit as well as played by the regular Boston Symphony under Milton Katims about ten days ago.

Fiedler followed his admirable custom of bowing briefly with his left side to the audience and making the orchestra stand for the lion's share of the credit.

The weekend's most startling contrast was Vaughn Williams'

Worcester Telegram Monday, Sept. 1, 1969 13

Fantasia on "Greensleeves." Fiedler, strings and woodwinds prodded the tune along sentimentally.

By comparison with the rest it was quite quiet.

PROGRAMS

Boston Pops Festival Orchestra
Arthur Fiedler, conductor
Saturday Night

Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin" — Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Orpheus in Hades" — Offenbach
The Skaters, Waltzes — Waldteufel
Rhapsody Espana — Chabrier
Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, Opus 23 — Tchaikovsky
Horacio Gutierrez, pianist
Selections from "Fiddler on the Roof" — Bock
Yellow Submarine — Lennon-McCartney
Consider Yourself, from "Oliver" — Bart

Sunday Afternoon

Entrance of the Guests, from "Tannhauser" — Wagner
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" — Rossini
Fantasie on "Greensleeves" — Vaughn Williams
Suite from "Gaite Parisienne" — Offenbach
Piano Concerto in F — Gershwin
Anthony Paratore, pianist
Selections from "Chitty Chitty Bang Bang" — Sherman
Eleanor Rigby — Lennon-McCartney
Up, Up and Away — Webb

14,554 Attend 'Pops' Concerts At Tanglewood

A total of 14,554 persons attended the two Boston Pops concerts held at Tanglewood over the weekend with Arthur Fielder conducting.

Attendance Saturday night was 7,518 and Sunday it was 7,036. Guest pianist Sunday, Anthony Paratore, a graduate of Boston University and the Juilliard School of Music, played Gershwin's Concerto in F. Saturday night, it was Horacio Gutierrez, 21, a native of Cuba and also a Juilliard School graduate, who played Tchaikovsky's first piano concerto. Both were well-received.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

SEP 1 1969 New England

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

SEP 2 1969

Labor Day Concert Set For Tanglewood

For the first time two special Labor Day Weekend Concerts will be given at Tanglewood-in-Lenox by the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra, with Arthur Fiedler conducting.

The first, on Saturday at 8 p.m., will offer Tchaikovsky's Eugene-Onegin Polonaise, Offenbach's Orpheus Overture, Walteufel's Skaters Waltz, Chabrier's Espana Rhapsody, and Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1, with Horacio Gutierrez, pianist.

Bock's Fiddler on the Roof, Lennon-McCartney's Eleanor Rigby and Bart's Consider Yourself will conclude the program.

Sunday afternoon's concert at 2:30 p.m. will feature another pianist, Anthony Paratore in Gershwin's Piano Concerto in F, and include Wagner's Tannhauser March, Rossini's La Gazza Ladra Overture; Vaughan Williams' Greensleeves, Offenbach's Gaite Parisienne, Sherman-Sherman's Chitty Chitty, Bang Bang; Lennon - McCartney's Yellow Submarine and Webb's Up, Up and Away.

Tickets are now on sale at Tanglewood's box office and paid admission to the lawn will be available two hours before each concert.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 26 1969

IN TANGLEWOOD CONCERT

... One of Belmont's fine young talents, concert pianist Anthony Paratore, Jr. of 142 Chilton st. will appear at the Tanglewood

ANTHONY PARATORE

Music Festival this Sunday afternoon August 31 at 2:30 p.m. He will perform with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra. Anthony will return to B.U. in the fall to work for his doctorate. His brother, Joe, also a talented pianist is a senior at B.U.

HERALD
BELMONT, MASS
WEEKLY 7,000

AUG 28 1969

Attendance at 236,937 for Nine Weeks

Pops Concert Ends Tanglewood Season

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

It was like an old-time band concert in the park. Or was it It is unlikely that any band in the park could play with the zest and elan which are the predominant characteristics of the Boston Pops.

For the first time in its history, Tanglewood extended its season to nine weeks, adding a weekend of pops at the end of the usual eight-week season of orchestra concerts. Over 8000 were present on a hot but generally ideal Sunday afternoon to hear Arthur Fiedler conduct the Boston Pops in a three-part program.

Picnics and family groups abounded as the music drifted far over the grounds. Opening with Wagner's Entrance of the Guests from "Tanhauser," the orchestra played a half hour of light classical selections ranging from Offenbach's "Gaite Parisienne" to Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on "Greensleeves."

BETWEEN intermissions, pianist Anthony Paradore joined the orchestra in playing the American classic. Gershwin's Piano Concerto in F. The sure light touch, declaring that music should be fun, marked the playing of Paratore as it did that of the musicians for whom the Pops are the lighter side of their Boston Symphony obligations.

Winding up, Fiedler went all-out pops. Pioneering the orchestration of rock and music of the Beatles with pieces like "I Want to Hold Your Hand" many years ago, Fiedler on Sunday presented another Beatle tune, Lenon and McCartney's "Eleanor Rigby" as well as selections from the Disney film, "Chitty Chitty Bang Bang." The official conclusion came with "Up, Up and Away" but was quickly followed by a roaring encore of "Those Were the Days" and more.

ARTHUR FIELDER

Sunday's concert was the second of two for the holiday weekend. Fiedler also conducted the pops on Saturday night with guest soloist pianist Horacio Gutierrez.

THE CONCERTS marked the end of all activity at the Berkshire Music Festival for the 1969 season in which total attendance at all performances and open rehearsals except this weekend was 236,937.

Attendance at the 24 weeknd concerts and 8 open rehearsals totaled 175,468, down nearly 13,000 from a year ago. This can at least partially be attributed to rain. But overall attendance was up nearly 15,000 with concerts like the "Fillmore at Tanglewood," part of the Contemporary Trends series, playing to 21,500 in one night, a Tanglewood record.

ERICH LEINSDORF retired as conductor of the Boston Symphony and musical director of Tanglewood at the final Boston Symphony Orchestra concert a week ago with the celebrational Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. It was his 709th concert as music director of the Boston Symphony, according to figures released by the Boston Symphony on Monday.

During his seven-year tenure, Leinsdorf conducted 429 works by 96 composers, including 13 world premieres of major works. He also made 65 recordings with the orchestra for RCA Victor, including the complete "Lohengrin" by Wagner. (The orchestra, now under William Steinberg, has a new recording contract announced last month with Deutsche Grammaphon.)

Mozart led in numbers in Leinsdorf's Boston repertoire as he did in this past summer season. Opening with an all-Mozart weekend in July, the season embraced 12 Mozart compositions. Beethoven followed with eight; Tchaikowsky seven and Bach five. Twenty-five other composers were represented at least once.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

SEP 2 1969

MONEY and MANAGEMENT

95

Tanglewood Friends

A Council of Tanglewood Friends has been formed to provide closer ties between Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood area, and to take charge of the annual Friends' fund appeal. Superseding the Tanglewood Advisory Committee the new council has as its chairman Robert C. Alsop of Stockbridge, Mass. Vice-chairman of the council is Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris of Lenox, Mass., and Washington, D.C. Other charter members of the council are:

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Boxer of Pittsfield, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Gardner L. Brown of Richmond, Mass., Mrs. Bruce Crane of Dalton, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. David T. Dana, Jr. of Lenox, Mass., Mrs. George Edman of Pittsfield, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Paul Fromm of Chicago, Ill., Mr. and Mrs. John H. P. Gould of Lenox, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. John Mason Harding of Lenox, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Hatch of Lenox, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Amory Houghton, Jr. of Corning, New York, Walter Howard of Tyringham, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Hewitt of New York City, and Lenox, Mass., Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky of New York, and Lenox, Mass., Karl Lipsky of New Marlboro, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Lord of Stockbridge, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Frank McCabe of Rensselaer, New York, Charles Meloun of Pittsfield, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. L. K. Miller of Pittsfield, Mass., Margo Miller of Boston and Pittsfield, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. George E. Mole of Lenox, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Jeffrey Potter of Tyringham, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. George T. Sewall of South Lee, Mass., Mrs. John L. Senior of New York and Lenox, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. George Stedman of Loudonville, New York, Mr. and Mrs. Whitney S. Stoddard of Williamstown, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Warren B. Syer of Great Barrington, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Robert K. Wheeler of Great Barrington, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. George Wilde of Stockbridge, Mass., Mrs. C. D. Jackson of New York City.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
NOV 19 1968 New

Presidential Candidates Differ on the Arts

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Presidential candidates Hubert H. Humphrey and Richard M. Nixon have released statements representing differences of policy with regard to the arts.

Each candidate outlines what his general attitude and policy toward the arts would be during the next four years.

Humphrey declares, "The National Endowment for the Arts has been hampered by underfunding. I would definitely support substantially increased appropriations for the arts program, as well as increased federal support for state arts councils."

Nixon warns, "We don't want a state-directed culture. We must be very careful to maintain a vigorous climate of cultural endeavor not dependent on federal largess. But our government should, within prudent limits, foster artistic and cultural expression."

The candidates' statements were made in response to a letter from the editors of Cultural Affairs, a quarterly magazine published in New York City under the sponsorship of Associated Councils of the Arts. The magazine completed its first year of publication with its fourth issue, published last month.

SOMETHING NEW in the annuals of symphony concerts was experienced recently by an audience in the Hofstra Playhouse on the campus of Hofstra University in Hempstead, N.Y.

There was a conductor on stage, but no orchestra. The Pro Arte Symphony, the nation's first fully professional orchestra founded and maintained by a univesity, was in four separate groups spread around the theater.

Eleazar de Carvalho conducted from the stage. The composition was De Carvalho's own arrangement of the canzona "Noni Toni" by the 16th-century Venetian composer Giovanni Gabrielli.

The idea was originally Gabrielli's. He pioneered antiphonal music and "stereophonic" sound by writing for multiple choral groups performing simultaneously from different parts of the

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Cathedral of San Marco, where he was organist.

Carvalho, of Tanglewood fame, has just been appointed the Pro Arte's first permanent conductor.

MUSIC CRITICS Association has taken the first steps to promote the "critics exchange" program for which it received a substantial grant from the National Endowment for the Arts.

Robert Finn, music critic for the Cleveland Plain Dealer, has been named chairman of a committee to activate the project. His assistants are Edwin Safford, Providence Journal critic, and Mary Nic Shenk of the St. Petesburg, Fla., Times.

The project calls for exchanges between professional music critics working in cities of various sizes. The proposed period of exchange is one year.

FORMATION OF A new Boston Symphony Orchestra advisory group called the Council of Tanglewood Friends has been announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees.

"The new council's purpose is to provide a closer link with the Berkshire community," Banks said, "and to plan and sustain a healthy future for the orchestra's Tanglewood activities."

It is hoped that the council will become interested in regulating prices that soar customarily during the Tanglewood season.

THE HIGH COST of maintaining a major symphony orchestra is reported realistically in a financial declaration issued by the Cleveland Orchestra for its 1967-68 season.

Total operating expenses for the year were $2,540,364. Total income from all sources was $2,231,393. This makes a net loss of $308,971 for the year.

SMITH COLLEGE Glee Club, directed by Iva Dee Hiatt, is having a highly active season with impressive plans for next spring.

On March 9, Smith and Amherst glee clubs will present Bach's "St. John Passion." From March 26 to April 13, Smith will make a tour of Mexico with the Princeton Chamber Singers. April 12 and 13, Smith will repeat the Bach Passion, this time with Wesleyan Glee Club.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY Symphony Orchestra, conduced by Walter Eisenberg, recently performed a full-scale, nonstudent program with which to initiate the season.

The program was Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Brahms' First Symphony, and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

Fund Drive for Tanglewood Set for County Businesses

The first phase of a county-wide fund-raising effort to narrow the annual deficits incurred by Tanglewood was launched at a luncheon meeting here yesterday sponsored by the Tanglewood Business Committee, a division of the newly organized Council of Tanglewood Friends.

David Rockefeller Jr., a member of the Boston Symphony staff, outlined for the 20 committee members attending the luncheon at the Country Club of Pittsfield the plans for raising a minimum of $20,000 among Berkshire business firms in the initial campaign. Mr. Rockefeller told the group that arrangements already had been made for matching the sum raised in the county by a national foundation.

Taxes Paid

During his talk, Rockefeller noted that Tanglewood has not exercised its tax-exempt eligibility so far as the towns in which it is situated are concerned. He said that as of Nov. 1 this year, taxes totalling $9,000 were paid to Stockbridge and Lenox, 90 per cent of which went to Stockbridge, where most of the property is situated.

Balance sheets for 1967 and 1968 were distributed to members of the committee showing that in both years, the deficits for the entire Tanglewood operation were over $450,000. This past year, $263,522 was incurred by the Berkshire Festival and $189,143 by the Music Center.

James C. Hart, president of Clark-Aiken Co., Lee papermaking machine manufacturers, is chairman of the special committee. At the end of the meeting, members were given lists of 186 Berkshire firms as prospects for the campaign.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
DEC 5 1968 New England

Tanglewood $900,000 In the Red

LENOX — Tanglewood, the home of the Berkshire Music Center, has its financial problems.

Big Deficits

Balance sheets for 1967 and 1968 show that in both years the deficits for the summer-season operation were over $450,000. This past year, $263,522 was incurred as a deficit by the Berkshire Festival itself while the affiliated music center went into the red to the tune of $189,143.

David Rockefeller, Jr., a member of te BSO staff, explained the situation to the Tanglewood business committee and said they have not excercised the BSO tax-exempt eligibility so far as towns in which Tanglewood is located. This year taxes totaling $9000 were paid to the towns of Stockbridge and Lenox, 90 per cent of which went to Stockbridge, in which most of the Tanglewood property is located.

James C. Hart of the Clark-Aiken Co. in Lee has been named chairman of a special committee planning to attempt raising a fund amongst Berkshire business firms in an initial campaign to assist with the deficit problem and assure the continued existence of the summer music festival.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
NOV 3 1968 New England

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
DEC 6 1968 New

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950
DEC 6 1968 New

Tanglewood's Two-Year Loss Is $900,000

Tanglewood, the home of the Berkshire Festival, has had deficits of $900,000 covering the past two summers.

This was revealed by David Rockefeller, Jr., a member of the Tanglewood staff, in a discussion with the music center's business staff. He also explained that Tanglewood has not exercised its tax-exempt eligibility as far as the towns where the center is located. This year taxes of $9,000 were paid, 90 per cent to Stockbridge and the remainder to Lenox.

Efforts are being made to raise funds among Berkshire business firms to assist in the deficit problem and to assure continuance of the summer musical festival.

During the past summer the deficit for the Festival itself was $263,522 while the affiliated music center had a deficit of $189,143

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500
DEC 7 1968 New England

Tanglewood Fund Drive for $20,000 Starts in County

The Tanglewood Business Committee, a division of the newly organize Council of Tanglewood Friends, met Thursday to start a drive to narrow the annual deficits incurred at the home of the annual summer music festivals.

Tanglewood has not exercised its tax-exempt eligibility, according to David Rockefeller Jr., a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra staff. He said it paid $9,000 in taxes last year to Stockbridge and Lenox, mostly to Stockbridge in which most of the property lies.

He outlined for the 20-member committee plans for raising at least $20,000 among Berkshire business firms in the initial campaign. He said arrangements already have been made for matching the sum raised in the county by a national foundation.

Balance sheets for 1967 and 1968 show Tanglewood had deficits of $450,000 for both years. In 1968, the Berkshire Festival lost $263,522 and the Berkshire Music Center lost $189,143.

$450G in red

Tanglewood, at Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass., the home of the world-famed Berkshire Music Center, has its financial woes. Balance sheets for 1967 and 1968 disclose that in both seasons, the deficits totaled over $450,000.

This past summer, $263,522 was incurred as a deficit by the Berkshire Festival itself, while the affiliated Music Center went into the red to the tune of $189,143.

David Rockefeller Jr., a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra staff, explaining the situation to the Tanglewood business committee, said that the BSO tax-exempt eligibility has not been exercised so far as towns in which Tanglewood is situated.

This year taxes totaling $9,000 were paid to the towns of Stockbridge and Lenox, 90 per cent of which went to Stockbridge, in which most of the Tanglewood property is located.

James Hart of the Clark-Aiken Company, Lee, Mass., heads a committee to raise a fund among Berkshire-area business firms to assist with the deficit problem and assure continuance of the traditional summer music festival.

AMUSEMENT BUSINESS
CHICAGO, ILL.
W. 14,000
DEC 28 1968

MONEY and MANAGEMENT

Tanglewood Friends

A Council of Tanglewood Friends has been formed to provide closer ties between Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood area, and to take charge of the annual Friends' fund appeal. Superseding the Tanglewood Advisory Committee the new council has as its chairman Robert C. Alsop of Stockbridge, Mass. Vice-chairman of the council is Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris of Lenox, Mass., and Washington, D.C. Other charter members of the council are:

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Boxer of Pittsfield, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Gardner L. Brown of Richmond, Mass., Mrs. Bruce Crane of Dalton, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. David T. Dana, Jr. of Lenox, Mass., Mrs. George Edman of Pittsfield, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Paul Fromm of Chicago, Ill., Mr. and Mrs. John H. P. Gould of Lenox, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. John Mason Harding of Lenox, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Hatch of Lenox, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Amory Houghton, Jr. of Corning, New York, Walter Howard of Tyringham, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Howitt of New York City, and Lenox, Mass., Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky of New York, and Lenox, Mass., Karl Lipsky of New Marlboro, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Frederick W. Lord of Stockbridge, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Frank McCabe of Rensselaer, New York, Charles Meloun of Pittsfield, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. L. K. Miller of Pittsfield, Mass., Margo Miller of Boston and Pittsfield, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. George E. Mole of Lenox, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Jeffrey Potter of Tyringham, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. George T. Sewall of South Lee, Mass., Mrs. John L. Senior of New York and Lenox, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. George Stedman of Loudonville, New York, Mr. and Mrs. Whitney S. Stoddard of Williamstown, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Warren B. Syer of Great Barrington, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Robert K. Wheeler of Great Barrington, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. George Wilde of Stockbridge, Mass., Mrs. C. D. Jackson of New York City.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

NOV 19 1968 New

Fund Drive for Tanglewood Set for County Businesses

The first phase of a countywide fund-raising effort to narrow the annual deficits incurred by Tanglewood was launched at a luncheon meeting here yesterday sponsored by the Tanglewood Business Committee, a division of the newly organized Council of Tanglewood Friends.

David Rockefeller Jr., a member of the Boston Symphony staff, outlined for the 20 committee members attending the luncheon at the Country Club of Pittsfield the plans for raising a minimum of $20,000 among Berkshire business firms in the initial campaign. Mr. Rockefeller told the group that arrangements already had been made for matching the sum raised in the county by a national foundation.

Taxes Paid

During his talk, Rockefeller noted that Tanglewood has not exercised its tax-exempt eligibility so far as the towns in which it is situated are concerned. He said that as of Nov. 1 this year, taxes totalling $9,000 were paid to Stockbridge and Lenox, 90 per cent of which went to Stockbridge, where most of the property is situated.

Balance sheets for 1967 and 1968 were distributed to members of the committee showing that in both years, the deficits for the entire Tanglewood operation were over $450,000. This past year, $263,522 was incurred by the Berkshire Festival and $189,143 by the Music Center.

James C. Hart, president of Clark-Aiken Co., Lee papermaking machine manufacturers, is chairman of the special committee. At the end of the meeting, members were given lists of 186 Berkshire firms as prospects for the campaign.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

DEC 5 1968 New England

Tanglewood $900,000 In the Red

LENOX -- Tanglewood, the home of the Berkshire Music Center, has its financial problems.

Big Deficits

Balance sheets for 1967 and 1968 show that in both years the deficits for the summer-season operation were over $450,000. This past year, $263,522 was incurred as a deficit by the Berkshire Festival itself while the affiliated music center went into the red to the tune of $189,143.

David Rockefeller, Jr., a member of te BSO staff, explained the situation to the Tanglewood business committee and said they have not excercised the BSO tax-exempt eligibility so far as towns in which Tanglewood is located. This year taxes totaling $9000 were paid to the towns of Stockbridge and Lenox, 90 per cent of which went to Stockbridge, in which most of the Tanglewood property is located.

James C. Hart of the Clark-Aiken Co. in Lee has been named chairman of a special committee planning to attempt raising a fund amongst Berkshire business firms in an initial campaign to assist with the deficit problem and assure the continued existence of the summer music festival.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

NOV 3 1968 New England

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

DEC 6 1968 New

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

DEC 6 1968 New

Tanglewood's Two-Year Loss Is $900,000

Tanglewood, the home of the Berkshire Festival, has had deficits of $900,000 covering the past two summers.

This was revealed by David Rockefeller, Jr., a member of the Tanglewood staff, in a discussion with the music center's business staff. He also explained that Tanglewood has not exercised its tax-exempt eligibility as far as the towns where the center is located. This year taxes of $9,000 were paid, 90 per cent to Stockbridge and the remainder to Lenox.

Efforts are being made to raise funds among Berkshire business firms to assist in the deficit problem and to assure continuance of the summer musical festival.

During the past summer the deficit for the Festival itself was $263,522 while the affiliated music center had a deficit of $189,143.

Presidential Candidates Differ on the Arts

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Presidential candidates Hubert H. Humphrey and Richard M. Nixon have released statements representing differences of policy with regard to the arts.

Each candidate outlines what his general attitude and policy toward the arts would be during the next four years.

Humphrey declares, "The National Endowment for the Arts has been hampered by underfunding. I would definitely support substantially increased appropriations for the arts program, as well as increased federal support for state arts councils."

Nixon warns, "We don't want a state-directed culture. We must be very careful to maintain a vigorous climate of cultural endeavor not dependent on federal largess. But our government should, within prudent limits, foster artistic and cultural expression."

The candidates' statements were made in response to a letter from the editors of Cultural Affairs, a quarterly magazine published in New York City under the sponsorship of Associated Councils of the Arts. The magazine completed its first year of publication with its fourth issue, published last month.

SOMETHING NEW in the annuals of symphony concerts was experienced recently by an audience in the Hofstra Playhouse on the campus of Hofstra University in Hempstead, N.Y.

There was a conductor on stage, but no orchestra. The Pro Arte Symphony, the nation's first fully professional orchestra founded and maintained by a univesity, was in four separate groups spread around the theater.

Eleazar de Carvalho conducted from the stage. The composition was De Carvalho's own arrangement of the canzona "Noni Toni" by the 16th-century Venetian composer Giovanni Gabrielli.

The idea was originally Gabrielli's. He pioneered antiphonal music and "stereophonic" sound by writing for multiple choral groups performing simultaneously from different parts of the Cathedral of San Maroc, where he was organist.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Carvalho, of Tanglewood fame, has just been appointed the Pro Arte's first permanent conductor.

MUSIC CRITICS Association has taken the first steps to promote the "critics exchange" program for which it received a substantial grant from the National Endowment for the Arts.

Robert Finn, music critic for the Cleveland Plain Dealer, has been named chairman of a committee to activate the project. His assistants are Edwin Safford, Providence Journal critic, and Mary Nic Shenk of the St. Petesburg, Fla., Times.

The project calls for exchanges between professional music critics working in cities of various sizes. The proposed period of exchange is one year.

FORMATION OF A new Boston Symphony Orchestra advisory group called the Council of Tanglewood Friends has been announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees.

"The new council's purpose is to provide a closer link with the Berkshire community," Banks said, "and to plan and sustain a healthy future for the orchestra's Tanglewood activities."

It is hoped that the council will become interested in regulating prices that soar customarily during the Tanglewood season.

THE HIGH COST of maintaining a major symphony orchestra is reported realistically in a financial declaration issued by the Cleveland Orchestra for its 1967-68 season.

Total operating expenses for the year were $2,540,364. Total income from all sources was $2,231,393. This makes a net loss of $308,971 for the year.

SMITH COLLEGE Glee Club, directed by Iva Dee Hiatt, is having a highly active season with impressive plans for next spring.

On March 9, Smith and Amherst glee clubs will present Bach's "St. John Passion." From March 26 to April 13, Smith will make a tour of Mexico with the Princeton Chamber Singers. April 12 and 13, Smith will repeat the Bach Passion, this time with Wesleyan Glee Club.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY Symphony Orchestra, conduced by Walter Eisenberg, recently performed a full-scale, nonstudent program with which to initiate the season.

The program was Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Brahms' First Symphony, and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

DEC 7 1968 New

Tanglewood Fund Drive for $20,000 Starts in County

The Tanglewood Business Committee, a division of the newly organize Council of Tanglewood Friends, met Thursday to start a drive to narrow the annual deficits incurred at the home of the annual summer music festivals.

Tanglewood has not exercised its tax-exempt eligibility, according to David Rockefeller Jr., a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra staff. He said it paid $9,000 in taxes last year to Stockbridge and Lenox, mostly to Stockbridge in which most of the property lies.

He outlined for the 20-member committee plans for raising at least $20,000 among Berkshire business firms in the initial campaign. He said arrangements already have been made for matching the sum raised in the county by a national foundation.

Balance sheets for 1967 and 1968 show Tanglewood had deficits of $450,000 for both years. In 1968, the Berkshire Festival lost $263,522 and the Berkshire Music Center lost $189,143.

$450G in red

Tanglewood, at Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass., the home of the world-famed Berkshire Music Center, has its financial woes. Balance sheets for 1967 and 1968 disclose that in both seasons, the deficits totaled over $450,000.

This past summer, $263,522 was incurred as a deficit by the Berkshire Festival itself, while the affiliated Music Center went into the red to the tune of $189,143.

David Rockefeller Jr., a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra staff, explaining the situation to the Tanglewood business committee, said that the BSO tax-exempt eligibility has not been exercised so far as towns in which Tanglewood is situated.

This year taxes totaling $9,000 were paid to the towns of Stockbridge and Lenox, 90 per cent of which went to Stockbridge, in which most of the Tanglewood property is located.

James Hart of the Clark-Aiken Company, Lee, Mass., heads a committee to raise a fund among Berkshire-area business firms to assist with the deficit problem and assure continuance of the traditional summer music festival.

AMUSEMENT BUSINESS
CHICAGO, ILL.
W. 14,000

DEC 28 1968

96

Suggestion by Mrs. Arlos

Tanglewood Shed Proposed For Democratic Convention

Mrs. Alma Arlos, a member of the Democratic State Committee, will propose at the state committee meeting tomorrow in Boston that the 1970 Democratic State Convention be held in the Tanglewood Shed, a facility that has "unsurpassed acoustics." and a seating capacity of at least 5,000.

Actually, the idea of a convention at Tanglewood is not new. John V. Geary, executive director of the Berkshire Hills Conference, has been quietly doing some spade work for about a year in promoting the idea of having both the Democratic and Republican state conventions held at Tanglewood in 1970.

Hyman Resigns

The main item on tomorrow's agenda is the election of a new chairman, Rep. David Harrison of Plymouth, and to accept the resignation of the incumbent chairman, Atty. Lester S. Hyman of Newton and Monterey. Hyman formally submitted his resignation yesterday and announced that he has accepted a partnership in the Washington, D.C., law firm of Leva, Hawes, Symington, Martin & Oppenheimer.

Both Mrs. Arlos and Rep. Thomas C. Wojtkowski, the other state committee members from the Berkshire Senatorial district, will vote for Harrison.

Mrs. Arlos said the Tanglewood site lends itself "beautifully" as the locales for the state convention, "and," she added, "I would hope that the Republicans might think of that site, too."

She noted that state conventions must, by law' be held in June, which is "just before the summer tourist season and the Berkshire Music Festival program begins." She said it would be a boon to the hotels, motels and restaurants in the area, and the accommodations, by that time, would be enhanced by the completed Berkshire Common facilities at Park Square in Pittsfield.

'Bucolic Atmosphere'

"But of more significance to the Democratic State Committee which is the sponsor of the Democratic State Convention," Mrs. Arlos noted, "the comparatively bucolic atmosphere of Tanglewood lends itself to a more orderly and thoughtful convention. It would be separated from the hurly-burly that attends conventions in major cities, particularly Boston, and would be more coducive to a dignified session."

Mrs. Arlos will make three other proposals at tomorrow's meeting. One is already on the agenda—that the state committee back a resolution calling for the removal of Congressman Mendel Rivers, D-S.C., as chairman of the House Armed Services Committee for his failure to support the Democratic candidate for president and for his espousal of Gov. George C. Wallace for president.

She wil also propose broader participation in the selection of delegates to the state convention. They are now selected by members of town and ward committees. She said many "thoughtful and dedicated" Democrats are excluded from participating in coventions as delegates because they don't "fit in" with members of the ward and town committees.

The other proposal calls for the state committee to pay for hotel and motel accommodations at conventions. This might help, she said, to put a stop to the highly questionable, if not "utterly irregular" practice of candidates offering rooms to delegates in exchange for a vote.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

DEC 6 1968 N Eng

Tanglewood's Sacred Hall May Be Political Arena

The Tanglewood shed, an edifice hallowed for years by the pure strains of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, may be reverberating to political oratory next June.

Mrs. Alma Arlos of Pittsfield, a member of the Democratic State Committee and an unsuccessful candidate in November for county treasurer on a platform to abolish county government, is planning to propose that the 1970 Democrati State Convention to be held in the shed.

John V. Geary, executive director of the Berkshire Hills Conference, has been promoting the idea that both the Democratic and Republican state conventions should be held in the shed next year.

Mrs. Arlos is to make her proposal at today's state committee meeting in Boston.

The "bucolic atmosphere of Tanglewood," Mrs. Arlos said, lends itself to a "more orderly and thoughful convention."

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

DEC 9 1968 N

Geary Suggests Tanglewood For Political Conventions

A request that the County Commissioners allocate $35,000 to bring the state Republican and Democratic conventions to Tanglewood next year will probably receive favorable consideration Commission Chairman John F. Shea of Pittsfield said today.

Commissioner Shea said the request, received from John V. Geary, executive director of the Berkshire Hills Conference, the county's tourist promotion agency, would be considered sometime later this week. He said budget hearings today precluded placing the matter on the agenda for today's meeting.

Mr. Geary's request to the commissioners was accompanied by letters from the Boston Symphony Orchestra management indicating that the Conference has been authorized to serve as the agent for making the Lenox facilities available for the conventions.

Mr. Geary said tentative financial arrangements include a $10,000 contribution to each major party to cover preliminary convention costs and $15,000 for cleaning and repairing the Tanglewood facilities, policing, parking attendants, insurance, legal fees, reservation service for delegates and other arrangements handled by the Conference.

He said that in his opinion the expenditure of $35,000 would produce over $500,000 in nonservice requirement tourist dollars plus an immeasurable amount of free publicity through the news media and the delegates.

If the commissioners approve the request the state legislature will be asked to include the $35,000 in this year's county budget.

Mr. Geary said the Conference is in the process of seeking the approval of the Republican and Democratic state committees for his proposal.

The major party conventions are usually held in June and the Tanglewood concerts do not start until July.

No party convention has ever been held at Tanglewood.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

JAN 14 1969 New England

Tanglewood Available

BHC Seeks County Funds To Get Party Conventions

The Berkshire Hills Conference today asked the County Commission for a special allocation of $35,000 this year to bring the state Republican and Democratic conventions to Tanglewood in 1970.

John V. Geary, executive director of the county's tourist promotion agency, made the request in a letter to the three-man commission.

Accompanying the request were letters from the Boston Symphony Orchestra management showing that the Conference has been authorized to serve as the agent for making the Lenox facilities available for the conventions.

The original authorization was given in 1967 and was renewed last year. The BSO emphasized that the invitation must go to both parties and that the orchestra must be reimbursed for out-of-pocket costs for use of the facilities.

The conventions traditionally are held in June, which would be in consonance with the BSO stipulation that the facilities would only be available for use

"In my opinion," Geary said, wood concerts, which start in early July each year.

Geary said the Conference is contacting representatives of both parties to seek their approval for having the conventions in Lenox next year. It would be the first time if it comes to pass.

The conventions normally are held in Boston, at times have met in Worcester, but have previously come only as far west as Springfield.

Geary told the county board that the $35,000 is needed to help finance preparatory work in trying to get the three-day conventions in Berkshire County.

He said tentative financial arrangements include a $10,000 contribution to each party to cover preliminary convention costs; $15,000 for cleaning and repairing the Tanglewood facilities, policing, parking attendants, insurance, legal fees, reservation service for delegates and other arrangements to be handled by the Conference.

"In my opinion," Geary said, "this $35,000 would produce more than $500,000 in nonservice requirement tourist dollars plus an immeasurable amount of free publicity through the news media, not to mention the repeat business (from delegates who might return again as Berkshire visitors).

The effort to try to get the conventions here will cost little if not successful, according to Geary. He said only a small part of the funds requested would be used in the promotion work of trying to sell the Berkshires as the conventions site.

The County Commission took the request under advisement today. If it approves the request, the board will ask the Massachusetts Legislature to include the $35,000 in the county budget this year.

John F. Shea of Pittsfield, County Commission chairman, said he and the other two members of the board "sort of looked at the convention proposal favorably" when it was presented by Geary during an executive hearing on budgets last week.

"We have made no definite decision yet," Shea said, "but we think it would be good for Berkshire County to get the delegates up here.

"For one thing, it would make the people in Boston more aware of Berkshire County. I'll bet that some of them have never been here."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JAN 14 1969 New

Hancock Racing Dates To Be Opposed Tomorrow

By A. A. MICHELSON

There will be some opposition at tomorrow night's public hearing of the state Racing Commission on the application of Berkshire Downs, Inc., for 24 days of flat horse racing at Hancock over a period of eight weeks, starting July 3.

However, it appeared today that little of it will come from Berkshire sources, even though the application this year calls for a radical departure in the allocation of racing dates in Massachusetts. The Hancock track is asking that it be allowed to operate only on Thursdays, Fridays and Saturdays over the eight-week period.

On previous occasions, when the Hancock track has sought summer dates, there had been opposition from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, operator of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. Manager Thomas D. Perry has appeared at hearings to note that highways and hotel-motel facilities in the Berkshires are filled to capacity on July and August weekends, and that commercial racing would make for "unwarranted congestion." There is no indication, however, that the BSO intends to register any objections.

Neither is there evidence of organized citizen group opposition.

Suffolk Downs Opposed

Opponents tomorrow will include spokesmen for Suffolk Downs, the Revere track which is competing this year for a larger share of the 90 days of flat horse racing available under the state law. Normally, Suffolk Downs, which is the largest track in New England, gets 66 days, and Berkshire Downs 24 days.

This year, Suffolk Downs, which is now headed by Bill Veeck, former baseball magnate, is asking for 76 days of racing, which would leave only 14 days for Berkshire Downs. Thomas J. Beedam of New Bedford, general manager of Suffolk Downs, and Atty. Kevin Hern of Boston will appear for the Revere track at the hearing, which will be held at 7:30 at Central School, Route 143, Hancock.

Resistance is also anticipated from horse owners and jockeys, who claim that the so-called black Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays will work a hardship on them.

The Racing Commission held a public hearing yesterday in Boston and at Revere on the Suffolk Downs application for 76 days. Spokesmen for all other commercial tracks appeared to enter protests. Representing Berkshire Downs was Atty. Paul A. Tamburello.

Tamburello maintained that if the Racing Commission cuts "us to 14 days, it'll put us out of business." He said that it was never the intent of the legislature to confine commercial horse racing to just one area of the state. And he noted that up to 1960, when Berkshire Downs was allocated dates for the first time, Suffolk Downs hardly ever sought more than 66 days of flat horse racing.

Questions Veeck

As a party of interest, Tamburello was allowed to cross-examine Veeck. He noted, however, that he knew Veeck many years ago when he, Tamburello, was president of the Pittsfield Electrics, a professional baseball farm club of the Cleveland Indians, then headed by Veeck. Tamburello said Veeck was a "credit" to professional baseball and "I'm sure he'll be a credit to professional racing in Massachusetts."

He asked Veeck when he took over Suffolk Downs last fall whether he was aware of the fact that Suffolk's season normally was only 66 days. Veeck said he noted that in 1966 Suffolk had 90 days of racing. (That was the year when Berkshire Downs' application for 24 days of racing was denied on a technicality.)

Atty. Robert T. Capeless of Boston, former mayor of Pittsfield, appeared in opposition to extra racing days for Suffolk on behalf of Wonderland Dog Track, also in Revere. He said that racing dates in Massachusetts have reached a "saturation point" and that allocation of more racing days could well run into the law of diminishing returns.

Atty. Tamburello disclosed today that the application has an "escape" clause in the event that the Racing Commission does not take to the idea of stretching out the 24 days over an eight-week period. The application states that failing the dates requested, Berkshire Downs would accept dates "in the alternative in the discretion of the Racing Commission."

He said Berkshire Downs is also prepared to ask for eight weeks of racing starting June 19, instead of July 3.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JAN 16 1969 New England

BSO Opposes Dates Asked For Racing

The office of the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra disclosed this morning that there would be a spokesman appearing in opposition tonight at a public hearing before the state Racing Commission to an application that calls for commercial horse racing at Hancock on eight weekends of July and August.

Representing the BSO will be James F. Kiley of Lenox, superintendent of the BSO's Tanglewood property.

The orchestra is presently on tour. A spokesman in Boston said that they were made aware of the details to the Berkshire Downs application only yesterday, else the management would have made plans for more intensive opposition.

The application calls for racing only on Thursdays, Fridays and Saturday for eight weeks, starting July 3. The Tanglewood season opens with a concert July 4.

The BSO management maintains that guest facilities and highways are already overcrowded on July and August weekends, and the addition of commercial horse racing will add to the inconvenience of

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JAN 17 1969 N Eng

In Brief . . .

The suggestion by Democratic Committeewoman Alma Arlos that her party hold its 1970 state convention in the Tanglewood Shed cannot be lightly dismissed. The setting is ideal for discussion and calm reflection, and certainly would cost the delegates no more than the municipal center setup in Boston. From the Berkshires' standpoint, pre-season activity that brings out-of-towners here constitutes public relations that money can't buy . . . As Pittsfield City Solicitor Samuel Landa points out, the School Committee has to face up to the state law requiring City Council approval before a lawyer can be hired to bargain with the teachers, whether or not the committee thinks the law is sound. Actually, the committee can make a strong dollars-and-cents case for engaging Attorney Leon J. Kowal on the basis that some $12,000 annually in fees is not excessive when salaries costing the city around $6 million are being negotiated . . . The Berkshire Life Insurance Company is wise to start working out the traffic patterns around its Berkshire Common development, even though it won't be in full use for another two years. The recent rhubarb over the temporary barricades on West Street showed what can happen when things go wrong . . . That was a pretty unequivocal blast against U.S. policy that the Rev. Blase Bombane of the Maryknoll Order delivered at Williams College the other night. One of several disturbing aspects was that Guatemala's Vietnam-like guerrilla war which the priest described goes almost unnoticed in this country.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

DEC 7 1968 New

But he said it would be exceedingly difficult for them to get horses at Pownal on a part-time basis.

BSO Objects

Also opposing the three-day racing week was James F. Kiley of Lenox, superintendent of Tanglewood. Representing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he said the Thursday through Saturday schedule would conflict with the summer Tanglewood season and make worse an already difficult traffic situation.

Kiley emphasized that the BSO is "not opposed to racing in Berkshire County." But he said the orchestra management would prefer a racing meet that would not conflict with Tanglewood.

The only other opponent was field, president of Shaker Community, Inc., the museum that abuts the Berkshire Downs property off Route 20 in Hancock. Her opposition also was based on the traffic situation.

Much of the testimony heard last night was the same as the commission heard in Boston Wednesday when it conducted a hearing on the Suffolk Downs application.

Hern and Tamburello agreed that the minutes of the Suffolk hearing be made part of the Berkshire Downs hearing record.

The commission must act on the applications by Jan. 30.

Bill Veeck, former baseball magnate now head of Suffolk Downs, did not attend last night's hearing.

Mitchell

OPPOSING LAWYERS face the Racing Commission at the hearing last night. Atty. Kevin Hern, left, represented Suffolk Downs; Atty. Paul A. Tamburello, right, Berkshire Downs. Thirty-five attended hearing.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

JAN 18 1969 N Eng

97

$350,000 Tanglewood Loss Cited as BSO Drive Opens

The deficit at Tanglewood this summer will be approximately $350,000 and that for the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra $1.5 million in 1969, 50 Berkshire businessmen were told by Talcott M. Banks of Boston, president of the BSO trustees, at a luncheon meeting yesterday at the Pittsfield Country Club.

The meeting was organized by Robert Alsop, chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends, which is attempting to raise funds from the Berkshire community to help the BSO with its deficit. Businessmen attending the luncheon were given lists of contacts to make in an appeal for funds.

$40,000 From Fund

The Rockefeller Foundation of New York has pledged $40,000 for Tanglewood expenses this season if the Friends can match the grant two for one. It is the hope of the Friends that the Berkshire community will meet half the Tanglewood deficit for this season.

In his talk to the group, Mr. Banks, a lawyer who is also president of the trustees of the Clark Art Institute and a member of the Williams College board of trustees, spelled out the problems facing the BSO in this period.

In 1938, he said, the budget for the orchestra was $820,000 and the deficit of $126,500 was covered entirely by the Friends of the Boston Symphony. This year the budget for the operation is over $5 million and the deficit will be $1.5 million. The same shortage is expected for next year.

Using Capital

The orchestra has been meeting these deficits by eating up its capital funds, he said, which cannot continue for too long a period. The 1966 grant of $2 million from the Ford Foundation, which was matched by a $4 million fund drive, yields interest income only until 1976 when some principal can be used.

Mr. Banks said that 60 per cent of the expenses is comprised of payments to musicians, 13 per cent to production of concerts, 15 per cent to maintenance of property and 15 per cent to administration. The members of the orchestra were granted raises last year in line with contracts with all other major symphony orchestras, and the BSO has been feeling the pinch from inflation on all fronts.

Few Alternatives

It is difficult to raise prices more than a moderate amount, said Mr. Banks, "because then we would be squeezing out all but the affluent music lover. In like manager, we cannot expand the size of our hall or increase the demands on our musicians, who now play some 150 concerts a year."

Mr. Banks commented, in answer to a question, that the BSO pays out $500,000 a year to Berkshire County businesses, and that it has been estimated that it brings in from $5 million to $7 million a year in tourist money. He said that Berkshire County is fortunate in having two world-renowned organizations — the BSO and Clark Art Institute — within its boundaries.

Seated at the head table with Mr. Banks and Mr. Alsop were Thomas D. Perry Jr., BSO manager; Harry J. Kraut, associate manager; James C. Hart, president of Clark-Aiken and head of the Friends Business Committee; Frank McCabe, chairman of the National Commercial Bank & Trust of Albany; and David Rockefeller, BSO development coordinator.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

FEB 7 1969 N Eng

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

FEB 8 1969 New England

Tanglewood Friends Form New Group

LENOX—The first meeting of a new group called the Special Events Committee of the Council of Tanglewood Friends was held Saturday afternoon at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris.

The new committee, whose chairman is Mrs. William H. Ryan of Stockbridge, will coordinate social events of the council and the Friends, with the aim of promoting good will between Tanglewood and its audience. The committee will consist of the chairman and a group of 15 to 20 other Berkshire women who will rotate the responsibility for the special events.

Hoping to promote an increased air of festivity to the Tanglewood season, the committee plans to arrange Sunday teas at Seranak after the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts and receptions following important Berkshire Music Center events, to run the twice-yearly meetings of the full Council of Tanglewood Friends and to take charge of social events in connection with the Tanglewood-on-Parade concert.

Among the guests at the Morris home were Mrs. Robert C. Alsop and Mrs. William A. Selke of Stockbridge, Mrs. John S. McLennan of Tyringham, Mrs. Robbins H. Miller of Lee, and Mrs. Samuel Boxer and Mrs. Lawrence K. Miller of Pittsfield. Mrs. Thomas D. Perry Jr., of West Stockbridge and Boston, wife of the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was also present.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

MAR 4 1969 N Eng

Librizzi

BUSINESS LEADERS from Berkshire County were asked to participate in a fund drive for Tanglewood yesterday by Talcott M. Banks of Boston, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Seated at the head table with Mr. Banks were, left, Frank McCabe, Albany, N.Y., banker, and James C. Hart, president of Clark-Aiken Co. Fifty businessmen attended luncheon at the County Club.

There'll Always Be a Tanglewood

By MILTON R. BASS

THERE WILL ALWAYS be a Tanglewood; everybody knows that, but that it gets harder and harder every year to keep a symphony orchestra and a summer festival and a music school going is not so well known. It is not so well known because everybody takes it for granted that there will always be a Tanglewood. And the fact that salaries and other expenses have gone up astronomically in the past 10 years and that income hasn't matched them is not even considered by the people who see that Symphony Hall in Boston is always full for the Boston Symphony concerts and that there are a lot of bodies lying on the ever-green Tanglewood grass during the summer season.

—o—

SYMPHONY HALL in Boston is acoustically perfect as it is, and no one would even dream of enlarging any of its aspects. Therefore, there is limited opportunity in Boston to increase the income through ticket sales. It is impossible to add more concerts because the present long season literally poops out the musicians. You cannot go up more than a moderate amount on ticket prices or else you crowd out the less affluent music lovers. Therefore, except for fund-raising drives, Boston is a dead end.

—o—

BUT TANGLEWOOD, ah Tanglewood, that is a different story. That's a big lawn they have there, a big big big lawn. The Shed itself will hold some 6,000 citizens, and that lawn will take another 12,000 easy. You draw 18,000 people to anything, and I'll vote for you.

So will the BSO management, for they have obviously decided that they are going to go all out in promoting Tanglewood and building its audience. Starting in 1970, golden man Leonard Bernstein (a bit mellower but still golden) will move in as ADVISER, and Gunther Schuller and Seiji Ozawa will take over as artistic directors. Mr. Bernstein recently resigned as music director of the New York Philharmonic, but at the age of 51 he is far from hanging up his baton. It is as likely as it is not likely that when William Steinberg's three-year contract is up, Mr. Bernstein might be persuaded to take over as King Charming. His feelings for the BSO and Tanglewood are as strong as is the public's feeling for him.

—o—

IT SEEMS QUITE probable that the Tanglewood season will be extended to 10 weeks in 1970, with a week of Boston Pops to open the season and a week of Boston Pops to close the season. The one night in which Fiedler performs his renditions of TV commercial jingles is about the most popular night of the season.

Tanglewood will also expand its Contemporary Concerts series, bringing in more Rock and Folk groups to attract the younger music lovers and offer a more balanced program. The popularity of the Association, Ravi Shankar and the jazz concert show that there is a large audience available for such fare around here.

—o—

THIS DOES not mean that there won't be the old familiars on the classical side of the programming. Erich Leinsdorf, who will be conducting his swan songs this summer, recently commented that the BSO management instructed each guest conductor to include one warhorse on his program. The vast majority of the audience DO want to hear the Beethoven 9th for the 27th year in a row.

All in all, what is happening at Tanglewood is most healthy. Management is not dying on the vine, nor is it leaping about in a frenzy. They are weighing the situation carefully and acting accordingly. That is why there will always be a Tanglewood.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

FEB 25 1969 N Eng

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUN 17 1969 E N.Y.

Tanglewood Friends Pledged $17,000 By Businessmen

The business community of Berkshire County has already pledged $17,000 toward the goal of $20,000 set by the Council of Tanglewood Friends, according to a report made by James C. Hart of North Adams, chairman of the business committee.

The report was made at the council meeting held in the Glass House at Tanglewood.

Hart said that there were 200 prospects still to be contacted before the Aug. 1 cutoff date.

Thirty-seven members have already been signed up for the new Tent Club, according to Mrs. Peter van S. Rice, chairman of the membership committee. The Tent Club, located near the Shed, will provide a location for social gatherings before and after concerts. Any individual contributing $100 or more annually through Tanglewood Friends is a member. The club will be open at least an hour before and after concerts and will be used for receptions for guest artists.

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 6,100

MAR 12 1969 E

BSO Deficit at Tanglewood $350,000, Aid Being Sought

PITTSFIELD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's deficit at Tanglewood the past summer was $350,000 and it is hoped that funds can be raised in Berkshire County to offset half that amount.

That financial picture was given at a luncheon meeting in Pittsfield Thursday by Talcott M. Banks of Boston, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Board of Trustees.

The meeting, attended by about 50 county businessmen, was arranged by Robert Alsop, chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends, which is attempting to raise funds in Berkshire County.

Mr. Banks said that the Rockefeller Foundation had agreed to give the orchestra a grant of $40,000 if the Tanglewood Friends would match it 2 to 1. He explained that means $80,000 would have to be raised to become eligible for the Ford grant.

The problems the orchestra faces were also described by Mr. Banks who said this year's deficit will be $1.5 million out of a $5 million budget.

Mr. Banks, a Boston attorney, president of the trustees of the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute and a Williams College trustee, said that the BSO pays out $500,000 a year to Berkshire County businesses and that it has been estimated that it brings in from $5 to $7 million a year in tourist money.

It is difficult to raise prices he said, "because then we would be squeezing out all but the affluent music lover."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

FEB 27 1969 N Eng

BSO Opposes Planned Shop Near Festival

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra sounded some sour notes against a petition filed by Lauriel I. St. Jacques at a hearing held by the Zoning Board of Appeals last night. Eight people attended the hearing in the Town Hall.

Speaking on behalf of Thomas D. Perry, business manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, James F. Kiley indicated that the orchestra opposes any commercial enterprise such as the proposed antique and gift shop in the area of Tanglewood. Orchestra officials believe it would be a precedent they would rather not see set.

The petition by St. Jacques would authorize him to conduct an antique-gift shop in his barn and outbuildings at 214 West St. The barn is across from the Tanglewood property.

Under the town bylaws the Zoning Board of Appeals can authorize the use, provided it is not "injurious, noxious or offensive." St. Jacques has also requested a permit for a sign to be erected.

A decision on the St. Jacques petition will be announced by the appeals board on March 26.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

MAY 6 1969 E

Music Theatre Movies TV Art

Tanglewood Friends Seek 500 Members

A goal of 500 members has been set by the newly formed Council of Tanglewood Friends, which is in the process of raising funds to support the Berkshire Music Center in its activities.

Cost Rise

At a recent meeting at the home of Mrs. Peter van S. Rice, David Rockefeller, development coordinator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, explained to the membership committee that a steep rise in costs has placed the continuance of the Music Center in jeopardy. The group is attempting to get donations from individuals, families and businesses in the area.

It was pointed out that $1,000 will provide tuition, room and board for a student for the eight-week session of the Center. The young musicians are selected by audition from throughout the United States and from foreign countries.

All Friends have the privilege of attending without charge every Berkshire Music Center event.

Appeals Letters

Mrs. Rice said that appeals letters are being sent out that state:

"Thirty-three years ago the Tanglewood Summer Music Festival was started by a handful of dedicated souls with great vision. It has grown and been emulated the world over, and should be nourished so that it may continue to be a trend-setter."

Members of the committee besides Mrs. Rice are, from Pittsfield: Mrs. Thomas Phalen and Mrs. Prentice Pradley; from Stockbridge, Mrs. Philip Potter and Mrs. Frederick W. Lord; Lee, Mr. and Mrs. Churchward R. Davis; Great Barrington, Mrs. John B. Hull Jr.; Williamstown, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Winant; Bennington, Vt., Mrs. Edward H. Cumpston; Old Chatham, N.Y., Mr. and Mrs. William F. Sawyer and Lakeville, Conn., Mrs. Benjamin M. Belcher.

Mrs. Peter van S. Rice and David Rockefeller

Additional "Friends" article on page 32a.

98.

Businesses Pledge $17,000 To Tanglewood Friends

The business community of Berkshire County has already pledged $17,000 toward the goal of $20,000 set by the Council of Tanglewood Friends, according to a report made Saturday by James C. Hart of North Adams, chairman of the business committee.

The report was made at the council meeting held in the Glass House at Tanglewood.

Hart said that there were 200 prospects still to be contacted before the Aug. 1 cutoff date.

Thirty-seven members have already been signed up for the new Tent Club, according to Mrs. Peter van S. Rice, chairman of the membership committee. The Tent Club, located near the Shed, will provide a location for social gatherings before and after concerts. Any individual contributing $100 or more annually through the Tanglewood Friends is a member. The club will be open at least an hour before and after concerts and will be used for receptions for guest artists.

Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees, thanked the council for its support in helping to meet the $500,000 income gap at Tanglewood. Thomas D. Perry, BSO manager, reviewed the plans for the season, and Harry J. Kraut, associate manager, went over schedules for Berkshire Music Center programs and the Tuesday night contemporary programs.

David Rockefeller Jr., coordinator of development, answered questions on fund-raising activities, and Mrs. William H. Ryan, chairman of the special events committee, discussed the summer's social activities, including the entertainment of Berkshire Music Center students, who, she noted, usually see little of the Berkshires outside Tanglewood.

'Money Not Enough'

Robert C. Alsop, chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends, commented that "money is not enough—Tanglewood needs enthusiasm and the general support of the community."

The meeting was preceded by an executive committee session at the Red Lion Inn in Stockbridge. Following the meeting, the council was entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence K. Miller in Pittsfield. Mrs. Miller and Mrs. Samuel

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 16 1969

Tanglewood Gets License To Sell Liquor on Grounds

STOCKBRIDGE — Alcoholic beverages will be sold at the Tanglewood Music Festival this summer for the first time.

The Stockbridge Selectmen last night approved an all-alcoholic beverage club license for the Tent Club, Inc., which will operate out of a tent adjacent to the Music Shed. Club membership will be open to patrons who contribute a minimum of $100 to the Berkshire Music Center.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well as the Tent Club, said this morning that the primary aim of the club will be 'to provide an amenity to the principals of the music center."

"It will not be a public facility," he said. Nor will it be so exclusive that many will be unable to join, he added.

Perry said such clubs are common, especially at festivals.

"We haven't thought of selling our soul to the devil. It's the sort of thing that we hope will make it more pleasurable at Tanglewood."

Public Hearing

A public hearing preceded last night's approval of the license.

James F. Kiley, superintendent of Tanglewood, explained to the selectmen that liquor would be stored in the garage and that the club would not be for the general public but for club members only.

Chairman Robert G. Williams said that the garage premises would have to be included in the license, since the liquor will be stored there.

There were no objections to the proposal.

The selectmen received a letter from John Mason Harding, president of the Stockbridge Bowl Association, in which Harding said neither he nor the association found the plan objectionable.

Another letter from John H. P. Gould of Mahkeenac Farm also contained no objections. On the contrary, Gould said "We support the application and trust you will see fit to grant it."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 17 1969

Booze at Tanglewood

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

The Boston Symphony Orchestra applies for a liquor license on the Stockbridge side of the road with no opposition, yet the Tanglewood janitor and John H. P. Gould voice personal opposition to antique shops and art galleries on the Lenox side. Evidently it is all right to dispense liquor in the front yard but not antiques and art in the backyard.

Mr. Kiley says, "We are opposed to any commercial enterprise coming into the area for we feel it would be detrimental." Evidently they are going to give liquor away as collecting money might be termed commercialization. Are liquor establishments detrimental to an area? Dear music lovers, reel to Manhattan symphonies but don't stoop to commercialized Lenox antique shops and art galleries.

Mr. Kiley, self-styled lone champion of our Lenox neighborhood, always says "we." The Lenox people of the neighborhood have not opposed art galleries, antique shops or commercialization. In all his personal appearances in opposition, Mr. Kiley says "we" without presentation to the various boards of written evidence from whomever "we" is. Perhaps it is time that some board found out and were more concerned with what they and the people want, instead of what Mr. Kiley wants for the area.

Controlled commercialization just might help the Boston Symphony with its financial difficulties better than the dispensation of uncontrolled liquor patrons. Do other area music centers dispense only music and liquor to attract the people? Instead of traffic jams from symphonies, antique shops and art galleries, the Lenox people will be faced with possible drunken traffic jams in their front yards. There is no opposition to liquor licenses but there is opposition to self means of area commercialization. Who will control it? Mr. Kiley or the Zoning Board of Appeals?

LAURIEL I. St. JACQUES.
207 Main St.,
Lenox.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 16 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 19 1969

A Spirited Answer To the BSO Deficit

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has another headache. Deficit-ridden but still eager to engage the ablest players and most exciting conductors, it must now find a charismatic barkeep for Tanglewood.

The BSO assumes no new role at Lenox in donning the white coat and toting the tray. Since 1885 (with years out during Prohibition) wine and beer have flowed in Symphony Hall during the nine-week spring series of Pops concerts. Generations of students and properly light-hearted Bostonians have seen Symphony Hall transformed into a beer garden where waitressees have long popped corks in time with the music. Since 1930 Arthur Fiedler as Pops conductor has made the formula of malt and schmaltz the envy of the musical world, especially since it is financially self-sustaining and then some.

Tanglewood's Tent Club, however, is a more proper variation, even though spirits will also be available. Refreshments will be served before and after the concerts and at intermission, but not during the performance as at Symphony Hall Pops. Those allowed to use the facility, set off from the Shed, will be those Tanglewood ticket-buyers who in addition have helped to subsidize the Berkshire Music Center's program by contributing $100 either for its general support or purchasing a ticket in that amount affording admission to all the 30 student concerts which the Center offers.

Many will be delighted with the Tent Club as plaiting another flower in the hair of the Berkshire Festival, in keeping with its spirit and setting. The BSO, however, must look upon it as a device whose festive overtones are a by-product. The Berkshire Music Center, as important as it is artistically and professionally to the total Tanglewood operation, has been a severe drain. And the Boston orchestra, no less than every major U.S. symphony organization, is in deep trouble with serious limitations on income while expenses have esaclated. Because Tanglewood can comfortably accommodate audiences fivefold beyond the 2,631 seats of Symphony Hall, anything that adds enjoyment for its Lenox patrons, it is hoped, can be transposed into lessening its financial crisis.

Ogden Nash has maintained that liquor is quicker. With a maid, yes, but with a deficit we shall see.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUN 25 1969

Hard Likker to Flow At Hub Symph's Tanglewood Festival for First Time

Pittsfield, Mass., June 24.

For the first time hard liquor will be sold this season at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But alcoholic drinks won't be available to all musiclovers simply because they are of legal age, which is 21 in Massachusetts. (The festival opens July 4 and closes Aug. 24.)

The Stockbridge selectmen okayed an all-alcoholic beverage license for the Tent Club Inc., which will serve drinks to club members only on a tent to be erected adjacent to the 6,000-seat Tanglewood music shed. Club membership will be open to music patrons who contribute a minimum of $100 to the Berkmusic Center. The center is part of the Tanglewood complex and includes a music school for advanced music students.

It should be noted that the BSO management uses the town of Lenox, adjacent to Stockbridge, as its address apparently for convenience. All or virtually all of the 210-acre Tanglewood estate lies in Stockbridge and for that reason the selectmen of that town had license jurisdiction.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,000

JUN 18 1969 New England

LIQUOR TO BE SOLD TO SOME PATRONS AT TANGLEWOOD

Alcoholic beverages will be sold at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Stockbridge this summer for the first time. The Stockbridge Selectmen have approved an all-alcoholic beverage club license for the Tent Club, Inc., which will operate out of a tent adjacent to the Music Shed.

Club membership will be open to patrons who contribute a minimum of $100 to the Berkshire Music Center. It will not be a public facility.

FOR THE FIRST TIME since it was founded in 1934, Tanglewood is dispensing the hard stuff this summer. Whoa, there, fellows. Before you get your thirst—and your hopes—up, let it be known that the Lenox, Mass., home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is selective. Only members of the Tent Club will be able to belly up to the bar in a tent adjacent to the Music Shed. Membership to the club is open to anyone who contributes $100 or more to the Berkmusic Center, Variety notes.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, July 7, 1969

Between the Acts

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

SO MANY PROJECTS are undertaken and prosper on which I have not been consulted that I have automatically narrowed my interests without any perturbation whatsoever. The news of a liquor license at Tanglewood for a limited clientele is such an issue. My vote was not solicited and my opinion now is of no value or pertinence, as much as it may be on my, and off Leinsdorf's beat.

* * * *

TANGLEWOOD has provided food—snacks and drinks—for many years. Not only before and after performances and at intermissions but for the convenience of the students of the Berkshire Music Center. Such service has always been available. The extra step to a bar should not disturb the routine nor require an excessive expenditure of energy.

There is considerable precedent for such facilities. Philharmonic Hall in Lincoln Center allots most of the spacious entrance foyer to a bar and restaurant where patrons may enjoy or endure, as the case may be, the scrutiny of everyone entering the building to attend a performance of no matter what nature.

At Saratoga there were restaurants before a festival was thought of but now the facilities complement each other with mutual benefits. Race-goers can rest and relax at dining tables before concerts raise them again to high levels of excitement.

* * * *

IN THE NEW complex of halls and theatres across the Thames in London, the restaurants in Festival Hall and the bars—some for liquor and some for tea—are major components of the pleasures of attending performances in that concentration of entertainment. In Covent Garden opera house the counters serving sandwiches and tea at the entr'actes are profusely attended. Indeed, it takes an adroit and adept tea-hound to juggle such a serving in those surroundings. The carpeted steps of the staircases are usually the first vantage points garnered by those who know their way around and if one can keep his feet and his food away from the constant traffic, which uses the necessarily narrowed channels on those occasions, there is the minor additional satisfaction of savoir-faire.

The Paris Opera has bars in the marble-floored promenades adjoining the grand staircase. Waiting for a chance to get near the bar or to pierce the inexorable stream of promeneurs is an achievement which may fail to survive or to suffer. They offer a full carte of spirits but, strange as it may be, the most popular libations are a glass of champagne and a glass of our Atlanta beverage served, too, in the same festive type of stemwear.

* * * *

IN MUNICH'S HerkulesSalle in the Residenz, the counter of inviting snacks includes, in season, a delicious dish of ice cream over which is poured a sauce of fresh raspberries from a steaming, chafing-dish. New York theatres now offer the resources of a bar and service quite different from the usual lemon- and orange-ades previously available from ambulating vendors. In London theatres you may order your tea when you take your seat at the beginning of a show and the usher notes your seat location and brings you a tray at the intermission.

Vienna theatres and the HofOper have distinctive offerings of this nature at midpoints in performances, including, as one might expect, snatches of wurst and steins of beer. All these are customs which prevail and probably have long traditions but there are other factors which apply to the situation. Curtain time in Europe is often sevenish and opera often begins at six with the result that patrons may not feel ready to eat a substantial meal in the late afternoon. Tea thus serves a purpose which otherwise might not appear so valid and serves a function quite apart from the hoity-toity raised-pinkie role some of us sometimes assign it. In Brussels certain cafes invite patronage for "five o'clock tea (sic) a toutes heures."

* * * *

THESE CURTAIN TIMES disarrange the schedules of any of us who are accustomed to 8:30 schedules. Many Europeans or tourists at theatre or opera plan to eat after the performance. As a matter of fact, many of the exclusive restaurants do not open before 8 and even then early arrivals find a desert of unoccupied tables. In Madrid, I seem to recall, dining hours are even later.

"Parsifal" is sometimes played with a very long interval to allow the audience to eat leisurely and abundantly. Glyndebourne intentionally has curtain-time at 5 to allow for a meal in the restaurants or a champagne picnic on the elegant lawns of the estate and also to permit patrons to catch the train back to London in reasonable time. When "Mourning Becomes Elektra" played New York the last time, time for a meal was arranged between the long halves of the drama.

* * * *

ALL THEATRES and opera houses now being built make greater provision for the audiences to promenade at intermissions. This has long been a pleasant feature of European halls. Carnegie Hall in New York has always been deficient in this respect. The bar and cocktail facility added some years back partially supplied this accommodation but there has never been, nor yet is, enough room to circulate and be seen by the other parts of the audience. And that is a factor in theatre- or concert-going that should not be minimized.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 28 1969

Whitestone

TANGLEWOOD TENT is up and ready to serve alcoholic beverages, starting July 5, to any patron willing to contribute $100 to the Friends of Music. This marks the first time drinks will be available on the Tanglewood grounds. The tent club committee, from left, consists of Mrs. William H. Ryan, Mrs. Henry J. Wheelwright, Mrs. Lawrence K. Miller, Mrs. J. D. Hatch, Mrs. John S. McLennan, Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris, and Mrs. Robert Alsop. More than 150 people have joined the club so far.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 30 1969

98.

Businesses Pledge $17,000 To Tanglewood Friends

The business community of Berkshire County has already pledged $17,000 toward the goal of $20,000 set by the Council of Tanglewood Friends, according to a report made Saturday by James C. Hart of North Adams, chairman of the business committee.

The report was made at the council meeting held in the Glass House at Tanglewood.

Hart said that there were 200 prospects still to be contacted before the Aug. 1 cutoff date.

Thirty-seven members have already been signed up for the new Tent Club, according to Mrs. Peter van S. Rice, chairman of the membership committee. The Tent Club, located near the Shed, will provide a location for social gatherings before and after concerts. Any individual contributing $100 or more annually through the Tanglewood Friends is a member. The club will be open at least an hour before and after concerts and will be used for receptions for guest artists.

Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees, thanked the council for its support in helping to meet the $500,000 income gap at Tanglewood. Thomas D. Perry, BSO manager, reviewed the plans for the season, and Harry J. Kraut, associate manager, went over schedules for Berkshire Music Center programs and the Tuesday night contemporary programs.

David Rockefeller Jr., coordinator of development, answered questions on fund-raising activities, and Mrs. William H. Ryan, chairman of the special events committee, discussed the summer's social activities, including the entertainment of Berkshire Music Center students, who, she noted, usually see little of the Berkshires outside Tanglewood.

'Money Not Enough'

Robert C. Alsop, chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends, commented that "money is not enough—Tanglewood needs enthusiasm and the general support of the community."

The meeting was preceded by an executive committee session at the Red Lion Inn in Stockbridge. Following the meeting, the council was entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence K. Miller in Pittsfield. Mrs. Miller and Mrs. Samuel

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 16 1969

Tanglewood Gets License To Sell Liquor on Grounds

STOCKBRIDGE — Alcoholic beverages will be sold at the Tanglewood Music Festival this summer for the first time.

The Stockbridge Selectmen last night approved an all-alcoholic beverage club license for the Tent Club, Inc., which will operate out of a tent adjacent to the Music Shed. Club membership will be open to patrons who contribute a minimum of $100 to the Berkshire Music Center.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well as the Tent Club, said this morning that the primary aim of the club will be 'to provide an amenity to the principals of the music center."

"It will not be a public facility," he said. Nor will it be so exclusive that many will be unable to join, he added.

Perry said such clubs are common, especially at festivals.

"We haven't thought of selling our soul to the devil. It's the sort of thing that we hope will make it more pleasurable at Tanglewood."

Public Hearing

A public hearing preceded last night's approval of the license.

James F. Kiley, superintendent of Tanglewood, explained to the selectmen that liquor would be stored in the garage and that the club would not be for the general public but for club members only.

Chairman Robert G. Williams said that the garage premises would have to be included in the license, since the liquor will be stored there.

There were no objections to the proposal.

The selectmen received a letter from John Mason Harding, president of the Stockbridge Bowl Association, in which Harding said neither he nor the association found the plan objectionable.

Another letter from John H. P. Gould of Mahkeenac Farm also contained no objections. On the contrary, Gould said "We support the application and trust you will see fit to grant it."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 17 1969

Booze at Tanglewood

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

The Boston Symphony Orchestra applies for a liquor license on the Stockbridge side of the road with no opposition, yet the Tanglewood janitor and John H. P. Gould voice personal opposition to antique shops and art galleries on the Lenox side. Evidently it is all right to dispense liquor in the front yard but not antiques and art in the backyard.

Mr. Kiley says, "We are opposed to any commercial enterprise coming into the area for we feel it would be detrimental." Evidently they are going to give liquor away as collecting money might be termed commercialization. Are liquor establishments detrimental to an area? Dear music lovers, reel to Manhattan symphonies but don't stoop to commercialized Lenox antique shops and art galleries.

Mr. Kiley, self-styled lone champion of our Lenox neighborhood, always says "we." The Lenox people of the neighborhood have not opposed art galleries, antique shops or commercialization. In all his personal appearances in opposition, Mr. Kiley says "we" without presentation to the various boards of written evidence from whomever "we" is. Perhaps it is time that some board found out and were more concerned with what they and the people want, instead of what Mr. Kiley wants for the area.

Controlled commercialization just might help the Boston Symphony with its financial difficulties better than the dispensation of uncontrolled liquor patrons. Do other area music centers dispense only music and liquor to attract the people? Instead of traffic jams from symphonies, antique shops and art galleries, the Lenox people will be faced with possible drunken traffic jams in their front yards. There is no opposition to liquor licenses but there is opposition to self means of area commercialization. Who will control it? Mr. Kiley or the Zoning Board of Appeals?

LAURIEL I. St. JACQUES.
207 Main St.,
Lenox.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 16 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 19 1969

A Spirited Answer To the BSO Deficit

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has another headache. Deficit-ridden but still eager to engage the ablest players and most exciting conductors, it must now find a charismatic barkeep for Tanglewood.

The BSO assumes no new role at Lenox in donning the white coat and toting the tray. Since 1885 (with years out during Prohibition) wine and beer have flowed in Symphony Hall during the nine-week spring series of Pops concerts. Generations of students and properly light-hearted Bostonians have seen Symphony Hall transformed into a beer garden where waitressees have long popped corks in time with the music. Since 1930 Arthur Fiedler as Pops conductor has made the formula of malt and schmaltz the envy of the musical world, especially since it is financially self-sustaining and then some.

Tanglewood's Tent Club, however, is a more proper variation, even though spirits will also be available. Refreshments will be served before and after the concerts and at intermission, but not during the performance as at Symphony Hall Pops. Those allowed to use the facility, set off from the Shed, will be those Tanglewood ticket-buyers who in addition have helped to subsidize the Berkshire Music Center's program by contributing $100 either for its general support or purchasing a ticket in that amount affording admission to all the 30 student concerts which the Center offers.

Many will be delighted with the Tent Club as plaiting another flower in the hair of the Berkshire Festival, in keeping with its spirit and setting. The BSO, however, must look upon it as a device whose festive overtones are a by-product. The Berkshire Music Center, as important as it is artistically and professionally to the total Tanglewood operation, has been a severe drain. And the Boston orchestra, no less than every major U.S. symphony organization, is in deep trouble with serious limitations on income while expenses have esaclated. Because Tanglewood can comfortably accommodate audiences fivefold beyond the 2,631 seats of Symphony Hall, anything that adds enjoyment for its Lenox patrons, it is hoped, can be transposed into lessening its financial crisis.

Ogden Nash has maintained that liquor is quicker. With a maid, yes, but with a deficit we shall see.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUN 25 1969

Hard Likker to Flow At Hub Symph's Tanglewood Festival for First Time

Pittsfield, Mass., June 24.

For the first time hard liquor will be sold this season at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But alcoholic drinks won't be available to all musiclovers simply because they are of legal age, which is 21 in Massachusetts. (The festival opens July 4 and closes Aug. 24.)

The Stockbridge selectmen okayed an all-alcoholic beverage license for the Tent Club Inc., which will serve drinks to club members only on a tent to be erected adjacent to the 6,000-seat Tanglewood music shed. Club membership will be open to music patrons who contribute a minimum of $100 to the Berkmusic Center. The center is part of the Tanglewood complex and includes a music school for advanced music students.

It should be noted that the BSO management uses the town of Lenox, adjacent to Stockbridge, as its address apparently for convenience. All or virtually all of the 210-acre Tanglewood estate lies in Stockbridge and for that reason the selectmen of that town had license jurisdiction.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,000

JUN 18 1969

New England

LIQUOR TO BE SOLD TO SOME PATRONS AT TANGLEWOOD

Alcoholic beverages will be sold at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Stockbridge this summer for the first time. The Stockbridge Selectmen have approved an all-alcoholic beverage club license for the Tent Club, Inc., which will operate out of a tent adjacent to the Music Shed.

Club membership will be open to patrons who contribute a minimum of $100 to the Berkshire Music Center. It will not be a public facility.

FOR THE FIRST TIME since it was founded in 1934, Tanglewood is dispensing the hard stuff this summer. Whoa, there, fellows. Before you get your thirst—and your hopes—up, let it be known that the Lenox, Mass., home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is selective. Only members of the Tent Club will be able to belly up to the bar in a tent adjacent to the Music Shed. Membership to the club is open to anyone who contributes $100 or more to the Berkmusic Center, Variety notes.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, July 7, 1969

Between the Acts

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

SO MANY PROJECTS are undertaken and prosper on which I have not been consulted that I have automatically narrowed my interests without any perturbation whatsoever. The news of a liquor license at Tanglewood for a limited clientele is such an issue. My vote was not solicited and my opinion now is of no value or pertinence, as much as it may be on my, and off Leinsdorf's beat.

* * * *

TANGLEWOOD has provided food—snacks and drinks—for many years. Not only before and after performances and at intermissions but for the covenience of the students of the Berkshire Music Center. Such service has always been available. The extra step to a bar should not disturb the routine nor require an excessive expenditure of energy.

There is considerable precedent for such facilities. Philharmonic Hall in Lincoln Center allots most of the spacious entrance foyer to a bar and restaurant where patrons may enjoy or endure, as the case may be, the scrutiny of everyone entering the building to attend a performance of no matter what nature.

At Saratoga there were restaurants before a festival was thought of but now the facilities complement each other with mutual benefits. Race-goers can rest and relax at dining tables before concerts raise them again to high levels of excitement.

* * * *

IN THE NEW complex of halls and theatres across the Thames in London, the restaurants in Festival Hall and the bars—some for liquor and some for tea—are major components of the pleasures of attending performances in that concentration of entertainment. In Covent Garden opera house the counters serving sandwiches and tea at the entr'actes are profusely attended. Indeed, it takes an adroit and adept tea-hound to juggle such a serving in those surroundings. The carpeted steps of the staircases are usually the first vantage points garnered by those who know their way around and if one can keep his feet and his food away from the constant traffic, which uses the necessarily narrowed channels on those occasions, there is the minor additional satisfaction of savoir-faire.

The Paris Opera has bars in the marble-floored promenades adjoining the grand staircase. Waiting for a chance to get near the bar or to pierce the inexorable stream of promeneurs is an achievement which may fail to survive or to suffer. They offer a full carte of spirits but, strange as it may be, the most popular libations are a glass of champagne and a glass of our Atlanta beverage served, too, in the same festive type of stemwear.

* * * *

IN MUNICH'S HerkulesSalle in the Residenz, the counter of inviting snacks includes, in season, a delicious dish of ice cream over which is poured a sauce of fresh raspberries from a steaming, chafing-dish. New York theatres now offer the resources of a bar and service quite different from the usual lemon- and orange-ades previously available from ambulating vendors. In London theatres you may order your tea when you take your seat at the beginning of a show and the usher notes your seat location and brings you a tray at the intermission.

Vienna theatres and the HofOper have distinctive offerings of this nature at midpoints in performances, including, as one might expect, snatches of wurst and steins of beer. All these are customs which prevail and probably have long traditions but there are other factors which apply to the situation. Curtain time in Europe is often sevenish and opera often begins at six with the result that patrons may not feel ready to eat a substantial meal in the late afternoon. Tea thus serves a purpose which otherwise might not appear so valid and serves a function quite apart from the hoity-toity raised-pinkie role some of us sometimes assign it. In Brussels certain cafes invite patronage for "five o'clock tea (sic) a toutes heures."

* * * *

THESE CURTAIN TIMES disarrange the schedules of any of us who are accustomed to 8:30 schedules. Many Europeans or tourists at theatre or opera plan to eat after the performance. As a matter of fact, many of the exclusive restaurants do not open before 8 and even then early arrivals find a desert of unoccupied tables. In Madrid, I seem to recall, dining hours are even later.

"Parsifal" is sometimes played with a very long interval to allow the audience to eat leisurely and abundantly. Glyndebourne intentionally has curtain-time at 5 to allow for a meal in the restaurants or a champagne picnic on the elegant lawns of the estate and also to permit patrons to catch the train back to London in reasonable time. When "Mourning Becomes Elektra" played New York the last time, time for a meal was arranged between the long halves of the drama.

* * * *

ALL THEATRES and opera houses now being built make greater provision for the audiences to promenade at intermissions. This has long been a pleasant feature of European halls. Carnegie Hall in New York has always been deficient in this respect. The bar and cocktail facility added some years back partially supplied this accommodation but there has never been, nor yet is, enough room to circulate and be seen by the other parts of the audience. And that is a factor in theatre- or concert-going that should not be minimized.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 28 1969

Whitestone

TANGLEWOOD TENT is up and ready to serve alcoholic beverages, starting July 5, to any patron willing to contribute $100 to the Friends of Music. This marks the first time drinks will be available on the Tanglewood grounds. The tent club committee, from left, consists of Mrs. William H. Ryan, Mrs. Henry J. Wheelwright, Mrs. Lawrence K. Miller, Mrs. J. D. Hatch, Mrs. John S. McLennan, Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris, and Mrs. Robert Alsop. More than 150 people have joined the club so far.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 30 1969

99

Beer and Wine and Just Weekends

State Blocks Booze at Tanglewood

By DOANE HULICK

STOCKBRIDGE — The Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission (ABCC) has denied the Tent Club, Inc., a permit to sell liquor at Tanglewood.

According to commission secretary George V. Nelson, the ABCC ruled against the corporation's application for an all-alcoholic beverage club license, because a tent does not conform to statutes regulating clubs.

Nelson this morning said the Boston Symphony Orchestra has filed a legal memorandum petitioning the ABCC to reconsider its action. Although the commission is slated to meet today and tomorrow, officials would not disclose whether reconsideration was on the agenda.

* * *

Thomas D. Perry, manager of both the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Tent Club, told The Eagle that the ABCC is expected to act on the appeal today. "I hope we can sell liquor," Perry said. "If not, we will not perish from the face of the earth."

Acting as the local licensing authority, the Selectmen voted June 16 to grant the permit. The ABCC, however, has ultimate jurisdiction in issuing liquor licenses.

Although the ABCC action came about three weeks ago, the Tent Club, operating out of a tent adjacent to the Music Shed, has been selling wine and beer to club patrons on weekends. The corporation has done so with three-day wine and malt licenses issued by the Selectmen.

The Tent Club is open to patrons who contribute a minimum of $100 to the Berkshire Music Center. The club's aim is "to provide an amenity to the principals of the Music Center," according to Perry.

* * *

The legal question prompting the ABCC to turn down the license involves terminology. According to state liquor regulations, a club is a building, and a tent, the ABCC feels, hardly fits into that category.

Perry said the club's legal counsel will argue that other temporary structures have been "accredited as a club."

Should the ABCC fail to reverse its ruling, the club is expected to reapply.

At the local hearing, there were no objections to the request. In fact, several residents wrote letters supporting the venture. Although there has been no liquor sold at Tanglewood this summer, a precedent was set, since alcoholic beverages (beer and wine) did go on sale for the first time in the music festival's history.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 28 1969

Frank McCarthy

SCULPTURE of Homer Gunn of Dean Hill Road, Richmond, is one of two of his works exhibited at Tanglewood. This one is in front of the Tent Club. Gunn has been commissioned to turn out sculptures for a new chain of Jack August restaurants.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 16 1969

BSO Asks ABCC To Reconsider Liquor Permit

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has asked the state Alcoholic Beverages Control Commissioner (ABCC) to reconsider its denial of permission that would allow sale of liquor at Tanglewood.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of both the BSO asd the Tent Club, Inc., the applicant for the liquor license, said he hopes the ABCC will review the decision today.

The commission denied the Tent Club's permit request because it said a tent does not conform to the state law's definition of a private club.

The Tent Club was established this year and is open to patrons who contribute at least $100 to the Berkshire Music Center. No liquor has been sold at Tanglewood, but beer and wine have been sold this year for the first time in the spa's history.

Mr. Perry said the Tent Club "will not perish from the face of the earth" if it doesn't get the liquor license, but said its legal counsel will argue that other temporary structures have been accredited as clubs and given such licenses.

The Stockbridge Selectmen June 16 voted, for their part, to allow the liquor sales. The state has final say, however.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUL 30 1969

Tanglewood Tent Club Denied Liquor Permit

The Tent Club, Inc. at Tanglewood, site of the Stockbridge music festival center, has been denied a permit to sell liquor by the state Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission on grounds that the tent does not conform to statutes regulating clubs.

No liquor has yet been sold at Tanglewood, but the Tent Club, opened this year for patrons who contributed a minimum of $100 or more to Tanglewood, and has been serving beer and wine for the first time in its history. The selectmen of Stockbridge have been issuing three-day licenses to the club since the ABCC's action on the local permit they issued June 16.

The Commission refused to comment on the legal memorandum filed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra petitioning the ABCC to reconsider. Although the Commission has not promised to act at this week's meeting, Thomas D. Perry, Symphony manager and director of the Tent Club, says he hopes for favorable action this week. The dispute involves the fact that the club is a tent and not a building, the state's grounds for denial. Counsel for the club will argue that temporary structures have received all-alcoholic club licenses in the past.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 29 1969

Tanglewood Club Liquor License Awaits State Appeal Outcome

STOCKBRIDGE — The state Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission has denied a permit to sell liquor at the Tent Club, Inc., at Tanglewood.

Action Due

Commission Secretary George V. Nelson informed the corporation that its application for an all-alcoholic club license has been denied because the tent does not conform to statutes regulating clubs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has filed a legal memorandum petitioning the ABCC to reconsider its action. Commission officials refused to disclose if the petition would be taken up at this week's meeting.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Symphony and the tent club, hopes for favorable action this week.

Beer, Wine Sold

Stockbridge selectmen had issued the local permit June 16 subject to ABCC approval.

Since the ABCC action, the club has been selling beer and wine to club patrons on three-day licenses issued by selectmen.

The ABCC's denial involved terminology. According to state regulations, a club is a building and not a tent. The club's legal counsel will argue that other temporary structures have received club accreditation.

The Tent Club was set up for the first time this year, and is open to patrons who contribute a minimum of $100 or more to the Berkshire Music Center.

No liquor has been sold as yet at Tanglewood, but for the first time in the center's history, beer and wine have been sold this year.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 29 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 31 1969

A Dour Camel's Head Under the BSO Tent

Tanglewood from a fiscal standpoint is aptly named. And not Tanglewood alone. According to a Ford Foundation official who knows the score, "The plain fact is that the performing arts in America are broke."

Notwithstanding, there is little help from the ABCC. Gumshoes from the state's alcoholic control board have debarred the Tent Club, patently a device for chipping away at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's deficit, from serving spirits. Rules galore forbid, though wine and beer apparently pass muster. These beverages somehow are not freighted with the perils to health, safety and morals attached to knocking one back under canvas. In another day those congregated under canvas with sawdust underfoot were full of the redemptive spirit with small harm to the Republic other than a religious hangover which soon passed.

Probably no great harm has been done. It is doubtful that anyone who paid a hundred dollars to help support the Berkshire Music Center will demand his dues back because there's no Old Drum to be had under the patronizing canvas. But it will be an eye-opener for anyone who considers the bizarre, out-of-date liquor regulations of Massachusetts. Dispensing of alcoholic beverages in the state is essentially a cartel with the regulations regarding club licenses as capricious as any piece of music played at Tanglewood.

Now if Tanglewood engaged in a raffle for the good of the order, there's the ticket. No class angle, no fuss, no problem. Laws, yes, but as we said, no problem.

★ ★ ★

"Hair" and "Oh Calcutta," two of the most controversial shows ever to hit Broadway have been tentatively scheduled to open in Boston this fall.

The Tent Club Inc., an under-the-tent bistro adjacent to the grounds at Tanglewood, has been denied a permit by the Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission to sell liquor. The reason was that a tent does not conform to statutes regulating clubs. The ruling is being appealed. The Tent Club is for use of those who have contributed a minimum of $100 to the Berkshire Music Center.

Krieger

★ ★ ★

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 31 1969

Tanglewood's Tent Club Fails on New License Bid

STOCKBRIDGE — The Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission has informed the Boston Symphony Orchestra through its attorney, Edward M. Condit Jr. of Boston, that it has voted not to reconsider its July decision denying an all-alcoholic beverages club license to the Tent Club, Inc., at Tanglewood.

Reasons for Denial

In a letter to Condit, a copy of which was sent to the Selectmen, ABCC Chairman Howard M. Miller wrote that additional evidence presented at a hearing held Aug. 11 was considered.

Among the reasons for denial was the fact that a tent "is not of sufficient permanency to qualify as a 'building'" and also that, once the tent was dismantled at the end of the season, the license would be subject to revocation, since there would "then be no premises in existence for the license to attach to."

In conclusion the letter states, "Where licenses are issued on a quota system, we do not deem it in the public interest to approve a license with full privileges where the license would be exercised only two months out of the year and most likely only on weekends during those two months.

"This is so even though the Selectmen have indicated that the total quota of available liquor licenses in town has not been reached and the demand for licenses is low. This demand could, however, change and under our system of licensing, if we were to approve this application, another worthy applicant who might better serve the public would be denied an opportunity for this license."

Original Denial

The ABCC denied the license to the Tent Club on July 27 after the Selectmen, acting as the local licensing authority, voted to grant a liquor license to the club on June 16. Consequently, the club was able only to sell wine and beer on weekends this summer, using three-day permits granted by the Selectmen.

The Tent Club was open to patrons who contributed $100 to the Berkshire Music Center. The club's aim, according to Thomas D. Perry, manager of both the club and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to "provide an amenity to the principals of the music center." Perry has also said that without a license to sell liquor, the club "will perish from the face of the earth."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

SEP 16 1969

99

Beer and Wine and Just Weekends

State Blocks Booze at Tanglewood

By DOANE HULICK

STOCKBRIDGE — The Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission (ABCC) has denied the Tent Club, Inc., a permit to sell liquor at Tanglewood.

According to commission secretary George V. Nelson, the ABCC ruled against the corporation's application for an all-alcoholic beverage club license, because a tent does not conform to statutes regulating clubs.

Nelson this morning said the Boston Symphony Orchestra has filed a legal memorandum petitioning the ABCC to reconsider its action. Although the commission is slated to meet today and tomorrow, officials would not disclose whether reconsideration was on the agenda.

* * *

Thomas D. Perry, manager of both the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Tent Club, told The Eagle that the ABCC is expected to act on the appeal today. "I hope we can sell liquor," Perry said. "If not, we will not perish from the face of the earth."

Acting as the local licensing authority, the Selectmen voted June 16 to grant the permit. The ABCC, however, has ultimate jurisdiction in issuing liquor licenses.

Although the ABCC action came about three weeks ago, the Tent Club, operating out of a tent adjacent to the Music Shed, has been selling wine and beer to club patrons on weekends. The corporation has done so with three-day wine and malt licenses issued by the Selectmen.

The Tent Club is open to patrons who contribute a minimum of $100 to the Berkshire Music Center. The club's aim is "to provide an amenity to the principals of the Music Center," according to Perry.

* * *

The legal question prompting the ABCC to turn down the license involves terminology. According to state liquor regulations, a club is a building, and a tent, the ABCC feels, hardly fits into that category.

Perry said the club's legal counsel will argue that other temporary structures have been "accredited as a club."

Should the ABCC fail to reverse its ruling, the club is expected to reapply.

At the local hearing, there were no objections to the request. In fact, several residents wrote letters supporting the venture. Although there has been no liquor sold at Tanglewood this summer, a precedent was set, since alcoholic beverages (beer and wine) did go on sale for the first time in the music festival's history.

Frank McCarthy

SCULPTURE of Homer Gunn of Dean Hill Road, Richmond, is one of two of his works exhibited at Tanglewood. This one is in front of the Tent Club. Gunn has been commissioned to turn out sculptures for a new chain of Jack August restaurants.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 16 1969

BSO Asks ABCC To Reconsider Liquor Permit

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has asked the state Alcoholic Beverages Control Commissioner (ABCC) to reconsider its denial of permission that would allow sale of liquor at Tanglewood.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of both the BSO asd the Tent Club, Inc., the applicant for the liquor license, said he hopes the ABCC will review the decision today.

The commission denied the Tent Club's permit request because it said a tent does not conform to the state law's definition of a private club.

The Tent Club was established this year and is open to patrons who contribute at least $100 to the Berkshire Music Center. No liquor has been sold at Tanglewood, but beer and wine have been sold this year for the first time in the spa's history.

Mr. Perry said the Tent Club "will not perish from the face of the earth" if it doesn't get the liquor license, but said its legal counsel will argue that other temporary structures have been accredited as clubs and given such licenses.

The Stockbridge Selectmen June 16 voted, for their part, to allow the liquor sales. The state has final say, however.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUL 30 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 28 1969

Tanglewood Club Liquor License Awaits State Appeal Outcome

STOCKBRIDGE -- The state Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission has denied a permit to sell liquor at the Tent Club, Inc., at Tanglewood.

Action Due

Commission Secretary George V. Nelson informed the corporation that its application for an all-alcoholic club license has been denied because the tent does not conform to statutes regulating clubs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has filed a legal memorandum petitioning the ABCC to reconsider its action. Commission officials refused to disclose if the petition would be taken up at this week's meeting.

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Symphony and the tent club, hopes for favorable action this week.

Beer, Wine Sold

Stockbridge selectmen had issued the local permit June 16 subject to ABCC approval.

Since the ABCC action, the club has been selling beer and wine to club patrons on three-day licenses issued by selectmen.

The ABCC's denial involved terminology. According to state regulations, a club is a building and not a tent. The club's legal counsel will argue that other temporary structures have received club accreditation.

The Tent Club was set up for the first time this year, and is open to patrons who contribute a minimum of $100 or more to the Berkshire Music Center.

No liquor has been sold as yet at Tanglewood, but for the first time in the center's history, beer and wine have been sold this year.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 29 1969

Tanglewood Tent Club Denied Liquor Permit

The Tent Club, Inc. at Tanglewood, site of the Stockbridge music festival center, has been denied a permit to sell liquor by the state Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission on grounds that the tent does not conform to statutes regulating clubs.

No liquor has yet been sold at Tanglewood, but the Tent Club, opened this year for patrons who contributed a minimum of $100 or more to Tanglewood, and has been serving beer and wine for the first time in its history. The selectmen of Stockbridge have been issuing three-day licenses to the club since the ABCC's action on the local permit they issued June 16.

The Commission refused to comment on the legal memorandum filed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra petitioning the ABCC to reconsider. Although the Commission has not promised to act at this week's meeting, Thomas D. Perry, Symphony manager and director of the Tent Club, says he hopes for favorable action this week. The dispute involves the fact that the club is a tent and not a building, the state's grounds for denial. Counsel for the club will argue that temporary structures have received all-alcoholic club licenses in the past.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 29 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 31 1969

A Dour Camel's Head Under the BSO Tent

Tanglewood from a fiscal standpoint is aptly named. And not Tanglewood alone. According to a Ford Foundation official who knows the score, "The plain fact is that the performing arts in America are broke."

Notwithstanding, there is little help from the ABCC. Gumshoes from the state's alcoholic control board have debarred the Tent Club, patently a device for chipping away at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's deficit, from serving spirits. Rules galore forbid, though wine and beer apparently pass muster. These beverages somehow are not freighted with the perils to health, safety and morals attached to knocking one back under canvas. In another day those congregated under canvas with sawdust underfoot were full of the redemptive spirit with small harm to the Republic other than a religious hangover which soon passed.

Probably no great harm has been done. It is doubtful that anyone who paid a hundred dollars to help support the Berkshire Music Center will demand his dues back because there's no Old Drum to be had under the patronizing canvas. But it will be an eye-opener for anyone who considers the bizarre, out-of-date liquor regulations of Massachusetts. Dispensing of alcoholic beverages in the state is essentially a cartel with the regulations regarding club licenses as capricious as any piece of music played at Tanglewood.

Now if Tanglewood engaged in a raffle for the good of the order, there's the ticket. No class angle, no fuss, no problem. Laws, yes, but as we said, no problem.

★ ★ ★

"Hair" and "Oh Calcutta," two of the most controversial shows ever to hit Broadway have been tentatively scheduled to open in Boston this fall.

Krieger

The Tent Club Inc., an under-the-tent bistro adjacent to the grounds at Tanglewood, has been denied a permit by the Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission to sell liquor. The reason was that a tent does not conform to statutes regulating clubs. The ruling is being appealed. The Tent Club is for use of those who have contributed a minimum of $100 to the Berkshire Music Center.

★ ★ ★

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 31 1969

Tanglewood's Tent Club Fails on New License Bid

STOCKBRIDGE — The Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission has informed the Boston Symphony Orchestra through its attorney, Edward M. Condit Jr. of Boston, that it has voted not to reconsider its July decision denying an all-alcoholic beverages club license to the Tent Club, Inc., at Tanglewood.

Reasons for Denial

In a letter to Condit, a copy of which was sent to the Selectmen, ABCC Chairman Howard M. Miller wrote that additional evidence presented at a hearing held Aug. 11 was considered.

Among the reasons for denial was the fact that a tent "is not of sufficient permanency to qualify as a 'building'" and also that, once the tent was dismantled at the end of the season, the license would be subject to revocation, since there would "then be no premises in existence for the license to attach to."

In conclusion the letter states, "Where licenses are issued on a quota system, we do not deem it in the public interest to approve a license with full privileges where the license would be exercised only two months out of the year and most likely only on weekends during those two months.

"This is so even though the Selectmen have indicated that the total quota of available liquor licenses in town has not been reached and the demand for licenses is low. This demand could, however, change and under our system of licensing, if we were to approve this application, another worthy applicant who might better serve the public would be denied an opportunity for this license."

Original Denial

The ABCC denied the license to the Tent Club on July 27 after the Selectmen, acting as the local licensing authority, voted to grant a liquor license to the club on June 16. Consequently, the club was able only to sell wine and beer on weekends this summer, using three-day permits granted by the Selectmen.

The Tent Club was open to patrons who contributed $100 to the Berkshire Music Center. The club's aim, according to Thomas D. Perry, manager of both the club and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to "provide an amenity to the principals of the music center." Perry has also said that without a license to sell liquor, the club "will perish from the face of the earth."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

SEP 16 1969

100

Meeting of Orchestra Minds...

By MARJORIE ALGE, Society Editor

Blossom Center's second Festival season devoted to the classics opened last night amid fair skies and some distinguished company: namely the officials of the big five U. S. symphony orchestras.

Well, almost five. Talcott Banks, the Boston Symphony's president, had to fly back to Bean Town before the concert.

But the others — presidents, board chairmen and managers of the New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and our own Cleveland orchestras — heard the concert of Beethoven, Janacek and Brahms in Blossom's shell-like pavilion and reveled in the opportunity.

Boris Sokoloff, who manages the Philadelphia Orchestra, and his wife, Nancy, never did go down to the shell. They began the concert on the log at the top of the slope with John Edwards, manager of the Chicago Symphony and Boston Symphony manager and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry.

The rest went down to their box seats after the Beethoven "Coriolanus" Overture. But the Sokoloffs sat out the concert under the stars and obviously loved the Blossom sound outdoors.

For Sokoloff it was another homecoming. His father, the late Nikolai Sokoloff, founded the orchestra and conducted it from 1919 to 1933.

The VIPs of the big five had come to Cleveland at the invitation of Frank E. Joseph and Alfred M. Rankin, chairman of the board and president of Musical Arts Assn., the Cleveland Orchestra's indulgent and worried parent, to talk about ways out of their mutual financial troubles.

It was Joseph who last year organized the group loosely called The Committee of Presidents, Chairmen and Managers of the Big Five Orchestras. The get-together was their first outside New York City and included skull sessions at the nearby Holiday Inn, a tour of Blossom, cocktails in the Pavilion's Green Room overlooking the woods and the relaxing musicians below, and dinner in the new Restaurant, before the concert.

"We're looking for increased support from foundations as a group," said Joseph. "We're interested in art and culture. These need promoting in the U. S."

Others attending the opening were Amyas Ames, president, and Carlos Moseley, manager of the New York Philharmonic; Philadelphia Orchestra president and Mrs. C. Wanton Balis; Alan Jaffee, attorney for the New York Philharmonic, and Mrs. Jaffee; Cleveland Orchestra manager and Mrs. A. Beverly Barksdale and Louis Sudler, president and John Edwards, manager of the Chicago Symphony.

The Rankins entertained the visitors at a dinner party at their home Wednesday and the visiting wives were the guests of Mrs. Rankin and Mrs. Joseph and the feminine members of the Musical Arts board at a luncheon yesterday at the Silver Lakes Country Club.

Tomorrow night Mr. and Mrs. Rankin will be hosts again, this time to the British Ambassador John Freeman who will be the first high-ranking diplomat to attend a concert at Blossom Center.

Alfred M. Rankin, Musical Arts Assn. president (left) and Amyas Ames, New York Philharmonic president.

C. Wanton Balis, board chairman of the Philadelphia Symphony, and Mrs. Alfred M. Rankin.

(Press Photos by Frank Reed)

Louis Sudler, Chicago Symphony president.

Boris Sokoloff, Philadelphia Symphony manager (left), Thomas D. Perry, Boston Symphony manager, and Mrs. Sokoloff.

Frank E. Joseph (left), chairman of the Cleveland Orchestra, and Boris Sokoloff, manager of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Mr. Sokoloff's father, the late Nikolai Sokoloff, was the first conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra.

At left, Mrs. Alan Jaffe of New York, who said her husband is an attorney retained by the "Big Five" orchestras of the United States.

C. Wanton Baylis, chairing and to tour Blossom.

"The idea took hold," he said, "so our than individually. We can make the approach better through a joint coordinated effort than alone."

100.

Meeting of Orchestra Minds...

By MARJORIE ALGE, Society Editor

Alfred M. Rankin, Musical Arts Assn. president (left) and Amyas Ames, New York Philharmonic president.

Blossom Center's second Festival season devoted to the classics opened last night amid fair skies and some distinguished company: namely the officials of the big five U. S. symphony orchestras.

Well, almost five. Talcott Banks, the Boston Symphony's president, had to fly back to Bean Town before the concert.

But the others — presidents, board chairmen and managers of the New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and our own Cleveland orchestras — heard the concert of Beethoven, Janacek and Brahms in Blossom's shell-like pavilion and reveled in the opportunity.

C. Wanton Balis, board chairman of the Philadelphia Symphony, and Mrs. Alfred M. Rankin.
(Press Photos by Frank Reed)

Boris Sokoloff, who manages the Philadelphia Orchestra, and his wife, Nancy, never did go down to the shell. They began the concert on the log at the top of the slope with John Edwards, manager of the Chicago Symphony and Boston Symphony manager and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry.

The rest went down to their box seats after the Beethoven "Coriolanus" Overture. But the Sokoloffs sat out the concert under the stars and obviously loved the Blossom sound outdoors.

For Sokoloff it was another homecoming. His father, the late Nikolai Sokoloff, founded the orchestra and conducted it from 1919 to 1933.

The VIPs of the big five had come to Cleveland at the invitation of Frank E. Joseph and Alfred M. Rankin, chairman of the board and president of Musical Arts Assn., the Cleveland Orchestra's indulgent and worried parent, to talk about ways out of their mutual financial troubles.

It was Joseph who last year organized the group loosely called The Committee of Presidents, Chairmen and Managers of the Big Five Orchestras. The get-together was their first outside New York City and included skull sessions at the nearby Holiday Inn, a tour of Blossom, cocktails in the Pavilion's Green Room overlooking the woods and the relaxing musicians below, and dinner in the new Restaurant, before the concert.

"We're looking for increased support from foundations as a group," said Joseph. "We're interested in art and culture. These need promoting in the U. S."

Others attending the opening were Amyas Ames, president, and Carlos Moseley, manager of the New York Philharmonic; Philadelphia Orchestra president and Mrs. C. Wanton Balis; Alan Jaffee, attorney for the New York Philharmonic, and Mrs. Jaffee; Cleveland Orchestra manager and Mrs. A. Beverly Barksdale and Louis Sudler, president and John Edwards, manager of the Chicago Symphony.

The Rankins entertained the visitors at a dinner party at their home Wednesday and the visiting wives were the guests of Mrs. Rankin and Mrs. Joseph and the feminine members of the Musical Arts board at a luncheon yesterday at the Silver Lakes Country Club.

Tomorrow night Mr. and Mrs. Rankin will be hosts again, this time to the British Ambassador John Freeman who will be the first high-ranking diplomat to attend a concert at Blossom Center.

Louis Sudler, Chicago Symphony president.

Boris Sokoloff, Philadelphia Symphony manager (left), Thomas D. Perry, Boston Symphony manager, and Mrs. Sokoloff.

man of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Mrs. Alfred M. Rankin, whose husband is president of the Cleveland Orchestra.

Plain Dealer photos (William G. Vorpe)

At right, Louis Sudler, president of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

Below, Mrs. C. Wanton Baylis (right) and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry. Mrs. Baylis is the wife of the chairman of the Philadelphia Orchestra and Mrs. Perry, the wife of the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

'Big Five' Meeting at Blossom Center

By Mary Strassmeyer, Society Editor

"This is a historic day for symphony orchestras," said Frank E. Joseph above the small din of a very short cocktail hour last night.

Mr. Joseph, chairman of the Cleveland Orchestra, surveyed the small number of very important people gathered in the Green Room of Blossom Music Center, and smiled his famous smile.

HE HAD good reason to smile, for the gathering in the Green Room represented the "Big Five" orchestras of the United States, and it was at Mr. Joseph's instigation and invitation that they were in Cleveland and at Blossom Music Center for the opening night of its Blossom Festival Series featuring orchestral classics.

"Just think," Mr. Joseph said, "it was only a year ago that I suggested that we organize an informal group of chairmen, presidents and managers of the 'Big Five' (the Cleveland Orchestra, the Philalelphia Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra) and look what's happened. Now everybody knows everybody else and is having fun."

HE SAID the group calls itself the Committee of Chairmen, Presidents and Managers of the Big Five Orchestras and that it had met in New York until he decided to invite its members to Cleveland for a meeting and to tour Blossom.

"The idea took hold," he said, "so our next meeting will be in Boston. It's really something when busy executives will give up an entire day to travel to another city to see what's going on there. We had been meeting in New York because it was so convenient for everybody."

THE COMMITTEE was impressed with Blossom, "I think it's just fabulous," said Mrs. C. Wanton Baylis, whose husband is chairman of the Philadelphia Orchestra. "Now we can hardly wait to hear the orchestra in this setting."

They were to hear the orchestras, of course, in the first of its thrice-weekly classic series. Opening night conductor was Karel Ancerl, the celebrated Czech conductor.

"I think it's marvelous," said Mrs. Thomas D. Perry, wife of the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"The location of the Pavilion is just so natural and the architect used so many natural items such as the wood in its construction."

MR. JOSEPH said he believed that the only way the great symphony orchestras can make progress is through working together.

"Each of us is in a severe financial bind," he said, "We need more and more support and we're going after money from foundations and others as a group rather than individually. We can make the approach better through a joint coordinated effort than alone."

"Just for the sake of Society" & the Ball

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 461,357 SAT. 453,757

MAY 5 1969

Society in Chicago

90 'harmonize' for symphony

By Ruth Wessman

Getting nearly 90 women together and in "harmony" is no mean accomplishment. That's what happened when the WASO ladies descended on Chicago before noon Monday.

Representatives from 33 cities in the United States and Canada are attending the 17th biennial conference of the Assn. of Women's Committees for Symphony Orchestras.

They'll have a nonstop schedule of meetings and music, wining and dining before they leave town Friday noon — all because they're dedicated to the cause of keeping their local symphony orchestras alive.

Making tracks about Chicago and the North Shore, the ladies will speak and will hear about the problems facing the symphony and how to arouse greater public interest.

Among the guest speakers will be the Art Institute's Charles C. Cunningham; John S. Edwards, general manager of the Chicago Symphony; George London from the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts; George Howerton, dean of the Northwestern School of Music, and Hans W. Heinsheimer, director of publication at G. Schirmer Inc.

Tuesday evening the women will be guests at private parties in Chicago hosted by Mrs. A. Watson Armour III, Mrs. Gaylord A. Freeman, Mrs. Charles S. Potter, Mrs. Edward L. Ryerson, Mrs. William M. Spencer, Mrs. J. Harris Ward, Mrs. Rosecrans Baldwin, Mrs. Arthur S. Bowes and Mrs. Andrew McNally III.

Wednesday morning the ladies will be bussed to Shoreacres to hear Dr. Lee Chrisman of Tanglewood tell about "The Young Artists Program at Tanglewood." And then Mrs. Clive Runnells, Mrs. William S. Covington, Mrs. Albert B. Dick, Mrs. Donald B. Douglas, Mrs. Henry A. Preston, Mrs. Edward McCormick Blair, Mrs. William L. McLennan and Mrs. McMaster MacArthur will be hostesses at luncheons.

That evening Louis Sudler, president of the Orchestral Assn., will give the trustees' dinner at Orchestra Hall when the WASO award will be given to pianist James Adler, a senior at South Shore High School.

Mrs. James G. Dern is conference chairman. Other Chicago delegates are Mrs. Russell M. Baird, Mrs. Paul W. Oliver and Mrs. W. Newton Burdick Jr. Mrs. Hampton S. Lynch of New York City is national president.

Gloucester Times
Tuesday, June 24, 1969

Trips Are Slated as Part Of Summer Activities To Be Sponsored by Cave

Trips to the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, the Tanglewood Music Festival, and the Colonie Summer Theater represent just part of an 11-course summer schedule that will be offered by the Cave for area teen-agers.

In attempting to offer students a chance to explore areas of interest not included in school curriculums, the board of directors of the teen-age center has set up a wide-ranging program of activities for high school and early college students.

With the exception of a tennis course to be taught at the Knox Field courts during the daytime by Miss Sarah Schelle, a uniform fee of $2 will be charged each student per course. However, scholarships will be available for those who feel, for any reason, that they cannot afford the tuition.

Most of the courses will be conducted at night to avoid conflicts with work of summer school schedules.

A course in moviemaking will be offered by Edward Brennan, Cave advisor, from 7 to 8 on Friday nights. Students will participate in making actual sound movies, in color, and will be urged to create an original 8mm film of their own. Classes will meet in the third floor meeting room of the Cave, but filming will be in various spots.

"Where the Action Is," is the title of a course to be supervised by another Cave advisor, William Pollak. The schedule will be determined by the interests of the participants, but the Cave's course booklet list possible trips. Meeting times for the group are also indefinite.

Examination of the current music scene, including trips to the Saratoga Performing Arts Center and Boston, will make up a course to be offered by Brennan from 7 to 9 on Tuesday nights at the Cave's third floor.

An introduction to the automobile and how to cope with its problems, highlighted by a car rally and rodeo, will constitute course four of the summer schedule.

The time schedule and the instructor have yet to be named.

Brennan will offer a daytime golf course at local driving ranges and golf courses for those interested in learning the sport inexpensively.

A drama workshop will be offered twice a week at the Cave's third floor by Rev. Alan J. Sorem, assistant pastor of the First United Presbyterian Church, Johnstown. The course includes staging a play as well as taking trips to both New York City and a summer theater.

In trying to further its aim of helping students to be themselves, the Cave will offer a personal growth seminar, to be taught by George Pilkey, which will meet in two to three hour intensive sessions in the Cave's new rathskeller room. Pilkey, who is involved in personnel work at EMCC, will attempt to devote the course to helping individuals discover "who they are" and thus gain new insights into both themselves and their relationships with others.

Moving outdoors, Miss Schelle and Rev. Sorem will conduct a weekend hiking course at sites of interest in and around the Adirondacks. Tentative excursions will be to Nine Corner Lake, Crum Creek, and Kane Mountain.

For those interested in art, a painting course will be given at the Cave once or twice a week, for six weeks, in periods of one and a half hours. Instruction will be by William Weldner, Knox Junior High School art teacher. As in the other courses, no experience is necessary.

A tentative schedule of trips has also been released by the Cave. Participation in each trip will necessarily be limited. The Cave will defray as many of the expenses as possible, and the maximum charge to students will be that of program tickets, usually from $1.50 to $3.

Trips planned to the Saratoga Arts Center include, "Your Own Thing," a rock musical, June 27; "Slaughter on Tenth Avenue, New York City Ballet Company, July 13; the Cowsills, July 29; the Fifth Dimension, Aug 19, and Janis Joplin, Aug. 27.

Also a Rodgers and Hammerstein program, Aug. 17; an all Tchaikovsky program, Aug. 21, and a Viennese program, featuring the work of Strauss and Schubert, Aug. 24, all presented by Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Philharmonic.

A trip is also planned to the Tanglewood Music Festival, Berkshire, Mass., to see Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops.

Also on the tentative schedule is a July 23 trip to see Broadway's "Fiddler on the Roof" and the Schaefer Central Park Music Festival, with Tim Hardin and Joni Mitchell.

The deadline for the Cave's summer course registration is July 1. Students are asked to register on time so that plans can be completed. Registration can be made at the Cave or by notifying either Rev. Sorem, Pollak, or Brennan. The latter two can be contacted at Johnstown High School.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JUN 12 1969

'Week-end at Tanglewood'

And thinking of nice safaris, "Week-end at Tanglewood," July 18 through 20, will offer a feast of music in that most gorgeous of Berkshire settings made a reality by the late Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Koussevitsky will give a tea party at her Berkshire country house for special visitors, who are joining Friends of the New England Conservatory for this Friday-to-Sunday festival. Conservatory president and Mrs. Gunther Schuller are also hosting an after-concert party.

The John Carters, the Charles Hoveys, the Robert Palmers, Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Stare and the Charles Masons are among "Friends" who will be sharing tennis and golf as well as open rehearsals, Sunday morning chamber music, and Friday/Saturday/Sunday BSO concerts that week-end.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JUN 14 1969 New England

Weekend at Tanglewood by NEC

A WEEKEND AT TANGLEWOOD is planned by the Friends of the New England Conservatory from Friday, July 18, through Sunday, July 20. Making their headquarters at the Curtis Hotel in Lenox, guests will attend the regular Friday, Saturday and Sunday afternoon Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, have the opportunity to play tennis, golf, swim or sight-see, and enjoy Friday's prelude concert, the open rehearsals on Saturday, and the chamber music concert, Sunday morning.

Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Mrs. Schuller will entertain at a party for the group after the Saturday night concert. Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky will be their hostess for tea at "Seranak," her Berkshire house, after the Sunday afternoon concert.

Among those planning to attend the Friends' weekend are Mr. and Mrs. John T. Carter, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Colony, Mr. and Mrs. George Darrell, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph F. Godwin, Mrs. Frank Hinckley, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Mason Jr., Mrs. Edwin Ohl, Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. Palmer, Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Stare and Dr. and Mrs. Nathan B. Talbot.

* * *

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUN 17 1969

A music lovers' dream which would also appeal to the less musically-minded is the "Weekend at Tanglewood" offered by the Friends of the New England Conservatory for July 18 through July 20.

Making their headquarters at the Curtis Hotel in Lenox the guests will attend the regular Friday, Saturday anl Sunday afternoon Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, have an opportunity to play tennis, golf, swim, or sightsee if they wish, and enjoy Friday's prelude concert, the open rehearsals on Saturday, and the Chamber Music Concert Sunday morning.

Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Mrs. Schuller will entertain at a party for the guests after the Saturday night concert, and on Sunday Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky will be their hostess for tea at "Seranak" her Berkshire residence.

Among those planning to attend the Friends' "Weekend at Tanglewood" are Mr. and Mrs. John T. Carter of Weston, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio Colony, Mr. and Mrs. George Darrell, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph F. Godwin, Mrs. Frank Hinckley, Mrs. Charles F. Hovey of Chestnut Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Mason, Jr. of Chestnut Hill, Mrs. Edwin Ohl of Dedham, Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. Palmer of Hingham, Dr. and Mrs. Fredrick Stare of Wellesley and Dr. and Mrs. Nathan B. Talbot of Brookline.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUN 18 1969

"WEEKEND AT TANGLEWOOD" offered by the Friends of the New England Conservatory of Music for Friday, July 18 through Sunday, July 20, is meeting with quick response. The John T. Carters, the Horatio Colonys, the George Darrells, the Joseph F. Goodwins and Mrs. Frank Hinckley, have already made reservations. Also Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, the Robert L. Palmers, Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Mason, Jr., Mrs. Edwin Ohl, Dr. and Mrs. Frederick Stare and Dr. and Mrs. Nathan B. Talbot.

Guests will make their headquarters at the Curtis Hotel, Lenox. They at at liberty to attend the regular Friday, Saturday and Sunday afternoon Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, and will have plenty of opportunity to play tennis, golf, swim or sightsee and enjoy Friday's prelude concert; the open rehearsals on Saturday and the Chamber Music Sunday evening.

Gunther Schuller, president of the Conservatory, and Mrs. Schuller are giving a party for the group after the concert Saturday night. Following the Sunday afternoon concert, Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky will hostess a tea at her lovely Berkshire residence, "Seranek."

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUN 24 1969 E

★ ★ ★

ON the eve of going to Tanglewood to prepare for the Boston Symphony ROrchestra's summer season, Marvin Schofer, its public realtions director, entertained at a cocktail-buffet reception in his Back Bay home for Broadway and opera conductor, Lehman Engel. The guest of honor conducted Boston Pops at Symphony two evenings last week.

In the BSO group of guests coming on from Pops were manager Thomas D. Perry, Jr., and Mrs. Perry; concert manager, Mary Smith; Charles Wilson, asst. conductor; R. Laning Humphrey, program editor; Andrew Raeburn, David Levenson and Barbara Curtis.

Mrs. Marvin Schofer, Sr., flew on from New York for her son's party. Among others were Dr. Ronald Baker, the Richard M. Neumanns, Jeannie Crader (Pops solist); Josephine Davidow (opera singer; William French, Carl Crossman, Neil McNellis (from "Fiddler on the Roof" cast); William Cortes, Dr. Frank Coleord, Philip Bloom and Leonard Gerber.

102.

Social Chatter

047 By Alison Arnold

Friends of N. E. Conservatory Plan Weekend at Tanglewood

A WEEKEND OF MUSIC and relaxation at Tanglewood in the Berkshires is planned by the Committee of Friends of the New England Conservatory, from Friday, July 18, through Sunday, July 20. There will be a prelude concert at 7 o'clock, Friday evening, followed by a box supper at Tanglewood. The regular concert will start at 9 o'clock.

Guests will stay at the Curtis Hotel, where they will gather for cocktails in the garden at 5:30, Saturday afternoon, before the hotel's famous buffet dinner. After the 8 o'clock concert at Tanglewood, there will be a party with the Gunther Schullers.

On Sunday, there will be cocktails and a buffet luncheon at Naumkeag House, the beautiful old Choate mansion now owned by the Trustees of Reservations. After an afternoon concert at Tanglewood, there will be a tea at "Seranek," the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky.

* * *

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,205 (S) 298,557

JUL 7 1969

ROSE WALSH

Tanglewood Fete For Music 'Friends'

SOME 50 FRIENDS of the New England Conservatory of Music who made their reservations in early June for "A weekend of music and relaxation at Tanglewood in the Berkshires," July 18-20, have had very attractive parties planned for them. Guests will be staying at the Curtis Hotel in Lenox — 15 minutes from Tanglewood. The prelude concert on July 18 will be followed by a box supper at Tanglewood.

On the following day there is a choice of pleasures, beginning with breakfast at the Hotel. For music concentrators there will be open rehearsals from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. Sports enthusiasts may play tennis, golf, and go swimming; For the less energetic, sightseeing is a happy diversion.

Cocktails will be served in the garden of the hotel at 5:30 followed by the Curtis' famous buffet. A bus will provide transportation to the 8 o'clock concert at Tanglewood after which there will be a party with Gunther Schuller, president of the N. E. Conservatory, and Mrs. Schuller.

On July 20, a 10 a. m. Chamber Music Concert at the Theatre Concert Hall is optional. An hour later guests will be on their way to the beautiful old mansion and gardens of Naumkeag House which belongs to the Trustees of Reservations, where cocktails and a buffet luncheon will be served.

The group will return to Tanglewood for an early afternoon concert and go on to tea at "Seranah," the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky, whose late husband was the much beloved conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

★ ★ ★

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 4[illegible]

JUL 2 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 3 1968

'Friends' Concert Slated Sunday

The Berkshire Music Center will present the season's first Friends of Music at Tanglewood concert with a program of chamber music Sunday at 10 a.m. The concert is open to the public for a nominal fee.

Pen Women Attend Tanglewood

The Berkshire branch of the National League of Pen Women attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsal at Tanglewood, Lenox, last Saturday. Members from the Boston area also attended.

Members will attend the North Atlantic regional conference at Sugarbush Inn, Warren, Vt., in September. The group is comprised of women in the arts: writers, painters, sculptors, composers and craftsmen. Further information may be had by calling Mrs. Paul A. Lauzon, secretary-treasurer.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 9 1969

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

The babies lay quietly and the little children were hushed in the inspiring atmosphere created by Tanglewood on a perfect summer afternoon.

Tanglewood, that magic name in music and the dream come true of one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's most beloved conductors, Serge Koussevitzky, opened its eight-week season this weekend with a festival of Mozart. For two nights and one afternoon music lovers listened to music that soared and lifted them above their everyday cares, played in a setting that is so beautiful it hurts.

Set among the majestic forest-covered Berkshire Hills between Lenox and Stockbridge the 210 acres of Tanglewood was orginally the estate of William Aspinwall Tappan, a Boston banker and merchant. His descendants, Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan and Mrs. George Brooks, gave the estate to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1936 for its new summer home, and as a permanent site for a Berkshire Festival of Music. Since then 106 members of the B.S.O., together with leading soloists in the musical world, perform concerts every Friday and Saturday evening and on Sunday afternoons in July and August.

After a somewhat damp and foggy start to the season the crowds came in by the thousands Sunday afternoon. Every kind of person from babies in car beds, teen-agers by the hundreds, to the ardent musician, his music scores spread around him on the grass were there. They came with their picnic baskets and rugs and settled on the immaculately kept green lawns for an afternoon of pure delight. They sat under the huge pines and sweeping yew trees set out originally by Mr. Tappan, or in the long open-sided building called The Shed where the orchestra performed.

Flowers are everywhere at Tanglewood, grown and carefully nurtured in a small greenhouse and nursery on the grounds. They hung from baskets down the center of this year's newest innovation at the festival — The Tent Club. A large green marquee holds this latest facility which is available to anyone donating $100 or more to the Berkshire Music Festival and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In effect a refreshment tent where all manner of delicious food and drink is available, it has little tables decorated with flowers set within and without the tent where guests can sit at intermission or after the concerts and enjoy the incredible view down to Lake Mahkeenac and the hills all around.

Sunday afternoon was picnic time and there were some elegant ones in the true old world style to be seen. One very special one had evreything set out on a green damask tablecloth laid on the grass and centered with a posy of flowers. Lace-edged linen napkins and silver cutlery were at each place and each guest was provided with a small wicker basket which orginally had contained split bottles of Bollinger's champagne. In the basket were a tiny cold stuffed Cornish Rock Hen laid on a bed of lettuce and surrounded by cherry tomatoes, and a small half cantalope centered with fresh raspberries decorated with mint leaves. Fresh buttered rolls and cheese, and marinated mushrooms and artichoke hearts were passed and ice cold champagne was sipped as the glorious sounds of Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 27, played by Claude Frank, issued from The Shed.

As with every cultural endeavor Tanglewood has its dedicated supporters who attend at every opportunity. The E. Anthony Kuttens of Brookline are regular visitors as are many of the Board of Overseers of the B.S.O. Consisting of 41 men and women they include among their number Judge Paul Reardon and Louville Niles, both of Hingham, Byron K. Elliott of Needham, Abram T. Collier of Wellesley, who is chairman, and many more.

Tanglewood, like the regular winter season of the B.S.O., has its Council of Friends who support it in every way. Included among them are many summer visitors to the area such as Robert Alsop of New York and Mrs. Stephen V.C. Morris of Washington.

An easy drive up the Massachusetts Turnpike, a visit to Tanglewood is an experience, the peace and beauty of which will linger with the visitor through many a long day afterward.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUL 8 1969

Woman's World

Phyllis Livernois, Women's Editor
764-4325

Boston Symphony Orchestra At Tanglewood Festival

By IRENE JARRY
News Music Columnist

The Tanglewood Berkshire Festival, which started Friday for eight weeks of superb concerts, is considered the best festival in America. Concerts will be presented every Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m. by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its official music conductor Erich Leinsdorf.

All concerts will take place in the 6,000-seat Music Shed. It is there that the principals of the orchestra, together with a distinguished faculty, including some of the best composers of America and Europe, hold the annual session of the Berkshire Music Center, a school for "living and working in music." New composers and compositions are born there. They have a large choral group, forums, chamber music, opera, and every other type of musical activity. One encounters artists, actors, dancers, writers, and personalities. It has become as famous a festival as any in Europe.

The first two weeks, as has been established for many years, they follow the popular plan of presenting chamber music concerts with a smaller group of the orchestra playing works of Bach, Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven. The remaining six weeks will be concerts by the full orchestra.

Tuesday nights, they have the Non-classical series again people liked so much last year.

People who like Pop Concerts especially with the famous Arthur Fiedler conducting, can look forward to an exciting evening on Aug. 30 and 31 at 2:30. Have you ever attended one of Arthur Fiedler's rehearsals? They are unlike any other conductor's. He is both interesting and amusing, often using the ludicrous to put an idea across—an elusive combination of clowning and disciplined purpose. There is always the thrill of hearing an expert orchestra tune up which applies to all the concerts there also;—a hair - prickling cacophony of sounds. There is nothing like it. It is the auger of the music to be heard and the remembrances of other concerts.

Each man is madly playing runs and snatches of themes, warming up his instrument and fingers. The violins are playing extracts from "Daphnis and Chloe" perhaps while the flutes are doodling passages from Beethoven, the horns counterpointing with the radical motives of Schonberg or Piston. It is chaos but something more; you recognize the individual bits and get whiffs of what could be . . . fascinating!

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct all of the chamber music concerts except that of July 13th, and ten of the other concerts. Guest conductors conducting the other concerts will be David Zinman, Charles Wilson, Pierre Boulez, Daniel Baenboim, Karel Ancerl, Josef Krips, Max Rudolf, Henry Lewis, Milton Katims. Mr. Leinsdorf will also conduct concert performances of two operas, Mozart's 'Abduction from the Seraglio' July 12th, and Verdi's Otello (in Italian) July 26.

Piano soloists this year are Christoph Eschenbach, Lillan Kallir, John Browning, and Claude Frank. Earl Wild, July 18, 25. Gilbert Kalish, July 18. Andre Watts, July 25. Vladimir Ashkenazy, July 26. Van Cliburn, Aug. 9. Malcolm Frazer, Aug. 23.

Violin Soloists: Joseph Silverstein, July 11, 13 and August 2. Paul Zukofsky, July 18. Pinchas Zukerman, July 20.

Cellists; Jules Eskin, tomorrow and Aug. 2. Jacqueline DuPre, Aug. 3. Flute; Doriot Dwyer, Sunday. Oboe; Ralph Gomberg, Aug. 2. Bassoon; Sherman Walt, Aug. 2.

Eleven famous Met singers, Boston Symphony Chamber Ensembles, and three choruses are also part of the many varied solos and concerto works.

The program follows for the major concerts:

July 11, Weekend Prelude 7 p.m. Silverstein and Eskin—Bach Program, The four suites, Leinsdorf.

July 12, Mozart: The Abduction from the Seraglio (in German) Leinsdorf, Tanglewood Choir.

July 13, Graff: Symphony for strings, Bach: Triple concerto in a minor, Dwyer, Silverstein, Levin—Handel: Concerto Grosso op. 6 no. 1, Mozart: 'Linz' Symphony k. 425 Zinman.

July 18, Weekend, Prelude 7 p.m. Zukofsky and Kalish, Leinsdorf, Rossini: L'Italiana in Algeri' Overture, Scharwenka: Piano Concerto no. 1 —Wild Stravinsky: The rite of spring.

July 19, Leinsdorf. Concerto and soloist to be announced, plus —Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet suite.

July 20, Leinsdorf, Tchaikovsky, Program: Introduction to Act II 'Swan Lake,' Violin Concerto Zukerman soloist and the Symphony no. 5.

July 25, weekend Prelude 7 p.m. Wild-Leinsdorf Beethoven; Egmont 'Overture, Beethoven: Symphony no. 1 and Brahms: Piano concerto no. 2—Watts.

July 26, Leinsdorf—Verdi: Otello with the 3 full Choirs and soloists.

July 27, Wilson — Sibelius: Symphony no. 2 and Beethoven: 'Emperor' concerto Ashkenazy.

Aug. 1, Weekend Prelude 7 p.m. Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Leindorf — Stravinsky: Symphony in C, Schonenberg: A survivor from Warsaw and Brahsm: Symphony no. 4.

Aug. 2, Boulez—Haydn: Sinfonia concertante op. 84—Debussy: Jeux, Bartok: Two rhapsodies for violin and orch. Silverstein—Debussy: La mer.

Aug. 3, Barenboim, Mendelssohn: 'Ruy Blas' Overture, Elgar: Cello concerto—Dupre, Beethoven: Symphony no. 5.

Aug. 8 Weekend Prelude, Berkshire Boy Choir, Ancerl Smetana: Ma Viast.

Aug. 9, Leinsdoft, Debussy: Three nocturnes—Tanglewood Choir. Weill:Suite from 'The Threepenny Opera,' Brahms: Piano concerto no. 1. Cliburn.

Aug. 10, Krips, Haydn: 'Surprise' Symphony, Strauss: Till Eulenspiegel, Shubert: Symphony no. 9.

Aug. 15, Weekend Prelude 7 p.m. Boston Symphony Chamber Players, Leinsdorf, Beethoven Program—'Pastoral' Symphony, 'Eroica' Symphony.

Aug. 16, Rudolf, Haydn: Symphony no. 91, Bartok: Dance Suite, Tchaikovsky: 'Pathetique' Symphony.

Aug. 17, Lewis, Berlioz: 'Corsaire' Overture, Berlioz: Nuits d'ete, Mozart: Parto from 'La clemenza di Tito' K. 621, Rossini: Druds sorte from L'Italiana Horne, Tchaikovsky: Francesca da Rimini.

Aug. 22, Weekend, Prelude 7 p.m. Sills, Katims, Rossini: 'Gazza Ladra' Overture, Tchaikovsky: Symphony no. 4, Vaughan Williams: Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Taillis, Ravel: 'Daphnis et Chloe no. 2.

Aug. 23, Leinsdorf, Varese: Deserts, Beethoven: Piano concerto no. 4. Frager—Stravinsky: 'Firebird' suite.

Aug. 24, Leinsdorf, Berlioz: 'Royal hunt and storm from 'The Trojans.' Beethoven: Symphony no. 9. Sills, Kopleff, Alexander, Diaz, Bershire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir.

NEWS
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
(E) 5,742

JUL 10 1969

103

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 13 1969 New England

...In the Berkshires, its Tanglewood

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Staff Writer

The blue-eyed, 2-year-old smiled engagingly, licked the sugar off her cookie, and listened to the Boston Symphony Orchestra play the Mozart Jupiter Symphony.

Two picnic blankets away on the wide green lawns of Tanglewood were two little boys, running their mini-cars silently back and forth.

Hunndreds of teen-agers sprawled on the grass or kept silent watch at the curving rim of the great Music Shed.

Music students pored over their scores, and inside and out, the Sunday afternoon quiet was broken only by the bright golden notes of Mozart's last symphony.

The huge trees drowsed in the clear Berkshire sunlight, and more than one white-haired listener, lawn-chaired in the shade, slept a little too.

On this still Summer day, Serge Koussevitzsky's dream the Berkshire Music Center was very real.

His widow, her fragile face luminous with pleasure in this favorite music, remembered the opening night of more than 30 years ago as she and her sister Anna, Duchess de Leuchtenberg, strolled quietly in The Tent, the BSO's newest at Tanglewood.

A gathering place for special contributors to Tanglewood, The Tent drew the longtime hierachy of this Glyndebourne of America at its festive opening. Cabots and Tafts, senators from Washington, and visitors from England lifted a toast to Symphony, and over their heads, pink and violet Fuchsias swayed a little in the cool breeze.

MEMBERS of BSO debate a score between performances.

FIRST time at Tanglewood for Mrs. David Sharpley of England.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUL 22 1969

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

In years to come tales will be told of exactly where people were and what they were doing at the precise moment of man's landing on the moon. Some were at the beach, others at home, but surely one of the most impressive and unforgettable places to be was at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

To a standing and prolonged ovation maestro Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony to a crashing close. To the thousands and thousands of music lovers in The Shed who were on their feet and calling for an encore he held up his hand for silence and said, "The word has just come that man has landed safely on the moon. The orchestra and I would like to play the National Anthem." And to an emotion-packed audience who joined in with the words, the men of the orchestra rose to their feet and saluted the astronauts in their own special way.

Among the audience at this all-Tchaikovsky program were the members of the Friends of the New England Conservatory to whom the afternoon was a climax to a wonderful weekend of music in the Berkshires. Arranged and sponsored by the Friends organization, the group had arrived Friday evening in time for for the prelude concert at Tanglewood, followed by one of the special Tanglewood box suppers before the regular Friday evening concert.

The famous old Curtis Hotel in Lenox was the base of operations for the group and here they stayed Friday and Saturday nights. The well-known buffet dinner of the hotel was enjoyed Saturday evening and after the evening concert at Tanglewood, the Friends joined the president of the New England Conservatory, Gunther Schuller, and his wife for a party.

The highlight of the social part of the weekend came at noon on Sunday when the group were guests for luncheon at Naumkeag, the beautiful old mansion at Stockbridge that is now the property of the Trustees of Reservations.

Here they gathered on the terrace behind the big, rambling Victorian house designed in 1885 by Stanford White for Joseph Choate, one-time United States Ambassador to Great Britain. The gardens, all 46 acres of them, fall in terraces to a water garden below, and the view from any part encompasses a panoramic view of the rolling wooded Berkshire hills.

Deep in conversation within the tiled walls of the Chinese garden were Dr. Nathan B. Talbot of Brookline and John H. Carter of Weston, whose wives are among the most active members of the Friends of the New England Conservatory. An exquisite enclosed area the Chinese Garden has a peaceful temple within its walls in which are examples of Chinese sculpture and tiling. A deep blue hammock is hung here inviting guests to relax and enjoy the view of the hills.

Mrs. Charles E. Mason, Jr. of Chestnut Hill was urging the guests to tour the house with its fabulous treasures and furnishings of the twenties. Like Mrs. Jack Gardner's palace on the Fenway, the house was left by Miss Mabel Choate to the Trustees of Reservations with the understanding that nothing would be moved or changed, and so it is a living memorial to a way of life in a particular period of history. Leading a group consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Palmer of Hingham, and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Goodwin of Cohasset, Mrs. Mason was asked numerous questions about the house. Her husband is an officer of the Trustees of Reservations.

Among the guests at the luncheon was Mrs. Frank Hinckley whose daughter, Mrs. Sharles F. Hovey of Chestnut Hill, accompanied her on the weekend. Mrs. Hinckley was delighting the group of Friends with reminiscences of days gone by when she was a guest at Naumkeag, for she was a close friend of Miss Mabel Choate and used to be a frequent visitor at the estate.

Mrs. Edwin Ohl of Dedham was another at the luncheon and weekend, as were the George Darrells and the Horatio Colonys. Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory, arrived in time for luncheon, looking like a 'symphony in green' as he wore a green sports jacket and matching slacks.

There was complete agreement among the Friends that it had been a perfect weekend, and one that every one hoped would become an annual event on the calendar of the Friends of the New England Conservatory.

'twas Party Weekend For BSO Overseers

THIS WAS A MUSIC and party weekend for Boston Symphony Orchestra's Board of Overseers and their wives at Tanglewood, Lenox, beginning Friday evening with a concert by the Berkshire Boy Choir (formed three years ago to establish an American Choir of the highest international standing). Guests went on to a picnic supper in the Tent before attending the Leinsdorf-conducted Stravinsky, Schoenberg, Brahms program.

Saturday there was a tour of Tanglewood, a luncheon meeting (just for the Overseers) in the Tent followed by a mid-afternoon vocal concert at the Berkshire Music Center. Mrs. John L. Senior entertained at cocktails before the evening concert conducted by Boulez. The concert offered Haydn, Debussy and Bartok (Silverstein).

Yesterday Mr. and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry, Jr., gave a luncheon before the afternoon concert conducted by Berenboim and later guests adjourned for tea at "Seranak," the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky.

The Talcott M. Banks, the Philip K. Allens, Msgr. Edward G. Murray, the Robert C. Alisops and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock were among those participating in the festive weekend. Others were the Abram T. Colliers, the Lawrence Kaplans, Leo Beranek, the Gardner Browns, Carleton P. Fuller, Mrs. C. D. Jackson, the Lawrence K. Millers (he is publisher of the Berkshire Eagle).

Also the Herbert W. Fratts, the Donald B. Sinclairs, Mr. and Mrs. John Hoyt Stookey (one of the founders of the Berkshire Boys' Choir); the Robert G. Weises and members of the Tanglewood Council of Friends.

★ ★ ★

JOAN KENNEDY will narrate Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" Tuesday night at the first "Old Timers Night" program, conducted by Arthur Fielder in his annual Tanglewood appearance with his celebrated Boston Pops Orchestra. It benefits the Orchestra's pension fund. Song sheets with the lyrics of Ta-Ra-Ra-Boom De Ay, The Sidewalks of New York, Sweet Rosie O'Grady, Daisy, The Band Played On, After the Ball, A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight and similar great favorites will be given to the audience with their program. Mrs. Kennedy, who delighted the full-house Boston Pops audience with her narration in the Spring, will repeat her performance.

Tickets are now on sale at Tanglewood ($4 to $6.50 for box seats). Admission to the lawn, on sale at 6 p. m., the day of the concert is $3.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

AUG 4 1969

IRON MOUNTAIN RECORD
Monday, August 4, 1969

Mensa Group To Visit Tanglewood

The area members of Mensa, an association of individuals who qualify for membership by virtue of their IQ ratings being among the top 2 per cent, plan two activities this month, local secretary Willard J. Hoyt of Castleton announces.

Saturday members will attend the open rehearsal of the orchestra and related activities at the Tanglewood music festival in the Berkshires.

Sunday, Aug. 24, an outing is planned aboard the secretary's sailing sloop on the Hudson River, leaving from the Castleton Boat Club.

Mensa International claims membership and subscribers to its monthly Mensa Bulletin in 61 countries.

NE

Arts Council Sets August Date for Tanglewood Trip

Monadnock Area Arts Council and the Peterborough Recreation Dept. are co-sponsors of a planned Aug. 31 expedition to the Berkshires to hear Arthur Fiedler and the famed Boston Pops Festival Orchestra.

Music lovers will leave by bus at 10 a.m. for "Tanglewood," the Lenox, Mass. summer home of the Boston Symphony.

A $10 per person fee will include bus fare and a seat in the shed.

There are 38 tickets available; none will be sold after Monday, Aug. 25. Those wishing tickets should send cash or check (payable to Peterborough Recreation Dept.), to Rec. Director Russ Bardwell.

RECORDER-TRANSCRIPT
JAFFREY, N. H.
4,100

JUL 31 1969

Music Students To Visit Tanglewood

GREAT BARRINGTON—Reuel Sheldon, Director of music at Monument Mountain Regional High School, has announced that there will be a field trip to Tanglewood Saturday for all students who participated in the summer music program.

Transportation will be provided from the high school at 1:30. About 70 students are expected to go. There will be no charge.

Correction: The special meeting of the Berkshire Hills Regional School Committee will be held tonight at 7:30, instead of Thursday night as reported in The Eagle last Friday.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 20 1969

200 BSO Tickets Donated to Low-Income Units

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has donated 200 Shed seats for tomorrow night's concert by Mahalia Jackson to Pittsfield antipoverty agencies.

Albert A. Bogdan, executive director of the Pittsfield Urban Coalition, said he secured the tickets from the Tanglewood management and has given them to Mrs. Elizabeth Caesar of the Action for Opportunity staff for distribution to residents of the city's low-income areas.

Car pools are being arranged to get the people to the concert.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 29 1969 New England

oh?

103

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 13 1969 New England

...In the Berkshires, its Tanglewood

By MARJORIE SHERMAN
Staff Writer

The blue-eyed, 2-year-old smiled engagingly, licked the sugar off her cookie, and listened to the Boston Symphony Orchestra play the Mozart Jupiter Symphony.

Two picnic blankets away on the wide green lawns of Tanglewood were two little boys, running their mini-cars silently back and forth.

Hunndreds of teen-agers sprawled on the grass or kept silent watch at the curving rim of the great Music Shed.

Music students pored over their scores, and inside and out, the Sunday afternoon quiet was broken only by the bright golden notes of Mozart's last symphony.

The huge trees drowsed in the clear Berkshire sunlight, and more than one white-haired listener, lawn-chaired in the shade, slept a little too.

On this still Summer day, Serge Koussevitzsky's dream the Berkshire Music Center was very real.

His widow, her fragile face luminous with pleasure in this favorite music, remembered the opening night of more than 30 years ago as she and her sister Anna, Duchess de Leuchtenberg, strolled quietly in The Tent, the BSO's newest at Tanglewood.

A gathering place for special contributors to Tanglewood, The Tent drew the longtime hierachy of this Glyndebourne of America at its festive opening. Cabots and Tafts, senators from Washington, and visitors from England lifted a toast to Symphony, and over their heads, pink and violet Fuchsias swayed a little in the cool breeze.

MEMBERS of BSO debate a score between performances.

FIRST time at Tanglewood for Mrs. David Sharpley of England.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUL 22 1969

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

In years to come tales will be told of exactly where people were and what they were doing at the precise moment of man's landing on the moon. Some were at the beach, others at home, but surely one of the most impressive and unforgettable places to be was at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

To a standing and prolonged ovation maestro Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony to a crashing close. To the thousands and thousands of music lovers in The Shed who were on their feet and calling for an encore he held up his hand for silence and said, "The word has just come that man has landed safely on the moon. The orchestra and I would like to play the National Anthem." And to an emotion-packed audience who joined in with the words, the men of the orchestra rose to their feet and saluted the astronauts in their own special way.

Among the audience at this all-Tchaikovsky program were the members of the Friends of the New England Conservatory to whom the afternoon was a climax to a wonderful weekend of music in the Berkshires. Arranged and sponsored by the Friends organization, the group had arrived Friday evening in time for for the prelude concert at Tanglewood, followed by one of the special Tanglewood box suppers before the regular Friday evening concert.

The famous old Curtis Hotel in Lenox was the base of operations for the group and here they stayed Friday and Saturday nights. The well-known buffet dinner of the hotel was enjoyed Saturday evening and after the evening concert at Tanglewood, the Friends joined the president of the New England Conservatory, Gunther Schuller, and his wife for a party.

The highlight of the social part of the weekend came at noon on Sunday when the group were guests for luncheon at Naumkeag, the beautiful old mansion at Stockbridge that is now the property of the Trustees of Reservations.

Here they gathered on the terrace behind the big, rambling Victorian house designed in 1885 by Stanford White for Joseph Choate, one-time United States Ambassador to Great Britain. The gardens, all 46 acres of them, fall in terraces to a water garden below, and the view from any part encompasses a panoramic view of the rolling wooded Berkshire hills.

Deep in conversation within the tiled walls of the Chinese garden were Dr. Nathan B. Talbot of Brookline and John H. Carter of Weston, whose wives are among the most active members of the Friends of the New England Conservatory. An exquisite enclosed area the Chinese Garden has a peaceful temple within its walls in which are examples of Chinese sculpture and tiling. A deep blue hammock is hung here inviting guests to relax and enjoy the view of the hills.

Mrs. Charles E. Mason, Jr. of Chestnut Hill was urging the guests to tour the house with its fabulous treasures and furnishings of the twenties. Like Mrs. Jack Gardner's palace on the Fenway, the house was left by Miss Mabel Choate to the Trustees of Reservations with the understanding that nothing would be moved or changed, and so it is a living memorial to a way of life in a particular period of history. Leading a group consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Palmer of Hingham, and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Goodwin of Cohasset, Mrs. Mason was asked numerous questions about the house. Her husband is an officer of the Trustees of Reservations.

Among the guests at the luncheon was Mrs. Frank Hinckley whose daughter, Mrs. Sharles F. Hovey of Chestnut Hill, accompanied her on the weekend. Mrs. Hinckley was delighting the group of Friends with reminiscences of days gone by when she was a guest at Naumkeag, for she was a close friend of Miss Mabel Choate and used to be a frequent visitor at the estate.

Mrs. Edwin Ohl of Dedham was another at the luncheon and weekend, as were the George Darrells and the Horatio Colonys. Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory, arrived in time for luncheon, looking like a 'symphony in green' as he wore a green sports jacket and matching slacks.

There was complete agreement among the Friends that it had been a perfect weekend, and one that every one hoped would become an annual event on the calendar of the Friends of the New England Conservatory.

'twas Party Weekend For BSO Overseers

THIS WAS A MUSIC and party weekend for Boston Symphony Orchestra's Board of Overseers and their wives at Tanglewood, Lenox, beginning Friday evening with a concert by the Berkshire Boy Choir (formed three years ago to establish an American Choir of the highest international standing). Guests went on to a picnic supper in the Tent before attending the Leinsdorf-conducted Stravinsky, Schoenberg, Brahms program.

Saturday there was a tour of Tanglewood, a luncheon meeting (just for the Overseers) in the Tent followed by a mid-afternoon vocal concert at the Berkshire Music Center. Mrs. John L. Senior entertained at cocktails before the evening concert conducted by Boulez. The concert offered Haydn, Debussy and Bartok (Silverstein).

Yesterday Mr. and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry, Jr., gave a luncheon before the afternoon concert conducted by Berenboim and later guests adjourned for tea at "Seranak," the home of Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky.

The Talcott M. Banks, the Philip K. Allens, Msgr. Edward G. Murray, the Robert C. Alisops and Mrs. Harris Fahnestock were among those participating in the festive weekend. Others were the Abram T. Colliers, the Lawrence Kaplans, Leo Beranek, the Gardner Browns, Carleton P. Fuller, Mrs. C. D. Jackson, the Lawrence K. Millers (he is publisher of the Berkshire Eagle).

Also the Herbert W. Fratts, the Donald B. Sinclairs, Mr. and Mrs. John Hoyt Stookey (one of the founders of the Berkshire Boys' Choir); the Robert G. Weises and members of the Tanglewood Council of Friends.

★ ★ ★

JOAN KENNEDY will narrate Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" Tuesday night at the first "Old Timers Night" program, conducted by Arthur Fielder in his annual Tanglewood appearance with his celebrated Boston Pops Orchestra. It benefits the Orchestra's pension fund. Song sheets with the lyrics of Ta-Ra-Ra-Boom De Ay, The Sidewalks of New York, Sweet Rosie O'Grady, Daisy, The Band Played On, After the Ball, A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight and similar great favorites will be given to the audience with their program. Mrs. Kennedy, who delighted the full-house Boston Pops audience with her narration in the Spring, will repeat her performance.

Tickets are now on sale at Tanglewood ($4 to $6.50 for box seats). Admission to the lawn, on sale at 6 p. m., the day of the concert is $3.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

AUG 4 1969

TROY RECORD
Monday, August 4, 1969

Mensa Group To Visit Tanglewood

The area members of Mensa, an association of individuals who qualify for membership by virtue of their IQ ratings being among the top 2 per cent, plan two activities this month, local secretary Willard J. Hoyt of Castleton announces.

Saturday members will attend the open rehearsal of the orchestra and related activities at the Tanglewood music festival in the Berkshires.

Sunday, Aug. 24, an outing is planned aboard the secretary's sailing sloop on the Hudson River, leaving from the Castleton Boat Club.

Mensa International claims membership and subscribers to its monthly Mensa Bulletin in 61 countries.

NE

Arts Council Sets August Date for Tanglewood Trip

Monadnock Area Arts Council and the Peterborough Recreation Dept. are co-sponsors of a planned Aug. 31 expedition to the Berkshires to hear Arthur Fiedler and the famed Boston Pops Festival Orchestra.

Music lovers will leave by bus at 10 a.m. for "Tanglewood," the Lenox, Mass. summer home of the Boston Symphony.

A $10 per person fee will include bus fare and a seat in the shed.

There are 38 tickets available; none will be sold after Monday, Aug. 25. Those wishing tickets should send cash or check (payable to Peterborough Recreation Dept.), to Rec. Director Russ Bardwell.

RECORDER-TRANSCRIPT
JAFFREY, N. H.
4,100

JUL 31 1969

Music Students To Visit Tanglewood

GREAT BARRINGTON—Reuel Sheldon, Director of music at Monument Mountain Regional High School, has announced that there will be a field trip to Tanglewood Saturday for all students who participated in the summer music program.

Transportation will be provided from the high school at 1:30. About 70 students are expected to go. There will be no charge.

Correction: The special meeting of the Berkshire Hills Regional School Committee will be held tonight at 7:30, instead of Thursday night as reported in The Eagle last Friday.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 20 1969

200 BSO Tickets Donated to Low-Income Units

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has donated 200 Shed seats for tomorrow night's concert by Mahalia Jackson to Pittsfield antipoverty agencies.

Albert A. Bogdan, executive director of the Pittsfield Urban Coalition, said he secured the tickets from the Tanglewood management and has given them to Mrs. Elizabeth Caesar of the Action for Opportunity staff for distribution to residents of the city's low-income areas.

Car pools are being arranged to get the people to the concert.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 29 1969 New England

oh?

104

Berkshire Festival Called Worthwhile Expedition

By EUGENE BROWN
Ottaway News Service

A female cellist, with the cello between her knees and a heavy bow in her hand, no matter how graceful, still looks like mother rubbing the dirt out of clothes on a washboard held sideways.

I made this observation to Mrs. Brown at the famed Berkshire Festival recently as we heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra accompany sturdy Jacqueline Du Pre at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass.

Going to Tanglewood is usually an expedition for anyone except the natives surrounding Lenox who probably don't.

Torturous Drive

We had driven up from Danbury., Conn., a two-hour drive on Connecticut's torturous Route 7. Most of the time we were poking along behind female motorists looking for rare specimens of roadside butterflies.

I had just finished a tiring 11-9 set of hotly contested tennis doubles and wanted to get to Tanglewood only so I could sleep to soft music. The trip seemed interminable, but Mrs. B assured me that the scenery in Northern Connecticut and Western Massachusetts is rare at any time of the year, and it is indeed.

We had ordered expensive box seats for the festival way back in April. These are comfortable camp chairs in neat boxes. The real music lovers sit on green steel-folding chairs. Bring a cushion unless you are very young or padded.

Daniel Barenboim was the conductor that Sunday afternoon. He is young, born in Buenos Aires and now a citizen of Israel. As a small child he made many musical appearances, as did his wife the cellist, Jacqueline Du Pre, who was born in England. She started on the cello at the age of 5. I wonder to myself why it is possible for a musical genius to start earning a living at 5 whereas a newspaperman seldom achieves even a modest fame till his forties.

I mentioned this to Mrs. B during the concert, but she was listening elsewhere.

Difficult to See Cellist

For music people, the program consisted of an overture, "Ruy Blas," Opus 95 by Mendelssohn; Elgar's cello concerto in E minor, Opus 85, followed by an intermission; and then Beethoven's vigorous Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67.

I thought — and wispered conversations confirmed it — that the cellist should sit on a high platform where you could watch the technique. As it was we had to strain to see her head and shoulders and assume there was a cello below.

The Boston Symphony dresses sensibly for the weather, in no coats but in all white shoes, socks, trousers and shirts.

Ties and belts are black. Barenboim got into a warm lather in a white jacket. His wife wore a medium-length skirt which draped around the cello.

Some day she might wear a miniskirt, if they change the shape of cellos.

This is the 32nd year for the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, in a band shell which is officially called "The Shed."

1890 Appearance

This structure is sort of 1890 in appearance, but there are several modern theatre and snack stands surrounding it, well hidden behind spacious lawns and shaped hemlocks.

The floor of The Shed is hard clay, and the ceiling decor is green steel beams. As the ceiling bends down towards the orchestra pit, it is covered with what looks like 15-foot black bats. Which looks as if the bats were flying into the mouth of a cave. I assume that "bats" are there for acousitical aid.

After the performance, we wandered around the very beautiful box gardens and watched the fascinating dress of permissive youths who are now everywhere. However, we did see many middle-aged folks dressed with the same abandon.

Hundreds of people just sit on the grass during the concert. They can't see much, but what better way is there to listen to music than to be with congenial friends and a picnic basket on soft grass on a sunny afternoon. It. is true you rise with a protesting sacroiliac, but you have lived!

One snatch of overheard conversation in The Shed has made me wonder ever since. Three women were talking to a man about an incident, and he replied: "Well, if she sticks her tongue out at me, I am going to stick my tongue out right at her . . ."

I just hated to go home.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

AUG 13 1969

NEWS-TIMES
DANBURY, CONN.
(E) 29,870

AUG 13 1969

WASHINGTON DATEBOOK

Tanglewood Is Delight After Sizzling D. C.

By BARONESS STACKELBERG

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425

SEP 3 1969

With the President and Congress out of town for three weeks, it was the first time in years official Washington enjoyed a real vacation. President Nixon did everyone a favor by announcing his vacation plans well in advance, unlike President Johnson who usually left for short stays in Texas on the spur of the moment.

Baroness Stackelberg

Congressmen, meanwhile, got around to voting a long-dreamed-of three weeks' vacation for themselves. Their aim, it was said, was to get time to be with their vacationing school-age children. But as happens every year, within 24 hours dozens of them had already flown off for glamor cities like Paris and Hong Kong on "inspection trips."

Most of the diplomatic corps had also left town because there is no point in sweltering in Washington when no White House or Congressional VIP's are around to entertain.

While some of the press went west to cover the California White House, I took off for eight days to Massachusetts to see glamorous international hostess Juliette Cobian and her husband, Rafael, in the Berkshires, where occasionally they retreat to rest up from the rigors of their social life in San Juan, New York and Madrid, as well as in ultra-chic Marbella, near Malaga in Spain, where they are building a fabulous villa.

TANGLEWOOD at Lenox, Mass., was the highlight of the vacation when the emotion-charged voices of 14,120 people shouted and cheered Boston Symphony's conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, at his valedictory performance.

Demonstrations of enthusiasm are normal at Tanglewood. But this was the first time I ever saw such waves of adoration sweep toward a conductor that people were moved to tears.

It wasn't surprising considering the combination of the magnificent orchestra performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, assisted by the marvelous Berkshire Chorus, and a soloist named Beverly Sills, whose voice has been likened to that of Geraldine Farrar, as well as the fond farewell they were extending to Leinsdorf.

TANGLEWOOD incidentally, was founded by the late Serge Koussevitsky as a unique summer academy for advanced music study. Gifted young musicians from here and abroad gather for an intensive eight-week session.

Berkshire Music Center students and faculty members perform publicly almost every day. Orchestra, chamber music, choral and vocal programs and composer's forums are held weekly. The "Friends of Music" at Tanglewood provide both the audience and the tuition funds for the Berkshire Music Center.

Conductor Leinsdorf, incidentaly, left this weekend for Buenos Aires to begin rehearsals for 15 performances at the famed Teatro Colon Opera House.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

FEB 21 1969

BMC Auxiliary To Benefit From Concert at Tanglewood

The Berkshire Medical Center Auxiliary will hold its first major fund-raising event at Tanglewood on Friday, Aug. 15, when, for the first time, a performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will benefit a Berkshire County cause. Luke S. Hayden, chairman, stated that the program will be announced soon.

Luke S. Hayden

Mr. Hayden, who was active in merging the Pittsfield General and St. Luke's hospitals, was the first lay president of St. Luke's. He is a member of the BMC executive committee. Along with Harry Kraut, BSO assistant manager and Tanglewood director, and David Rockefeller Jr., Tanglewood development coordinator, he is arranging the benefit.

The BMC Auxiliary, organized last year after the merging of the hospitals, is itself a merger of the two hospital auxiliaries. St. Luke's auxiliary formed in the early '30s and Pittsfield General's in the early 1900s, when it was the House of Mercy. They were organized by women to supplement the hospitals' incomes and supply, by sewing or purchase, linen and other necessities. Later they added volunteer services and a variety of money-making projects. Since joining forces, they have continued the projects and added others as rising prices have created the need for additional income and the need for additional services has become apparent. The membership totals 1,083.

Since its advent in the Berkshires in 1936, the BSO has played only two benefit concerts at Tanglewood in addition to those for its own pension fund and its summer school, the Berkshire Music Center. During World War II, it performed for British War Relief and again for Russian War Relief, the latter of special interest to the late conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who came to Boston from conducting on the Volga River. During the Pops season in Boston for many years, many organizations have added to their treasuries by sponsoring programs under the baton of Arthur Fiedler.

The Aug. 15 program will be included in the regular Tanglewood series by the full orchestra. The committee is planning special features for the early evening, including picnic parties on the Tanglewood lawn.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Tuesday, February 25, 1969

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Tanglewood on Aug. 15, part of the eight-week Tanglewood Festival, will benefit the Berkshire Medical Ceter.

The performance will be the first major fund raising event of the newly merged medical center.

This will be the third concert in the history of Tanglewood to benefit something other than one of its own projects. During World War 2 it performed for the British War Relief and for the Russian War Relief (seasons were cancelled during the latter part of the war.)

Speical features are being planned fo the evening. These and the program will be announced at a later date.

* * *

Symphony to Perform For Medical Center

PITTSFIELD — For the first time a performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will benefit a Berkshire County cause.

The Berkshire Medical Center Auxiliary will hold its first major fund raising event at Tanglewood Aug. 15. The chairman, Luke S. Hayden, said the program will be announced soon.

Arrangements are being made with Harry Kraut, BSO assistant manager and Tanglewood director, and the Tanglewood development coordinator, David Rockefeller, Jr.

The BMC Auxiliary organized after the merger of St. Luke's and Pittsfield General Hospitals. St. Luke's auxiliary was organized in the early 30s and Pittsfield General in the 20s by women who wanted to help by supplementing hospital incomes and supplying linen and other necessities. Added projects have increased the need for additional income.

The Aug. 15 program will be included in the regular Tanglewood series by the full orchestra. The committee is planning special features for the early evening, including picnics.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

FEB 24 1969

BSO At Tanglewood To Give Benefit Concert For BMC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play for the first time at Tanglewood on Friday, Aug. 15th, a concert to benefit a Berkshire County cause.

Asking the public to save the date, the chairman, Luke S. Hayden, executive committee member of the Berkshire Medical Center, stated that the program will be announced soon. The performance will be the first major fund-raising event for the recently merged Pittsfield General and St Luke's hospitals by its auxiliary.

Since its advent in the Berkshires in 1936, the orchestra has given at Tanglewood only two benefit concerts, in addition to those for its own pension fund and summer school, the Berkshire Music Center.

During World War II it performed for British War Relief and again for Russian War Relief, the latter of special interest to its late conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

The Aug. 15th concert will be included in the regular Tanglewood series by the full orchestra. The committee is planning special features for the early evening, including picnic parties on the Tanglewood lawn.

DALTON-HINSDALE NEWS
DALTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 1,700

FEB 27 1969

Benefit Concert Chairmen Listed

Luke S. Hayden, chairman of arrangements for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Aug. 15 at Tanglewood that will benefit the Berkshire Medical Center, has announced committee chairmen.

Members of the BMC Auxiliary, sponsors of the concert are: Mrs. Henry D. Brigham and Mrs. Francis L. Woods, president and vice president; Mrs. Charles J. Graham in charge of ticket control; Mrs. Edward L. Dobbins, publicity; Mrs. Gilbert D. Kittredge, invitations to patrons and sponsors; Mrs. Frederick S. Klein, designing; and Mrs. James G. Garivaltis, parties on the Tanglewood lawn.

The program for the evening, with special features, will be announced soon. The major fund-raising event of the center for the season, the benefit will involve many of the 1,200 auxiliary members who contribute money and volunteer services to the Pittsfield General and St. Luke's hospital units that merged in 1968.

Ticket information may be obtained and seats reserved by a call or letter to Miss Virginia Rhodes, 74 Wendell Ave., Pittsfield.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

APR 5 1969

Aides Named for BMCA Concert

Luke S. Hayden, chairman of arrangements for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Aug. 15 at Tanglewood that will benefit the Berkshire Medical Center, has announced committee heads.

Members of the BMC Auxiliary, sponsor of the gala evening who are planning it, are: Mrs. Henry D. Brigham and Mrs. Francis L. Woods, president and vice president; Mrs. Charles J. Graham in charge of ticket control; Mrs. Edward L. Dobbins, publicity; Mrs. Gilbert D. Kittredge, invitations to patrons and sponsors; Mrs. Frederick S. Klein, designing; and Mrs. James G. Garivaltis, parties on the Tanglewood lawn.

The program for the evening, with special features, will be announced at an early date. The major fund-raising event of the Center for the season, the benefit will involve many of the 1,200 Auxiliary members who contribute money and volunteer services to the Pittsfield General and St. Luke's hospital units that merged in 1968.

Ticket information may be obtained and seats reserved by a call or letter to Miss Virginia Rhodes, 74 Wendell Ave.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

APR 7 1969

105.

Tanglewood Benefit

LEE — Tickets for the gala evening at Tanglewood Aug. 15 for the benefit of the Berkshire Medical Center will be sold Saturday from 10 to 2 at the Lee Super Market.

Heading the sale in Lee are Mrs. Francis P. Devanny, chairman, Mrs. William K. Collins and Mrs. Stuart C. Miller. Both reserved seat and general admission tickets will be sold. On the Tanglewood program for the evening are Beethoven's "Pastoral" and "Eroica" symphonies, with Eric Leinsdorf conducting.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 23 1969

Labor Secretary To Attend Tanglewood Gala

George P. Shultz

A member of President Nixon's Cabinet will attend the gala evening at Tanglewood on Friday, Aug. 15. Secretary of Labor George P. Shultz and Mrs. Shultz have accepted the invitation of the Berkshire Medical Center Auxiliary, signed by Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky and Mrs. Norman Rockwell for the Beethoven concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, and other events of the evening that will benefit the Pittsfield General and St. Luke's units of the medical center.

Secretary Shultz, for the past 25 years a summer resident of the Swift River section of Cummington, when appointed by the President was granted leave from the Center of Advanced Studies in the Behavioral Sciences at Stanford University, where he is a fellow. He and Mrs. Shultz will be guests at a cocktail-buffet of Councilman and Mrs. Edward L. Dobbins at their home, 101 Colt Road, preceding the concert.

General admission tickets to the event, which will also include a musical prelude by the Boston Symphony Players at 7 p.m. and festivities on the Tanglewood lawn from 8 to 9, with opportunity to picnic, are on sale at England's and the Pittsfield General gift shop. Reserved seats are available through Miss Virginia Rhodes, 74 Wendell Ave.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 25 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 28 1969

Reserved Seats For BMC Gala

To accommodate those wishing reserved seats for the gala evening at Tanglewood Aug. 15 for the benefit of the Berkshire Medical Center, tickets will be sold in central locations during the coming week. The sale has been arranged by Mrs. Homer D. Laube and Mrs. Samuel Boxer, ticket chairmen for Pittsfield.

On Friday, Aug. 1, from 10 to 3, tickets will be sold at the City Savings Bank, and at Sammy Vincent's music store, on Aug. 2 from 10 to 1. Mrs. John M. Allen has arranged a sale from Aug. 4 to 7 at Sammy Vincent's by volunteers of the Berkshire Medical Auxiliary, which is sponsoring the event.

At the concert the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and there will be a musical prelude by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and festivities on the Tanglewood lawn.

General admission tickets are on sale every day at England's, Sammy Vincent's, the City Savings Bank and the Pittsfield General unit gift shop.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 31 1969

Stockbridge

Tickets for the gala evening at Tanglewood on Aug. 15 to benefit the Berkshire Medical Center will be sold at the Red Lion Inn on Thursday, Aug. 7, from 11 to 2:30 and 5:30 to 8:30. The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, will be preceded by a musical prelude by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and a program on the lawn. The sale of reserved seats and general admissions will be under the direction of Mrs. Fayette O. White Jr.

Plan a Tanglewood Picnic

The Berkshire Medical Center Auxiliary's gala evening at Tanglewood on Friday, Aug. 15, will be the culmination of six months of planning for the first major fund-raising event of the combined auxiliaries of Pittsfield General and St. Luke's hospitals.

On a stormy February afternoon, the committee headed by Luke S. Hayden met to formulate plans for the evening, which will feature an all-Beethoven concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among the special features planned are picnic parties on the spacious lawns preceding the concert. Set the stage for the concert with a well-stocked hamper and a congenial group of friends, and plan to take part in the festivities.

When grandad was a lad, he knew what picnics were. In those days, the picnic hamper groaned with a load of cold chicken, vegetables, fresh fruits and cheeses. The picnic was an event that required hearty food for appetites whetted by fresh air.

Hurrah for the good old days! Today's picnic basket can provide the same elegant assortment of goodies—most important among them plenty of juicy cold roast chicken.

Twin Lemon Chickens make any picnic meal doubly delicious. Lemon juice and tarragon add their flavors to the birds. The inside of the chicken is succulent; the skin, crisp and an appetizing golden-brown.

With the chicken, serve a platter of cold antipasto. Try beets, artichoke hearts, olives, button mushrooms, chick peas, or any cold canned vegetable for that matter. Marinate them with French dressing or serve them without dressing, as you choose. Either way, they add a pleasant note of sophistication to the picnic.

With antipasto, cold roast chickens, a crisp crust bread, fruit, cheese and yummy dessert, the meal is certain to be a high spot of the evening.

TWIN LEMON CHICKENS

2 whole broiler-fryer chickens
2 teaspoons Ac'cent, divided
2 teaspoons salt, divided
2 teaspoons tarragon, divided
1 lemon

Sprinkle cavity of each chicken with ½ teaspoon of the Ac'cent, ½ teaspoon of the salt an ½ teaspoon of the tarragon. Hook wing tips into back to hold neck skin. Truss chickens. Rub each chicken with cut surface of ½ lemon and sprinkle each with ½ teaspoon Ac'cent and ½ teaspoon salt and ½ teaspoon tarragon. Place on rack in small roasting pan. Bake in 375 degrees oven 30 minutes per pound. Yield: Four servings of a half-chicken each.

Ann Giddings, who sometimes surprises a hungry Friday-night news staff with baked goodies, has agreed to share her recipe for Delights, an easy to prepare, easy to carry dessert. It's just the right note on which to end a pre-concert picnic.

DELIGHTS

Melt 1 stick butter or margarine in 9 by 13 baking tin.

Mix in 1½ cup crushed vanilla wafers.

Sprinkle 1 small package chocolate bits, then 1 can cocoanut, and 1 cup sliced nuts. Pour 1 can (39c size) condensed milk over all.

Bake 25 minutes at 375 degrees.

Note: May need a few minutes more baking time.

If you have neither the time nor the inclination to make your own picnic, reservations may be made with Mrs. James G. Garivaltis, 200 Holmes Road, for box suppers prepared by the Tanglewood kitchen staff. The choices are half-chicken, fruit and brownies, or tuna or chicken salad sandwiches, relishes and desert.

Mrs. Garivaltis has also announced that all BMCA ticket holders will be entitled to use the Tent Club that night.

Marge Harris

Cold roast chickens, flavored with lemon and tarragon, are a welcome picnic duo. Sharing the spotlight: an elegant antipasto, cheese and fresh fruit.

Joel Librizzi

Mrs. Edward L. Dobbins and Mrs. James G. Garivaltis, chairmen of lawn parties preceding Berkshire Medical Center Auxiliary's gala evening at Tanglewood, refer to cookbook for recipes. The all-Beethoven concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held Friday, Aug. 15. Proceeds will benefit the medical center and are available at England's and Sammy Vincent's.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 1 1969

Medical Center Benefit Soon

A benefit for the Berkshire Medical Center is being held at Tanglewood on Aug. 15. General admission tickets for the gala evening are available at Pierce World Travel Agency in Williamstown for $3. Reserved seats, priced from $5 to $18 are also available by contacting Mrs. Walter Kearsey in Williamstown.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be performing at the benefit, with a musical prelude from 7 to 8 and a Beethoven concert at 9. There will be lawn festivities between these two programs.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 1 1969

Joel Librizzi

CANDY-STRIPERS Marjorie Goodrich, Terri McKee, Polly Himes and Pamela Milukas are selling tickets for the Aug. 15 gala at Tanglewood. The event will be the first major fund-raising effort for the Berkshire Medical Center's Auxiliary.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 2 1969

105.

Tanglewood Benefit

LEE — Tickets for the gala evening at Tanglewood Aug. 15 for the benefit of the Berkshire Medical Center will be sold Saturday from 10 to 2 at the Lee Super Market.

Heading the sale in Lee are Mrs. Francis P. Devanny, chairman, Mrs. William K. Collins and Mrs. Stuart C. Miller. Both reserved seat and general admission tickets will be sold. On the Tanglewood program for the evening are Beethoven's "Pastoral" and "Eroica" symphonies, with Eric Leinsdorf conducting.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 23 1969

Labor Secretary To Attend Tanglewood Gala

George P. Shultz

A member of President Nixon's Cabinet will attend the gala evening at Tanglewood on Friday, Aug. 15. Secretary of Labor George P. Shultz and Mrs. Shultz have accepted the invitation of the Berkshire Medical Center Auxiliary, signed by Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky and Mrs. Norman Rockwell for the Beethoven concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, and other events of the evening that will benefit the Pittsfield General and St. Luke's units of the medical center.

Secretary Shultz, for the past 25 years a summer resident of the Swift River section of Cummington, when appointed by the President was granted leave from the Center of Advanced Studies in the Behavioral Sciences at Stanford University, where he is a fellow. He and Mrs. Shultz will be guests at a cocktail-buffet of Councilman and Mrs. Edward L. Dobbins at their home, 101 Colt Road, preceding the concert.

General admission tickets to the event, which will also include a musical prelude by the Boston Symphony Players at 7 p.m. and festivities on the Tanglewood lawn from 8 to 9, with opportunity to picnic, are on sale at England's and the Pittsfield General gift shop. Reserved seats are available through Miss Virginia Rhodes, 74 Wendell Ave.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 25 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 28 1969

Reserved Seats For BMC Gala

To accommodate those wishing reserved seats for the gala evening at Tanglewood Aug. 15 for the benefit of the Berkshire Medical Center, tickets will be sold in central locations during the coming week. The sale has been arranged by Mrs. Homer D. Laube and Mrs. Samuel Boxer, ticket chairmen for Pittsfield.

On Friday, Aug. 1, from 10 to 3, tickets will be sold at the City Savings Bank, and at Sammy Vincent's music store, on Aug. 2 from 10 to 1. Mrs. John M. Allen has arranged a sale from Aug. 4 to 7 at Sammy Vincent's by volunteers of the Berkshire Medical Auxiliary, which is sponsoring the event.

At the concert the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and there will be a musical prelude by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and festivities on the Tanglewood lawn.

General admission tickets are on sale every day at England's, Sammy Vincent's, the City Savings Bank and the Pittsfield General unit gift shop.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 31 1969

Stockbridge

Tickets for the gala evening at Tanglewood on Aug. 15 to benefit the Berkshire Medical Center will be sold at the Red Lion Inn on Thursday, Aug. 7, from 11 to 2:30 and 5:30 to 8:30. The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, will be preceded by a musical prelude by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and a program on the lawn. The sale of reserved seats and general admissions will be under the direction of Mrs. Fayette O. White Jr.

Plan a Tanglewood Picnic

The Berkshire Medical Center Auxiliary's gala evening at Tanglewood on Friday, Aug. 15, will be the culmination of six months of planning for the first major fund-raising event of the combined auxiliaries of Pittsfield General and St. Luke's hospitals.

On a stormy February afternoon, the committee headed by Luke S. Hayden met to formulate plans for the evening, which will feature an all-Beethoven concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among the special features planned are picnic parties on the spacious lawns preceding the concert. Set the stage for the concert with a well-stocked hamper and a congenial group of friends, and plan to take part in the festivities.

When granddad was a lad, he knew what picnics were. In those days, the picnic hamper groaned with a load of cold chicken, vegetables, fresh fruits and cheeses. The picnic was an event that required hearty food for appetites whetted by fresh air.

Hurrah for the good old days! Today's picnic basket can provide the same elegant assortment of goodies—most important among them plenty of juicy cold roast chicken.

Twin Lemon Chickens make any picnic meal doubly delicious. Lemon juice and tarragon add their flavors to the birds. The inside of the chicken is succulent; the skin, crisp and an appetizing golden-brown.

With the chicken, serve a platter of cold antipasto. Try beets, artichoke hearts, olives, button mushrooms, chick peas, or any cold canned vegetable for that matter. Marinate them with French dressing or serve them without dressing, as you choose. Either way, they add a pleasant note of sophistication to the picnic.

With antipasto, cold roast chickens, a crisp crust bread, fruit, cheese and yummy dessert, the meal is certain to be a high spot of the evening.

TWIN LEMON CHICKENS

- 2 whole broiler-fryer chickens
- 2 teaspoons Ac'cent, divided
- 2 teaspoons salt, divided
- 2 teaspoons tarragon, divided
- 1 lemon

Sprinkle cavity of each chicken with ½ teaspoon of the Ac'cent, ½ teaspoon of the salt an ½ teaspoon of the tarragon. Hook wing tips into back to hold neck skin. Truss chickens. Rub each chicken with cut surface of ½ lemon and sprinkle each with ½ teaspoon Ac'cent and ½ teaspoon salt and ½ teaspoon tarragon. Place on rack in small roasting pan. Bake in 375 degrees oven 30 minutes per pound. Yield: Four servings of a half-chicken each.

Ann Giddings, who sometimes surprises a hungry Friday-night news staff with baked goodies, has agreed to share her recipe for Delights, an easy to prepare, easy to carry dessert. It's just the right note on which to end a pre-concert picnic.

DELIGHTS

Melt 1 stick butter or margarine in 9 by 13 baking tin.

Mix in 1½ cup crushed vanilla wafers.

Sprinkle 1 small package chocolate bits, then 1 can cocoanut, and 1 cup sliced nuts. Pour 1 can (39c size) condensed milk over all.

Bake 25 minutes at 375 degrees.

Note: May need a few minutes more baking time.

If you have neither the time nor the inclination to make your own picnic, reservations may be made with Mrs. James G. Garivaltis, 300 Holmes Road, for box suppers prepared by the Tanglewood kitchen staff. The choices are half-chicken, fruit and brownies, or tuna or chicken salad sandwiches, relishes and desert.

Mrs. Garivaltis has also announced that all BMCA ticket holders will be entitled to use the Tent Club that night.

Marge Harris

Cold roast chickens, flavored with lemon and tarragon, are a welcome picnic duo. Sharing the spotlight: an elegant antipasto, cheese and fresh fruit.

Medical Center Benefit Soon

A benefit for the Berkshire Medical Center is being held at Tanglewood on Aug. 15. General admission tickets for the gala evening are available at Pierce World Travel Agency in Williamstown for $3. Reserved seats, priced from $5 to $18 are also available by contacting Mrs. Walter Kearsey in Williamstown.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be performing at the benefit, with a musical prelude from 7 to 8 and a Beethoven concert at 9. There will be lawn festivities between these two programs.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 1 1969

Joel Librizzi

Mrs. Edward L. Dobbins and Mrs. James G. Garivaltis, chairmen of lawn parties preceding Berkshire Medical Center Auxiliary's gala evening at Tanglewood, refer to cookbook for recipes. The all-Beethoven concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held Friday, Aug. 15. Proceeds will benefit the medical center and are available at England's and Sammy Vincent's.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 1 1969

Joel Librizzi

CANDY-STRIPERS Marjorie Goodrich, Terri McKee, Polly Himes and Pamela Milukas are selling tickets for the Aug. 15 gala at Tanglewood. The event will be the first major fund-raising effort for the Berkshire Medical Center's Auxiliary.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 2 1969

106

BMC Tanglewood Gala Program Is Announced

Berkshire Community College President Thomas E. O'Connell will be master of ceremonies at the interim hour of the gala evening at Tanglewood Aug. 15, which is for the benefit of the Berkshire Medical Center. The interlude between the musical prelude at 7 and the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Beethoven program, which will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf beginning at 9, will start with bagpipe fanfare by Jack MacGregor of Lee, who plays with the Springfield Pipers.

From 8 to 9, when many of the audience will picnic on the lawn, the Berkshire Hillsmen will sing a 20-minute program of light music on the porch of the Tanglewood-estate house. The Hillsmen include about 40 men of Pittsfield who have sung barbershop harmony for 15 years. Danny Johnson, guitarist, will conclude the interlude program.

At 7 the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will perform two compositions by Franz Schubert: the String Trio No. 1 in B Flat and the "Trout Quintet" for piano and strings. Guest pianist will be Gilbert Kalish of New York and Boston, who will play with Joseph Silverstein, BSO concertmaster; Jules Eskin, cello; Burton Fine, viola, and Henry Portnoi, double bass, all occupying first chairs in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At 9, the Boston Symphony will perform Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 in F Major ("The Pastoral") and Symphony No. 3 in E Flat ("Eroica").

General admissions for the gala, sponsored by the Berkshire Medical Center Auxiliary, are available daily at Sammy Vincent's, the City Savings Bank, England's and Pittsfield General and St. Luke's hospital units. Picnic suppers may be ordered by calling Mrs. James D. Garivaltis of 300 Holmes Road.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 8 7 1969

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 8 1969

BCC President to Emcee During Tanglewood Event

Berkshire Community College President Thomas E. O'Connell will be master of ceremonies for the interim hour at the Gala Evening at Tanglewood in Lenox Aug. 15 for the benefit of the Berkshire Medical Center.

Bagpipe fanfare by Jack MacGregor of Lee, who plays with the Springfield Pipers, will open the program between the musical prelude at 7 p.m. and the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Beethoven concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

From 8 to 9, when many of the audience will picnic on the lawn, the Berkshire Hillsmen will sing a 20-minute program of light music on the porch of the Tanglewood-estate house which serves as the classroom building of the Berkshire Music Center and contains its administration offices.

The Hillsmen include about 40 men of Pittsfield who have sung barbershop harmony for 15 years. Danny Johnson, guitarist of Adams, will conclude the interlude program.

At 7 o'clock the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will perform in the musical prelude two compositions by Franz Schubert: the String Trio No. 1 in B Flat and the "Trout Quintet" for piano and strings. The guest pianist will be Gilbert Kalish of New York and Boston, who will play with Joseph Silverstein, BSO concertmaster; Jules Eskin, cello; Burton Fine, viola and Henry Portnoi, double bass, all occupying first chairs in the larger orchestra.

At 9 o'clock the full Boston Orchestra will perform Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 in F Major ("The Pastoral") and Symphony No. 3 in E. Flat ("Eroica").

Reserved seats and general admission tickets for the evening may be ordered by calling Miss Virginia Rhodes of 74 Wendell Ave., Pittsfield. Picnic suppers may be ordered by calling Mrs. James D. Garivaltis of 300 Holmes Rd., Pittsfield.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 18 1969

Whitestone

LENOX DELEGATION at Friday's benefit performance at Tanglewood for the Berkshire Medical Center included Mr. and Mrs. W. Hewitt Clifford, Mr. and Mrs. Russell Dickinson, the Rev. and Mrs. Harris B. Hinchcliff, Mr. and Mrs. John D. Bender and Mr. and Mrs. George E. Mole.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 9 1969

Tanglewood Interlude to Benefit Berkshire Medical Center

PITTSFIELD — Berkshire Community College President Thomas E. O'Connell will be master of Ceremonies for the interim hour at Tanglewood Aug. 15 for the benefit of the Berkshire Medical Center.

A bagpipe fanfare by Jack MacGregor of Lee, who plays with the Springfield Pipers, will open the program between the musical prelude at 7 p. m. and the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Beethoven concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Picnic on Lawn

From 8 to 9, while many in the audience picnic on the lawn, the Berkshire Hillsmen will sing a 20-minute program of light music on the porch of the Tanglewood estate house.

The Hillsmen include about 40 Pittsfield men who sing barbershop harmony. They are affiliated with the 30,000-member National Society for the Preservation and Encouragement of Barbershop Singing in America.

Danny Johnson of Adams, guitarist, will conclude the interlude program.

"Trout" Quintet

At 7 p. m., the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will present a musical prelude of two compositions by Franz Schubert: the String Trio No. 1 in B Flat and the "Trout" Quintet for piano and strings.

Guest pianist will be Gilbert Kalish of New York and Boston, who will play with Joseph Silverstein, Boston Symphony concertmaster; Jules Eskin, cello; Burton Fine, viola; and Henry Portnoi, double bass, all occupying first chairs in the symphony.

The Chamber Players include the orchestra's principal musicians. Two years ago they toured Russia. The prelude will be in the music shed, where all ticket holders, including those with lawn tickets will be seated.

Beethoven Symphonies

At 9 p. m. the full Boston Symphony will perform Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 in F Major (the "Pastoral") and Symphony No. 3 in E Flat ("Eroica").

Reserved seats and general admission tickets for the evening may be ordered by calling Miss Virginia Rhodes of 74 Wendell Ave., Pittsfield. Tickets are available at Sammy Vincent's Music Store, the City Savings Bank, England's, and Pittsfield General and St. Luke's Hospital units. Picnic suppers may be ordered by calling Mrs. James D. Garivaltis of 300 Holmes Rd.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 12 1969

Support With Music

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

The gala evening at Tanglewood on Friday for the benefit of the Berkshire Medical Center offers a unique opportunity: to hear a concert by the superb Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, a prelude by the orchestra's principal players, an interlude including light music by the Berkshire Hillsmen, a chance to picnic on the beautiful Tanglewood lawn, and at the same time to contribute to our own hospitals.

The BMC Auxiliary has arranged its first major fund-raising event since the merging of St. Luke's and Pittsfield General units not only to give enjoyment to its supporters but to help in the purchase of modern equipment necessary to maintain the high standard of medical service the community needs and wants.

Let's support our hospitals to music. Call Miss Virginia Rhodes for reserved seats or get general admissions at Sammy Vincent's.

(Mrs.) LOUISE H. SULLIVAN.
39 Orchard Road,
Dalton.

Chorus Auditions Are Set

For all interested area vocalists, the Berkshire Music Center and Boston Symphony Orchestra announce the first set of auditions for the 1969 Berkshire Chorus, Jan. 5 from 1 to 5 p.m. at Thayer Hall of the Lenox School in Lenox, Massachusetts. Further auditions will be announced at a later date. Anyone desiring further information or an audition appointment should write to: Miss Marilyn R. Wilt, Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Avenue, Boston, Mass., 02115.

Now beginning its third year, the chorus is made up of residents of several area communities, rehearses once a week during the winter, and performs during the summer season with the Tanglewood Choir and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. Mr. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the vocal program at Tanglewood, will conduct the Chorus. Mr. John Oliver, also of Boston, will assist Mr. Wilson for his second year. In 1969, the Chorus will join the Tnaglewood Choir in a concert performance of Verdi's "Otello" and Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," along with other works still to be named, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. The Ninth Symphony will be part of Music Director Erich Leinsdorf's last concert as Music Director of the Orchestra.

The 1968 Chorus numbered about 35 voices, all amateurs although generally with some singing experience, and Mr. Wilson is hoping for an even larger group this year. He and Mr. Oliver auditioned over 90 applicants in 1968 for the 35 finally selected for the Chorus, but, given the weighty works on the projected program for 1969, Mr. Wilson is anxious to greatly increase the size of the group this year.

The Chorus was formed in 1966 by Mr. Wilson and the Boston Symphony especially to do performances at Tanglewood. The majority of the members in the last two years have been Berkshire County residents, but in both the 1967 and 1968 groups there have been increasing numbers (1968 a total of eight) from neighboring New York State — Albany, Schenectady, and elsewhere. Last summer, the Chorus performed the Brahms' "Ein deutsches Requiem," the incidental music of Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," as well as a group of Brahms' choral works — the "Nanie," "Schicksalslied," and "Gesang der Parzen" — the last group as part of the concluding concert of the 1968 Tanglewood season.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,253
DEC 26 1968 New England

PRESS (e)
BRISTOL, CONN.
CIRC. 15,900
DEC 26 1968

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, December 25, 1968

Music Notes: News Of Auditions, Concerts

The Berkshire Chorus, which performs at Tanglewood each summer along with the Tanglewood Choir and the Boston Symphony, plans its first set of adutitions for the 1969 season on Sunday, January 5.

Residents of the Capital District wishing to try out for the chorus are urged to attend the auditions which will take place from 1 to 5 p.m. at Thayer Hall of the Lenox School in Lenox,

While the membership of the singing ensemble is traditionally drawn from western Massachusetts, in 1968 eight of the 35 members came from the Albany-Schenectady area.

The chorus, led by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, rehearses once a week during the winter.

This summer it will join the Tanglewood Choir in a concert performance of Verdi's "Otello" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony as well as a number of other works still to be announced.

Anyone desiring further information or an audition appointment should write to Miss Marilyn R. Wilt, Symphony Hall, 251 Huntingdon Avenue, Boston, Mass.

* * *

Berkshire Chorus Sets Auditions

The Berkshire Music Center and Boston Symphony Orchestra announce the first auditions for the 1969 Berkshire Chorus, from 1 to 5 p.m. Jan. 5, at Thayer Hall, the Lenox School, Lenox, Mass. Further auditions will be announced later.

Information or audition appointments may be obtained from Miss Marilyn R. Wilt, Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., Boston, Mass., 02115.

Now beginning its third year, the chorus rehearses once a week during the winter, and performs during the summer season with the Tanglewood Choir and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the vocal program at Tanglewood, will conduct. John Oliver, also of Boston, again will assist.

In 1969, the chorus will join the Tanglewood Choir in a concert performance of Verdi's "Otello" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, along with other works still to be named, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 134,700
DEC 29 1968 New England

1969 Berkshire Choral Audition Set For Jan. 5

For all interested area vocalists, the Berkshire Music Center and Boston Symphony Orchestra announce the first set of auditions for the 1969 Berkshire Chorus, from 1 to 5 p.m. on Sunday, January 5, 1969, at Thayer Hall of the Lenox School in Lenox, Massachusetts. Further auditions will be announced at a later date. Anyone desiring further information or an audition appointment should write to: Miss Marilyn R. Wilt, Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Avenue, Boston, Mass., 02115.

Now beginning its third year, the Chorus is made up of residents of several area communities, rehearses once a week during the winter, and performs during the summer season with the Tanglewood Choir and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. Mr. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the vocal program at Tanglewood, will conduct the Chorus. Mr. John Oliver, also of Boston, will assist Mr. Wilson for his second year. In 1969, the Chorus will join the Tanglewood Choir in a concert performance of Verdi's "Otello" and Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," along with other works still to be named, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. The "Ninth Symphony" will be part of Music Director Erich Leinsdorf's last concert as Music Director of the Orchestra.

The 1968 Chorus numbered about 35 voices, all amateurs although generally with some singing experience, and Mr. Wilson is hoping for an even larger group this year. He and Mr. Oliver auditioned over 90 applicants in 1968 for the 35 finally selected for the Chorus, but, given the weighty works on the projected program for 1969, Mr. Wilson is anxious to greatly increase the size of the group this year.

The Chorus was formed in 1966 by Mr. Wilson and the Boston Symphony especially to do performances at Tanglewood. The majority of the members in the last two years have been Berkshire County residents, but in both the 1967 and 1968 groups there have been increasing numbers (1968 a total of eight) from neighboring New York State — Albany, Schenectady, and elsewhere. Last summer, the Chorus performed the Brahm's "Ein deutsches Requiem," the incidental music of Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," as well as a group of Brahm's choral works — the "Nanie," "Schicksalslied," and "Gesang der Parzen" — the last group as part of the concluding concert of the 1968 Tanglewood season.

Whitestone

Area men rehearse Brahms' "Requiem" at Tanglewood

BSO Sets Area Choral Tryouts

The Berkshire Music Center and Boston Symphony Orchestra announce the first set of auditions for the 1969 Berkshire Chorus, from 1 to 5 p.m. on Sunday at Thayer Hall of the Lenox School in Lenox. Further auditions will be announced at a later date. Anyone desiring further information or an audition appointment should write to: Miss Marilyn R. Wilt, Symphony Hall, 251 Huntington Ave., Boston, Mass., 02115.

Now beginning its third year, the chorus is made up of residents of several area communities, rehearses once a week during the winter, and performs during the summer season with the Tanglewood Choir and the BSO at Tanglewood. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the BSO and director of the vocal program at Tanglewood, will conduct the chorus. John Oliver, also of Boston, will assist Wilson for his second year.

In 1969, the chorus will join the Tanglewood Choir in a concert performance of Verdi's "Otello" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony along with other works still to be named, with the BSO, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. The Ninth Symphony will be part of Erich Leinsdorf's last concert as music director of the orchestra.

The 1968 chorus numbered about 35 voices, all amateurs, although generally with some singing experience, and Wilson is hoping for an even larger group this year. He and Oliver auditioned over 90 applicants in 1968 for the 35 finally selected for the chorus, but, given the weighty works on the projected program for 1969, Wilson is anxious to greatly increase the size of the group this year.

The chorus was formed in 1966 by Wilson and the Boston Symphony especially to do performances at Tanglewood. The majority of the members in the last two years have been Berkshire County residents, but in both the 1967 and 1968 groups there have been increasing numbers (1968 a total of eight) from neighboring New York State—Albany, Schenectady, and elsewhere. Last summer, the chorus performed the Brahms' Ein deutsches Requiem, the incidental music of Mendelssohn's A Midsummer Night's Dream, as well as a group of Brahms' choral works—the Nanie, Schicksalslied, and Gesang der Parzen—the last group as part of the concluding concert of the 1968 Tanglewood season.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
DEC 31 1968 New England

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JAN 15 1969 New England

ENTERPRISE (E)
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
CIRC. 4,700
JAN 15 1969 New England

Chorus Tryouts to Be Jan. 22

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced auditions for the 1969 Berkshire Chorus on Jan. 22 from 7 to 10 in Thayer Hall of the Lenox School.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, head of vocal activities at Tanglewood, and conductor of the chorus, will be in charge.

Prospective applicants are asked to bring a piece of their own choosing for the audition, and they will be asked to do brief sight-reading.

For information and an audition appointment, vocalists should contact the Berkshire Chorus co-managers, Mrs. Roger Errington (413-637-1371) or Ed Desabaye (413-637-1135).

JAN 18 1969 New England

Albany Times Union
Jan. 15, 1969

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
JAN 15 1969 New England

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GT. BARRINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,400
JAN 16 1969 New England

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500
JAN 14 1969 New England

Berkshire Chorus Auditions Sunday

The first auditions for 1969's Berkshire Chorus at Tanglewood are scheduled for Sunday from 1 to 5 at Thayer Hall of Lenox School in Lenox.

The chorus will be beginning its third year. It rehearses once weekly during the winter and performs at Tanglewood during July and August with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the orchestra and director of the vocal program at Tanglewood, will conduct the chorus.

ENTERPRISE & TIMES (e)
BROCKTON, MASS.
CIRC. 52,417
JAN 2 1969 New England

Final Auditions For BSO Chorus Set for Saturday

The final auditions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Chorus will be held on Saturday, Feb. 1, from noon to 4 p.m. at Thayer Hall in the Lenox School in Lenox. The Chorus, now entering its third year, offers Berkshire area residents an opportunity to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and tht Tanglewood Choir at Tanglewood during the summer. It rehearses three times a month in Lenox during the winter months, and at Tanglewood once the summer season begins there.

Auditionees are asked to prepare a piece of their own choosing for the audition, and they will be asked to do brief sight-reading. Further information is available by calling Mrs. Roger Errington or Ed Desabaye in Lenox.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS
CIRC. 13,500
JAN 28 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JAN 30 1969 New England

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
JAN 31 1969

OKLAHOMA PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
Oklahoma City, Oklahoma

SUNDAY OKLAHOMAN
Oklahoma City, Okla
Circ. 274,576

Date Is Set For Auditions

Auditions for area high school junior interested in attending Boston University's Young Artists Program at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., will be held by faculty members at 2 to 6 p.m. Tuesday at the Sheraton-Oklahoma Hotel.

Dr. Lee Chrisman, coordinator of auditions for the School of Fine and Applied Arts at Boston University, announced that auditions will also be held for music students who wish to enter the university next September, as either freshmen or for advanced study. The Tanglewood auditions are for instrumentalists only; the Boston University auditions will include voice students.

The Young Artists Program at Tanglewood is designed to lend a new dimension to the musical education of gifted high school juniors. If accepted for participation in the Tanglewood program, a student is assured eight weeks of study in a setting which has been the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1940.

berkshire chorus auditions

Saturday — February 1st
12 noon to 4 p.m.

Thayer Hall — Lenox School

The Berkshire Chorus Performs With The Boston Symphony Orchestra At Tanglewood Next Summer. Tenors and Basses Especially Needed.

FOR FURTHER INFORMATION CALL 637-1371 or 637-1135

108.

Berkshire Music Center

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens the 28th session of the Berkshire Music Center on Sunday, June 29 at 2:30 pm. The orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr., will greet the students and Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, will deliver the principal address.

Out of a total of 400 students attending the 1969 session, 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship program provides instruction and coaching by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and distinguished guest Faculty members for young instrumentalists, singers, composers and conductors who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers.

Four, six and eight week programs will also be offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. Boston University's Tanglewood Institute offers programs in music, art, theatre and dance. The New England Conservatory offers programs in contemporary composition, jazz and music education.

The Berkshire Music Center will offer a full schedule of orchestra, chamber music and composer's forum concerts through the summer. In addition, members of the Vocal Fellowship program will appear as soloists in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert performance of Verdi's "Otello", as part of the Berkshire Festival.

Among the Center's special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented in two parts, July 29 - August 2 and August 11 - 17, in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Composers Theodore Antoniou, Robert Ceely, Edwin Dugger and Phillip Rhodes were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival within a Festival," as B.M.C. director Erich Leinsdorf refers to it.

The highly successful Contemporary Trends Concerts will be presented again this year on Tuesday evenings July 8, 15, 22, 29 and August 12 under the auspices of the Contemporary Music Department of the Berkshire Music Center. Expanded from three concerts to five, the popular series will present artists from jazz, rock, soul and spiritual areas who will illustrate the significant trends in music outside the 'classical' medium.

Complete information for this series will be available on July 1.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
(E) 9,230

JUN 25 1969 New England

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,000

JUN 27 1969 New England

New Music Scholarships Available

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Young Artists Awards has a number of new scholarships of $300 each available to young women students, residents of Massachusetts, for the pursuit of their music education.

Beginning next September, these new scholarships will be in addition to those already awarded and subject to renewal by decision of the trustees.

For the third year since these awards were instituted in 1950, two fellowships will be awarded also to young women for study at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, educational department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Auditions for the Tanglewood fellowships have already been held at Symphony Hall, Boston, and names of the recipients will be announced shortly.

New candidates for the regular awards will be heard by a board of judges Friday evening, June 6, at M. Steinert & Sons Co., 308 Main St., Worcester.

Judges will be Johnny W. Bradburn, organist and choir director at Central Congregational Church; Louis J. Curran of the music faculty, Worcester Polytechnic Institute; and Raymond Morin, chairman.

Recipients of these scholarships, under the terms of the anonymous fund, are to be "such female students of music who are residents of Massachusetts, and who are in need of financial assistance, as deemed by the trustees to be most worthy and deserving of assistance."

All scholarships must be applied toward tuition in accredited institutions of musical learning. These may be anywhere in the United States. Each candidate must be working for a degree with a music major.

Age limits are: Freshmen, not over 22 years of age; sophomores, 23; juniors, 24; seniors, 25. Scholarships are not available for graduate study.

Auditions forms may be obtained by writing to Raymond Morin, chairman, Young Artists Awards, 45 Test Hill Drive, Worcester 01609.

All auditions are by appointment only. Applications must be postmarked not later than midnight, Friday, May 30.

Applicants may major in piano, voice, and any instrument of the symphony orchestra; also organ, music education, sacred music, public school music and music therapy.

Since 1950, 91 young women have been assisted with their education in 33 musical institutions throughout the country. Scholarships have amounted to over $75,000.

Present scholarship holders are at the New England Conservatory of Music, Pacific Union College, Angwin, Calif., University of Connecticut, Peabody Conservatory of Music, Baltimore, Lowell State College, University of Hartford, Anna Maria College, and Evansville College, Indiana.

LONDON'S FAMED Royal Ballet from the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, will present five performances in Boston on its 11th tour of the United States.

Opening night will be Saturday, June 7, ending Tuesday night, June 10 with a single matinee on Sunday, June 8, at 2:30 p.m.

Evening performances at the Music Hall are at 8:30.

The Royal Ballet is under the direction of Sir Frederick Franklin. Guest artists will be Dame Margot Fonteyn and Rudolf Nureyev.

List of principal ballerinas includes Deanne Bergsma, Svetlana Beriosova, Monica Mason, Merle Park, Georgina Parkinson and Antoinette Sibley.

Male Princpals

Male principals will include Anthony Dowell, Desmond Doyle, Alexander Grant, Stanley Holden, Donald Macleary and Brian Shaw. Conductors are John Lanchbery, Anthony Twiner and Emanuel Young.

Program for opening night and Tuesday night closing will be Fonteyn and Nureyev in "Pelleas and Melisande," the third act of "Raymonda," and "La Bayadere."

"Giselle" will be danced at the Sunday matinee and evening performances.

Tchaikovsky's "Swan Lake" will be given on Monday night.

Mail orders for all performances are now being accepted at the Music Hall, 268 Tremont St., Boston. Mail orders will be filled as received. The box-office sale at the Music Hall will not be open until the last week in May.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,892

MAY 4 1969 New England

SUNDAY REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
CIRC. 121,600

MAY 25 1969 New England

Miss Leslie Sixfin Earns Fellowship

Leslie Sixfin of Knollwood Road, Bethany, has been awarded an associate fellowship for summer study at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. The Boston Symphony Orchestra sponsors this grant at its summer home in Lenox, Mass.

Miss Sixfin is a third-year scholarship student at the Mannes College of Music in New York City and studies piano under Jeanette Haien. She formerly was a scholarship student at the Juilliard School of Music in New York.

White Plains Reporter Dispatch
Thursday, June 19, 1969

Miss Landsman To Study Horn At Tanglewood

GREENBURGH—
Julie Landsman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Aaron Landsman of 51 Edgewood Road, Woodlands, is the only Westchester resident accepted to study with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Tanglewood Music Program this summer.

Miss Landsman, 16, is a junior at Ardsley High School and plays the French horn in the school band, the All-County and All-State Bands. She studies here with Howard Howard, first French horn for the Metropolitan opera orchestra.

Berkshire Music Center Will Open The 28th Session On June 29

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens the 28th session of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, on Sunday, June 29 at 2:30 p.m. The orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr., will greet the students and Erich Leindorf, music director of the orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, will deliver the principal address.

Out of a total of 400 students attending the 1969 session, 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship program provides instruction and coaching by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and distinguished guest faculty members for young instrumentalists, singers, composers and conductors who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers. Four, six and eight week programs will also be offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. Boston University's Tanglewood Institute offers programs in music, art, theatre and dance. The New England Conservatory offers programs in contemporary composition, jazz and music education.

The Berkshire Music Center will offer a full schedule of orchestra, chamber music and composer's forum concerts through the summer. In addition, members of the Vocal Fellowship program will appear as soloists in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert performance of Verdi's "Otello," as part of the Berkshire Festival.

Among the Center's special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented in two parts, July 29-Aug. 2 and Aug. 11-17, in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Composers Theodore Antoniou, Robert Ceely, Edwin Dugger and Phillip Rhodes were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival within a Festival," as B.M.C. director Erich Leinsdorf refers to it.

The highly successful Contemporary Trends Concerts will be presented again this year on Tuesday evenings, July 8, 15, 22, 29 and Aug. 12 under the auspices of the Contemporary Music Department of the Berkshire Music Center. Expanded from three concerts to five, the popular series will present artists from jazz, rock, soul and spiritual areas who will illustrate the significant trends in music outside the 'classical' medium. Complete information for this series will be available on July 1.

The 1969 session of the Berkshire Music Center marks the seventh and final year for Erich Leinsdorf as director of the Center and Charles Wilson as head of vocal music activities. In the summer of 1970, Gunther Schuller, the distinguished composer-conductor and president of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Seiji Ozawa, newly-appointed music director of the San Francisco Symphony, will become artistic directors at Tanglewood with Leonard Bernstein acting as advisor.

The 1969 session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude on Sunday, Aug. 24, the final day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,000

JUN 17 1969 New England

Tanglewood Center Opens Next Sunday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens the 28th session of the Berkshire Music Center next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. The orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr., will greet the students and Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra and director of the Music Center, will deliver the principal address.

Out of a total of 400 students attending the 1969 session, 165 will be fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The fellowship program provides instruction and coaching by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and distinguished guest faculty members for young instrumentalists, singers, composers and conductors embarking on professional careers.

The Berkshire Music Center will offer a full schedule of orchestra, chamber music and composer's forum concerts through the summer. In addition, members of the vocal fellowship program will appear as soloists in the Symphony concert performance of Verdi's "Otello",as part of the Berkshire Festival.

Among the Center's special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented in two parts, July 29-Aug. 2 and Aug. 11-17, in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Composers Theodore Antoniou, Robert Ceely, Edwin Dugger and Phillip Rhodes were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the festival.

The highly successful Contemporary Trends Concerts will be presented again this year on Tuesday evenings July 8, 15, 22, 29 and Aug. 12. The popular series will present artists from jazz, rock, soul and spiritual areas who will illustrate the significant trends in music outside the 'classical' medium. Complete information for this series will be available July 1.

The 1969 session of the Berkshire Music Center marks the seventh and final year for Erich Leinsdorf as director of the center and Charles Wilson as head of vocal music activities. In the summer of 1970, Gunther Schuller, composer-conductor and president of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Seiji Ozawa, newly-appointed music director of the San Francisco Symphony, will become artistic directors at Tanglewood with Leonard Bernstein acting as advisor.

The 1969 session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude on Sunday, Aug. 24, the final day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUN 22 1969 New England

Berkshire Music Center

Claude Frank at Tanglewood.

Tanglewood Holds Opening Exercises

LENOX — Berkshire Music Center welcomed 400 students at opening exercises at Tanglewood Sunday. Included were several study groups at collegiate levels, also the specially selected fellowship of 165 young artists, allotted funds to cover expenses of their eight weeks of ensemble work and individual coaching.

The first major concerts, on the weekend of July 4-6, also those of July 11-13, will be given by 50 players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, well suited to works of Mozart, Bach, Handel, etc.

Six weekends of concerts by the full ensemble of over 100 players will extend from July 18 to Aug. 24. A final weekend will bring concerts on Aug. 30 and 31 by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra.

Each Friday, Tanglewood presents at 7 p.m. a Weekend Prelude of chamber music, as a bonus to early arrivals. The Friday orchestral concerts follow at 9 p.m.

Concerts on Saturdays are at 8 p.m. and on Sundays at 2:30 p.m.

Rehearsals on Saturdays at 10:30 a.m. are open to the public for $2.50 (unreserved.)

Admission to the lawn for concerts is $3.00 this year (all children require tickets) and seats in the shed vary from $3.50 to $8.50, as against $3.50 to $7.50 last year.

The weekend of July 4-6 is entirely music of Mozart. The prelude on Friday is by Lilian Kallir and Claude Fran, pianists.

Piano concertos played by Christopher Eschenbach, John Browning and Claude Frank with the orchestra will be K. 467 (in C,) K. 488 (in A,) and K. 595 (in B flat.) Orchestral works conducted by Erich Leinsdorf will include Symphonies Nos. 29 and 39, the "Haffner" and No. 40, and Six German Dances and Symphony No. 41.

Numerous student events and concerts of "contemporary trends" music will be available during each week. Tuesdays, beginning July 8, will for the most part present popular groups.

—J.F.K.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUN 30 1969 New England

Leinsdorf Speaks Informally at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Erich Leinsdorf had a splendid talk prepared for the 28th opening session of the Berkshire Music Center yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood.

This is his last summer as director of the Center and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After what seemed like a long, dull preliminary program of speeches and music, Leinsdorf was finally asked to give his address.

He placed it on the speaker's stand, looked out at some 400 young musicians from many countries, and completely ignored his prepared statements.

'Real Truths'

"This is the seventh of these speeches I have delivered," he said. "I have never regarded them as a matter of routine. This time I should acquaint you with some very real truths."

"In the first place, this is not a school nor are you students," he said. "Rather this is a summer academy that will try to mold you into your professional lives."

Leinsdorf stressed that what a young musician needs most of all is to know the truth.

"Know, well," he said, "that all your life you will work for the public. If you don't contribute, you don't belong."

"Also, get rid of the silly notion that composers work in a time of temporary misery, that they must wait for posterity to be recognized."

"Above all, be true to yourselves," he added. "You are in this great art to serve."

Leinsdorf's opinions about contemporary composition were particularly pointed in an area where hybrid, honest, fake, valuable and provocative new music is fearlessly introduced.

This summer, the Center's Festival of Contemporary Music will be presented in two parts, July 29—Aug. 2, and Aug. 11—17.

Speaking directly to extremists, Leinsdorf said, "If you elect to be a member of that small segment of experimentors, don't expect to sit on both sides of the fence, like politicians."

"Music becomes more important to a world that is troubled," he said.

He pointed out that it is the responsibility of the composer to provide music that the world needs, and implied that he should not always diagnose what the world should have because he so decrees.

Erich Leinsdorf

Leinsdorf believes that we need new music, but contemporary music has no audience. "Modern music," to split a very fine hair, fares a little better.

"Ask a concert goer if he enjoys modern music, and he'll probably say, 'Well, some — Firebird and Petrouchka, for instance."

Leinsdorf was clearly serving notice that much of the new music produced at the Center in past years is not "his cup of tea."

A very small percentage of this music has received general approbation. Most of it has aroused reactions from apathy to downright hostility.

Earlier in his talk, Leinsdorff had annihilated the shopworn alibi of compositional defectives that "no great composer is understood in his lifetime."

Fine Showing

The program was introduced by Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony.

Greetings were extended by Msgr. Edward G. Murray for the Boston Symphony trustees, and Robert Alsop for the Council of Tanglewood Friends.

The traditional performance of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," written especially for this occasion in 1940, was directed by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony.

In view of one hasty rehearsal, it was a remarkably fine showing, although more time would have polished phrasing and persuaded some individuals that they were not soloists.

Beethoven's Sonata in G minor, Opus 5, No. 2 was performed by Jules Eskin, first cellist with the Boston Symphony, and Virgnia Eskin, pianist.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUN 30 1969 New England

Tanglewood Season Opened on Sunday

Whiteston

Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, meets with Michael T. Thomas, new assistant conductor of BSO, and Mrs. John Davis Hatch of Stockbridge at a garden reception following the opening exercises at Tanglewood, Sunday.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 1 1969

Leinsdorf Sounds Hopeful Musical Note

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf, speaking at the 29th opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center which were held yesterday at Tanglewood, sounded an encouraging note for those embarking on musical careers.

Prospects Good

Mr. Leinsdorf, who retires at the end of this season as director of both the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center, told the students and their guests that even in these days of social turmoil, the prospects in the musical profession are good. The Center is Tanglewood's school for advanced study in music.

Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the BSO, welcomed the audience. He introduced the Rev. Msgr. Edward G. Murray, who represented the trustees of the orchestra, and Robert C. Alsop, president of the Friends of Tanglewood Council.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 30 1969 New England

Leinsdorf Berkshire speaker

LENOX — The Boston Symphony's conductor Erich Leinsdorf told students at the opening of the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center, yesterday that the more the world is in trouble the more it needs music.

Leinsdorf, whose seven-year tenure with the Boston Symphony ends with the conclusion of the festival Aug. 24, was the afternoon's main speaker. He said that after reading the Spring's spate of commencement addresses that students wanted "the truth, not aspirin."

Why is it forgotten, Leinsdorf asked, that the musician works for the public? "Do not sneer," he told the students, "at the person who daydreams while you are playing."

Music may serve the dreamer in ways not apparent to the performer, he suggested.

Leinsdorf came to a partial defense of "composers who write for a club of like-minded musicians" but he thought they should not then expect acclaim from those they exclude.

"Only politicians," he said, "can sit on both sides of the fence, not musicians."

About 400 students and guests attended the exercises in Tanglewood's theatre concert hall.

The Beethoven G Minor Cello Sonata was performed by BSO principal Jules Eskin and his pianist wife, and the Randall Thompson "Allelulia," which each student body has sung since the opening of the music center in 1940.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUN 30 1969 New England

170.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
JUL 6 1969

Robert Patterson

TANGLEWOOD TEMPOS—Students at the Berkshire Music Center's 17th season practice on the lawn of the administration building at Lenox, Mass. On Saturday, Erich Leinsdorf will lead the Boston Symphony in a concert version of Mozart's comic opera, "The Abduction From the Seraglio," with Beverly Sills, George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, Raymond Michalski and the Tanglewood Choir.

TUNKHANNOCK, PA.
NEW AGE
W. 4,150
JUL 3 1969

Tanglewood Fellowship To Cortese

Peter Cortese, former Tunkhannock Area High School student and senior at the Boston University, was the recipient of a music fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass.

The center was established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in fulfillment of the dream of Serge Koussevitsky, former music director, to provide an environment in which promising musicians could continue their professional training and add to their artistic experience through the guidance of eminent musicians. Erich Leinsdorf is the present director of the center.

Members of the fellowship program are admitted, tuition free, on the basis of demonstrated musical proficiency. Peter's acceptance resulted from his audition before and recommendation by a panel of judges comprised of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This summer's festival highlights include the conducting of Eric Leinsdorf, piano soloist Van Cliburn and a gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13 500
JUL 1 1969
New England

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
WESTSIDE CITIZEN
W. 39,328
JUL 10 1969

KATHLEEN P. TOOHEY

City Girl Wins 2nd Fellowship To Music Center

Miss Kathleen P. Toohey, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William P. Toohey, of 137 West Main St., has been awarded an associate fellowship to the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood for the second consecutive year.

The Berkshire Music Center is under the direction of Eric Leinsdorf, who also is the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives the award.

There will be 20 women singers, from all parts of the country, who will participate in all the activities of the fellowship program.

Miss Toohey's selection for this award was based on demonstrative musical proficiency, both at the Hartt College of Music in West Hartford, Conn., and at Tanglewood last year where she performed as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program is designed for eight weeks of study in music, and the focus of the program is on performance, offering intensive work in the advanced field of music. Miss Toohey will reside at Tanglewood until the completion of the program.

The students will work under the supervision of faculty members. They will represent the Tanglewood Choir, and will perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concerts at Tanglewood this summer.

Miss Toohey, a 1967 graduate of Drury High School, has just completed her sophomore year at the Hartt College of Music, University of Hartford, West Hartford, Conn. She was a member of the Hartt Choral, and the Hartt Chamber Singers, where she performed as a soloist for the Music Educators National Convention in Washington, D.C. last January. She was also a member of the Hartt Madrigal Singers, and the Hartt Opera Chorus and department, and participated in all productions at thd college. She also appeared in the operas, "The Magic Flute," "Tales of Hoffman," "Abduction from the Seraglio," and "Hansel and Gretel."

Miss Toohey will continue her education at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, starting in the fall.

VIOLINIST—Richard Kaufman, 21-year-old violinist and senior music major at Valley State College, will study for eight weeks at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer as an associate fellow of the famed Berkshire Music Festival. Kaufman is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Kaufman of West Los Angeles.

VSC Violinist Off to Eastern Music Festival

WEST LOS ANGELES — Richard Kaufman, 21-year-old violinist and senior music major at Valley State College, will study eight weeks at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer as an associate fellow of the famed Berkshire Music Festival.

Kaufman, son of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Kaufman of West Los Angeles, will perform with the Berkshire Festival Orchestra and the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, with guest conductors including Milton Katims, Henry Lewis and Pierre Boulez.

He will take part in orchestra, chamber music and seminar programs at Tanglewood. As the finale to this summer's festival, Leinsdorf will conduct the combined Berkshire Festival Orchestra and Boston Symphony in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. It will be Leinsdorf's farewell concert as music director of the Boston Symphony.

Kaufman has studied violin for the past 12 years with Alma Hewis, the late Peter Meremblum and Manuel Compinsky, his present teacher. He is concertmaster of the Valley State College Symphnoy Orchestra, has played with the Brentwood and Santa Monica symphonies and is a member of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra.

His conducting and musical direction credits are numerous. They include "The Mikado" at the Valley State Teen-age Drama Workship, college productions of "Beggar's Opera," "Cox and Box," "Trial by Jury," "Sweenie Agonistes" and "Roar of the Greasepaint Smell of the Crowd" and other productions of "Bye, Bye Birdie," "Oklahoma" and "H M S Pinafore."

He is musical director of the Los Angeles Savoy-Artes Co. and wrote the alma mater for Valley State College.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 5 1969

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
(E) 109,181
JUL 6 1969
New England

* * * * *

SUMMER'S MASS CULTURE phase, made a formal Berkshire debut with Sunday's opening exercises for the 29th season of the Berkshire Music Center, the school at Tanglewood for advanced study. The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Tanglewood season Friday night with an all-Mozart program. The Berkshire Theatre Festival got going at the Stockbridge summer playhouse with "John & Abigail," a William Gibson drama narration, on Tuesday night, and the Williamstown Summer Theatre opened Thursday night with Christopher Fry's adaptation of "Ring Around the Moon."

* * * * *

Student Pinch-Hits For Cardillo

LENOX, Mass. (UPI)—More than 6,300 persons cheered a student clarinetist as he pinch-hit for an ailing Boston Symphony musician at the opening concert of the 1969 Berkshire Festival.

Laurence Wheeler, 22, a graduate of Temple University and student of the Berkshire Music Center, sat in for first violinist Pasquale Cardillo for the last half of an all-Mozart program Friday night.

Cardillo's usual stand-in, Felix Viscuglia, was playing a Charles River Esplanade Concert in Boston and could not drive to Tanglewood in time.

INQUIRER
CINCINNATI, O.
A.M. - CIRC. 192,209
JUL-6-69
047

Lynn Teachers Will Attend Music Session

Miss Josephine F. Rando, faculty member at Hood Elementary School, and Miss Ruth L. Curtis, supervisor of vocal music, will represent the Lynn School System in September at the leadership conference in Framingham in conjunction with the Tanglewood Symposium Topic V.

Sponsored by the Massachusetts Music Educators Association, Topic V of the Tanglewood Symposium deals with new perspectives in elementary music education.

Miss Rando and Miss Curtis were in attendance at the Opening Exercises of the 28 Season of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, in Lenox last weekend. Eric Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the music center, was the principal speaker.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 38,000
JUL 3 1968

110.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
JUL 6 1969

Robert Patterson

TANGLEWOOD TEMPOS—Students at the Berkshire Music Center's 17th season practice on the lawn of the administration building at Lenox, Mass. On Saturday, Erich Leinsdorf will lead the Boston Symphony in a concert version of Mozart's comic opera, "The Abduction From the Seraglio," with Beverly Sills, George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, Raymond Michalski and the Tanglewood Choir.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 5 1969

* * * *

SUMMER'S MASS CULTURE phase, made a formal Berkshire debut with Sunday's opening exercises for the 29th season of the Berkshire Music Center, the school at Tanglewood for advanced study. The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Tanglewood season Friday night with an all-Mozart program. The Berkshire Theatre Festival got going at the Stockbridge summer playhouse with "John & Abigail," a William Gibson drama narration, on Tuesday night, and the Williamstown Summer Theatre opened Thursday night with Christopher Fry's adaptation of "Ring Around the Moon."

* * * *

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
103,191
JUL 6 1969
New England

Student Pinch-Hits For Cardillo

LENOX, Mass. (UPI)—More than 6,300 persons cheered a student clarinetist as he pinch-hit for an ailing Boston Symphony musician at the opening concert of the 1969 Berkshire Festival.

Laurence Wheeler, 22, a graduate of Temple University and student of the Berkshire Music Center, sat in for first violinist Pasquale Cardillo for the last half of an all-Mozart program Friday night.

Cardillo's usual stand-in, Felix Viscuglia, was playing a Charles River Esplanade Concert in Boston and could not drive to Tanglewood in time.

TUNKHANNOCK, PA.
NEW AGE
W. 4,150
JUL 3 1969

Tanglewood Fellowship To Cortese

Peter Cortese, former Tunkhannock Area High School student and senior at the Boston University, was the recipient of a music fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass.

The center was established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in fulfillment of the dream of Serge Koussevitsky, former music director, to provide an environment in which promising musicians could continue their professional training and add to their artistic experience through the guidance of eminent musicians. Erich Leinsdorf is the present director of the center.

Members of the fellowship program are admitted, tuition free, on the basis of demonstrated musical proficiency. Peter's acceptance resulted from his audition before and recommendation by a panel of judges comprised of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This summer's festival highlights include the conducting of Eric Leinsdorf, piano soloist Van Cliburn and a gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500
JUL 1 1969
New England

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
WESTSIDE CITIZEN
W. 39,328
JUL 10 1969

KATHLEEN P. TOOHEY

City Girl Wins 2nd Fellowship To Music Center

Miss Kathleen P. Toohey, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William P. Toohey, of 137 West Main St., has been awarded an associate fellowship to the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood for the second consecutive year.

The Berkshire Music Center is under the direction of Eric Leinsdorf, who also is the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives the award.

There will be 20 women singers, from all parts of the country, who will participate in all the activities of the fellowship program.

Miss Toohey's selection for this award was based on demonstrative musical proficiency, both at the Hartt College of Music in West Hartford, Conn., and at Tanglewood last year where she performed as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program is designed for eight weeks of study in music, and the focus of the program is on performance, offering intensive work in the advanced field of music. Miss Toohey will reside at Tanglewood until the completion of the program.

The students will work under the supervision of faculty members. They will represent the Tanglewood Choir, and will perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concerts at Tanglewood this summer.

Miss Toohey, a 1967 graduate of Drury High School, has just completed her sophomore year at the Hartt College of Music, University of Hartford, West Hartford, Conn. She was a member of the Hartt Choral, and the Hartt Chamber Singers, where she performed as a soloist for the Music Educators National Convention in Washington, D.C. last January. She was also a member of the Hartt Madrigal Singers, and the Hartt Opera Chorus and department, and participated in all productions at thd college. She also appeared in the operas, "The Magic Flute," "Tales of Hoffman," "Abduction from the Seraglio," and "Hansel and Gretel."

Miss Toohey will continue her education at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, starting in the fall.

VIOLINIST—Richard Kaufman, 21-year-old violinist and senior music major at Valley State College, will study for eight weeks at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer as an associate fellow of the famed Berkshire Music Festival. Kaufman is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Kaufman of West Los Angeles.

VSC Violinist Off to Eastern Music Festival

WEST LOS ANGELES — Richard Kaufman, 21-year-old violinist and senior music major at Valley State College, will study eight weeks at Tanglewood, Mass., this summer as an associate fellow of the famed Berkshire Music Festival.

Kaufman, son of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Kaufman of West Los Angeles, will perform with the Berkshire Festival Orchestra and the Boston Symphony under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, with guest conductors including Milton Katims, Henry Lewis and Pierre Boulez.

He will take part in orchestra, chamber music and seminar programs at Tanglewood. As the finale to this summer's festival, Leinsdorf will conduct the combined Berkshire Festival Orchestra and Boston Symphony in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. It will be Leinsdorf's farewell concert as music director of the Boston Symphony.

Kaufman has studied violin for the past 12 years with Alma Hewis, the late Peter Meremblum and Manuel Compinsky, his present teacher. He is concertmaster of the Valley State College Symphnoy Orchestra, has played with the Brentwood and Santa Monica symphonies and is a member of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra.

His conducting and musical direction credits are numerous. They include "The Mikado" at the Valley State Teen-age Drama Workship, college productions of "Beggar's Opera," "Cox and Box," "Trial by Jury," "Sweenie Agonistes" and "Roar of the Greasepaint, Smell of the Crowd" and other productions of "Bye, Bye Birdie," "Oklahoma" and "H M S Pinafore."

He is musical director of the Los Angeles Savoy-Artes Co. and wrote the alma mater for Valley State College.

Lynn Teachers Will Attend Music Session

Miss Josephine F. Rando, faculty member at Hood Elementary School, and Miss Ruth L. Curtis, supervisor of vocal music, will represent the Lynn School System in September at the leadership conference in Framingham in conjunction with the Tanglewood Symposium Topic V.

Sponsored by the Massachusetts Music Educators Association, Topic V of the Tanglewood Symposium deals with new perspectives in elementary music education.

Miss Rando and Miss Curtis were in attendance at the Opening Exercises of the 28 Season of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, in Lenox last weekend. Eric Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the music center, was the principal speaker.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 36,000
JUL 3 1968

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUL 12 1969

Silverstein: Conductor

LENOX — There's an interesting article to be written about the soil most fertile to the flourishing of conductors. Looking back, the richest breeding ground seems to have been the composer's study, for while none of these men was groomed principally for the podium, Mahler, Bernstein and Boulez, for instance, have all found fame there. Only a little less popular has been the orchestra itself. Koussevitsky was first an instrumentalist, and so were Ormandy and Alexander Schneider, and so, too, is Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, who on Wednesday night led the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra — a group culled internationally from young professionals — in its first concert of the season.

Silverstein made his conducting debut with the orchestra a year ago, and since then has made several appearances with smaller ensembles in town. And although he is not a professional conductor — and I'm sure lays no claims to being one — he takes the business seriously and knows a great deal about music.

As a visual phenomenon, Silverstein has changed. Last year the man we saw was clearly a violinist, conducting for the most part one-handed, with great sweeps of his bow arm. Now both arms are used, ed, and although the impression he gives is of one after the Golden Gloves title, smoothness and grace should come with time.

He stills directs himself, excessively, it seems, to the strings, who respond to him eagerly and produce a full, rich sound; but there's more to the orchestra than strings alone.

The program he chose was a tough one — Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," Tchaikovsky's "Rococo Variations" for cello and orchestra, and Beetoven's Fifth Symphony — and though each reading left something to be desired, they shared a common rhythmic vitality and masculinity, and a sense of musical honesty that was admirable.

WHAT I MISSED, however, were the shadings and nuances and delicacies that make for finished performances. Some examples from Stravinsky's 1936 ballet: There was little tautness and sense of forward motion to that deceptively simple accompaniment figure of repeated thirds that underlies the D flat flute melody near the start of the first "deal;" it's a very Mozartian sort of arrangement, a simple triadic figure beneath an equally uncomplicated tune, but as with Mozart from whom this lesson was likely learned) it's just these inner parts that have to be kept alive and vibrant. Or in the third "deal," there could have been far more buoyancy and swing to the parody of "La Valse."

I also would have liked phrasing, particularly in the Tchaikovsky, to have been more supple and gracious. I suspect though, that with such limited rehearsal time the piece wasn't much more than put together, for basic problems of coordination, of catching the soloist at just the right moment, were occassionally left unsolved.

The soloist was Jules Eskin, first cellist of the BSO, and his playing was very fine, indeed. But for all its exquisitely wrought orchestral detail, the piece doesn't offer much; like the air in the super-stratosphere where the solo line usually aims, the "Variations" are pretty thin stuff.

The one piece that was purely orchestral, meant to accompany neither cellist nor dancer, was in concert by far the best. The Beethoven was architecturally clear and vigorously conducted. As with the works heard earlier, it was rough-hewn and somewhat unsophisticated, but it showed Silverstein to be a conductor of more than average competence, one to whom I'd trust the BSO, or any other group, with the confidence that the pieces would be well put across, without much subtlety, perhaps, but without distortions, either.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 17 1969

Notes and Footnotes

YESTERDAY we visted fo an hour or so with Marlo Nobre (pronounced No-Bray) a Tanglewood where he is one o eight composers invited this summer to an annual sympo sium at the Berkshire Music Center. We sat under the open-sided cafeteria tent, and he told us about their routine at Tanglewood.

All eight composers are expected to attend three seminars a week during their eight-week stay, from June 29 to Aug. 24 and each one is obligated to compose a number to be played by members of the Music Center Orchestra in the Theatre-Concert Hall while they're here. Mr. Nobre is busy on his assignment, which will be heard Aug. 16, along with compositions of three of the others. The other four artists' work will be heard at another date.

Mr. Nobre is a native of Brazil, and has a wife and family at home in Rio de Janeiro. As is the case with the other seven, six men and one woman, he is a young but recognized composer in his homeland. "We are professionals," he pointed out, "not students." At Tanglewood they discuss problems of music at the two-hour official symposium meetings that usually run over, at mealtime and in between. He finds this invigorating and challenging to the creative drive inherent in all artists.

Mornings and evenings, Mr. Nobre spends working on his composition in his room at Windsor Mountain School, where the eight are housed. He calls the piece "Ludus Instrumentale," which roughly translates into "Instrumental Games" or "Instrumental Combinations," and requires 16 musicians.

As for Tanglewood, Mr. Nobre, who visited here a couple of days last year, declared, "The atmosphere is very good for composing. The beautiful surroundings, meeting performers and other composers, and hearing good musical programs are an inspiration." He also was quite fascinated by the great number of birds in the Berkshires, and told us that every morning when he awakes at Windsor Mountain School a bird is singing outside his window. It's a great way to start a musical day, all right.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 16 1969

Thomas To Conduct BMC Concert Tonight

Michael Tilson Thomas, who will be the new assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall, will be one of the conductors at tonight's concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. The concert, second of the season, will begin at 9 p.m. in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall.

Mr. Thomas will conduct Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler." Two Berkshire Music Center fellows, Alvaro Cassuto and Yoav Talmi, will conduct works by Wagner, Debussy and Haydn.

Music center events are open to the public for a nominal fee, through the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 26 1969

String Quartet To Play Today

The Boston String Quartet, the subsidized fellowship quartet of the New England Conservatory, will play at Tanglewood this afternoon at 2:30.

The four musicians who study under Rudolf Kolisch of the Kolisch Quartet and Joseph Silverstein of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear instead of the previously scheduled composers forum.

The program will be Schubert's Quartet in G major, Opus 161 and Schoenberg Quartet No. 2 in F-Sharp Minor, which will feature soprano Joan Heller.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUL 19 1969

New England

FELLOWS AT LENOX

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

Thomas Keen Conductor

LENOX — To consider as students the Conducting Fellows enrolled at the Berkshire Music Center is mistaken, for more so than any other group of young people here, the conductors, traditionally, are a seasoned lot. And also a group of great potential, as a glimpse at a list of alumni — including Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Czawa, Claudio Abbado — quickly shows.

In the current crop the furthest advanced professionally is Michael Tilson Thomas, a Californian who last summer won the Koussevitzky Award — given annually to the outstanding fellow — and who has been named assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony for the coming year.

In his portion of the program on Wednesday night, Thomas led Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler," and it's just his sort of piece — extroverted, large of gesture, colorful in effect.

It was a fine reading, if not a total success. As far as orchestral sound, balances, and so on, things were admirable; Thomas obviously hears with extraordinary keenness, and must have the knack of rehearsing a group to optimal advantage. He has, too, a rock solid sense of rhythm, and this aspect of his performance was equally striking.

But where he most noticeably failed was in the opening pages of the "Temptation," where the piece never built quite forcefully enough, where in terms of sheer sound the climactic moments were never really as strong as they ought to have been.

IT WAS ALMOST as if Thomas was physically or psychically incapable of bringing this off, as if the effort for some reason demanded too much. And on an otherwise good job, there was this small flaw.

Yoav Talmi, an Israeli, is currently assisting Jorge Mester with the Louisville Orchestra, and he's a conductor of poise and precision. Technically he's impeccible, and there wasn't a wasted, excess motion in his performance of Debussy's "Iberia."

Trough the reading lacked depth somewhat, this may have been the fault of the players. "Iberia" itself presents ensemble problems of a more than average trickiness; there are 3s against 4s against 5s all at once, and the assurance and coolness that's needed to bring off this sort of thing convincingly might have been a step beyond the capacities of this year's group. But Talmi is a mature, intelligent conductor, and I look forward to hearing him again.

Possibly the most difficult pieces went to Alvaro Cassuto, a Portuguese, who seemed a bit shakier and less experienced than either Thomas or Talmi. He had Haydn's 100th Symphony ("Military") and Wagner's "Tristan" Prelude, and both performances were compressed and small-scale.

His emotional range — and the dynamic and expressive ranges over which he worked with the players — all these were restricted, due possibly to an underrehearsed orchestra or possibly to nerves alone. But within this limited scope, one could see a sensitive musical mind at work, and I would think that subsequent Cassuto performances will be better than there were.

The Evening Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 654,741

JUL 16 1969

THAT OLD movie plot, ever dramatic, wherein the young unknown steps out of the wings to substitute for the ailing star, still happens in real life show business.

The latest incident developed at the famed Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood, Mass., and a Philadelphian named Laurence Wheeler was involved.

A May graduate of Temple University's College of Music, he is a student at the summer music center and had looked forward to hearing the opening concert by the Boston Symphony.

At the last minute, he had to change his seat from the middle of the audience to the middle of the orchestra as he was called on to pinchhit for the regular first clarinetist, who became ill, midway through an all-Mozart program. More than 6,000 persons cheered his performance.

And then Wheeler had another surprise a few days later. Temple officials, who were unaware of his success at Tanglewood, had accepted his application for the graduate Master of Music program and offered him a fellowship.

Under the fellowship, he would teach North Philly's disadvantaged children in a joint Temple-Settlement Music School community music program funded by the Rockefeller Foundation.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 17 1969

3-Lingual Concert Slated Tonight

The fellows in Voice of the Berkshire Music Center will give a recital of German, French and Spanish songs this evening at 9 in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. The program will feature songs by Schumann, Faure, Mahler, Ravel, Poulenc, Schubert and deFalla.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 13 1969

Tanglewood Lists

Musical Events

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — Some 37 different musical events are currently listed on this summer's schedule of Berkshire Music Center concerts at Tanglewod. Open to the public through the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, the programs include orchestra concerts, opera scenes, faculty recitals, and concerts by the Boston University Tanglewood Institute and New England Conservatory Tanglewood Institute.

Other Concerts

In addition, there are the concerts of the Festival of Contemporary Music, the "Festival Within a Festival" sponsored by the B.M.C. in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. This special series of concerts, from Wednesday, July 30 to Saturday, Aug. 16, includes performances of chamber music, electronic and orchestral works, some especially commissioned for the festival, and two fully staged and danced performances of Stravinsky's masterpiece, L'Histoire du soldat, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. In addition, there will be two complete concert performances of Alban Berg's opera, Wozzeck, also conducted by Leinsdorf.

On Aug. 19, a concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras climaxes the annual gala called Tanglewood - on - Parade, in which all departments of Tanglewood perform publicly in an all-day series of concerts and demonstrations. The evening ends traditionally with a display of fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl.

The Berkshire Music Center events are widely known as the "Friends" events because they are open to members of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood. Membership in the Friends is available to all through the Friends Office at Tanglewood.

Remaining Concerts

The list of Berkshire Music Center events, with dates and times, follows. All events are in Tanglewood's 1200 seat Theatre - Concert Hall unless otherwise noted. An asterisk marks the concerts of the Festival of Contemporary Music.

* * *

JULY

13 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music II 10 a.m.

16 Wednesday — Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Conducting Fellows conducting, 9 p.m.

17 Thursday — Youth Concert 230 p.m.

19 Saturday — Boston University Tanglewood Institute Concert, 2.30 p.m.

20 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music III 10 a.m.

23 Wednesday — Composers' Forum I, 9 p. m. 24 Thursday — Faculty Recital — Roman Totenberg, violin Arthur Balsam, piano, 9 p.m.

26 Saturday — New England Conservatory Tanglewood Institute Concert 2.30 p.m.

27 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music IV, 10 a.m.

30 Wednesday — xBerkshire Music Center Orchestra, Gunther Schuller conducting, 9 p.m.

30 Wednesday — Youth Concert, 2.30 p.m.

31 Thursday — xChamber Music and Dance, 9 p.m.

AUGUST

2 Saturday — Vocal Concert III — Opera Scenes, 2.30 p.m.

3 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music V, 10 a.m. XChamber Music, 9 p.m.

6 Wednesday — Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Charles Wilson conducting, 9 p.m.

7 Thursday — Faculty Recital — Paul Zukofsky, violin Gilbert Kalish, piano, 9 p.m.

9 Saturday — Boston University Tanglewood Institute Concert, 2.30 p.m.

10 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music VI, 10 a.m.

11 Monday — xBerg: WOZZECK — Shed Erich Leinsdorf conducting, 9 p.m.

13 Wednesday — xChamber Music and Dance, 9 p.m.

14 Thursday — xChamber Music, 9 p.m.

15 Friday — Youth Concert, 2.30 p.m.

16 Saturday — New England Conservatory Tanglewood Institute Concert, 2.30 p.m.; xElectronic Concert— Main Lawn 4 p.m.

17 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music VII, 10 a.m.; Berg: WOZZECK — Shed Erich Leinsdorf conducting, 9 p.m.

18 Monday — Composers' Forum II, 9 p.m.

19 Tuesday — TANGLEWOOD - ON - PARADE Gala Concert — Shed, 8 p.m.

20 Wednesday — Boston University Tanglewood Institute Concert, 9 p.m.

21 Thursday — Vocal Concert IV — Opera Scenes, 9 p.m.

23 Saturday — Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, Conducting Fellows conducting, 2.30 p.m.

24 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music VIII, 10 a.m.

Sunday Concert Features Huggler

Work by John Huggler, who spent the 1964-65 season as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's composer-in-residence, will be featured at the Sunday morning chamber music concert by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

The concert will begin at 10 in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. In addition to the Huggler brass quintet, the Mozart piano-woodwind quintet K. 452 and the Brahms Quartet for piano and strings Opus 60, are on the program.

BMC concerts are open to the public.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 26 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,200

JUL 12 1969

Silverstein: Conductor

LENOX — There's an interesting article to be written about the soil most fertile to the flourishing of conductors. Looking back, the richest breeding ground seems to have been the composer's study, for while none of these men was groomed principally for the podium, Mahler, Bernstein and Boulez, for instance, have all found fame there. Only a little less popular has been the orchestra itself. Koussevitsky was first an instrumentalist, and so were Ormandy and Alexander Schneider, and so, too, is Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, who on Wednesday night led the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra — a group culled internationally from young professionals — in its first concert of the season.

Silverstein made his conducting debut with the orchestra a year ago, and since then has made several appearances with smaller ensembles in town. And although he is not a professional conductor — and I'm sure lays no claims to being one — he takes the business seriously and knows a great deal about music.

As a visual phenomenon, Silverstein has changed. Last year the man we saw was clearly a violinist, conducting for the most part one-handed, with great sweeps of his bow arm. Now both arms are used, and although the impression he gives is of one after the Golden Gloves title, smoothness and grace should come with time.

He stills directs himself, excessively, it seems, to the strings, who respond to him eagerly and produce a full, rich sound; but there's more to the orchestra than strings alone.

The program he chose was a tough one — Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," Tchaikovsky's "Rococo Variations" for cello and orchestra, and Beetoven's Fifth Symphony — and though each reading left something to be desired, they shared a common rhythmic vitality and masculinity, and a sense of musical honesty that was admirable.

WHAT I MISSED, however, were the shadings and nuances and delicacies that make for finished performances. Some examples from Stravinsky's 1936 ballet: There was little tautness and sense of forward motion to that deceptively simple accompaniment figure of repeated thirds that underlies the D flat flute melody near the start of the first "deal;" it's a very Mozartian sort of arrangement, a simple triadic figure beneath an equally uncomplicated tune, but as with Mozart from whom this lesson was likely learned) it's just these inner parts that have to be kept alive and vibrant. Or in the third "deal," there could have been far more buoyancy and swing to the parody of "La Valse."

I also would have liked phrasing, particularly in the Tchaikovsky, to have been more supple and gracious. I suspect though, that with such limited rehearsal time the piece wasn't much more than put together, for basic problems of coordination, of catching the soloist at just the right moment, were occassionally left unsolved.

The soloist was Jules Eskin, first cellist of the BSO, and his playing was very fine, indeed. But for all its exquisitely wrought orchestral detail, the piece doesn't offer much: like the air in the super-stratosphere where the solo line usually aims, the "Variations" are pretty thin stuff.

The one piece that was purely orchestral, meant to accompany neither cellist nor dancer, was in concert by far the best. The Beethoven was architecturally clear and vigorously conducted. As with the works heard earlier, it was rough-hewn and somewhat unsophisticated, but it showed Silverstein to be a conductor of more than average competence, one to whom I'd trust the BSO, or any other group, with the confidence that the pieces would be well put across, without much subtlety, perhaps, but without distortions, either.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 17 1969

Notes and Footnotes

YESTERDAY we visted fo an hour or so with Marlo Nobre (pronounced No-Bray) a Tanglewood where he is one o eight composers invited this summer to an annual sympo sium at the Berkshire Music Center. We sat under the open-sided cafeteria tent, and he told us about their routine at Tanglewood.

All eight composers are expected to attend three seminars a week during their eight-week stay, from June 29 to Aug. 24 and each one is obligated to compose a number to be played by members of the Music Center Orchestra in the Theatre-Concert Hall while they're here. Mr. Nobre is busy on his assignment, which will be heard Aug. 16, along with compositions of three of the others. The other four artists' work will be heard at another date.

Mr. Nobre is a native of Brazil, and has a wife and family at home in Rio de Janeiro. As is the case with the other seven, six men and one woman, he is a young but recognized composer in his homeland. "We are professionals," he pointed out, "not students." At Tanglewood they discuss problems of music at the two-hour official symposium meetings that usually run over, at mealtime and in between. He finds this invigorating and challenging to the creative drive inherent in all artists.

Mornings and evenings, Mr. Nobre spends working on his composition in his room at Windsor Mountain School, where the eight are housed. He calls the piece "Ludus Instrumentale," which roughly translates into "Instrumental Games" or "Instrumental Combinations," and requires 16 musicians.

As for Tanglewood, Mr. Nobre, who visited here a couple of days last year, declared, "The atmosphere is very good for composing. The beautiful surroundings, meeting performers and other composers, and hearing good musical programs are an inspiration." He also was quite fascinated by the great number of birds in the Berkshires, and told us that every morning when he awakes at Windsor Mountain School a bird is singing outside his window. It's a great way to start a musical day, all right.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 16 1969

Thomas To Conduct BMC Concert Tonight

Michael Tilson Thomas, who will be the new assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall, will be one of the conductors at tonight's concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. The concert, second of the season, will begin at 9 p.m. in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall.

Mr. Thomas will conduct Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler." Two Berkshire Music Center fellows, Alvaro Cassuto and Yoav Talmi, will conduct works by Wagner, Debussy and Haydn.

Music center events are open to the public for a nominal fee, through the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 26 1969

String Quartet To Play Today

The Boston String Quartet, the subsidized fellowship quartet of the New England Conservatory, will play at Tanglewood this afternoon at 2:30.

The four musicians who study under Rudolf Kolisch of the Kolisch Quartet and Joseph Silverstein of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear instead of the previously scheduled composers forum.

The program will be Schubert's Quartet in G major, Opus 161 and Schoenberg Quartet No. 2 in F-Sharp Minor, which will feature soprano Joan Heller.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,200

JUL 19 1969

New England
FELLOWS AT LENOX

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

Thomas Keen Conductor

LENOX — To consider as students the Conducting Fellows enrolled at the Berkshire Music Center is mistaken, for more so than any other group of young people here, the conductors, traditionally, are a seasoned lot. And also a group of great potential, as a glimpse at a list of alumni — including Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Czawa, Claudio Abbado — quickly shows.

In the current crop the furthest advanced professionally is Michael Tilson Thomas, a Californian who last summer won the Koussevitzky Award — given annually to the outstanding fellow — and who has been named assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony for the coming year.

In his portion of the program on Wednesday night, Thomas led Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler," and it's just his sort of piece — extroverted, large of gesture, colorful in effect.

It was a fine reading, if not a total success. As far as orchestral sound, balances, and so on, things were admirable; Thomas obviously hears with extraordinary keenness, and must have the knack of rehearsing a group to optimal advantage. He has, too, a rock solid sense of rhythm, and this aspect of his performance was equally striking.

But where he most noticeably failed was in the opening pages of the "Temptation," where the piece never built quite forcefully enough, where in terms of sheer sound the climactic moments were never really as strong as they ought to have been.

IT WAS ALMOST as if Thomas was physically or psychically incapable of bringing this off, as if the effort for some reason demanded too much. And on an otherwise good job, there was this small flaw.

Yoav Talmi, an Israeli, is currently assisting Jorge Mester with the Louisville Orchestra, and he's a conductor of poise and precision. Technically he's impeccible, and there wasn't a wasted, excess motion in his performance of Debussy's "Iberia."

Trough the reading lacked depth somewhat, this may have been the fault of the players. "Iberia" itself presents ensemble problems of a more than average trickiness; there are 3s against 4s against 5s all at once, and the assurance and coolness that's needed to bring off this sort of thing convincingly might have been a step beyond the capacities of this year's group. But Talmi is a mature, intelligent conductor, and I look forward to hearing him again.

Possibly the most difficult pieces went to Alvaro Cassuto, a Portuguese, who seemed a bit shakier and less experienced than either Thomas or Talmi. He had Haydn's 100th Symphony ("Military") and Wagner's "Tristan" Prelude, and both performances were compressed and small-scale.

His emotional range — and the dynamic and expressive ranges over which he worked with the players — all these were restricted, due possibly to an underrehearsed orchestra or possibly to nerves alone. But within this limited scope, one could see a sensitive musical mind at work, and I would think that subsequent Cassuto performances will be better than there were.

The Evening Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 654,741

JUL 16 1969

THAT OLD movie plot, ever dramatic, wherein the young unknown steps out of the wings to substitute for the ailing star, still happens in real life show business.

The latest incident developed at the famed Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood, Mass., and a Philadelphian named Laurence Wheeler was involved.

A May graduate of Temple University's College of Music, he is a student at the summer music center and had looked forward to hearing the opening concert by the Boston Symphony.

At the last minute, he had to change his seat from the middle of the audience to the middle of the orchestra as he was called on to pinchhit for the regular first clarinetist, who became ill, midway through an all-Mozart program. More than 6,000 persons cheered his performance.

And then Wheeler had another surprise a few days later. Temple officials, who were unaware of his success at Tanglewood, had accepted his application for the graduate Master of Music program and offered him a fellowship.

Under the fellowship, he would teach North Philly's disadvantaged children in a joint Temple-Settlement Music School community music program funded by the Rockefeller Foundation.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 17 1969

3-Lingual Concert Slated Tonight

The fellows in Voice of the Berkshire Music Center will give a recital of German, French and Spanish songs this evening at 9 in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. The program will feature songs by Schumann, Faure, Mahler, Ravel, Poulenc, Schubert and deFalla.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 13 1969

Tanglewood Lists

Musical Events

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — Some 37 different musical events are currently listed on this summer's schedule of Berkshire Music Center concerts at Tanglewod. Open to the public through the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, the programs include orchestra concerts, opera scenes, faculty recitals, and concerts by the Boston University Tanglewood Institute and New England Conservatory Tanglewood Institute.

Other Concerts

In addition, there are the concerts of the Festival of Contemporary Music, the "Festival Within a Festival" sponsored by the B.M.C. in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. This special series of concerts, from Wednesday, July 30 to Saturday, Aug. 16, includes performances of chamber music, electronic and orchestral works, some especially commissioned for the festival, and two fully staged and danced performances of Stravinsky's masterpiece, L'Histoire du soldat, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. In addition, there will be two complete concert performances of Alban Berg's opera, Wozzeck, also conducted by Leinsdorf.

On Aug. 19, a concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras climaxes the annual gala called Tanglewood - on - Parade, in which all departments of Tanglewood perform publicly in an all-day series of concerts and demonstrations. The evening ends traditionally with a display of fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl.

The Berkshire Music Center events are widely known as the "Friends" events because they are open to members of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood. Membership in the Friends is available to all through the Friends Office at Tanglewood.

Remaining Concerts

The list of Berkshire Music Center events, with dates and times, follows. All events are in Tanglewood's 1200 seat Theatre - Concert Hall unless otherwise noted. An asterisk marks the concerts of the Festival of Contemporary Music.

* * *

JULY

13 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music II 10 a.m.

16 Wednesday — Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Conducting Fellows conducting, 9 p.m.

17 Thursday — Youth Concert 2.30 p.m.

19 Saturday — Boston University Tanglewood Institute Concert, 2.30 p.m.

20 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music III 10 a.m.

23 Wednesday — Composers' Forum I, 9 p. m. 24 Thursday — Faculty Recital — Roman Totenberg, violin Arthur Balsam, piano, 9 p.m.

26 Saturday — New England Conservatory Tanglewood Institute Concert 2.30 p.m.

27 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music IV, 10 a.m.

30 Wednesday — xBerkshire Music Center Orchestra, Gunther Schuller conducting, 9 p.m.

30 Wednesday — Youth Concert, 2.30 p.m.

31 Thursday — xChamber Music and Dance, 9 p.m.

AUGUST

2 Saturday — Vocal Concert III — Opera Scenes, 2.30 p.m.

3 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music V, 10 a.m. XChamber Music, 9 p.m.

6 Wednesday — Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Charles Wilson conducting, 9 p.m.

7 Thursday — Faculty Recital — Paul Zukotsky, violin Gilbert Kalish, piano, 9 p.m.

9 Saturday — Boston University Tanglewood Institute Concert, 2.30 p.m.

10 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music VI, 10 a.m.

11 Monday — xBerg: WOZZECK — Shed Erich Leinsdorf conducting, 9 p.m.

13 Wednesday — xChamber Music and Dance, 9 p.m.

14 Thursday — xChamber Music, 9 p.m.

15 Friday — Youth Concert, 2.30 p.m.

16 Saturday — New England Conservatory Tanglewood Institute Concert, 2.30 p.m.; xElectronic Concert— Main Lawn 4 p.m.

17 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music VII, 10 a.m.; Berg: WOZZECK — Shed Erich Leinsdorf conducting, 9 p.m.

18 Monday — Composers' Forum II, 9 p.m.

19 Tuesday — TANGLEWOOD - ON - PARADE Gala Concert — Shed, 8 p.m.

20 Wednesday — Boston University Tanglewood Institute Concert, 9 p.m.

21 Thursday — Vocal Concert IV — Opera Scenes, 9 p.m.

23 Saturday — Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, Conducting Fellows conducting, 2.30 p.m.

24 Sunday — Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music VIII, 10 a.m.

Sunday Concert Features Huggler

Work by John Huggler, who spent the 1964-65 season as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's composer-in-residence, will be featured at the Sunday morning chamber music concert by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

The concert will begin at 10 in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. In addition to the Huggler brass quintet, the Mozart piano-woodwind quintet K. 452 and the Brahms Quartet for piano and strings Opus 60, are on the program.

BMC concerts are open to the public.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 26 1969

112

Area Students Receive Music Scholarships

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Twelve Massachusetts girls will receive Young Artists Award music scholarships totaling $3,600 beginning in September. In addition, two students have been awarded fellowships of $450 each at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, this summer.

Berkshire Center fellowships have been awarded to Linda Raymond of Salem, Mass., a student at the New England Conservatory majoring in percussion, and Kathleen Toomey of North Adams, a voice major at the Conservatory.

Four are new recipients of regular scholarships. They are Alexis Providakes, 42 Massachusetts Ave., Worcester, a junior at Hartt College of Music, University of Hartford; Maureen Britt, 223 Cambridge St., Worcester, a freshman at Anna Maria College; Susan Eck, 40 School St., Northboro, a freshman at State College at Lowell; and

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Lois Hobbs, 40 Grosvenor St., Worcester, a freshman at State College at Lowell.

The conductor of the 29 concerts of baroque, classic and contemporary programs is James D. Bolle.

"The enthusiastic response to our concerts during the past three summers has convinced us," Bolle states, "that they have great value to students, people of towns and farms, all of whom are able to enjoy music of a quality and variety normally available only to residents of a few large cities."

Several of the players are members of the Boston Philharmonia Orchestra. Among them are Elinor Preble, Raymond Toubman, David Ohanian and John Miller, members of the Philharmonia Woodwind Quintet, "in residence" at Clark University.

A schedule of concerts may be obtained by writing to Monadnock Music, Franklin Pierce College, Rindge, N.H. 03461. Telephone (603) 899-3382.

UNDER THE "DOUBLE-ENTENDRE" title "Fan-Fare for Organ," a unique four-concert, one-man festival will be given this fall and winter by Virgil Fox at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall, New York City.

Fox will start with a "scaled" sequence of Bach works according to key signatures — Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Prelude and Fugue in B minor, etc. — on Oct. 21.

The second program Nov. 25, will be "The Gallic Greats." The third title, to be given Jan. 18, is "La Belle Epoque," including Busoni's "Fantasia Contrappuntistica" and Charles Ives' "Variations on 'America'." The final program, Feb. 24, will be organ concertos, with Fox as soloist with The Symphony of the New World, conducted by Benjamin Steinberg.

Renewal scholarships have been given to Sherryl Roy, Lancaster; Jane Gorden, Ware; Beverly Revzin, 10 Berkshire St., Worcester; Christine Kaloustian, Lancaster; Maria J. Lehoux, Gardner; Elaine Freedman, 25 South Lenox St., Worcester; Elizabeth Lamson, 25 Wabash Ave., Worcester; Georgeann Peterson, South Lancaster.

Auditions for new scholarships were held June 6 at M. Steinert & Sons Co., Worcester. Judges were Johnny W. Bradburn, organist and choir director at Central Congregational Church in Worcester; Louis J. Curran, Jr., director of music at Worcester Polytechnic Institute and Raymond Morin, chairman.

This year's awards bring to $82,250 the value of scholarships given since Young Artists Awards were established 19 years ago by an anonymous fund.

MONADNOCK MUSIC 1969 is patterned generally after the New Hampshire Music Festival that functions in four communities around Lake Winnipasaukee.

Base for the Monadnock Festival Orchestra is Franklin Pierce College, Rindge, N.H. Its concerts spread from the college to Jaffrey Center, Walpole, Dublin, Peterboro, Keene, Nelson, Amherst and Francestown.

Monadnock Concerts - Free

Some 35 professional musicians, members of symphony orchestras during the regular season, will perform the programs which began last Tuesday and will continue through Aug. 29.

All concerts are free.

Approximately 5,000 persons heard the concerts last year and took part in instructional discussions. An innovation this season is a series of lectures open to the public and held in Franklin Pierce's Ravencroft Theater. Lecturer is Edwin W. Wilfert, Jr., a member of the college's faculty.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
JUL 27 1969
New England Newsclip

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
AUG 25 1969

Israel Wins Music Prize

Yoav Talmi, an Israeli, has won the Koussevitzky Memorial Conducting Prize at the annual Berkshire Musical Festival at Tanglewood. He is a graduate of the Samuel Rubin Israel Academy of Music in Tel Aviv, and the Juilliard School of Music and an American-Israel Cultural Foundation scholarship recipient. Talmi will be associate conductor of the Louisville Symphony Orchestra and music director of the Kentucky Chamber Orchestra for the coming season. In May, 1970, he will be guest conductor of the Kol Israel (the National Radio) Orchestra in Jerusalem.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
AUG 25 1969

Koussevitzky Prize Goes To Yoav Talmi, an Israeli

Yoav Talmi, an Israeli conductor, has won the Koussevitzky Memorial Conducting Prize at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, selected Mr. Talmi from the three conductors who served as his assistants with the orchestra during its Tanglewood season.

Mr. Talmi, a Juilliard graduate, will be the associate conductor during the coming season for the Louisville Symphony Orchestra and will be music director of the Kentucky Chamber Orchestra.

RECORDER-GAZETTE
GREENFIELD, MASS.
(E) 13,822
JUL 16 1969

and the ... teachers include Joseph ... ano, James Pappoutsakis and Aurele Nicolet.

Jin-Kyung Koo, violinist from Korea, appeared as soloist with major orchestras in Korea as a child prodigy. She was awarded a Fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this summer and is studying with Roman Totenberg at Boston University.

Aline Drescher, soprano, received her professional training ... York. She attended Skid... has appeared

6 G THE KANSAS CITY STAR Sunday, August 3, 1969

Music in Mid-America

A report from a Midwestern music festival, and another from Tanglewood, the daddy of them all

... see Schonberg and Kaye columns.

SCRANTON, PA.
SCRANTONIAN
SUN. 47,500
AUG 3 1969

Local Violinist At Tanglewood

Fritz Valenches . . . scholarship

Fritz Valenches, son of Mr. and Mrs. Leon Valenches, 415 Electric St., well-known local violinist, was awarded a scholarship this summer at the world famous music camp, Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Valenches was chosen by William Kroll, a renowned violinist, and director of strings at Tanglewood and the Mannes School of Music, New York City.

While at Tanglewood, Valenches will study under Kroll.

He was awarded a scholarship at Mannes School of Music last year and will continue to study at the school next year.

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Monday, August 4, 1969

Youth studies at Berkshire

Edward Musengo, son of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Musengo of 116 Copleigh Drive, is studying at the famed Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox, Mass.

The youth is a trumpet major at Boston University.

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
(E) 15,210
SEP 5 1969

Michael Johns, son of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Johns of 250 Greenwood Dr., was awarded the C.D. Jackson Award, a citation and $300, at a concert at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. John was a student at Tanglewood Berkshire Festival during the last two summers. He is a junior at the New England Conservatory in Boston.

Tanglewood, a Musical Experience

By Joseph Kaye
(The Star's New York Correspondent)

Lenox, Mass.—A recent weekend at Tanglewood, our foremost summer music festival, brought such riches as a staged concert version of Verdi's opera, "Otello," and absorbing performances by pianists Andre Watts and Vladimir Ashkenazy with the Boston Symphony.

The "Otello" may be ranked as probably the best performance of a Shakespearean work this season in and out of New York. What is rare in opera occurs in "Otello"—the music emphasizes the drama and frequently enhances its qualities. Thus a good performance of "Otello" became a good performance of Shakespeare's play, but the Tanglewood presentation was not only a good performance, it was a stunning performance.

The conductor was Erich ...sdorf, retiring musical ... the Boston Symphony ... its summer ... here

Donna Precht, with conductor Charles Wilson.

ness that was ... it was understanding. Ashkenazy, soloist in the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto, was the introspective Russian.

A MISSOURIAN was encountered at Tanglewood. Donna Precht, of Mexico, is a fellowship participant at the Berkshire Music Center, appearing in the Center's presentation of operatic scenes and entire operas. She will sing the role of Marie in Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" soon.

A tall and pretty soprano, Miss Precht has already had wide experience. She studied in France after graduating from the University of Missouri and later in New York, where she was chosen by the pioneer musical avant-gardist, Edgard Varese, to sing in his "Offrandes" and in the world premiere of "Nocturnal," for soprano solo and eight contrabasses. She has affectionate memories of the late French-American composer. "When he spoke of music," she recalled, "he came alive. Otherwise, he was a rather quiet and self-contained man." She has been a member of the New York City Opera company. and this fall she goes to Zurich, Switzerland on a private scholarship to study German opera. After that, it is expected that the world of high professional opera will open up for her.

Miss Precht was the only student in the area from Missouri, a fact which prompted some nostalgic thoughts. When I first came to Tanglewood some years ago there were seven or eight Missouri students. Then, year after year, there were fewer—five, four, three, and now just one.

"Otello" review may be found on page

112

Area Students Receive Music Scholarships

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Twelve Massachusetts girls will receive Young Artists Award music scholarships totaling $3,600 beginning in September. In addition, two students have been awarded fellowships of $450 each at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, this summer.

Berkshire Center fellowships have been awarded to Linda Raymond of Salem, Mass., a student at the New England Conservatory majoring in percussion, and Kathleen Toomey of North Adams, a voice major at the Conservatory.

Four are new recipients of regular scholarships. They are Alexis Providakes, 42 Massachusetts Ave., Worcester, a junior at Hartt College of Music, University of Hartford; Maureen Britt, 223 Cambridge St., Worcester, a freshman at Anna Maria College; Susan Eck, 40 School St., Northboro, a freshman at State College at Lowell; and Lois Hobbs, 40 Grosvenor St., Worcester, a freshman at State College at Lowell.

The conductor of the 29 concerts of baroque, classic and contemporary programs is James D. Bolle.

"The enthusiastic response to our concerts during the past three summers has convinced us," Bolle states, "that they have great value to students, people of towns and farms, all of whom are able to enjoy music of a quality and variety normally available only to residents of a few large cities."

Several of the players are members of the Boston Philharmonia Orchestra. Among them are Elinor Preble, Raymond Toubman, David Ohanian and John Miller, members of the Philharmonia Woodwind Quintet, "in residence" at Clark University.

A schedule of concerts may be obtained by writing to Monadnock Music, Franklin Pierce College, Rindge, N.H. 03461. Telephone (603) 899-3382.

UNDER THE "DOUBLE-ENTENDRE" title "Fan-Fare for Organ," a unique four-concert, one-man festival will be given this fall and winter by Virgil Fox at Lincoln Center's Philharmonic Hall, New York City.

Fox will start with a "scaled" sequence of Bach works according to key signatures — Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Prelude and Fugue in B minor, etc. — on Oct. 21.

The second program Nov. 25, will be "The Gallic Greats." The third title, to be given Jan. 18, is "La Belle Epoque," including Busoni's "Fantasia Contrappuntistica" and Charles Ives' "Variations on 'America'." The final program, Feb. 24, will be organ concertos, with Fox as soloist with The Symphony of the New World, conducted by Benjamin Steinberg.

Renewal scholarships have been given to Sherryl Roy, Lancaster; Jane Gorden, Ware; Beverly Revzin, 10 Berkshire St., Worcester; Christine Kaloustian, Lancaster; Maria J. Lehoux, Gardner; Elaine Freedman, 25 South Lenox St., Worcester; Elizabeth Lamson, 25 Wabash Ave., Worcester; Georgeann Peterson, South Lancaster.

Auditions for new scholarships were held June 6 at M. Steinert & Sons Co., Worcester. Judges were Johnny W. Bradburn, organist and choir director at Central Congregational Church in Worcester; Louis J. Curran, Jr., director of music at Worcester Polytechnic Institute and Raymond Morin, chairman.

This year's awards bring to $82,250 the value of scholarships given since Young Artists Awards were established 19 years ago by an anonymous fund.

MONADNOCK MUSIC 1969 is patterned generally after the New Hampshire Music Festival that functions in four communities around Lake Winnipasaukee.

Base for the Monadnock Festival Orchestra is Franklin Pierce College, Rindge, N.H. Its concerts spread from the college to Jaffrey Center, Walpole, Dublin, Peterboro, Keene, Nelson, Amherst and Francestown.

Monadnock Concerts - Free

Some 35 professional musicians, members of symphony orchestras during the regular season, will perform the programs which began last Tuesday and will continue through Aug. 29.

All concerts are free.

Approximately 5,000 persons heard the concerts last year and took part in instructional discussions. An innovation this season is a series of lectures open to the public and held in Franklin Pierce's Ravencroft Theater. Lecturer is Edwin W. Wilfert, Jr., a member of the college's faculty.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 27 1969

New England Newsclip

RECORDER-GAZETTE
GREENFIELD, MASS.
(E) 13,822

JUL 16 1969

and the ... teachers include Joseph M... ano, James Pappoutsakis and Aurele Nicolet.

Jin-Kyung Koo, violinist from Korea, appeared as soloist with major orchestras in Korea as a child prodigy. She was awarded a Fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this summer and is studying with Roman Totenberg at Boston University.

Aline Drescher, soprano, received her professional training ... York. She attended Skid... has appeared ...

---

6 G THE KANSAS CITY STAR Sunday, August 3, 1969

Music in Mid-America

A report from a Midwestern music festival, and another from Tanglewood, the daddy of them all

... see Schonberg and Kaye columns.

SCRANTON, PA.
SCRANTONIAN
SUN. 47,500

AUG 3 1969

Local Violinist At Tanglewood

Fritz Valenches . . . scholarship

Fritz Valenches, son of Mr. and Mrs. Leon Valenches, 415 Electric St., well-known local violinist, was awarded a scholarship this summer at the world famous music camp, Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Valenches was chosen by William Kroll, a renowned violinist, and director of strings at Tanglewood and the Mannes School of Music, New York City.

While at Tanglewood, Valenches will study under Kroll.

He was awarded a scholarship at Mannes School of Music last year and will continue to study at the school next year.

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Monday, August 4, 1969

Youth studies at Berkshire

Edward Musengo, son of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Musengo of 116 Copleigh Drive, is studying at the famed Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox, Mass.

NC

The youth is a trumpet major at Boston University.

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
(E) 15,210

SEP 5 1969

Michael Johns, son of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Johns of 250 Greenwood Dr., was awarded the C.D. Jackson Award, a citation and $300, at a concert at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. John was a student at Tanglewood Berkshire Festival during the last two summers. He is a junior at the New England Conservatory in Boston.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

AUG 25 1969

Israeli Wins Music Prize

Yoav Talmi, an Israeli, has won the Koussevitzky Memorial Conducting Prize at the annual Berkshire Musical Festival at Tanglewood. He is a graduate of the Samuel Rubin Israel Academy of Music in Tel Aviv, and the Juilliard School of Music and an American-Israel Cultural Foundation scholarship recipient. Talmi will be associate conductor of the Louisville Symphony Orchestra and music director of the Kentucky Chamber Orchestra for the coming season. In May, 1970, he will be guest conductor of the Kol Israel (the National Radio) Orchestra in Jerusalem.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

AUG 25 1969

Koussevitzky Prize Goes To Yoav Talmi, an Israeli

Yoav Talmi, an Israeli conductor, has won the Koussevitzky Memorial Conducting Prize at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass.

Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, selected Mr. Talmi from the three conductors who served as his assistants with the orchestra during its Tanglewood season.

Mr. Talmi, a Juilliard graduate, will be the associate conductor during the coming season for the Louisville Symphony Orchestra and will be music director of the Kentucky Chamber Orchestra.

Tanglewood, a Musical Experience

By Joseph Kaye
(The Star's New York Correspondent)

Lenox, Mass.—A recent weekend at Tanglewood, our foremost summer music festival, brought such riches as a staged concert version of Verdi's opera, "Otello," and absorbing performances by pianists Andre Watts and Vladimir Ashkenazy with the Boston Symphony.

The "Otello" may be ranked as probably the best performance of a Shakespearean work this season in and out of New York. What is rare in opera occurs in "Otello"—the music emphasizes the drama and frequently enhances its qualities. Thus a good performance of "Otello" became a good performance of Shakespeare's play, but the Tanglewood presentation was not only a good performance, it was a stunning performance.

The conductor was Erich ...sdorf, retiring musical ... the Boston Symphony ... its summer ... here ...

ness that was ... it was understanding. Ashkenazy, soloist in the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto, was the introspective Russian.

A MISSOURIAN was encountered at Tanglewood. Donna Precht, of Mexico, is a fellowship participant at the Berkshire Music Center, appearing in the Center's presentation of operatic scenes and entire operas. She will sing the role of Marie in Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" soon.

A tall and pretty soprano, Miss Precht has already had wide experience. She studied in France after graduating from the University of Missouri and later in New York, where she was chosen by the pioneer musical avant-gardist, Edgard Varese, to sing in his "Offrandes" and in the world premiere of "Nocturnal," for soprano solo and eight contrabasses. She has affectionate memories of the late French-American composer. "When he spoke of music," she recalled, "he came alive. Otherwise, he was a rather quiet and self-contained man." She has been a member of the New York City Opera company, and this fall she goes to Zurich, Switzerland on a private scholarship to study German opera. After that, it is expected that the world of high professional opera will open up for her.

Miss Precht was the only student in the area from Missouri, a fact which prompted some nostalgic thoughts. When I first came to Tanglewood some years ago there were seven or eight Missouri students. Then, year after year, there were fewer—five, four, three, and now just one.

Donna Precht, with conductor Charles Wilson.

"Otello" review may be found on page

John Revel, trombone; Yael Orbach, viola.

DEDICATED TO THEIR MUSIC

By Judith Brody

Young Talent Blooms to Beauty at Tanglewood

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, dressed in short-sleeved shirts and hardly recognizable without their tuxedos, sat on the concert stage at Tanglewood, their summer home, and rehearsed a program of Mozart.

The day was warm, the atmosphere was jovial. A few players chatted with each other while one musician scratched his back with his violin bow.

The maestro was trying to find his place. "Where are we?", asked Erich Leinsdorf. Someone pointed to the right section.

But when the conductor lifted his arms and the orchestra members started to play, they played with the grace and precision of the professionals they are, who have been performing for years and are confident of their skill. And because they are good and have proved it, they can afford to think about other things — salary and vacations and home and family.

But also at Tanglewood are 160 young people who are thinking only of music. They are "fellows" at the Berkshire Music Center (BMC), a tuition-free summer academy sponsored by the Boston Symphony to give young musicians a chance to continue their professional training under the guidance of eminent musicians.

They are talented, these young men and women—they have been carefully screened and selected on the basis of their musical proficiency. But they are not yet confident.

"I felt nervous at the BMC audition," said John Revel, 26, a bass trombone player from New Jersey. "I suppose it's good to feel a little nervous, but sometimes it gets out of hand. A word can set you off."

And they are very intense, for they have come, after all, to totally involve themselves in music for eight weeks. Any interruption is unwelcome.

In one of the many rooms on the handsome 210-acre Tanglewood estate, a string quartet was practicing. The cool grass and tall trees outside would have lured less dedicated souls away from their music, but the young musicians seemed oblivious to their surroundings.

"I think we played that too fast. What do you think?" asked a pretty violinist, her cheeks slightly red from exertion.

"I think that's the right tempo for the whole movement," the cellist answered.

The group played the piece again.

"I overdid it this time," the girl said. "Too fast. Let's try it again."

So they played it again, and would play it over and over until it was right, because they knew that only hard work would bring technical perfection.

The Berkshire Music Center was established in 1940 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its music director, Serge Koussevitzky. That year, a slim, 22-year-old man named Leonard Bernstein was one of the Center's first fellows. Alumnae have included Sarah Caldwell, Phyllis Curtain and Leontyne Price.

Nearly 40 percent of the Boston Symphony attended the BMC and 15 percent of all players in symphony orchestras across the country have gone to the Center for at least one year. Thirteen conductors of

Turn to Page 27, Col. 1

Charles Wilson, vocal leader.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUL 8 1969 New England

Music Blooms at Tanglewood

Continued from Page 5

major U.S. orchestras have studied at Tanglewood.

The faculty (largely composed of members of the Boston Symphony and guest performers) realizes what great potential the fellows have.

"The future great singers of the world will, 99 times out of 100, be American," said Charles Wilson, head of vocal music activities. "Their vocal talent is marvelous and the availability of good preparation is higher here."

To develop that potential, the BMC aims at giving the fellows the widest possible musical experience, with a good deal of emphasis on contemporary music. The students rehearse orchestra and chamber music from 9 a. m.-6 p. m. and perform publicly almost every night.

On Aug. 19, at the annual "Tanglewood-on-Parade" festival, they will end their eight-week program by giving a joint concert with the Boston Symphony.

In one sense, that concert will be an event shared by all the fellows. They are united by the common goal of making music — and making it the best it can be. But, in another sense, the concert will be a very personal and individual achievement. Each student has a unique musical history and each has traveled a long, lonely road.

Bob Watt, 21, of Boston, who likes to practice the French horn outdoors, with his music perched on a waist-high bush, became interested in music when he was a child.

"I liked the sound of the horn ever since I heard it on "The Lone Ranger' television show," he said. But it wasn't until years later that he finally found out what the instrument was—and decided to play it. He was a freshman in high school.

"But even if you start late, you can become a good musician if you're interested," Watt said. He was interested, practiced hard and soon was taking lessons from Boston Symphony player Harry Shapiro, who suggested that Bob come to Tanglewood. His goal is to play in a major orchestra.

One fellow at the BMC came close to not being a musician at all. John Revel began studying the violin because a family friend gave him one. But, three years later, he gave it up.

"When I was in the eighth grade the band leader at my school said the band needed a trombone player, so I started taking lessons on the trombone," Revel explained. "When I got talked into going to Julliard School of Music, and now here I am. If it hadn't been for the band leader, I'd be a very bad engineer."

But Revel takes his music seriously, practices five horus a day ("If you miss a day of practice, your muscle tone goes"), and plans to return to Julliard for a master's degree. He desires a "steady job" with an orchestra.

For some, the choice of a career as a professional musician is an agonizing one to make. Judy Checkovich, 21, of Connecticut, has been playing the viola for 14 years because she loves the instrument. She has been a student of Burton Fine, principal viola for the Boston Symphony.

"I practice three hours a day, but I should be practicing five or six," she admitted. "I'm just not sure yet about making music a career. It's very time-consuming and so much travel is involved."

But this is Judy's second summer at Tanglewood. Despite her uncertainty, the lure of music is very hard for her to resist.

Kathleen Linge, Arlington, Va., practises her French horn while Kinberly Kabala, of Mich., coaches Robert Kelley, tenor of New York City.

(Other Photos in Centerfold)

Record American Photo, Teresa Zabala

114.

Tanglewood Artists Tune Up for Summer Concerts

Joe Conti, Providence totes case for Judy Checkovich, Ct.

The students spend the entire day at private and group rehearsals.

MUSIC fills the air abounding the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in the western part of the state. The cacaphonic strains of neophytes are toned and blended by the smooth synchronized perfection of the masters in a democratic theater of give and take. The center is more than a musical entertainment center, more than a national talent shelf; it is an incubator warning the youthful spark of fervor within those teetering on the brink of professionalism; a nursery for 160 young talents on learning from the maestros. Above, Erich Leinsdorf conducts rehearsal for his last summer of concerts at Tanglewood. Left, Bob Watt of Boston practices his French horn.

Record American Photo, Teresa Zabala

(Storm, Other Photos, Page 5)

Byron Belt on the arts

Director of boys choir imaginative, inspiring

By BYRON BELT

LENOX, Mass.—The Berkshire Boy Choir is the most recent heir to an ancient and honorable tradition dating from England's Canterbury Cathedral in the fifth century. A bare three summers old, the chorus of 47 boys and 14 men has already been acclaimed as possibly the finest of its kind in America.

It was certainly fitting that the present organist and master of choristers at Canterbury Cathedral, Allan Wicks, be brought to New England to help strengthen a major musical form which has been somewhat in eclipse here in recent years. Wicks, who is also organ scholar of Christ Church, Oxford, is the third British musician to direct the Berkshire Boy Choir.

When New York businessman and ex-chorister John Hoyt Stookey founded the chorus he selected one of the most distinguished authorities on male choral singing, George Guest, to serve as first music director. Guest is well known through a series of outstanding recordings with his choir of St. John's College at Cambridge. The conductor for the second summer was Brian Runnett from Norwich Cathedral.

COMPETITION

If the art of boy choir singing is to survive, John Stookey feels it must have the stimulating challenge of the kind of recognition Olympic competition provides in sports. By selecting the boys regardless of race, color or religious affiliation from across the country, the Berkshire Boy Choir provides a goal of unique quality for singers and their directors.

The boys are selected after auditions upon the recommendation of their own choirmasters, and already in three seasons, the honor of spending most of July and August singing under the outstanding men in the field has contributed to stimulating a modest revival in boy and men choirs in many communities.

When they return home, after a summer of intensive training, the boys tend to justify their experience by helping to upgrade the quality of music on the local level. Since all boys are provided full expenses, youths from the ghetto mingle freely with scions of the most prominent families. Talent and love of singing with others are the only requirements.

The man largely responsible for the gathering of singers of special merit is Executive Director Ellwood W. ("Bunker") Hill, a former choirmaster and retired head of the music department at Bradford Junior College.

At camp, which is housed at the Stockbridge School, just five minutes from the beautiful Tanglewood summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Hill and the music director are assisted by R. Michael McNaught, the English-born principal of Berkshire Country Day School, Mrs. Ruth K. Sullivan, Donald Ingram, Lowell V. Lacey and Mark H. Pearlman, as choir mother, assistant music director, accompanist and waterfront director, respectively.

In addition to the musical and administrative staff, the 14 men who comprise the adult voices of the choir serve as counselors, coaches and idols for the lively boys.

Spending several days living, eating, playing and humming along with the Berkshire Boy Choir was an unforgettable and rewarding experience.

All of those braces, high pitched voices and the incredible physical and mental emergy of boys always comes as a shock to an aging bachelor. The extraordinary musical talent was somewhat taken for granted, but the keen dedication, enthusiasm and almost hourly improvement in the singing could never be taken as anything less than a blend of youthful genius coupled with tremendously hard work.

Joining in their conversations ,watching them at play and sharing some of their daily experiences and public performances was a special joy. But the highlight of our days together were the rehearsals conducted by Allan Wicks.

The quiet authority, sophisticated wit and musical powers of Mr. Wicks should be observed by all educators and people concerned with youth. Seldom raising his voice above the most confidential sort of conversational level, the conductor was able to perfectly control, delight and inspire nearly four dozen exuberant youngsters.

By never talking down to them (his vocabulary sent me scurrying to a dictionary more than once) the singers give him not only their attention, but their fond respect and eager best. The result, from early seasonal concerts at Rutgers University, through a pair of distinguished programs at the Saratoga and Tanglewood festivals, was almost miraculous improvement from an initially high level.

'DO SOMETHING'

The colorful Wicks exhortations are surely partly responsible for his success: "It's so bland — DO something with it, put it in aspic, add a touch of kirsch — but do SOMEthing!" "Let's see some fire in your eyes and sparks in your nostrils!" and the less colorful but equally effective "Please hit those consonants — they make the music come alive."

Every word is designed to stimulate and enliven the music-making, and the performance quality clearly justifies the conductor's imaginative approach.

New York music lovers will have a unique opportunity to hear the Berkshire Boy Choir (the name is somehow inapt and misleading) in the exquisite setting of the Cloisters, in Manhattan, where a program of sacred music highlighting the Baroque splendors of the Monteverdi Mass "In illo tempore" and the Britten "Hymn to Saint Cecelia" will be sung at 3 p.m. Tuesday.

We have heard all of the major works other than the Monteverdi, with the Britten a favorite triumph along with the lean magnificence of Aaron Copland's moving "In the Beginning." Allen Ridout, something of composer-in-residence at Canterbury and a faculty member at Cambridge, composed a delicious "Divertimento on Poems of Robert Burns" for this year's choir, which the group sings with lusty swagger with Wicks and Lacey at the piano.

The Berkshire Boy Choir, shown here in rehearsal with its director, Allan Wicks, will give a concert of sacred music Tuesday afternoon in the Cloisters, Manhattan.

STATEN ISLAND ADVANCE
Sunday, August 10, 1969

← Same story, different pictures →

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Sunday, August 10, 1969

Two members of the Berkshire Boy Choir.

CRITIC-AT-LARGE

Berkshire Boy Choir Heir To Honorable Tradition

By BRYON BELT

LENOX, Mass. — The Berkshire Boy Choir is the most recent heir to an ancient and honorable tradition dating from England's Canterbury Cathedral in the 5th century. A bare three to an aging bachelor. The extraordinary musical talent was somewhat taken for granted, but the keen dedication, enthusiasm and almost hourly improvement in the singing could never be taken

—Whitestone Photo

Choir Rehearses For Concert Here

The Berkshire Boy Choir, New York City, rehearses for a concert of sacred and secular music it will give for the benefit of the Fresh Air Fund and the Choir at 8:30 p.m. Friday, August 15, at St. Mark's Church.

The Choir, under the direction of Allan Wicks, organist and master of choristers at Canterbury Cathedral in England, is performing this summer for the third consecutive year at major music festivals, including the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood (with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in "Othello") and the Southern Vermont Art Center in Manchester. It also will sing at the Cloisters in New York and at various church services.

The August 15 concert at St. Mark's will conclude the season.

Tickets for the concert here can be obtained from the Berkshire Boy Choir, 445 Park Avenue, Room 2100, New York, N. Y. 10022, and are entirely tax deductible. Fresh Air children will be admitted free. Both organizations are nonprofit and depend on contributions from private sources.

The Detroit Free Press
D. 600,803 SUN. 644,524

AUG 8 1969

Just 11, He'll Solo On Stage

By Jack Tucker
Free Press Society Columnist

John Gage Parke, who's all of 11 years old, is on the verge of a debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In solo yet!

For two years, John, son of the Hervey C. Parkes (Parke Davis and Co. pharmaceuticals) of University Place, Grosse Pointe, has been attending Berkshire Boy - Choir Camp at Lenox, Mass.

John Detroit

The camp is run by Elwood Hill, former organist at Christ Church, Grosse Pointe, affectionately known as "Bunker."

The throaty talented youngsters train like crazy and then sing — for their supper?—around the Down East church circuit.

Next week, the choir will appear at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony, Leinsdorf conducting. And right up there on stage and on key will be Master John — going it alone for five whole bars.

Meanwhile, back at home Dad and Mom are packed and waiting the arrival of their exchange student, Stefan Moberg, from Sweden. Then the Clan Parke and Stefan will head eastward to Tanglewood where they will be met by son James who's been in Quebec. They'll be on hand for John's chant of triumph — proud, and probably twice as nervous.

ADVERTISER
NEW CANAAN, CONN.
WEEKLY 5,141

JUL 31 1969

116

NEW YORK DAILY COLUMN
AND KNICKERBOCKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 150,000

AUG 17 1969

Roman Totenberg at the violin and Artur Balsam sits at piano during a typical afternoon session in Tanglewood.

The Young Apprentices at TANGLEWOOD

By Dr. Jack Bloomfield
(Part Two of a Series)

The young musicians who spend their summers in this part of the Berkshires are enjoying a satisfying, fruitful experience which could not be duplicated anywhere.

At Tanglewood, on a typical afternoon, an exciting lecture-demonstration takes place in the Little Red House, once the home of Nathaniel Hawthorne. It had been reconstructed by the National Federation of Music Clubs for use as a practice building.

40 people had crammed into the main studio on the ground floor to watch and learn. Some sat on folding chairs. Others just squatted. Many stood up in the back. The sun steamed through the open windows, overheating the room, which was bare except for some essential equipment: a baby grand piano, a spinet, a chalkboard, and some hi-fi equipment on a shelf.

The audience is made up largely of high school and college age youth attending the Tanglewood School of Music. There are a sprinkling of invited guests, including Mrs. Steven (Pamela Ross) Levy, 1966 winner of the top award in piano competition of the Connecticut Federation of Music Clubs.

Two performers enter the room. Yosef Yankelev, age 23, a violinist studying at the Juilliard School of Music, and Leslie Sinfin, 19, a piano student at the Mannes College of Music. For a short time, they play part of Beethoven's Sonata No. 4, as the audience listens appreciatively. When they finish, they are received with applause and they move toward the back of the room.

At this point, two famous musicians, instructors at the Tanglewood Music School, take over. Roman Totenberg, head of the Music Department of Boston University walks up front with his Stradivarius, considered to be one of the few in the world in mint condition. Artur Balsam, once a member of the renowned Albanieri Trio, sits down at the piano.

String quartet plays in an open enclosure at Merrywood.

Totenberg, nationally known for his violin clinics, begins to speak, commenting on the performance of the two young artists:

"You must recognize the relentless rhythmical drive of Beethoven, which is tremendously important. Be steady. With the orchestra, you get supported by the double bassoon. Here you don't. Listen."

The violinist picks up his instrument and plays at length to demonstrate. It was obvious that though Yosef had outstanding technique, he needed to learn from the maestro how to interpret the music. When Totenberg finishes, the audience applauds once again.

Yosef speaks up: "I see. But I don't think I could do it."

Balsam breaks in, agreeing with Totenberg's appraisal:

"Both of you played very well, but it was too fast, sometimes unsteady and harried. At your tempo, no pianist could do it justice. You were practically twice as fast as you should be.

"Let me show you."

The pianist, famous as a soloist and as an accompanist, then illustrates at the keyboard what he means.

"You understand?" he asked. "Beethoven needs a steady hand and a steady time. The greatest difficulty with his sonatas is keeping the tempo. And that is also the most important part."

The young artists ask a few more questions, which are answered verbally and instrumentally. Yosef's final query was, "How do you happen to play so fast and so slow at the same time?"

"I play it with an even tempo with both hands." Balsam answers.

"It's so fast." Yosef demurs.

"I just try to play every note distinctly, Balsam concludes.

At this point, the two instructors play through the sonata brilliantly.

Yosef and Leslie have had an instructive afternoon and have gained a new insight into Beethoven.

In nearby Lenox, the Merrywood Music School, a non-profit organization like the Tanglewood Music School, was operating in its 12th year. Housed in a rambling, old, though well-kept mansion, it had started off in 1958 with 13 students and had grown to 61. They ranged in age from 16 to 23, half of them college students.

Students surrounded by greenery on way to class at Merrywood.

The founder and manager of the school was a music teacher from West Hartford, Connecticut, Ruth B. Horowitz. When Mrs. Horowitz, who has been teaching music for 35 years, started the school, she did it with the assistance of her musician son and daughter. They are no longer with her and have been replaced with a staff of 12, three of whom come to the school from England:

- Mr. Benjamin Zander, the Music Program Director, who is an honor graduate from London University and who has had additional study in Germany, Italy and the U.S. in the piano and the cello, as well as in conducting.
- Mrs. Patricia Zander, pianist, and a graduate of the Royal College of Music in London, who has also studied in Paris and the U.S.
- Mr. Michael Freyen, violinist, who sometimes performs with the London Orchestra.

The program of the school includes private lessons, chamber music, orchestra work, theory, choir and composition. Student recitals for the public are given on Saturday afternoons and staff recitals on Sunday evenings.

All applicants for the school are auditioned, in person, or through tapes. Mrs. Horowitz claims that usually the scholarships, given to outstanding students each year, far exceed the money donated for that purpose by well-wishers. She is extremely enthusiastic about the young people:

"What I find is that I can practice a great deal in a relaxed, free, college atmosphere of friendship and consideration. We're encouraged to go to bed early—and with our schedule, we have to. But we can also go off campus. There are 5 cars available.

"Most of all, I'm learning a lot and I'm enjoying my music."

Next Sunday—The Stockbridge Players and The Fokine Ballet

Under expert instruction, the Merrywood chorus at practice.

B
2

117.

Boston University Tanglewood Institute Lists Summer Seminars

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750

APR 27 1969

Conducts Piano Seminar

ude Frank, German pianist, will conduct the t piano seminar at the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, June 29-July 26.

Claude Frank, the German pianist, will conduct the first piano seminar at the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, Mass., June 29-July 26.

Frank has played with most of the major symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada. He has performed at the Marlboro Music Festival and has appeared for the last several years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Born in Germany, Frank began his musical career under the tutelage of Artur Schnabel. He later studied music at Columbia University and conducting at Tanglewood.

* * *

Two of the twentieth century's most prominent singers, Pierre Bernac and Alexander Kipnis, will be guest - artists at two separate voice seminars this coming summer at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, Massachusetts.

Kipnis, the Russian basso who earned wide acclaim as an interpreter of German opera at the Metropolitan Opera, will give master classes during Vocal Seminar I, June 29 to July 26. Bernac, the French baritone who was a close associate of composer Francois Poulenc, will serve as guest - artist during Vocal Seminar II, July 28-Aug. 25.

While Kipnis appeared at virtually every famous opera house and music festival in Europe and America, Bernac is known chiefly as a recitalist. For a quarter of a century Bernac and Poulenc gave concerts whose purpose was to bring to song literature the same spirit of ensemble and balance which generally prevails in the performance of sonatas for instrument and piano. During that period, Poulenc also composed many songs especially for Bernac. Since Poulenc's death in 1962, Bernac has devoted his time to teaching master classes, and in April he conducted two of these classes at Boston University.

PIERRE BERNAC

Kipnis, now 78 years old, made his formal debut in Hamburg, Germany in 1915. Besides his long career at the Metropolitan Opera, he was a member of the Chicago Opera when that brilliant company made operatic history in that city during the 1920's and 1930's.

* * *

The Boston University Tanglewood Institute is a unique partnership in the arts between the Berkshire Music Center, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts.

Instructors and guest - artists include members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, faculty from the Divisions of Music, Art, and Theater at Boston University and prominent individuals in the fields of music, art, theater and dance.

The idea for a program that would provide a meaningful interchange between experienced performers, teachers and the developing artist was first conceived four years ago when Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra invited the School of Fine and Applied Arts to conduct a summer program of college - level instruction for music students.

Since then the institute has grown to include programs in theater, dance, drawing and painting, and music programs ranging from master classes for professional musicians and teachers to a Young Artists Program for gifted high school juniors.

Enrollment in the inst it has grown from 50 students th first summer to more than 30 from all 50 states, expected attend during the summer 196 session.

Guest-Artist

Alexander Kipnis, the noted Russian basso who will be a guest-artist at Boston University Tanglewood Institute this summer, as Boris Gudunov, a role he frequently played when he was associated with the Metropolitan Opera in New York.

OPERA NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
23 TI. A YEAR 73,000

APR 5 1969

The Boston University Tanglewood Institute, a partnership between the Boston school's fine arts department and the Berkshire Music Center, begins its fourth year on June 29. Enrollment for this summer's eight-week session will exceed three hundred; classes in voice, drama, set design and allied arts will be offered.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,892

APR 20 1969

A SEMINAR of Beethoven's sonatas, variations and five piano concertos will be conducted by Bela Boszormenyi-Nagy at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Aug. 11-23.

Professor of music at Boston University, Nagy has made more than 600 concert appearances in this country and Europe. True Beethoven piano music specialists have been rare. Outstanding was the late Artur Schnabel, who recorded all 32 of Beethoven's piano sonatas.

THE FIRST PIANO SEMINAR at the Boston University Tanglewood Institute will be conducted by Claude Frank June 29-26.

Frank has not been heard in Worcester, but he did give a recital in 1966 on the Fitchburg Community Concert Series at the state college there. He has performed

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,892

MAY 18 1969

many times with the Boston Symphony, both in Boston and at Tanglewood.

Boston University Tanglewood Institute is a unique partnership in the arts with the Berkshire Music Center, educational department of the Boston Symphony.

During the four years it has operated at Tanglewood, the institute has grown to include programs in theater, dance, drawing and painting, and master classes for professional musicians and teachers.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800

MAY 1 1969

Totenberg and Balsam to conduct Beethoven seminar

Roman Totenberg of Belmont, violinist, and Artur Balsam, pianist, will conduct a Seminar in Chamber Music and Accompanying at the Boston University Tangelwood Institute, Lenox, June 29 to July 12.

The seminar will cover the ten Beethoven sonatas for violin and piano.

A performer since the age of eight, Totenberg has appeared with the Berlin Philharmonic, the London Philharmonic, Concertgebouw in Amsterdam, and the Boston and Cleveland Symphony Orchestras. He has recorded extensively.

Totenberg graduated from the Warsaw Chopin Conservatory and later studied at the Berlin Academy and the Instrumental Academy of Paris. He was formerly head of the violin department at the Peabody Institute of Music and has taught at the Aspen Institute and the Mozarteum in Salzburg. He is presently a professor of music at the Boston University School of Fine and Applied Arts and resides at 15 Day School lane.

Balsam was born in Warsaw and studied music in Lodz, Poland, and at the State Academy of Music in Berlin. He first visited the United States in 1932 as an accompanist for Yehudi Menuhin. He has appeared with Totenberg in recitals in Europe and America.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

MAY 22 1969

Pianist Nagy To Present Concert

Dr. Bella B. Nagy, who for the past several summers has given advanced music seminars at Tanglewood, will present a piano concert this Sunday afternoon at 3 at Foxhollow School, Lenox.

Dr. Nagy, chairman of the piano department at Boston University and formerly head of the piano department at Indiana University, conducts artist seminars during the year at colleges throughout the country. This summer he will offer a piano seminar at Tanglewood from Aug. 10-24, and will perform all 32 Beethoven sonatas in a series of six concerts.

Sunday's concert will feature Hungarian music. This is of special interest since Dr. Nagy is a native of Hungary. The public is invited to attend and to stay for French tea and a folk-lore performance that will follow.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

MAR 13 1969

AT TANGLEWOOD

Philip Pearlstein and Alfred Leslie, prominent members of the "New Realism" school of painting, will be among the faculty members and visiting artists in the painting and drawing program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, June 29 to August 24. Pearlstein, recently awarded a $5000 grant from the National Council on the Arts, will be a member of the resident faculty, along with John Wilson, Richard Yarde and David Ratner, all of the faculty of Art at Boston University. Leslie will serve as a visiting critic at Tanglewood, joining Harold Tovish, Gabriel Laderman and Robert Mallary.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500

MAR 20 1969

Summer Art Courses at Tanglewood

LINCOLN and SUDBURY - Exceptionally qualified high school students who submit portfolios of their work in painting and drawing may become eligible for the summer painting and drawing program at the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, June 29 to August 24. The courses are also open to any college art student. For information, contact the office of John R. Watts, administrator of the institute and Assistant Dean of the School of Fine and Applied Arts, Boston University.

ROCKFORD MORNING STAR
ROCKFORD, ILL.
D. 61,712 SUN. 82,153

JUN 8 1969

Tanglewood Registration Now Open

Enrollment is open for the fourth annual General Seminar in the Arts, being offered during July and August at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, Mass., under auspices of Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts.

Enrollees may participate in organized visits and tours to concerts, dance festivals, art exhibitions and theater productions throughout the Berkshires.

Boston University Tanglewood Institute Lists Summer Seminars

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750

APR 27 1969

Conducts Piano Seminar

ude Frank, German pianist, will conduct the t piano seminar at the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, June 29-July 26.

New England

Claude Frank, the German pianist, will conduct the first piano seminar at the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, Mass., June 29-July 26.

Frank has played with most of the major symphony orchestras in the United States and Canada. He has performed at the Marlboro Music Festival and has appeared for the last several years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Born in Germany, Frank began his musical career under the tutelage of Artur Schnabel. He later studied music at Columbia University and conducting at Tanglewood.

* * *

Two of the twentieth century's most prominent singers, Pierre Bernac and Alexander Kipnis, will be guest - artists at two separate voice seminars this coming summer at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, Massachusetts.

Kipnis, the Russian basso who earned wide acclaim as an interpreter of German opera at the Metropolitan Opera, will give master classes during Vocal Seminar I, June 29 to July 26. Bernac, the French baritone who was a close associate of composer Francois Poulenc, will serve as guest - artist during Vocal Seminar II, July 28-Aug. 25.

While Kipnis appeared at virtually every famous opera house and music festival in Europe and America, Bernac is known chiefly as a recitalist. For a quarter of a century Bernac and Poulenc gave concerts whose purpose was to bring to song literature the same spirit of ensemble and balance which generally prevails in the performance of sonatas for instrument and piano. During that period, Poulenc also composed many songs especially for Bernac. Since Poulenc's death in 1962, Bernac has devoted his time to teaching master classes, and in April he conducted two of these classes at Boston University.

PIERRE BERNAC

Kipnis, now 78 years old, made his formal debut in Hamburg, Germany in 1915. Besides his long career at the Metropolitan Opera, he was a member of the Chicago Opera when that brilliant company made operatic history in that city during the 1920's and 1930's.

* * *

The Boston University Tanglewood Institute is a unique partnership in the arts between the Berkshire Music Center, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts.

Instructors and guest - artists include members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, faculty from the Divisions of Music, Art, and Theater at Boston Uniyersity and prominent individuals in the fields of music, art, theater and dance.

The idea for a program that would provide a meaningful interchange between experienced performers, teachers and the developing artist was first conceived four years ago when Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra invited the School of Fine and Applied Arts to conduct a summer program of college - level instruction for music students.

Since then the institute has grown to include programs in theater, dance, drawing and painting, and music programs ranging from master classes for professional musicians and teachers to a Young Artists Program for gifted high school juniors.

Enrollment in the inst[illegible] has grown from 50 students th[illegible] first summer to more than 30[illegible] from all 50 states, expected [illegible] attend during the summer 19[illegible] session.

Guest-Artist

Alexander Kipnis, the noted Russian basso who will be a guest-artist at Boston University Tanglewood Institute this summer, as Boris Gudunov, a role he frequently played when he was associated with the Metropolitan Opera in New York.

OPERA NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
23 TI. A YEAR 73,000

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,892

APR 20 1969

A SEMINAR of Beethoven's sonatas, variations and five piano concertos will be conducted by Bela Boszormenyi-Nagy at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Aug. 11-23.

Professor of music at Boston University, Nagy has made more than 600 concert appearances in this country and Europe. True Beethoven piano music specialists have been rare. Outstanding was the late Artur Schnabel, who recorded all 32 of Beethoven's piano sonatas.

THE FIRST PIANO SEMINAR at the Boston University Tanglewood Institute will be conducted by Claude Frank June 29-26.

Frank has not been heard in Worcester, but he did give a recital in 1966 on the Fitchburg Community Concert Series at the state college there. He has performed

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,892

MAY 18 1969

many times with the Boston Symphony, both in Boston and at Tanglewood.

Boston University Tanglewood Institute is a unique partnership in the arts with the Berkshire Music Center, educational department of the Boston Symphony.

During the four years it has operated at Tanglewood, the institute has grown to include programs in theater, dance, drawing and painting, and master classes for professional musicians and teachers.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800

MAY 1 1969

Totenberg and Balsam to conduct Beethoven seminar

Roman Totenberg of Belmont, violinist, and Artur Balsam, pianist, will conduct a Seminar in Chamber Music and Accompanying at the Boston University Tangelwood Institute, Lenox, June 29 to July 12.

The seminar will cover the ten Beethoven sonatas for violin and piano.

A performer since the age of eight, Totenberg has appeared with the Berlin Philharmonic, the London Philharmonic, Concertgebouw in Amsterdam, and the Boston and Cleveland Symphony Orchestras. He has recorded extensively.

Totenberg graduated from the Warsaw Chopin Conservatory and later studied at the Berlin Academy and the Instrumental Academy of Paris. He was formerly head of the violin department at the Peabody Institute of Music and has taught at the Aspen Institute and the Mozarteum in Salzburg. He is presently a professor of music at the Boston University School of Fine and Applied Arts and resides at 15 Day School lane.

Balsam was born in Warsaw and studied music in Lodz, Poland, and at the State Academy of Music in Berlin. He first visited the United States in 1932 as an accompanist for Yehudi Menuhin. He has appeared with Totenberg in recitals in Europe and America.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

MAY 22 1969

Pianist Nagy To Present Concert

Dr. Bella B. Nagy, who for the past several summers has given advanced music seminars at Tanglewood, will present a piano concert this Sunday afternoon at 3 at Foxhollow School, Lenox.

Dr. Nagy, chairman of the piano department at Boston University and formerly head of the piano department at Indiana University, conducts artist seminars during the year at colleges throughout the country. This summer he will offer a piano seminar at Tanglewood from Aug. 10-24, and will perform all 32 Beethoven sonatas in a series of six concerts.

Sunday's concert will feature Hungarian music. This is of special interest since Dr. Nagy is a native of Hungary. The public is invited to attend and to stay for French tea and a folk-lore performance that will follow.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 26,000

MAR 13 1969

AT TANGLEWOOD

Philip Pearlstein and Alfred Leslie, prominent members of the "New Realism" school of painting, will be among the faculty members and visiting artists in the painting and drawing program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, June 29 to August 24. Pearlstein, recently awarded a $5000 grant from the National Council on the Arts, will be a member of the resident faculty, along with John Wilson, Richard Yarde and David Ratner, all of the faculty of Art at Boston University. Leslie will serve as a visiting critic at Tanglewood, joining Harold Tovish, Gabriel Laderman and Robert Mallary.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500

MAR 20 1969

Summer Art Courses at Tanglewood

LINCOLN and SUDBURY - Exceptionally qualified high school students who submit portfolios of their work in painting and drawing may become eligible for the summer painting and drawing program at the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, June 29 to August 24. The courses are also open to any college art student. For information, contact the office of John R. Watts, administrator of the institute and Assistant Dean of the School of Fine and Applied Arts, Boston University.

APR 5 1969

The Boston University Tanglewood Institute, a partnership between the Boston school's fine arts department and the Berkshire Music Center, begins its fourth year on June 29. Enrollment for this summer's eight-week session will exceed three hundred; classes in voice, drama, set design and allied arts will be offered.

ROCKFORD MORNING STAR
ROCKFORD, ILL.
D. 61,712 SUN. 82,153

JUN 8 1969

Tanglewood Registration Now Open

Enrollment is open for the fourth annual General Seminar in the Arts, being offered during July and August at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, Mass., under auspices of Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts.

Enrollees may participate in organized visits and tours to concerts, dance festivals, art exhibitions and theater productions throughout the Berkshires.

118.

THEATRE

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

JUN 9 1969 New England

Tanglewood Gives Young Playwrights A Chance

TANGLEWOOD—Tanglewood, usually synonymous with music and or the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will ~~once again be~~ a breeding ground for young playwriting talent for four weeks this summer.

The program, formulated to help promising playwrights develop their craft, is the Symposium Workshop for Playwrights, part of the Boston University Tanglewood Institute.

Two writers who have already written promisingly for the theatre or have been judged exceptionally talented on the basis of works in progress are invited to participate in the symposium by the Boston University Theatre Arts Division.

At Tanglewood, the playwrights work with guest directors and guest critics from the professional theatre, faculty members from Boston University, and a company of professional actors.

During the month long session, the plays are discussed, criticized and analyzed, and placed in rehearsal. This year for the first time since the program began four years ago there will be a full scale performance of each play at Tanglewood. The possibility also exists that one or both of the plays may be produced at the Boston University Theatre next fall by the University's Theatre Arts Division.

Concept a Tryout

The symposium was begun by Boston University as an attempt to cope with the problem of how best to develop young playwrighting talent. Last year, however, the university was assisted, on a matching fund basis, by the National Endowment for the Arts. The Tanglewood idea is that the young playwright is helped most by bringing him together in a small group with exceptional and experienced people in and of the theatre. Thus, in that context, the playwright is provided with an opportunity to see his work in production at the hands of responsible and professional artists. Small audiences are invited as the material is generated and rehearsed, and the audience response and reaction is also incorporated into the theatrical learning experience.

The concept, as described by a University spokesman, is "a tryout, with the saving grace and hymane atmosphere of academia, yet not lacking in professionalism."

This year the playwrights invited to participate in the symposium are Philip Magdalany and Lawrence Holofcenter.

Guest directors include Pirie MacDonald and John Stix. MacDonald, formerly associated with the Seattle Repertory Theatre, has spent the past year as guest director at Boston University Theatre, Trinity Square Repertory in Providence, R.I., and the Actors Theatre in Louisville. Stix directed the off-Broadway revival of Strindberg's "The Father," did extensive work in the highly regarded television series, Omnibus, and also directed the first American performance of Edward Albee's "Zoo Story" and "The Death of Bessie Smith," at the Actors Studio Workshop.

Many Playwrights

During its first two summers, the Symposium was led by Harold Clurman. Associated with him during those seasons were Alvin Epstein, Gene Frankel, William Gibson and George Tabori. In 1967, Lloyd Richards and Will Lee served as resource people in the symposium, and last year, Robert Lewis was the artistic director.

Playwrights who participated in the symposium last summer include Kenneth Brown, Tom Oliver, Irene Fornes and Joseph Caldwell. While at Tanglewood, Brown worked on his new play, "Nightlight in the Locking Ring," which may be produced on Broadway next season. Oliver's Tanglewood play, "Saltflowers" was produced at the Playwrights Unit last fall and is scheduled for production at the O'Neill Playwright's Conference this summer as part of an evening entitled, "Flowers and Trees." Miss Fornes' play, "Molly Dream," was given a workshop production by the New Dramatists Committee in New York and is now under consideration for commercial production.

Although none of the playwrights see their Tanglewood experience as a natural step to a particular play being produced, they agree that the opportunity to have their play worked on in the workshop is valuable and that the experience provides new insights into playwrighting techniques.

Theatre Workshop

The symposium has been just one outgrowth of a unique partnership in the arts between Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts and the Berkshire Music Center, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1966, at the invitation of Enrich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony, the University established a music education program at Tanglewood. Since then, Boston University Tanglewood Institute has grown to include programs in dance, mime, painting and drawing, in addition to the symposium and a full curriculum of music workshops and seminars.

Also offered at Tanglewood is a theatre workshop, which is a direct extension of the Symposium for Playwrights. This workshop concerns itself with observing the symposium in operation, undergoes classroom work and discussions related to activities of the symposium, and workshop students also serve as production assistants for production units attached to the symposium. Exercises and scenes are also staged to pace the techniques discussed and observed.

A particular bonus for all who participate in the Tangelwood program is the plentiful supply of music available. All participants are welcome to attend open rehearsals and all performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUN 27 1969 New England

Tanglewood, BU, Combine On Playwrights' Session

Tanglewood, usually synonymous with music and or the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will again be a breeding ground for young playwrighting talent for four weeks this summer.

The program, formulated to help promising playwrights develop their craft, is the Symposium Workshop for Playwrights, part of the Boston University Tanglewood Institute. Two writers who have already written promisingly for the theatre or have been judged exceptionally talented on the basis of works in progress are invited to participate in the Symposium by the Boston University Theatre Arts Division. At Tanglewood, the playwrights work with guest directors and guest critics from the professional theatre, faculty members from Boston University, and a company of professional actors.

During the month-long session, the plays are discussed, criticized and analyzed, and placed in rehearsal. This year for the first time since the program began four years ago there will be a full-scale performance of each play at Tanglewood.

The Symposium was begun by Boston University as an attempt to cope with the problem of how best to develop young playwrighting talent. The Tanglewood idea is that the young playwright is helped most by bringing him together in a small group with exceptional and experienced people in and of the theater. Thus, in that context, the playwright is provided with an opportunity to see his work in production at the hands of responsible and professional artists.

Guest Directors

Guest directors include Pirie MacDonald and John Stix.

In addition, Elliott Norton-well-known drama critic of the Boston Record-American and a member of the Theatre Arts faculty at Boston University, will be serving as guest-critic at Tanglewood for his fourth consecutive summer.

Although none of the playwrights see their Taglewood experience as a natural step to a particular play being produced, past playwrights agree that the opportunity to have their play worked on in the workshop is valuable and that the experience provides new insights into playwrighting techniques.

Also offered at Tanglewood is a Theatre Workshop, which is a direct extension of the Symposium for Playwrights. This workshop concerns itself with observing the Symposium in operation, undergoes classroom work and discussions related to activities of the symposium, and workshop students also serve as production assistants for production units attached to the Symposium.

By CARON LE BRUN
H T Art Critic

A great deal of Boston's "art action" is summering at artists' colonies throughout New England especially Provincetown, Rockport, Tanglewood, and Ogunquit, Maine and in most cases it is in full swing now in these beginning weeks of July.

At Tanglewood four exhibitions, featuring works by students and faculty of the drawing and painting program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, plus an exhibition of work by artists from Boston University and several young painters in Boston, will be staged this summer in the Glass House at the entrance of the Tanglewood estate.

Presently the first show is in progress and features a representative selection of student paintings and drawings of advanced students in the Division art at Boston University and it will run through July 31.

Following this show will be "Young Boston Painters" tomorrow through Thursday. The artists include Douglas Parker and Kathy Porter from the Studio Coalition, Jerome and Judith Schuerger, Uldis Purins, Tod McKie, Sandy Sokoloff and Nicholas Isaac.

The faculty show, scheduled from July 28 to August 14 will be featuring works by such well-known artists as Philip Pearlstein, Alfred Leslie, Harold Tovish, John Wilson, Richard Yards, Gabriel Laderman, David Ratner, Robert Mallary and Jerry Rudquist.

The last show of the season will take place from August 15 to August 24 and will include paintings and drawings by the students enrolled in the painting and drawing program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute

The visual arts program at Tanglewood is an outgrowth of a unique partnership in the arts between Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts and the Berkshire Music Center, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 13 1969

Tanglewood Hosts Young Artists Show

"Young Boston Painters" will be the second exhibition at the Glass House, located on the Tanglewood grounds in Lenox. The works will be on display until July 27.

The Boston University Tanglewood Institute is sponsoring the show. The institute, which promotes a program of graduate-level instruction in music, theatre, dance and painting, is jointly directed by the Boston University School of Fine and Applied Arts and the Berkshire Music Center.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 15 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 24 1969 New England

Tanglewood To Host Art Exhibits

Four art exhibitions, featuring the work of young Boston artists and students and faculty from Boston University Tanglewood Institute and Boston University, will be held this summer in the Glass House at the entrance to Tanglewood in Lenox.

The first show, scheduled for June 28 through July 13, will consist of paintings and drawings done by advanced art students at Boston University.

Young Boston Painters

The second exhibition, running from July 14 through 27, will be the work of the Young Boston Painters. Included in this group will be the work of Douglas Parker and Kathy Porter, who organized the Studio Coalition in Boston.

The faculty show, with such artists as Philip Pearlstein, Jerry Rudquist and David Ratner, will be from July 28 through Aug. 14. The final display from Aug. 15 to 24 will consist of paintings and drawings by students at Boston University Tanglewood Institute.

Boston University Tanglewood Institute is an outgrowth of a summer program begun by Erich Leinsdorf, Boston Symphony conductor, four years ago. He invited Boston University School of Fine and Applied Arts to initiate a college-level music course at Tanglewood. The program now enrolls 300 students and includes courses in the other arts as well. The Tanglewood school is headed by Edwin Stein, assisted by John R. Watts.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 26 1969

At Tanglewood

Art Exhibit Planned By Noted Artists

Faculty members from the painting and drawing program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, will stage an exhibition of their work July 28 through Aug. 14 in the Glass House, at the entrance of the Tanglewood grounds.

The exhibition, which includes sculpture, paintings, and drawings, will feature representative pieces by nationally - known artists such as, Philip Pearlstein, David Ratner, John Wilson, Richard Yarde, Gabriel Laderman, Alfred Leslie, Robert Mallary, Jerry Rudquist, and Harold Tovish.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 27 1969

Tanglewood Offers Amateurs Arts Seminar

An arts seminar involving trips to area theatres, local exhibits and Jacob's Pillow will be offered by Boston University at Tanglewood from July 28 through Aug. 10. "General Seminar in the Arts" is a program for amateurs, and local residents are invited to enroll.

Students will audit classes in dance, theatre, music and painting at Tanglewood, where Boston University faculty members will lecture on performances that the group will attend at Berkshire Theatre Festival in Stockbridge and Williamstown Summer Theatre.

Mrs. Mac Morgan is in charge of the seminar.

General Seminar In Arts Scheduled

LENOX—A two-week general seminar in the arts will be offered by Boston University at Tanglewood starting Monday.

Participants will attend performances at Tanglewood, Jacob's Pillow, the Berkshire Theater Festival and Williamstown Summer Theater. They also will attend a number of art exhibits.

Enrollment vacancies exist and information may be obtained by calling 637-1430 in Lenox.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 24 1969

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

JUL 2 1969 New England

Art Exhibitions Featured At Tanglewood Estate

BOSTON — Four exhibitions, featuring works by students and faculty of the drawing and painting program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, plus an exhibition of work by artists from Boston University and several young painters in Boston, will be staged this summer in the Glass House, at the entrance of the Tanglewood estate.

The first exhibition running now through July, 31, will consist of a representative selection of student paintings and drawings of advanced students in the Division of Art at Boston University.

That show will be followed by the Young Boston Painters, from July 14 through July 27. The artists exhibiting include Douglas Parker and Kathy Porter, Boston artists who helped organize the highly successful Studio Coalition shows this past year in Boston. Other young artists represented will include Jerome and Judith Schuerger, Uldis Purins, Tod McKie, Sandy Sokoloff and Nicholas Isaak.

The faculty show, scheduled from July 28 through Aug. 14 will be featuring works by such well known artists as Philip Pearlstein, Alfred Leslie, Harold Tovish, John Wilson, Richard Yarde, Gabriel Laderman, David Ratner, Robert Mallery and Jerry Rudquist.

The last show of the season will take place from Aug. 15-24 and will include paintings and drawings by the students enrolled in the painting and drawing program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute.

The painting and drawing program at Tanglewood is an outgrowth of a unique partnership in the arts between Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts and the Berkshire Music Center, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Four years ago, Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, invited the School of Fine and Applied Arts to conduct a summer program of college-level instruction for music students at the Berkshire Music Center. Registration for the first summer totaled 50 students, all studying music. This year, enrollment is expected to exceed 300 students, coming from all 50 states and registered for seminars and workshops in theatre, dance and mime, in addition to the music courses and painting and drawing.

Art

Dance

Music

Art Review

The Glass House at Tanglewood

By WINIFRED B. BELL

FOR MANY YEARS now I have anticipated art openings with the same pleasure others reserve for the theatre, ski trips or whatever happens to be their "thing." The show which is being exhibited in the Glass House at Tanglewood through Aug. 14 was disappointing. Perhaps I was expecting too much, knowing that some of the names involved had achieved considerable reputation. Most of the art work is competent and some of it outstanding, but the total show lacks the stimulation or special quality one should demand of art openings. The exhibit does not contain the best work or even typical work of these artists, but rather whatever work happened to be available. In other words, it is a very casual affair, not carefully planned or arranged, and the experience of seeing it is equally casual.

Work in this show is by the instructors and visiting critics in the art program of the Boston University-Tanglewood Institute. Most of the staff are year-round members of the BU faculty. Others were imported for the summer.

* * *

RICHARD YARDE'S "Child and Door" is one of the show's eye-catchers. It is a stylized composition utilizing complementary colors (blue and orange) and geometric shapes.

A vague, slightly cubist, figurative green oil painting is the contribution of Sidney Hurwitz, chairman of the division of art at BU.

The summer program's director, David Ratner, is represented by two chaotic compositions consisting of toys, horses, bottles, etc., seen through a gray haze. I understand they were inspired by the debris in his children's rooms.

Drawings and prints by John Wilson show considerable skill. "Father and Child," executed in 1965, comes close in mood to the work of Kathe Kollwitz but is much more restrained. Wilson's subjects are from the Negro ghettos, but they make no emotional statements. They exist quietly and without involvement.

* * *

HAROLD TOVISH has been associated with the Boston Museum School and MIT and has been invited to be the visiting artist at the University of Hawaii next year. His two drawings are quite interesting, but since the man is a known sculptor, it would have been nice to see his "real" work.

Long known in New York City art circles as an "artists' artist," Philip Pearlstein was catapulted to fame this spring with his spectacularly successful show at the Frumkin Gallery. His work is an important force in the present American Renaissance of figurative art. One of his works in this show is a portrait of Dr. Collins handled with more tenderness than is characteristic for him; he is known for his piercing renditions. His details are more accurate than photography. Composition is of prime importance in Pearlstein's work and many a nude has had her head sacrificed in its name. The lovely one seated Buddha style on orange drapery in the exhibit here is typical in this respect but atypical by virtue of its small size. This Brooklyn College teacher frequently works bigger than life and his results are usually greater than life.

* * *

THE ONLY OTHER highlight in this show is a magnificent still life by Gabriel Laderman (Queens College faculty). "Still Life No. 6" is a controlled, flat, meticulous composition of household implements done in blue-grays. The delicate balance gives these ordinary tools the magnitude of city buildings. It combines the precision of the mathematician, the skill of the artisan and the imagination of the artist.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 5 1969

Boston Group To Dance At Lenox

BOSTON — The Mary Anthony Dance Theatre will give three performances, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, Aug. 7, 8 and 9 at the Windsor Mountain School Theatre in Lenox. Times for the performances are 8:30 p.m. on Thursday, 7 p.m. Friday and 2:30 p.m. on Saturday.

The appearances by Miss Anthony's company will mark the final week of the dance and movement program given by the Boston University Tanglewood Institute. Miss Anthony serves as guest artist for the dance and movement workshops offered at the Institute.

Programs for the Tanglewood concerts will include premiere performances of several untitled works, plus the well known, "Threnody," a composition by Miss Anthony which is based on Synge's one-act play, "Riders to the Sea." Leading male dancer for the performances will be Ross Parkes, a soloist with the Pennsylvania Ballet.

Miss Anthony originally founded her company in 1956. It has appeared on television and in various summer dance festivals, including Jacob's Pillow. Since the early 1960's, however, Miss Anthony's teaching schedule at her own studio and New York University has limited the group's performance schedule. Their first appearance at the Windsor Mountain Theatre School two years ago led to the company ever to appear being invited to perform in the Shed at Tanglewood during the "Tanglewood on Parade," the first dance company ever to appear on that stage.

Miss Anthony received her original training as a scholarship student with Hanya Helm and later served as Miss Helm's assistant. She was a teacher at the New Dance Group and choreographed works for that company before establishing her own studio and later her own company. In addition to other teaching positions in this country, Mexico and Israel, and her work in the concert world, Miss Anthony served as choreographer for the television series, "Lamp Unto My Feet" and "Look Up and Live." Her credits in the musical comedy include "Up in Central Park, "Rip Van Winkle" and "Touch and Go."

Mary Anthony Dancers Offers 3 Performances

LENOX — The Mary Anthony Dance Theater will give three performances, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, August 7, 8, and 9, at Windsor Mountain School Theater in Lenox. Times for the performances are 8:30 p.m. on Thursday, 7:00 p.m. on Friday, and 2:30 p.m. on Saturday.

The appearances by Miss Anthony's company will mark the final week of the dance and movement program given by the Boston University Tanglewood Institute. Miss Anthony serves as guest artist for the dance and movement workshops offered at the Institute.

Program for the Tanglewood concerts will include premiere performances of several untitled works, plus the well - known, "Threnody," a composition by Miss Anthony which is based on Synge's one-act play, "Riders to the Sea." Leading male dancer for the performances will be Ross Parkes, a soloist with the Pennsylvania Ballet.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 25 1969

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

JUL 16 1969

DANCE MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 30,000

SEP 1969

. . . The U. of Utah Repertory Dance Theatre gave Aug. perfs. in Denver as a benefit for The Changing Scene experimental theatre. Perfs. were arranged with assistance of Don Galvin of Federation of Rocky Mountain States. . . . This summer Judith Lynne Hanna gave African dance lecture-demos. for the N.J. Englewood Community Reading & Science Camp. . . . Tanglewood (the music center in Lenox, Mass.) offered 2 full-length dance evenings on July 31 & Aug. 13. They included the premiere of James Waring's "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" to a commissioned score by Robert Ceely, of the New England Conservatory, played by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. Dancers were students of the Indian Hill arts camp, where Waring teaches.

Ruth Solomon premiered her "Love and Plastic" at the Chautauqua Institution (N.Y.) July 24. Performed by the Chautauqua Dance Co. (art. dir. Statia Sublette), the work involves 16 dancers and 2 huge sheets of industrial plastic. In Sept. Miss Solomon returns to her post on the faculty of NYU's School of Arts.

Tanglewood Students To Exhibit Works

BOSTON — An exhibition of work by students enrolled in the painting and drawing program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox will be on display in the Glass House at the entrance of the Tanglewood grounds Aug. 15-24.

Students represented in the exhibition will have spent eight weeks at Tanglewood studying under well known artists such as Philip Pearlstein, David Ratner, John Wilson and Richard Yarde.

Throughout the eight week session the resident faculty was supplemented by visiting critics as well as well-known painters and sculptors. These visiting critics have included Gabriel Laderman, Robert Mallary, Harold Tovish, Alfred Leslie, Jerome Rudquist and Leonard Becour.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

AUG 12 1969

Art exhibit at BU Lenox

An exhibition of work by students enrolled in the painting and drawing program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute in Lenox, will be on display in the Glass House at the entrance of the Tanglewood grounds Aug. 15-24. Students in the exhibition will have spent eight weeks at Tanglewood, studying under such artists such as Philip Pearlstein, David Ratner, John Wilson and Richard Yarde. Throughout the eight-week session the resident faculty was supplemented by visiting critics, also outstanding painters and sculptors. Visiting critics have included Gabriel Laderman, Robert Mallary, Harold Tovish, Alfred Leslie, Jerome Rudquist and Leonard Becour.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

AUG 14 1969

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

AUG 14 1969

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

AUG 14 1969

ART IN LENOX

An exhibition of work by students enrolled in the painting and drawing program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, will be on display in the Glass House at the entrance of the Tanglewood grounds from Aug. 15 to 24.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

AUG 14 1969

STUDENTS who have spent eight weeks at Tanglewood, Lenox, enrolled in the painting and drawing program at Boston University, Tanglewood Institute, will have an exhibition of their work in the Glass House at the entrance of the Tanglewood grounds beginning today, through Aug. 24. The students have been studying under well-known artists such as Philip Pearlstein, David Ratner, John Wilson and Richard Yarde.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

AUG 15 1969

Dance concerts at Tanglewood

By MARGO MILLER
Globe Staff

LENOX—The Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center has traditionally been a performer's forum for concert music and during the days of Boris Goldovsky, for opera.

Last summer Boston University moved some art and theater courses adjacent to Tanglewood. This season, B.U.'s Joseph Gifford has devised a modern dance and movement curriculm, with a faculty that includes the mime Lotte Goslar, and the modern dancer-choreographer Mary Anthony.

For its part, the Berkshire Music Center, through the Fromm Foundation, commissioned Robert Ceely to do a dance score and James Waring its choreography. Erich Leinsdorf, the B.S.O. conductor, and the students prepared Stravinsky's "L'histoire du soldat," which was choreographed by Gifford and costumed by Miss Goslar.

The Ceely-Waring "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" had its premiere July 31, with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, and was repeated Aug. 13, when Thomas conducted the Stravinsky for an indisposed Leinsdorf.

Somewhere in this parade of facts is the germ of a fine idea, on the part of Tanglewood and B.U. The conducting was good, as was the playing. The Theater-Concert Hall is not bad as a place to watch dance, through the glare of the EXIT signs disturbed John Dodd's lighting design.

Ceely's music, a mix of on-stage orchestral and space-throbbing tape, was dull, shapeless stuff, though. And Waring, who said that he actually set the only the last three minutes of the score, used the Ceely mostly as music interludes between dances done in silence. The divisions of sound and silence were the most effective part of "Ghost Spectrum."

Waring is the Hobbit of choreographers, scurrying his dancers through a private world Freighted with Meaning.

That was the trouble, too, with the Stravinsky as Tanglewood did it.

The narration that most people are familiar with is an anonymous text of rhymed couplets that is not very elegant but at least is succinct.

I have never heard the original French libretto by Stravinsky's longtime collaborator, Ramuz, but remarks Stravinsky has made about "Les Noces," which was in the works at the time he was composing "The Soldier's Tale" (1918), make me think he thought less was more: "My idea (for "Les Noces") was to compose a sort of scenic ceremony." That is to say, a ballet without plot.

"The Soldier's Tale" has a plot of sorts, a cautionary story about a young man destined to become the prey of the Devil. As with all folkish materials, detail is scant and we fill in and flesh out the moral. But not at Tanglewood. This Stravinsky was tarted up.

The narration, written in 1955 by N. Richard Nash, lengthens the piece to an hour and cutens it. Choreographer Gifford resists at first, then joins in with rock 'n' roll gyrations for the Devil (Robert Lowe) and Tanglewood's first striptease — for the Princess (Sandra Klosinski).

Edward Griefen was good as Phillipe the soldier and Ronald Irving was unembarrassed as the professor who lectures us on War.

True to Stravinsky's scheme, the seven-piece band of solo instruments was up there on stage (and conductor Thomas dashing in blazer and bandmaster pants). But the interplay Stravinsky wanted between played and heard music and acted and spoken narration was fitful at best.

By RACHELLE PATTERSON

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

AUG 15 1969

Art

Art Review

The Glass House at Tanglewood

By WINIFRED B. BELL

FOR MANY YEARS now I have anticipated art openings with the same pleasure others reserve for the theatre, ski trips or whatever happens to be their "thing." The show which is being exhibited in the Glass House at Tanglewood through Aug. 14 was disappointing. Perhaps I was expecting too much, knowing that some of the names involved had achieved considerable reputation. Most of the art work is competent and some of it outstanding, but the total show lacks the stimulation or special quality one should demand of art openings. The exhibit does not contain the best work or even typical work of these artists, but rather whatever work happened to be available. In other words, it is a very casual affair, not carefully planned or arranged, and the experience of seeing it is equally casual.

Work in this show is by the instructors and visiting critics in the art program of the Boston University-Tanglewood Institute. Most of the staff are year-round members of the BU faculty. Others were imported for the summer.

* * *

RICHARD YARDE'S "Child and Door" is one of the show's eye-catchers. It is a stylized composition utilizing complementary colors (blue and orange) and geometric shapes.

A vague, slightly cubist, figurative green oil painting is the contribution of Sidney Hurwitz, chairman of the division of art at BU.

The summer program's director, David Ratner, is represented by two chaotic compositions consisting of toys, horses, bottles, etc., seen through a gray haze. I understand they were inspired by the debris in his children's rooms.

Drawings and prints by John Wilson show considerable skill. "Father and Child," executed in 1965, comes close in mood to the work of Kathe Kollwitz but is much more restrained. Wilson's subjects are from the Negro ghettos, but they make no emotional statements. They exist quietly and without involvement.

* * *

HAROLD TOVISH has been associated with the Boston Museum School and MIT and has been invited to be the visiting artist at the University of Hawaii next year. His two drawings are quite interesting, but since the man is a known sculptor, it would have been nice to see his "real" work.

Long known in New York City art circles as an "artists' artist," Philip Pearlstein was catapulted to fame this spring with his spectacularly successful show at the Frumkin Gallery. His work is an important force in the present American Renaissance of figurative art. One of his works in this show is a portrait of Dr. Collins handled with more tenderness than is characteristic for him; he is known for his piercing renditions. His details are more accurate than photography. Composition is of prime importance in Pearlstein's work and many a nude has had her head sacrificed in its name. The lovely one seated Buddha style on orange drapery in the exhibit here is typical in this respect but atypical by virtue of its small size. This Brooklyn College teacher frequently works bigger than life and his results are usually greater than life.

* * *

THE ONLY OTHER highlight in this show is a magnificent still life by Gabriel Laderman (Queens College faculty). "Still Life No. 6" is a controlled, flat, meticulous composition of household implements done in blue-grays. The delicate balance gives these ordinary tools the magnitude of city buildings. It combines the precision of the mathematician, the skill of the artisan and the imagination of the artist.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 5 1969

Boston Group To Dance At Lenox

BOSTON — The Mary Anthony Dance Theatre will give three performances, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, Aug. 7, 8 and 9 at the Windsor Mountain School Theatre in Lenox. Times for the performances are 8:30 p.m. on Thursday, 7 p.m. Friday and 2:30 p.m. on Saturday.

The appearances by Miss Anthony's company will mark the final week of the dance and movement program given by the Boston University Tanglewood Institute. Miss Anthony serves as guest artist for the dance and movement workshops offered at the Institute.

Programs for the Tanglewood concerts will include premiere performances of several untitled works, plus the well known, "Threnody," a composition by Miss Anthony which is based on Synge's one-act play, "Riders to the Sea." Leading male dancer for the performances will be Ross Parkes, a soloist with the Pennsylvania Ballet.

Miss Anthony originally founded her company in 1956. It has appeared on television and in various summer dance festivals, including Jacob's Pillow. Since the early 1960's, however, Miss Anthony's teaching schedule at her own studio and New York University has limited the group's performance schedule. Their first appearance at the Windsor Mountain Theatre School two years ago led to the company ever to appear being invited to perform in the Shed at Tanglewood during the "Tanglewood on Parade," the first dance company ever to appear on that stage.

Miss Anthony received her original training as a scholarship student with Hanya Helm and later served as Miss Helm's assistant. She was a teacher at the New Dance Group and choreographed works for that company before establishing her own studio and later her own company. In addition to other teaching positions in this country, Mexico and Israel, and her work in the concert world, Miss Anthony served as choreographer for the television series, "Lamp Unto My Feet" and "Look Up and Live." Her credits in the musical comedy include "Up in Central Park, "Rip Van Winkle" and "Touch and Go."

Mary Anthony Dancers Offers 3 Performances

LENOX — The Mary Anthony Dance Theater will give three performances, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, August 7, 8, and 9, at Windsor Mountain School Theater in Lenox. Times for the performances are 8:30 p.m. on Thursday, 7:00 p.m. on Friday, and 2:30 p.m. on Saturday.

The appearances by Miss Anthony's company will mark the final week of the dance and movement program given by the Boston University Tanglewood Institute. Miss Anthony serves as guest artist for the dance and movement workshops offered at the Institute.

Program for the Tanglewood concerts will include premiere performances of several untitled works, plus the well - known, "Threnody," a composition by Miss Anthony which is based on Synge's one-act play, "Riders to the Sea." Leading male dancer for the performances will be Ross Parkes, a soloist with the Pennsylvania Ballet.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 25 1969

DANCE MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 30,000

SEP 1969

. . /. The U. of Utah Repertory Dance Theatre gave Aug. perfs. in Denver as a benefit for The Changing Scene experimental theatre. Perfs. were arranged with assistance of Don Galvin of Federation of Rocky Mountain States. . . . This summer Judith Lynne Hanna gave African dance lecture-demos. for the N.J. Englewood Community Reading & Science Camp. . . . Tanglewood (the music center in Lenox, Mass.) offered 2 full-length dance evenings on July 31 & Aug. 13. They included the premiere of James Waring's "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" to a commissioned score by Robert Ceely, of the New England Conservatory, played by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. Dancers were students of the Indian Hill arts camp, where Waring teaches.

Ruth Solomon premiered her "Love and Plastic" at the Chautauqua Institution (N.Y.) July 24. Performed by the Chautauqua Dance Co. (art. dir. Statia Sublette), the work involves 16 dancers and 2 huge sheets of industrial plastic. In Sept. Miss Solomon returns to her post on the faculty of NYU's School of Arts.

Tanglewood Students To Exhibit Works

BOSTON — An exhibition of work by students enrolled in the painting and drawing program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox will be on display in the Glass House at the entrance of the Tanglewood grounds Aug. 15-24.

Students represented in the exhibition will have spent eight weeks at Tanglewood studying under well known artists such as Philip Pearlstein, David Ratner, John Wilson and Richard Yarde.

Throughout the eight week session the resident faculty was supplemented by visiting critics as well as well-known painters and sculptors. These visiting critics have included Gabriel Laderman, Robert Mallary, Harold Tovish, Alfred Leslie, Jerome Rudquist and Leonard Becour.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

AUG 12 1969

Art exhibit at BU Lenox

An exhibition of work by students enrolled in the painting and drawing program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute in Lenox, will be on display in the Glass House at the entrance of the Tanglewood grounds Aug. 15-24. Students in the exhibition will have spent eight weeks at Tanglewood, studying under such artists such as Philip Pearlstein, David Ratner, John Wilson and Richard Yarde. Throughout the eight-week session the resident faculty was supplemented by visiting critics, also outstanding painters and sculptors. Visiting critics have included Gabriel Laderman, Robert Mallary, Harold Tovish, Alfred Leslie, Jerome Rudquist and Leonard Becour.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

AUG 14 1969

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

AUG 14 1969

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

AUG 14 1969

ART IN LENOX

An exhibition of work by students enrolled in the painting and drawing program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, will be on display in the Glass House at the entrance of the Tanglewood grounds from Aug. 15 to 24.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

AUG 14 1969

STUDENTS who have spent eight weeks at Tanglewood, Lenox, enrolled in the painting and drawing program at Boston University, Tanglewood Institute, will have an exhibition of their work in the Glass House at the entrance of the Tanglewood grounds beginning today, through Aug. 24. The students have been studying under well-known artists such as Philip Pearlstein, David Ratner, John Wilson and Richard Yarde.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

AUG 15 1969

Dance

Dance concerts at Tanglewood

By MARGO MILLER
Globe Staff

LENOX—The Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center has traditionally been a performer's forum for concert music and during the days of Boris Goldovsky, for opera.

Last summer Boston University moved some art and theater courses adjacent to Tanglewood. This season, B.U.'s Joseph Gifford has devised a modern dance and movement curriculm, with a faculty that includes the mime Lotte Goslar, and the modern dancer-choreographer Mary Anthony.

For its part, the Berkshire Music Center, through the Fromm Foundation, commissioned Robert Ceely to do a dance score and James Waring its choreography. Erich Leinsdorf, the B.S.O. conductor, and the students prepared Stravinsky's "L'histoire du soldat," which was choreographed by Gifford and costumed by Miss Goslar.

The Ceely-Waring "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" had its premiere July 31, with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, and was repeated Aug. 13, when Thomas conducted the Stravinsky for an indisposed Leinsdorf.

Somewhere in this parade of facts is the germ of a fine idea, on the part of Tanglewood and B.U. The conducting was good, as was the playing. The Theater-Concert Hall is not bad as a place to watch dance, through the glare of the EXIT signs disturbed John Dodd's lighting design.

Ceely's music, a mix of on-stage orchestral and space-throbbing tape, was dull, shapeless stuff, though. And Waring, who said that he actually set the only the last three minutes of the score, used the Ceely mostly as music interludes between dances done in silence. The divisions of sound and silence were the most effective part of "Ghost Spectrum."

Waring is the Hobbit of choreographers, scurrying his dancers through a private world Freighted with Meaning.

That was the trouble, too, with the Stravinsky as Tanglewood did it.

The narration that most people are familiar with is an anonymous text of rhymed couplets that is not very elegant but at least is succinct.

I have never heard the original French libretto by Stravinsky's longtime collaborator, Ramuz, but remarks Stravinsky has made about "Les Noces," which was in the works at the time he was composing "The Soldier's Tale" (1918), make me think he thought less was more: "My idea (for "Les Noces") was to compose a sort of scenic ceremony." That is to say, a ballet without plot.

"The Soldier's Tale" has a plot of sorts, a cautionary story about a young man destined to become the prey of the Devil. As with all folkish materials, detail is scant and we fill in and flesh out the moral. But not at Tanglewood. This Stravinsky was tarted up.

The narration, written in 1955 by N. Richard Nash, lengthens the piece to an hour and cutens it. Choreographer Gifford resists at first, then joins in with rock 'n' roll gyrations for the Devil (Robert Lowe) and Tanglewood's first striptease — for the Princess (Sandra Klosinski).

Edward Griefen was good as Phillipe the soldier and Ronald Irving was unembarrassed as the professor who lectures us on War.

True to Stravinsky's scheme, the seven-piece band of solo instruments was up there on stage (and conductor Thomas dashing in blazer and bandmaster pants). But the interplay Stravinsky wanted between played and heard music and acted and spoken narration was fitful at best.

By RACHELLE PATTERSON

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

AUG 15 1969

Music

120

Young Musicians Perform Classic

The Young Artists Symphony Orchestra from Boston University Tanglewood Institute, under the direction of James Yanattos, will present a concert August 11, 7 p.m., in the courtyard at George Sherman Union, Boston University.

The Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, consisting of high school students who were chosen in nation-wide auditions to participate in the Young Artists Program at Tanglewood, will perform Beethoven's "Lenore Overture No. 3" and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka Suite."

In addition, the orchestra, along with soprano Chloe Owen of Boston University's Voice Department, will perform the aria "To This We've Come," from Gian Carlo Monetti's opera, "The Consul", a series of songs written by the conductor, Mr. Yanattos, entitled "Prieres dans L'Arche" (first Boston performance); and the aria, "Che Bel Sogno," from Puccini's "La Rondine."

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight-week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fourth year, the Young Artists Program provides these aspiring musicians an opportunity to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music.

Besides their membership in the Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, these young musicians attend private lessons and master classes and also perform in chamber groups of various sizes. They attend music theory classes, and during the course of the eight weeks, many of the Young Artists give solo recitals at Tanglewood.

Mr. Yanattos, visiting conductor of the Orchestra this summer, is conductor of the Harvard-Radcliffe Symphony Orchestra.

The concert is open to the public and there is no admission charge.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 8 1969

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

AUG 7 1969

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

AUG 7 1969

Youth Symphony at B U

The Young Artists Symphony Orchestra from Boston University Tanglewood Institute, under the direction of James Yanattos, will present a concert Aug. 11, at 7 p.m., in the courtyard at George Sherman Union, Boston University.

The Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, consisting of high school students who were chosen in nation-wide auditions to participate in the Young Artists Program at Tanglewood, will perform Beethoven's Lenore Overture No. 3 and Stravinsky's Petrouchka Suite.

In addition, the orchestra, along with soprano Chloe Owen of Boston University's Voice Department, will perform the aria "To This We've Come," from Gian Carlo Monetti's opera, "The Consul," a series of songs written by the conductor, titled "Prieres dans L'Arche" and aria, Che Bel Sogno," from Puccini's "La Rondine."

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight-week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fourth year, the Young Artists Program provides these aspiring musicians an opportunity to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music.

The concert is open to the public and there is no admission charge.

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

AUG 8 1969

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

AUG 7 1969

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

AUG 7 1969

Young artists' concert Aug. 11

The Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, an ensemble of high school students who are studying at the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, will give a free concert in the University's George Sherman Unon at 7 p.m., Aug. 11.

Harvard's James Yannatos will conduct.

The program includes the Boston premiere of the Yannatos song cycle "Prieres dans l'arche," which will be sung by soprano Chloe Owen of the B.U. music faculty.

She will also sing arias from Menotti's "The Consul" and Rossini's "La Rondine." The orchestra will be heard in Beethoven's "Leonore Overture No. 3 and a suite from Stravinsy's "Petrouchka."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 31 1969 Ne

Young Artists' Concert at BU

The Young Artists Orchestra from Boston University's Tanglewood Institute will give a concert tonight at 7 o'clock in the courtyard of the University's George Sherman Union.

The Young Artists Orchestra consists of high school students who were chosen in nationwide auditions to participate in the Young Artists Program at Tanglewood.

Monday's program, which is free, will include Beethoven's Lenore Overture No. 3. and Stravinsky's Petrouchka Suite.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 11 1969

Charles Pikler, son of Andrew Pikler and Mrs. Alice Pikler, both of Norwich, was the concert-master of the Boston University Tanglewood Institute Young Artists' Orchestra August 19 at the Tanglewood on Parade series in Lenox, Mass.

BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
(M) 31,475 (S) 28,895

AUG 22 1969

Brian McFarland Will Return From Music Institute

An area resident is among the 75 high school musicians who have been participating in the Young Artists Program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, Mass. He is Mr. Brian McFarland, clarinetist, son of Mr. Orrin P. McFarland, 350 Clintonville Road, North Haven. The program ends Saturday.

McFarland

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight-week session of study and performance, was designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fourth year, the Young Artists Program provided an opportunity for these aspiring musicians to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plus faculty members from Boston University's Division of Music.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 22 1969 E

—Mark Lutton, son of Warren D. Lutton of 265 North St., is among 75 high school musicians from throughout the nation participating in the Young Artists Program at Boston University's Tanglewood Institute in Lenox. He is a percussionist.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 20 1969

RECORD-TRANSCRIPT
MILTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,860

AUG 21 1969

LISA GOLDMAN AT TANGLEWOOD

Miss Lisa Goldman, daughter of Dr. Joseph Goldman, 7 Marshall road, is one of the 75 high school musicians from all over the country participating in the Young Artists Program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox. 047

Miss Goldman, a pianist, attends Milton High School. Her private teacher is Leo Litwin.

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight-week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fourth year, the Young Artists Program provides an opportunity for these aspiring musicians to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plus faculty members from Boston University's Division of Music.

Chosen from auditions held in major cities all over the United States, the Young Artists participate in chamber music ensembles, private lessons with BSO members, master classes, orchestral performance, and musical theory classes. In addition, they may also attend open rehearsals and performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood.

Successful completion of this eight-week study program is verified by examinations and appropriate credit may be applicable in a professional curriculum leading to a degree in music at Boston University.

The Young Artists Program at Tanglewood is an outgrowth of a unique partnership in the arts between Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts and the Berkshire Music Center. Four years ago, Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, invited the School of Fine and Applied Arts to conduct a summer program of college-level instruction for music students at the Berkshire Music Center. Since that time, the program has been expanded to include workshops and seminars in dance, mime, playwriting, painting, drawing, and an extensive program in music, besides the Young Artists Program.

Boston University Tanglewood Institute is headed by Edwin E. Stein, dean of the School of Fine and Applied Arts. John R. Watts, assistant dean of the School, serves as administrator for the Tanglewood program.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

AUG 20 1969

Natick Musician Chosen For Tanglewood Program

LENOX — Richard Fletcher, son of Mrs. Frances Fletcher of 13 Rutledge Road, Natick, is one of 75 high school musicians from all over the country participating in the Young Artists Program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute.

Fletcher, a double bassist, tends Natick High School. His private teacher is Leslie Martin.

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fourth year, the Young Artists program provides an opportunity for these aspiring musicians to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plus faculty members from Boston University's Division of Music.

Chosen from auditions held in major cities all over the United States, the Young Artists participate in chamber music ensembles, private lessons with BSO members, master classes, orchestral performance and musical theory classes. In addition, they may also attend open rehearsals and performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Successful completion of this eight week study program is verified by examinations and appropriate credit may be applicable in a professional curriculum leading to a degree in music at Boston University.

120.

Young Musicians Perform Classic

The Young Artists Symphony Orchestra from Boston University Tanglewood Institute, under the direction of James Yanattos, will present a concert August 11, 7 p.m., in the courtyard at George Sherman Union, Boston University.

The Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, consisting of high school students who were chosen in nation-wide auditions to participate in the Young Artists Program at Tanglewood, will perform Beethoven's "Lenore Overture No. 3" and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka Suite."

In addition, the orchestra, along with soprano Chloe Owen of Boston University's Voice Department, will perform the aria "To This We've Come," from Gian Carlo Monetti's opera, "The Consul", a series of songs written by the conductor, Mr. Yanattos, entitled "Prieres dans L'Arche" (first Boston performance); and the aria, "Che Bel Sogno," from Puccini's "La Rondine."

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight-week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fourth year, it provides these aspiring musicians with an opportunity to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music.

Besides their membership in the Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, these young musicians attend private lessons and master classes and also perform in chamber groups of various sizes. They attend music theory classes, and during the course of the eight weeks, many of the Young Artists give solo recitals at Tanglewood.

Mr. Yanattos, visiting conductor of the Orchestra this summer, is conductor of the Harvard-Radcliffe Symphony Orchestra.

The concert is open to the public and there is no admission charge.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 8 1969

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

AUG 7 1969

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100

AUG 7 1969

Youth Symphony at B U

The Young Artists Symphony Orchestra from Boston University Tanglewood Institute, under the direction of James Yanattos, will present a concert Aug. 11, at 7 p.m., in the courtyard at George Sherman Union, Boston University.

The Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, consisting of high school students who were chosen in nation-wide auditions to participate in the Young Artists Program at Tanglewood, will perform Beethoven's Lenore Overture No. 3 and Stravinsky's Petrouchka Suite.

In addition, the orchestra, along with soprano Chloe Owen of Boston University's Voice Department, will perform the aria "To This We've Come," from Gian Carlo Monetti's opera, "The Consul," a series of songs written by the conductor, titled "Prieres dans L'Arche" and aria, Che Bel Sogno," from Puccini's "La Rondine."

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight-week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fourth year, the Young Artists Program provides these aspiring musicians an opportunity to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music.

The concert is open to the public and there is no admission charge.

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

AUG 8 1969

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

AUG 7 1969

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

AUG 7 1969

Brian McFarland Will Return From Music Institute

An area resident is among the 75 high school musicians who have been participating in the Young Artists Program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox, Mass. He is Mr. Brian McFarland, clarinetist, son of Mr. Orrin P. McFarland, 350 Clintonville Road, North Haven. The program ends Saturday.

McFarland

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight-week session of study and performance, was designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fourth year, the Young Artists Program provided an opportunity for these aspiring musicians to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plus faculty members from Boston University's Division of Music.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 22 1969

Young artists' concert Aug. 11

The Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, an ensemble of high school students who are studying at the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, will give a free concert in the University's George Sherman Unon at 7 p.m., Aug. 11.

Harvard's James Yannatos will conduct.

The program includes the Boston premiere of the Yannatos song cycle "Prieres dans l'arche," which will be sung by soprano Chloe Owen of the B.U. music faculty.

She will also sing arias from Menotti's "The Consul" and Rossini's "La Rondine." The orchestra will be heard in Beethoven's "Leonore Overture No. 3 and a suite from Stravinsy's "Petrouchka."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 31 1969

Young Artists' Concert at BU

The Young Artists Orchestra from Boston University's Tanglewood Institute will give a concert tonight at 7 o'clock in the courtyard of the University's George Sherman Union.

The Young Artists Orchestra consists of high school students who were chosen in nationwide auditions to participate in the Young Artists Program at Tanglewood.

Monday's program, which is free, will include Beethoven's Lenore Overture No. 3. and Stravinsky's Petrouchka Suite.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 11 1969

Charles Pikler, son of Andrew Pikler and Mrs. Alice Pikler, both of Norwich, was the concert-master of the Boston University Tanglewood Institute Young Artists' Orchestra August 19 at the Tanglewood on Parade series in Lenox, Mass.

BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
(M) 31,475 (S) 28,895

AUG 22 1969

RECORD-TRANSCRIPT
MILTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,860

AUG 21 1969

LISA GOLDMAN AT TANGLEWOOD

Miss Lisa Goldman, daughter of Dr. Joseph Goldman, 7 Marshall road, is one of the 75 high school musicians from all over the country participating in the Young Artists Program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox. 047

Miss Goldman, a pianist, attends Milton High School. Her private teacher is Leo Litwin.

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight-week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fourth year, the Young Artists Program provides an opportunity for these aspiring musicians to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plus faculty members from Boston University's Division of Music.

Chosen from auditions held in major cities all over the United States, the Young Artists participate in chamber music ensembles, private lessons with BSO members, master classes, orchestral performance, and musical theory classes. In addition, they may also attend open rehearsals and performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood.

Successful completion of this eight-week study program is verified by examinations and appropriate credit may be applicable in a professional curriculum leading to a degree in music at Boston University.

The Young Artists Program at Tanglewood is an outgrowth of a unique partnership in the arts between Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts and the Berkshire Music Center. Four years ago, Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, invited the School of Fine and Applied Arts to conduct a summer program of college-level instruction for music students at the Berkshire Music Center. Since that time, the program has been expanded to include workshops and seminars in dance, mime, playwriting, painting, drawing, and an extensive program in music, besides the Young Artists Program.

Boston University Tanglewood Institute is headed by Edwin E. Stein, dean of the School of Fine and Applied Arts. John R. Watts, assistant dean of the School, serves as administrator for the Tanglewood program.

—Mark Lutton, son of Warren D. Lutton of 265 North St., is among 75 high school musicians from throughout the nation participating in the Young Artists Program at Boston University's Tanglewood Institute in Lenox. He is a percussionist.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 20 1969

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

AUG 20 1969

Natick Musician Chosen For Tanglewood Program

LENOX — Richard Fletcher, son of Mrs. Frances Fletcher of 13 Rutledge Road, Natick, is one of 75 high school musicians from all over the country participating in the Young Artists Program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute.

Fletcher, a double bassist, tends Natick High School. His private teacher is Leslie Martin.

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fourth year, the Young Artists' program provides an opportunity for these aspiring musicians to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plus faculty members from Boston University's Division of Music.

Chosen from auditions held in major cities all over the United States, the Young Artists participate in chamber music ensembles, private lessons with BSO members, master classes, orchestral performance and musical theory classes. In addition, they may also attend open rehearsals and performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Successful completion of this eight week study program is verified by examinations and appropriate credit may be applicable in a professional curriculum leading to a degree in music at Boston University.

Mildred Wallace

VIRGIN ISLANDS STUDENTS and teacher, Miss Agatha Canfield, all at Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this summer, discuss music even during lunch. Students are, top left, Miss Lois Hassell; and on right side of table, Miss Judy Petersen and Patmore Lewis. Miss Canfield is left, center, and in the foreground is Craig Shepard. The students will be returning to St. Thomas shortly.

EAGLE
CLAREMONT, N. H.
(E) 6,709

AUG 23 1969

Virgin Islands Students Study At Tanglewood

By MILDRED WALLACE

Three personable young people from St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, this summer became the first persons from their tiny; 27-square-mile Caribbean island to become scholarship students at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, thanks largely to the efforts of Miss Agatha Canfield, formerly of Sheffield and Canaan, Conn.

Miss Canfield, who has made her home in St. Thomas for the past 11 years and who teaches music there, is also at Tanglewood this summer on scholarship, for the third year in a row. Through her perseverance, the Boston Symphony Chamber players made their first appearance in St. Thomas and St. Croix, V.I., last year, after she initiated plans for the concerts during one of her summer stays at Tanglewood.

Here from St. Thomas are two of Miss Canfield's music students, Miss Lois Hassell, 16, and Miss Judy Petersen, 16, both high school seniors, who are taking piano seminar at the music center. Both have been with Miss Canfield for the past four years, studying piano and classes in harmony, solfegge, ensemble and music appreciation. The third student from St. Thomas is 18-year-old Patmore Lewis, a violinist on scholarship in the Young Artists program. A pupil of Jose Figueroa, concertmaster of the Puerto Rico Symphony, the talented young man has also been playing in that sumphony orchestra for the past year. He will return to the orchestra and will also attend the Conservatory of Music in Puerto Rico, started by Pablo Casals, noted conductor.

Miss Canfield is hoping to complete plans that will see the Boston Symphony Chamber return to the Virgin Islands for another series of concerts, and has already had a number of discussions about the possibilities with Boston Symphony personnel.

She has worked hard for music in the Virgin Islands, having taught at Charlotte Amalie High School in St. Thomas for three years, helping to form a glee club there and in putting on musical performances. Later, she taught at the Lutheran School, staging a number of choral programs.

Miss Canfield became the first music committee head of the newly formed St. Thomas Arts Council and was instrumental in setting up a choral group, the Caribbean Chorale, as one of two aims of the group. After that was accomplished, she turned her mind to the second aim, to bring established groups to the Virgin Islands to present chamber music concerts. That was last year. Now, she's working on the next step, bringing the chamber players back.

At the rate she's been going, it should be a foregone conclusion.

Student Given Theater Grant

LONGMEADOW — A local student has received a grant from Boston University for work in theater directing at Tanglewood.

Robert Low of 222 Colony Road will have a major part in an Aug. 13 performance of Stravinski's "History of A Soldier," which will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf as part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival at the Lenox site.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

JUL 31 1969

IN PERFORMANCE

Robert Lowe, son of Mr. and Mrs. Jules Lowe of 222 Colony Rd., Longmeadow, will take part in a performance of Stravinsky's "L Histoire de Soldat" under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf Aug. 13 at Tanglewood. Lowe is a senior at Colgate and is studying in the Boston University Tanglewood Institute.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 11 1969

ENTERPRISE
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
(E) 4,700

AUG 19 1969

Martha Lagoy And James Yanattos Discuss Score

City Girl Performs At Tanglewood

Martha Lagoy, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Bernard E. Lagoy of 424 Pleasant St., pauses in a busy Summer schedule at Tanglewood, to discuss a musical score with James Yanattos, conductor of the Young Artists Orchestra.

Martha is one of the 75 high school musicians from all over the country participating in the Young Artists Program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox. She attends Leominster High School and is studying piano under Sister Lydia Pirro.

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight - week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fourth year, the program provides an opportunity for these aspiring musicians to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plus faculty members from Boston University's Division of Music.

Chosen from auditions held in major cities throughout the country, the Young Artists participate in chamber music ensembles, have private lessons with BSO members, master classes, orchestral performance, and musical theory classes. They may also attend open rehearsals and performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood.

Successful completion of the eight - week study program is verified by examinations and appropriate credit may be applicable in a professional curriculum leading to a degree in music at Boston University.

The Young Artists Program at Tanglewood is an outgrowth of a unique partnership in the arts between Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts and the Berkshire Music Center. Four years ago Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, invited the School of Fine and Applied Arts to conduct a summer program of college - level instruction for music students at the Berkshire Music Center. Since that time the program has been expanded to include workshops and seminars in dance, mime, play-wrighting, painting, drawing and an extensive program in music, besides the Young Artists program.

Boston University Tanglewood Institute is headed by Edwin E. Stein, dean of the School of Fine and Applied Arts. John R. Watts, assistant dean of the school, serves as administrator for the Tanglewood program.

BOSTON AFTER DARK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 20, 1969 — Page 4

young artists' tanglewood program

BU musicians at Lenox

by Eleanor Weber

There is another Tanglewood. This one is sponsored by Boston University, and it is a "Young Artists Institute" culling approximately 70 high school musicians from throughout the United States for an eight-week session of private lessons, master classes, chamber music performances, and orchestra rehearsals.

In its fourth year, the Tanglewood Institute was originally conceived as a possible means of recruiting fine musicians for B. U.'s School of Fine and Applied Arts. Some students have indeed come to the college, but the merit of the program has proved itself greatest for the young instrumentalists themselves.

The greatest asset of the program, said a towheaded violinist, "it's the place — being at Tanglewood." Explained a tall young pianist with a southern drawl, "I'm behind; I'm not very advanced pianistically, or even musically, but I've been exposed to a whole lot."

At the other end of the spectrum is a teenaged violinist, a member of the Symphony Orchestra of Puerto Rico, and a veteran of both the Tanglewood Institute and Interlaken Music Camp, who felt that this summer was a "valid experience."

According to Dr. Lee Chrisman, B. U. coordinator of the Young Artists Program, an attempt is made to select outstanding musicians, and the program relies heavily on scholarship support. The teenagers are brought to Lenox where they may observe any rehearsal or performance of the established BSO and guest artists. They are also introduced to professional musicians in private lessons and master classe, receiving top-level instruction and evaluation.

Acting as Visiting Conductor of the Young Artists Program this year is James Yannatos, member of the Harvard faculty and conductor of the Harvard-Radcliffe Symphony Orchestra. He assumed the role this summer in the absence of Walter Eisenberg, conductor of the Boston University Symphony Orchestra, on leave with the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra which is participating in the International Festival of Youth Symphony Orchestras in St. Moritz, Switzerland.

Young, and with a great sense of vitality, Yannatos gave a Boston audience a taste of what he and the students had accomplished in a concert Monday, August 11, at

(Continued on page 13)

Additional article on page 32a

Young Musician From Leominster

A landmark of summer music, the Shed at Tanglewood, is in the background, as this member of Boston University's Young Artists Program at Tanglewood, Martha Lagoy of Leominster, discusses a musical score with conductor of the Young Artists Orchestra, James Yanattos. She is among 75 high school students chosen in nation-wide auditions to participate in the eight-week program offered by Boston University Tanglewood Institute. During their stay at Tanglewood, the students study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music. In addition, they perform in chamber groups and as part of the Young Artists Orchestra.

SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
(E) 21,000

AUG 19 1969

Mildred Wallace

VIRGIN ISLANDS STUDENTS and teacher, Miss Agatha Canfield, all at Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood this summer, discuss music even during lunch. Students are, top left, Miss Lois Hassell; and on right side of table, Miss Judy Petersen and Patmore Lewis. Miss Canfield is left, center, and in the foreground is Craig Shepard. The students will be returning to St. Thomas shortly.

Virgin Islands Students Study At Tanglewood

By MILDRED WALLACE

Three personable young people from St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, this summer became the first persons from their tiny; 27-square-mile Caribbean island to become scholarship students at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, thanks largely to the efforts of Miss Agatha Canfield, formerly of Sheffield and Canaan, Conn.

Miss Canfield, who has made her home in St. Thomas for the past 11 years and who teaches music there, is also at Tanglewood this summer on scholarship, for the third year in a row. Through her perseverance, the Boston Symphony Chamber players made their first appearance in St. Thomas and St. Croix, V.I., last year, after she initiated plans for the concerts during one of her summer stays at Tanglewood.

Here from St. Thomas are two of Miss Canfield's music students, Miss Lois Hassell, 16, and Miss Judy Petersen, 16, both high school seniors, who are taking piano seminar at the music center. Both have been with Miss Canfield for the past four years, studying piano and classes in harmony, solfegge, ensemble and music appreciation. The third student from St. Thomas is 18-year-old Patmore Lewis, a violinist on scholarship in the Young Artists program. A pupil of Jose Figueroa, concertmaster of the Puerto Rico Symphony, the talented young man has also been playing in that sumphony orchestra for the past year. He will return to the orchestra and will also attend the Conservatory of Music in Puerto Rico, started by Pablo Casals, noted conductor.

Miss Canfield is hoping to complete plans that will see the Boston Symphony Chamber return to the Virgin Islands for another series of concerts, and has already had a number of discussions about the possibilities with Boston Symphony personnel.

She has worked hard for music in the Virgin Islands, having taught at Charlotte Amalie High School in St. Thomas for three years, helping to form a glee club there and in putting on musical performances. Later, she taught at the Lutheran School, staging a number of choral programs.

Miss Canfield became the first music committee head of the newly formed St. Thomas Arts Council and was instrumental in setting up a choral group, the Caribbean Chorale, as one of two aims of the group. After that was accomplished, she turned her mind to the second aim, to bring established groups to the Virgin Islands to present chamber music concerts. That was last year. Now, she's working on the next step, bringing the chamber players back.

At the rate she's been going, it should be a foregone conclusion.

EAGLE
CLAREMONT, N. H.
(E) 6,709

AUG 23 1969

Student Given Theater Grant

LONGMEADOW — A local student has received a grant from Boston University for work in theater directing at Tanglewood.

Robert Low of 222 Colony Road will have a major part in an Aug. 13 performance of Stravinski's "History of A Soldier," which will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf as part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival at the Lenox site.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

JUL 31 1969

IN PERFORMANCE

Robert Lowe, son of Mr. and Mrs. Jules Lowe of 222 Colony Rd., Longmeadow, will take part in a performance of Stravinsky's "L Histoire de Soldat" under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf Aug. 13 at Tanglewood. Lowe is a senior at Colgate and is studying in the Boston University Tanglewood Institute.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 11 1969

ENTERPRISE
LEOMINSTER, MASS.
(E) 4,700

AUG 19 1969

Martha Lagoy And James Yanattos Discuss Score

City Girl Performs At Tanglewood

Martha Lagoy, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Bernard E. Lagoy of 424 Pleasant St., pauses in a busy Summer schedule at Tanglewood, to discuss a musical score with James Yanattos, conductor of the Young Artists Orchestra.

Martha is one of the 75 high school musicians from all over the country participating in the Young Artists Program at Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Lenox. She attends Leominster High School and is studying piano under Sister Lydia Pirro.

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight - week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fourth year, the program provides an opportunity for these aspiring musicians to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plus faculty members from Boston University's Division of Music.

Chosen from auditions held in major cities throughout the country, the Young Artists participate in chamber music ensembles, have private lessons with BSO members master classes, orchestral performance, and musical theory classes. They may also attend open rehearsals and performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood.

Successful completion of the eight - week study program is verified by examinations and appropriate credit may be applicable in a professional curriculum leading to a degree in music at Boston University.

The Young Artists Program at Tanglewood is an outgrowth of a unique partnership in the arts between Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts and the Berkshire Music Center. Four years ago Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, invited the School of Fine and Applied Arts to conduct a summer program of college - level instruction for music students at the Berkshire Music Center. Since that time the program has been expanded to include workshops and seminars in dance, mime, play-wrighting, painting, drawing and an extensive program in music, besides the Young Artists program.

Boston University Tanglewood Institute is headed by Edwin E. Stein, dean of the School of Fine and Applied Arts. John R. Watts, assistant dean of the school, serves as administrator for the Tanglewood program.

Young Musician From Leominster

A landmark of summer music, the Shed at Tanglewood, is in the background, as this member of Boston University's Young Artists Program at Tanglewood, Martha Lagoy of Leominster, discusses a musical score with conductor of the Young Artists Orchestra, James Yanattos. She is among 75 high school students chosen in nation-wide auditions to participate in the eight-week program offered by Boston University Tanglewood Institute. During their stay at Tanglewood, the students study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music. In addition, they perform in chamber groups and as part of the Young Artists Orchestra.

SENTINEL
FITCHBURG, MASS.
(E) 21,000

AUG 19 1969

young artists' tanglewood program

BU musicians at Lenox

by Eleanor Weber

There is another Tanglewood. This one is sponsored by Boston University, and it is a "Young Artists Institute" culling approximately 70 high school musicians from throughout the United States for an eight-week session of private lessons, master classes, chamber music performances, and orchestra rehearsals.

In its fourth year, the Tanglewood Institute was originally conceived as a possible means of recruiting fine musicians for B. U.'s School of Fine and Applied Arts. Some students have indeed come to the college, but the merit of the program has proved itself greatest for the young instrumentalists themselves.

The greatest asset of the program, said a towheaded violinist, "it's the place — being at Tanglewood." Explained a tall young pianist with a southern drawl, "I'm behind; I'm not very advanced pianistically, or even musically, but I've been exposed to a whole lot."

At the other end of the spectrum is a teenaged violinist, a member of the Symphony Orchestra of Puerto Rico, and a veteran of both the Tanglewood Institute and Interlaken Music Camp, who felt that this summer was a "valid experience."

According to Dr. Lee Chrisman, B. U. coordinator of the Young Artists Program, an attempt is made to select outstanding musicians, and the program relies heavily on scholarship support. The teenagers are brought to Lenox where they may observe any rehearsal or performance of the established BSO and guest artists. They are also introduced to professional musicians in private lessons and master classe, receiving top-level instruction and evaluation.

Acting as Visiting Conductor of the Young Artists Program this year is James Yannatos, member of the Harvard faculty and conductor of the Harvard-Radcliffe Symphony Orchestra. He assumed the role this summer in the absence of Walter Eisenberg, conductor of the Boston University Symphony Orchestra, on leave with the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra which is participating in the International Festival of Youth Symphony Orchestras in St. Moritz, Switzerland.

Young, and with a great sense of vitality, Yannatos gave a Boston audience a taste of what he and the students had accomplished in a concert Monday, August 11, at

(Continued on page 13)

Additional article on page 32a

122.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 21 1969

Roman Totenberg In Berkshire Violin Recital

A previously undiscovered work by the Polish composer, Wienawski, will be the featured work when Roman Totenberg, violinist, presents a recital, July 24, 9 p.m., in the theater at the Berkshire Music Center, Lenox.

Mr. Totenberg, chairman of the string department at Boston University, will also perform Beethoven's Sonata No. 4, Opus 24; Bach's Suite in D Minor with Chaconne for violin alone; and "Gasa," by Isang Yun, a Korean composer. The Yun work will be receiving its first American performance.

The Wienawski piece, entitled "Theme and Variations," was found when the Polish government issued a new and complete edition of Wienawski's compositions.

Piano accompaniment for the program will be provided by Raymond Hanson.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

JUL 17 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 19 1969

Violin Recital Will Feature Japanese Work

Roman Totenberg, professor of violin at Boston University and a member of the BU Tanglewood Institute, will give a faculty recital July 24 at 9 p.m. in the Theatre Concert Hall at Tanglewood.

Student Accompanist

The program includes Beethoven's Sonata Op. 24 and Bach's suite in D minor. "Gasa" by Isang Yun and "Theme and Variations" by Wieniawiki, two Japanese composers, will make their American premieres. Gilbert Kalish, pianist with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, will be guest artist in the Beethoven work. Hoon Mo Kim, a Korean piano fellow at the Berkshire Music Center, will accompany Mr. Totenberg in the Japanese compositions.

Mr. Totenberg has been soloist with many orchestras in the United States and Europe. He has also given chamber music recitals.

PIANIST RAYMOND HANSON

Hanson to Premiere Work at Tanglewood

Raymond Hanson, head of the Piano department at Hartt College of Music, West West Hartford, will perform in the premiere of "Themes and Variations" by Henri Wieniawski at Tanglewood on Thursday.

Hanson will be accompanied by Roman Totenburg, noted concert violinist during the performance which will take place in the Tanglewood Theater, Lenox, Mass., at 9 p.m. Thursday.

The Hanson-Totenburg program also includes works of Bach, Beethoven, Yum and Szymanowski.

Both Hanson and Totenberg have appeared together in sonata recitals throughout the United States, Canada and Europe and a recording of Hanson, Totenberg and Rostropovich was released recently by Heliodor.

Violinist gives pleasant concert

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

LENOX — The violinist Roman Totenberg gave a most enjoyable concert with the pianist Raymond Hanson in the Tanglewood Theatre Concert Hall Thursday night.

Though conventional in arrangement, the program was agreeably fresh in much of the actual filling out of its form at: Beethoven's A major sonata from Opus 30, the Bach D minor Partita, "Gasa" by Isang Yun, Szynanowski's "Fountain of Arethusa," and the Theme and Variations Opus 15, by Wieniawski. That, curiously enough, made the Bach the nearest thing to a chestnut: the Beethoven is not much heard in concert. "Gasa" was getting its first American performance, the Szynanowski, which used to be played so much 20 years ago, has rather fallen from favor now, and Wieniawski's charming and brilliant Variations. described in a program note as "little known and hitherto unperformed," were certainly quite unfamiliar.

The Korean composer, Isang Yun, is gifted and skilled. "Gasa" is a kind of nocturne for violin and piano, fairly brief, and its pleasing flow of ideas is articulated with admirable precision of workmanship.

The instrumental rising is colorful, and the color is responsibly and meaningfully integrated into the compositional life of the piece, rather than just being left on the surface as a cosmetic property. The sound, without being aggressively original, is all together fresh, and "Gasa" is a fine addition to the meager contemporary repertory for violin and piano.

There is no unmusical phrase or tasteless gesture in Totenberg's unaffected playing. Everything he does is warmly personal, full of bite and guts, and always lively and interesting to listen to. These are wonderful qualities and dismayingly rare, and I enjoyed them so much in Totenberg's playing that I don't at all mind an occasional lack of technical elegance or the absence of anything very profound or original in his interpretations of the classics.

He played the Bach Partrita, the one that ends with the grand Chaconne, as most violins do, to overwhelm rather than to charm, and with the sound of a Cesar Franck organ inmind rather than that of a lute. That seems to me fundamentally wrong, but there, too, his triumphant musicality and vitality made that approach convincing for once, and the Partita was not the torment such works usually are.

Hanson is a good musician and able pianist, though one who puts more life into his right hand tha into the left. There were moments in the Beethoven sonata that suggested the two players had not rehearsed together very much.

The ARTS

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 26 1969 New England

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 25 1969

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE RECITAL by violinist Roman Totenberg, assisted by pianist Raymond Hanson and sponsored by the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, in the Theatre Concert Hall last night was much more than a pleasant evening. For the general audience it was also a view through a magnifying glass of how a violin is played and how it should be played, and for those present who are students of the Berkshire Music Center it was a demonstration of what mastery of an instrument and long assiduous refinement can produce.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 23 1969

123

N.E.C. & Jazz

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

APR 23 1969 New England

Conservatory to Teach Jazz at Tanglewood

BOSTON — The New England Conservatory of Music will again sponsor, in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center, a summer Institute at Tanglewood offering courses in jazz and music education.

There will be two three-week seminars taught by jazz musicians David Baker and Jerry Coker. Each seminar will include jazz performance techniques, jazz improvisation, and fundamentals of theory pertaining to jazz. Jazz ensembles will be formed and performances given.

The music education program, under the direction of Herbert Alper, chairman of the music education department at the New England Conservatory, consists of the following two courses: "Contemporary Composition" and "Mid-twentieth Century Trends in Music Education."

Two Summer Seminars Set For Tanglewood

The New England Conservatory will again sponsor, in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center, a summer "Institute at Tanglewood" offering courses in jazz and music education, according to conservatory president Gunther Schuller.

There will be two three-week seminars taught by jazz musicians David Baker and Jerry Coker. Each seminar will include performance techniques, improvisation, and fundamentals of theory pertaining to jazz. Jazz ensembles will be formed and performances given.

The music education program, under the direction of Herbert Alper, chairman of the music education department at the conservatory, consists of "Contemporary Composition" and "Mid-twentieth Century Trends in Music Education."

For additional information write to the office of the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood, 290 Huntington avenue, Boston, 02115.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

MAY 18 1969 New England

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

MAY 31 1969

Conservatory's Jazz Courses

BOSTON—The New England Conservatory of Music will inaugurate a fully accredited jazz department this September. Courses will cover all aspects of jazz theory, history, arranging, composition and improvisation.

A bachelor's or master's degree will be offered in jazz. The school begins its jazz program this summer at its Tanglewood institute with two three-week seminars, July 14-Aug. 2, and Aug. 4 through Aug. 22.

Jazz ensembles will be formed by the students to work in performance techniques, improvisation and fundamentals of theory. Instructors will be Jerry Coker and David Baker. A tuition of $150 per three-week session will be charged.

Auditors will be allowed to sit in on any of the classes at $50 per week.

NEC Seminars At Tanglewood

In conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center the New England Conservatory will again sponsor a Tanglewood Institute offering courses in jazz and music education from July 14 through Aug. 22.

Two three-week seminars in jazz will be taught by David Baker and Jerry Coker. Each seminar will include performance techniques, improvisation, and fundamental of theory pertaining to jazz.

The music education program, directed by Herbert Alper, will consist of two courses: "Contemporary Composition," focusing on exploratory compositions for various instruments and sonorities using recent techniques of pitch organization, and "Mid-20th-Century Trends in Music Education," presenting as guest lecturers educators Eunice Boardman and Barbara C. Reeder, composers Donald Martino and Otto Luening, and performer Carl Atkins.

For information regarding enrollment, credit and fees, write the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood, 290 Huntington Ave., Boston 02115.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JUN 14 1969 New England

ITHACA JOURNAL
Tuesday, May 20, 1969

CAESAR GEORGE

ELWOOD PETERS

ROBERT HEATH

CARMELA TORRISI

MRS. LEILA ROUSE

Teachers Win Awards

Five Ithaca teachers have received grants from the Teachers' Advanced Study Fund of the Ithaca Council of Parent-Teacher Assns., the council announced today in connection with Teachers' Recognition Day.

They are Robert Heath, Elwood Peters and Mrs. Leila Rouse of the junior high staffs and Caesar George and Miss Carmela Torrisi, specialists at the elementary level. The grants total $940, the largest sum the council has awarded in a single year.

Heath, who lives at 318 Warren Pl., teaches German at Boynton and has been with the district for seven years. Next year he will be a full-time graduate student at Cornell, working toward a doctor's degree in education with a major in school administration and supervision and a minor in curriculum development and industrial and labor relations.

George lives at 1309 N. Cayuga St. and teaches physical education at Glenwood and Enfield schools. He has taught in Ithaca schools for eight years, and initiated and formerly directed the School-to-Employment Program at the high school now sponsored by BOCES. He will work toward a director's certificate in physical education, health and recreation at Ithaca College and Cornell, and intern with the Ithaca schools.

Peters, who lives at 208 E. Yates St., teaches instrumental music at DeWitt and has been with the district for four years. He will study this summer at the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood, and will take part in a three-week seminar on jazz theory and techniques.

Mrs. Rouse of Etna teaches mathematics at DeWitt and also is a four-year veteran on the staff. She will study mathematics and education at Cornell or Cortland this summer.

Miss Torrisi, who lives at 961 E. State St., teaches art at Henry St. John and Cayuga Heights Schools. She plans to study painting and design an elementary art curriculum at Cornell this summer. She has been with the Ithaca schools for five years.

The fund comes from the fall rummage sale sponsored by the council, which raised $420 this year, and the remainder was contributed by individual PTA units in the Ithaca district.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JUN 16 1969 New England

Tanglewood institute opens July 14

The New England Conservatory of Music will sponsor a Summer "Institute at Tanglewood" in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center. The Institute will extend from July 14 through Aug. 22 and will offer courses in jazz and music education.

David Baker and Jerry Coker will conduct two 3-week seminars in jazz performance techniques, improvisation and theory. Jazz ensembles will be formed and performances given.

The music education program, directed by Herbert Alper, will offer courses in "Contemporary Composition" and "Mid-Twentieth Century Trends in Music Education."

The composition course will focus on exploratory compositions for various instruments and sonorities, using 20th century techniques of pitch organizations. Student compositions will be performed and evaluated by the class.

"Mid-Twentieth Century Trends" will acquaint students with materials that are expected to dominate musical practice in the latter part of the century.

Guest lecturers will be Eunice Boardman, a leader in elementary musical education; Barbara C. Reeder, authority on general music at the junior high school level; Donald Martino, chairman of the Conservatory's composition department; Otto Luening, pioneer of electronic music, and Carl Atkins, saxophonist and lecturer on Black Culture.

NEC Jazz Trio Plans Program At Ogunquit

The New England Conservatory Jazz Trio, assisted by Carl Atkins of the NEC faculty, will present a program lecture-demonstration at Barn Gallery in Ogunquit Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Formed this year by the president, Gunther Schuller, the Jazz Trio has already appeared in many concerts, including a series at Northeastern University and Harvard. The demonstration- lecture-concert topic will be "What Is Jazz?"

Members are: Monty Stark, vibraphone; Donald Pate, bass, and Harvey Mason, percussion, assisted by Atkins, who is teaching at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Prior to joining the Conservatory faculty, he was a member of the University of Indiana Jazz band and played with the National Opera Company.

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, MAINE
(E) 30,034

AUG 14 1969 New England

NEWS
BANGOR, MAINE
(M) 78,940

AUG 13 1969 New England Newspapers

THE NEW ENGLAND Conservatory Jazz Trio, assisted by Carl Atkins of the NEC faculty will present a program lecture - demonstration at Barn Gallery in Ogunquit Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Formed this year by President Gunther Schuller, the Jazz Trio has already appeared in many concerts, including a series at Northeastern University and Harvard. The demonstration - lecture - concert will be on the topic "What Is Jazz?" Members are: Monty Stark, vibraphone, Donald Pate, bass, and Harvey Mason, percussion, assisted by Atkins, who is presently teaching at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Prior to his joining the Conservatory faculty, he was a member of the University of Indiana Jazz band and played with the National Opera Company.

SENTINEL
WATERVILLE, MAINE
(M) 21,324

AUG 14 1969 New England

New England Conservatory Jazz Trio Will Perform

OGUNQUIT — The New England Conservatory Jazz Trio, assisted by Carl Atkins of the New England Conservatory faculty, will present a program Lecture-Demonstration and Performance: What Is Jazz? Aug. 16 at 8:30 p.m. at the Barn Gallery, located at Shore Road and Bourne's Lane.

The New England Conservatory Jazz Trio, formed this year by President Gunther Schuller, already has a notable list of appearances to its credit, including a series of concert seminars in jazz at Northeastern University, concerts at the Harvard Business School, Jordan Hall, New Haven, Conn., in connection with the Quinnipiac Jazz Festival, and a lecture-demonstration entitled the "Evolution of Jazz Improvisation" on WHDH - TV's "Classroom Five." The programs on WHDH-TV were a part of a series sponsored by this station and Northeastern University on the general theme of "Black Artists and Music."

Members of the New England Conservatory Jazz Trio are: Monty Stark, vibraphone; Donald Pate, bass; Harvey Mason, percussion, assisted by Carl Atkins.

Carl Atkins is currently teaching and working at Tanglewood and is on the New England Conservatory faculty (saxophone). Prior to coming to the Conservatory in Boston, Atkins toured for the United States Department with the University of Indianna Jazz Band in Southeast Asia in 1965. He has also played with the American National Opera Company and with jazz artists, Nancy Wilson and Henry Mancini.

Monty Stark has played vibraphone with many groups exploring the most recent trends in jazz.

Harvey Mason, percussion, has organized jazz quintets and other jazz performances in the Boston area. He has also composed for jazz groups and his compositions have been played in Jordan Hall at the Conservatory. Harvey Mason is a student of Everett Firth at the Conservatory. He has worked with Teddy Wilson, Buck Clayton, Wild Bill Davis, Duke Ellington, Red Norvo and Attila Zoler.

123

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

APR 23 1969 New England

Conservatory to Teach Jazz at Tanglewood

BOSTON — The New England Conservatory of Music will again sponsor, in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center, a summer Institute at Tanglewood offering courses in jazz and music education.

There will be two three-week seminars taught by jazz musicians David Baker and Jerry Coker. Each seminar will include jazz performance techniques, jazz improvisation, and fundamentals of theory pertaining to jazz. Jazz ensembles will be formed and performances given.

The music education program, under the direction of Herbert Alper, chairman of the music education department at the New England Conservatory, consists of the following two courses: "Contemporary Composition' 'and "Mid-twentieth Century Trends in Music Education."

Two Summer Seminars Set For Tanglewood

The New England Conservatory will again sponsor, in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center, a summer "Institute at Tanglewood" offering courses in jazz and music education, according to conservatory president Gunther Schuller.

There will be two three-week seminars taught by jazz musicians David Baker and Jerry Coker. Each seminar will include performance techniques, improvisation, and fundamentals of theory pertaining to jazz. Jazz ensembles will be formed and performances given.

The music education program, under the direction of Herbert Alper, chairman of the music education department at the conservatory, consists of "Contemporary Composition" and "Mid-twentieth Century Trends in Music Education."

For additional information write to the office of the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood, 290 Huntington avenue, Boston, 02115.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

MAY 18 1969 New England

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

MAY 31 1969

Conservatory's Jazz Courses

BOSTON—The New England Conservatory of Music will inaugurate a fully accredited jazz department this September. Courses will cover all aspects of jazz theory, history, arranging, composition and improvisation.

A bachelor's or master's degree will be offered in jazz. The school begins its jazz program this summer at its Tanglewood institute with two three-week seminars, July 14-Aug. 2, and Aug. 4 through Aug. 22.

Jazz ensembles will be formed by the students to work in performance techniques, improvisation and fundamentals of theory. Instructors will be Jerry Coker and David Baker. A tuition of $150 per three-week session will be charged.

Auditors will be allowed to sit in on any of the classes at $50 per week.

NEC Seminars At Tanglewood

In conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center the New England Conservatory will again sponsor a Tanglewood Institute offering courses in jazz and music education from July 14 through Aug. 22.

Two three-week seminars in jazz will be taught by David Baker and Jerry Coker. Each seminar will include performance techniques, improvisation, and fundamental of theory pertaining to jazz.

The music education program, directed by Herbert Alper, will consist of two courses: "Contemporary Composition," focusing on exploratory compositions for various instruments and sonorities using recent techniques of pitch organization, and "Mid-20th-Century Trends in Music Education," presenting as guest lecturers educators Eunice Boardman and Barbara C. Reeder, composers Donald Martino and Otto Luening, and performer Carl Atkins.

For information regarding enrollment, credit and fees, write the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood, 290 Huntington Ave., Boston 02115.

N.E.C.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JUN 14 1969 New England

Jazz

ITHACA JOURNAL
Tuesday, May 20, 1969

CAESAR GEORGE

ELWOOD PETERS

ROBERT HEATH

Teachers Win Awards

Five Ithaca teachers have received grants from the Teachers' Advanced Study Fund of the Ithaca Council of Parent-Teacher Assns., the council announced today in connection with Teachers' Recognition Day.

They are Robert Heath, Elwood Peters and Mrs. Leila Rouse of the junior high staffs and Caesar George and Miss Carmela Torrisi, specialists at the elementary level. The grants total $940, the largest sum the council has awarded in a single year.

Heath, who lives at 318 Warren Pl., teaches German at Boynton and has been with the district for seven years. Next year he will be a full-time graduate student at Cornell, working toward a doctor's degree in education with a major in school administration and supervision and a minor in curriculum development and industrial and labor relations.

George lives at 1309 N. Cayuga St. and teaches physical education at Glenwood and Enfield schools. He has taught in Ithaca schools for eight years, and initiated and formerly directed the School-to-Employment Program at the high school now sponsored by BOCES. He will work toward a director's certificate in physical education, health and recreation at Ithaca College and Cornell, and intern with the Ithaca schools.

Peters, who lives at 208 E. Yates St., teaches instrumental music at DeWitt and has been with the district for four years. He will study this summer at the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood, and will take part in a three-week seminar on jazz theory and techniques.

Mrs. Rouse of Etna teaches mathematics at DeWitt and also is a four-year veteran on the staff. She will study mathematics and education at Cornell or Cortland this summer.

Miss Torrisi, who lives at 961 E. State St., teaches art at Henry St. John and Cayuga Heights Schools. She plans to study painting and design an elementary art curriculum at Cornell this summer. She has been with the Ithaca schools for five years.

The fund comes from the fall rummage sale sponsored by the council, which raised $420 this year, and the remainder was contributed by individual PTA units in the Ithaca district.

CARMELA TORRISI

MRS. LEILA ROUSE

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JUN 16 1969 New England

Tanglewood institute opens July 14

The New England Conservatory of Music will sponsor a Summer "Institute at Tanglewood" in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center. The Institute will extend from July 14 through Aug. 22 and will offer courses in jazz and music education.

David Baker and Jerry Coker will conduct two 3-week seminars in jazz performance techniques, improvisation and theory. Jazz ensembles will be formed and performances given.

The music education program, directed by Herbert Alper, will offer courses in "Contemporary Composition" and "Mid-Twentieth Century Trends in Music Education."

The composition course will focus on exploratory compositions for various instruments and sonorities, using 20th century techniques of pitch organizations. Student compositions will be performed and evaluated by the class.

"Mid-Twentieth Century Trends" will acquaint students with materials that are expected to dominate musical practice in the latter part of the century.

Guest lecturers will be Eunice Boardman, a leader in elementary musical education; Barbara C. Reeder, authority on general music at the junior high school level; Donald Martino, chairman of the Conservatory's composition department; Otto Luening, pioneer of electronic music, and Carl Atkins, saxophonist and lecturer on Black Culture.

NEC Jazz Trio Plans Program At Ogunquit

The New England Conservatory Jazz Trio, assisted by Carl Atkins of the NEC faculty, will present a program lecture-demonstration at Barn Gallery in Ogunquit Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Formed this year by the president, Gunther Schuller, the Jazz Trio has already appeared in many concerts, including a series at Northeastern University and Harvard. The demonstration- lecture-concert topic will be "What Is Jazz?"

Members are: Monty Stark, vibraphone; Donald Pate, bass, and Harvey Mason, percussion, assisted by Atkins, who is teaching at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Prior to joining the Conservatory faculty, he was a member of the University of Indiana Jazz band and played with the National Opera Company.

EXPRESS
PORTLAND, MAINE
(E) 30,034

AUG 14 1969 New England

NEWS
BANGOR, MAINE
(M) 78,940

AUG 13 1969 New England Newsclip

THE NEW ENGLAND Conservatory Jazz Trio, assisted by Carl Atkins of the NEC faculty will present a program lecture - demonstration at Barn Gallery in Ogunquit Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Formed this year by President Gunther Schuller, the Jazz Trio has already appeared in many concerts, including a series at Northeastern University and Harvard. The demonstration - lecture - concert will be on the topic "What Is Jazz?" Members are: Monty Stark, vibraphone, Donald Pate, bass, and Harvey Mason, percussion, assisted by Atkins, who is presently teaching at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Prior to his joining the Conservatory faculty, he was a member of the University of Indiana Jazz band and played with the National Opera Company.

SENTINEL
WATERVILLE, MAINE
(M) 21,324

AUG 14 1969 New England

New England Conservatory Jazz Trio Will Perform

OGUNQUIT — The New England Conservatory Jazz Trio, assisted by Carl Atkins of the New England Conservatory faculty, will present a program Lecture-Demonstration and Performance: What Is Jazz? Aug. 16 at 8:30 p.m. at the Barn Gallery, located at Shore Road and Bourne's Lane.

The New England Conservatory Jazz Trio, formed this year by President Gunther Schuller, already has a notable list of appearances to its credit, including a series of concert seminars in jazz at Northeastern University, concerts at the Harvard Business School, Jordan Hall, New Haven, Conn., in connection with the Quinnipiac Jazz Festival, and a lecture-demonstration entitled the "Evolution of Jazz Improvisation" on WHDH - TV's "Classroom Five." The programs on WHDH-TV were a part of a series sponsored by this station and Northeastern University on the general theme of "Black Artists and Music."

Members of the New England Conservatory Jazz Trio are: Monty Stark, vibraphone; Donald Pate, bass; Harvey Mason, percussion, assisted by Carl Atkins.

Carl Atkins is currently teaching and working at Tanglewood and is on the New England Conservatory faculty (saxophone). Prior to coming to the Conservatory in Boston, Atkins toured for the United States Department with the University of Indianna Jazz Band in Southeast Asia in 1965. He has also played with the American National Opera Company and with jazz artists, Nancy Wilson and Henry Mancini.

Monty Stark has played vibraphone with many groups exploring the most recent trends in jazz.

Harvey Mason, percussion, has organized jazz quintets and other jazz performances in the Boston area. He has also composed for jazz groups and his compositions have been played in Jordan Hall at the Conservatory. Harvey Mason is a student of Everett Firth at the Conservatory. He has worked with Teddy Wilson, Buck Clayton, Wild Bill Davis, Duke Ellington, Red Norvo and Attila Zoler.

124

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 30 1969
New England

The Boston University Institute at Tanglewood runs a Playwrights' Workshop. Here two actors rehearse an unpublished play which will open this fall.

Photos by Stephen Koch

Students in the Fellowship Program are proficient musicians. Tanglewood gives them an opportunity to engage in intensive performance.

The Boston University Institute holds a small program in painting and drawing at Tanglewood.

Tanglewood Student Program:

Precocious Youth Meet Established Masters

TO MOST PEOPLE, Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To some, it is Tuesday evening rock and folk concerts. But few are aware of the breadth and complexity of the Berkshire Music Center program which draws more than 400 students from across the country and abroad for studies in music, theatre, art and dance.

There are three fundamental student programs held at Tanglewood throughout the summer — the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program, the Boston University Tanglewood Institute and the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood.

The oldest and most prestigious of the three, the Fellowship Program was established in 1940 under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. This past year it was directed by Erich Leinsdorf and Joseph Silverstein, chairman of the faculty. The Center was established "to provide an environment in which young musicians could continue their professional training and add to their artistic experience through the guidance of eminent musicians."

Designed for musicians who have finished their formal training, the fellowship program stresses performance. Young musicians audition before representatives of the Boston Symphony or send tape recordings with applications. Fellows are selected according to their musical proficiency, and receive room, board, tuition and a small stipend for living expenses.

Instrumentalists, singers, composers and conductors apply from states throughout the country and abroad. "There is little time for anything but music," says Richard Kaufman, a 21-year-old student violinist from Los Angeles. "I usually have two chamber music rehearsals a day, each lasting two hours." He, as well as the majority of the fellowship students is a member of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra which practices most afternoons. Here the fellows are trained in modern idioms and play pieces composed by fellowship conductors. The center orchestra offers a rare opportunity for coordinating the efforts of composer, conductor and orchestra, for at Tanglewood the three live and work together. In chamber group rehearsals, the fellows practice with members of the Boston Symphony, who coach and train the individuals. "Being surrounded by so much talent is very inspiring," Kaufman says, "and it is a very human experience as well."

The Boston University Tanglewood Institute is only 4 years old, but it offers credited instruction in music, art, theatre and dance. Although it is run by the Boston University School of Fine Arts, the institute is not limited to students from BU. The institute is able to accommodate anyone, from gifted high-school juniors in the Young Artists at Tanglewood program to master musicians. The intensive instruction in chamber music, voice and piano, encompasses all levels of performance, ranging from the Young Artists program to seminars and master classes for advanced performers and teachers.

The institute's involvement with theatre and dance consists of workshops for playwrighting, theatre performance, dance and movement. The Playwright's Workshop brings in two noted young playwrights with promising work in progress. The work is placed in rehearsal and presented in its entirety by experienced actors. Throughout the production cycle, the author is able to work with the director and the actor, evaluating and criticising the play.

The Theatre Workshop is aimed at teachers of theatre and potential directors. The 35 students participate in an organized program of observation, discussion and practice that coordinates with the productions of the Playwright's Workshop and other theatre and dance activities. Skits and scenes, often composed by the student themselves, are staged to put into practice the techniques discussed and observed. Theatre Workshop participants may take classes in either mime or movement.

The drawing and painting programs, run on both basic and advanced levels, last for eight weeks. Professional artists are invited to supplement the resident faculty, and in addition to their roles as visiting critics, they also conduct seminars and critiques.

Three courses offered by the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood are designed primarily for music educators. Two-week seminars in jazz, taught by David Baker and Jerry Coker, concentrate on improvisation and fundamentals of theory. A course on mid-20th century trends in music education, directed by Herbert Alper, brings prominent personalities in music education to Tanglewood. Such topics as black music, electronic music and teaching in ghettos are discussed. Also given is a course in contemporary composition in which the class writes music for instruments played by its own members.

The Berkshire Music Center, with its many programs and all-encompassing summer curricula uniquely gathers young artists with a variety of talent. It brings the most talented of the young together with the best of the old. Creative people of every dimension and medium increase proficiency in their own art and sharpen their appreciation of others' artistic expression.—S.R.K.

Students in the Music Center Orchestra are conducted by Gunther Schuller, who will become director of the Center next year.

Summer 1969—

Talent, Poise, Perso
Pamela Nies' Pageant

By ROSE ALICE HOERST
Intell Staff Writer

A "very excited" Miss Lancaster County leaves today for the final chapter in the "Miss Pennsylvania Story" with an excellent chance to star in the epic called, "The Miss America Pageant." which only runs a week but makes the star a household name for years.

Pamela Nies, 21-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph A. Nies, Reinholds, will leave about 1:30 this afternoon for Hershey, where the state contest will be held.

Although contestants don't have to register until Tuesday, Pam said she wants to "get up there a little early and relax and get used to the home where I'll be staying."

Each Miss Pennsylvania contestant will live during the week in "Pageant Week Homes" with area residents. Accompanying Miss Lancaster County will be "Trixie" Jackson, Pam's wardrobe assistant in the county contest.

Pam, who graduated May 25 (cum laude) from the Shenandoah Conservatory of Music, Winchester, Va., is a poised and personable young woman. She's looking forward to the week's activities with typical enthusiasm.

"The closer it gets," s said, "the more exciting gets."

"Enthusiasm" reallv scribes Pam — wheth talking about her c music, her exper scholarship st

LANCASTER, PA.
INTELLIGENCER
JOURNAL
D. 35,000
JUN 9 1969

state contest ...
per cent of the total ...
Pam will sing "Vissi D'Arte from Puccini's "Tosca."

When asked if she's been practicing, Pam said, "No."

"It's that kind of song," she said, "I know it and if I sing it too much, I'll wear it down.

"To sing an aria and sing it correctly (as correctly as I can, she modestly added), you have to FEEL it. If you rehearse it too much, you wear it thin."

While Pam left the room to change clothes for another picture, her father made a big understatement when he said, "Pam's done pretty well, I must say."

Plays Piano

When she came back, Pam sat down at the piano and started playing. When she was asked what kind of music she likes best she was candid enough to admit there isn't any — she likes them all.

"Well, actually I could tell you my LEAST favorite type," she said, "but I'll probably make a lot of enemies."

When pressed, she said she really doesn't care for "the real down-home bluegrass country and western — the real way back kind."

Her favorite composers?

"Wagner and . . . gee, I haven't really thought about this . . . contemporary . . . Bernstein, I guess."

Great Summer

One mention of Leonard Bernstein who recently ended a long association as music director of the New York Philharmonic) sent Pam off on a stream of enthusiastic reminiscences about her summer at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

The summer after her senior year at Cocalico, Pam won a scholarship to Tanglewood (the summer home of the Boston Symphony) and met many of the greats of contemporary music — Bernstein, Aaron Copland, Eric Leinsdorf, and others.

"It was a wonderful experience," she said, "something I'll never forget. The only shame is that I was too young to comprehend what was going on. Cliburn (Van Cliburn, the pianist) was there. I mean, he was like five steps away and ate at the same table with us . . . I'd give anything to go up there again."

Part of the educational experience of those four weeks at Tanglewood was the opportunity to work under these men.

Her Inspirations

"I sang under the direction of Leinsdorf and Bernstein," she said. "We did the concert version of the last act of "Carmen" (Bernstein conducting) and Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia" with (Rudolf) Serkin on piano and Leinsdorf conducting."

But Pam got more out of Tanglewood than just the opportunity to work under such greats as these.

"I can attribute my interest in classical music to my time up there," she said. "When you're with people whose whole lives are wrapped up in music, you can't help but get interested."

Pam plans to teach for at least a year, but of course if she becomes Miss Pennsylvania (or Miss America) her

Singing is ...

"I'll never forget my summer at Tanglewood . . . a w

124

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 30 1969
New England

The Boston University Institute at Tanglewood runs a Playwrights' Workshop. Here two actors rehearse an unpublished play which will open this fall.

Photos by Stephen Koch

Students in the Fellowship Program are proficient musicians. Tanglewood gives them an opportunity to engage in intensive performance.

The Boston University Institute holds a small program in painting and drawing at Tanglewood.

Tanglewood Student Program:

Precocious Youth Meet Established Masters

TO MOST PEOPLE, Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To some, it is Tuesday evening rock and folk concerts. But few are aware of the breadth and complexity of the Berkshire Music Center program which draws more than 400 students from across the country and abroad for studies in music, theatre, art and dance.

There are three fundamental student programs held at Tanglewood throughout the summer — the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program, the Boston University Tanglewood Institute and the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood.

The oldest and most prestigious of the three, the Fellowship Program was established in 1940 under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. This past year it was directed by Erich Leinsdorf and Joseph Silverstein, chairman of the faculty. The Center was established "to provide an environment in which young musicians could continue their professional training and add to their artistic experience through the guidance of eminent musicians."

Designed for musicians who have finished their formal training, the fellowship program stresses performance. Young musicians audition before representatives of the Boston Symphony or send tape recordings with applications. Fellows are selected according to their musical proficiency, and receive room, board, tuition and a small stipend for living expenses.

Instrumentalists, singers, composers and conductors apply from states throughout the country and abroad. "There is little time for anything but music," says Richard Kaufman, a 21-year-old student violinist from Los Angeles. "I usually have two chamber music rehearsals a day, each lasting two hours." He, as well as the majority of the fellowship students is a member of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra which practices most afternoons. Here the fellows are trained in modern idioms and play pieces composed by fellowship conductors. The center orchestra offers a rare opportunity for coordinating the efforts of composer, conductor and orchestra, for at Tanglewood the three live and work together. In chamber group rehearsals, the fellows practice with members of the Boston Symphony, who coach and train the individuals. "Being surrounded by so much talent is very inspiring," Kaufman says, "and it is a very human experience as well."

The Boston University Tanglewood Institute is only 4 years old, but it offers credited instruction in music, art, theatre and dance. Although it is run by the Boston University School of Fine Arts, the institute is not limited to students from BU. The institute is able to accommodate anyone, from gifted high-school juniors in the Young Artists at Tanglewood program to master musicians. The intensive instruction in chamber music, voice and piano, encompasses all levels of performance, ranging from the Young Artists program to seminars and master classes for advanced performers and teachers.

The institute's involvement with theatre and dance consists of workshops for playwrighting, theatre performance, dance and movement. The Playwright's Workshop brings in two noted young playwrights with promising work in progress. The work is placed in rehearsal and presented in its entirety by experienced actors. Throughout the production cycle, the author is able to work with the director and the actor, evaluating and criticising the play.

The Theatre Workshop is aimed at teachers of theatre and potential directors. The 35 students participate in an organized program of observation, discussion and practice that coordinates with the productions of the Playwright's Workshop and other theatre and dance activities. Skits and scenes, often composed by the student themselves, are staged to put into practice the techniques discussed and observed. Theatre Workshop participants may take classes in either mime or movement.

The drawing and painting programs, run on both basic and advanced levels, last for eight weeks. Professional artists are invited to supplement the resident faculty, and in addition to their roles as visiting critics, they also conduct seminars and critiques.

Three courses offered by the New England Conservatory Institute at Tanglewood are designed primarily for music educators. Two-week seminars in jazz, taught by David Baker and Jerry Coker, concentrate on improvisation and fundamentals of theory. A course on mid-20th century trends in music education, directed by Herbert Alper, brings prominent personalities in music education to Tanglewood. Such topics as black music, electronic music and teaching in ghettos are discussed. Also given is a course in contemporary composition in which the class writes music for instruments played by its own members.

The Berkshire Music Center, with its many programs and all-encompassing summer curricula uniquely gathers young artists with a variety of talent. It brings the most talented of the young together with the best of the old. Creative people of every dimension and medium increase proficiency in their own art and sharpen their appreciation of others' artistic expression.—S.R.K.

Students in the Music Center Orchestra are conducted by Gunther Schuller, who will become director of the Center next year.

Summer 1969—

Talent, Poise, Perso
Pamela Nies' Pageant

By ROSE ALICE HOERST
Intell Staff Writer

A "very excited" Miss Lancaster County leaves today for the final chapter in the "Miss Pennsylvania Story" with an excellent chance to star in the epic called, "The Miss America Pageant." which only runs a week but makes the star a household name for years.

Pamela Nies, 21-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph A. Nies, Reinholds, will leave about 1:30 this afternoon for Hershey, where the state contest will be held.

Although contestants don't have to register until Tuesday, Pam said she wants to "get up there a little early and relax and get used to the home where I'll be staying."

Each Miss Pennsylvania contestant will live during the week in "Pageant Week Homes" with area residents. Accompanying Miss Lancaster County will be "Trixie" Jackson, Pam's wardrobe assistant in the county contest.

Pam, who graduated May 25 (cum laude) from the Shenandoah Conservatory of Music, Winchester, Va., is a poised and personable young woman. She's looking forward to the week's activities with typical enthusiasm.

"The closer it gets," s said, "the more exciting gets."

"Enthusiasm" reallv scribes Pam — wheth talking about her c music, her exper scholarship st

LANCASTER, PA.
INTELLIGENCER
JOURNAL
D. 35,000
JUN 9 1969

state contest ...
per cent of the total ...
Pam will sing "Vissi D'Arte from Puccini's "Tosca."

When asked if she's been practicing, Pam said, "No."

"It's that kind of song," she said, "I know it and if I sing it too much, I'll wear it down.

"To sing an aria and sing it correctly (as correctly as I can, she modestly added), you have to FEEL it. If you rehearse it too much, you wear it thin."

While Pam left the room to change clothes for another picture, her father made a big understatement when he said, "Pam's done pretty well, I must say."

Plays Piano

When she came back, Pam sat down at the piano and started playing. When she was asked what kind of music she likes best she was candid enough to admit there isn't any — she likes them all.

"Well, actually I could tell you my LEAST favorite type," she said, "but I'll probably make a lot of enemies."

When pressed, she said she really doesn't care for "the real down-home bluegrass country and western — the real way back kind."

Her favorite composers?

"Wagner and . . . gee, I haven't really thought about this . . . contemporary . . . Bernstein, I guess."

Great Summer

One mention of Leonard Bernstein who recently ended a long association as music director of the New York Philharmonic) sent Pam off on a stream of enthusiastic reminiscences about her summer at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

The summer after her senior year at Cocalico, Pam won a scholarship to Tanglewood (the summer home of the Boston Symphony) and met many of the greats of contemporary music — Bernstein, Aaron Copland, Eric Leinsdorf, and others.

"It was a wonderful experience," she said, "something I'll never forget. The only shame is that I was too young to comprehend what was going on. Cliburn (Van Cliburn, the pianist) was there. I mean, he was like five steps away and ate at the same table with us . . . I'd give anything to go up there again."

Part of the educational experience of those four weeks at Tanglewood was the opportunity to work under these men.

Her Inspirations

"I sang under the direction of Leinsdorf and Bernstein," she said. "We did the concert version of the last act of "Carmen" (Bernstein conducting) and Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia" with (Rudolf) Serkin on piano and Leinsdorf conducting."

But Pam got more out of Tanglewood than just the opportunity to work under such greats as these.

"I can attribute my interest in classical music to my time up there," she said. "When you're with people whose whole lives are wrapped up in music, you can't help but get interested."

Pam plans to teach for at least a year, but of course if she becomes Miss Pennsylvania (or Miss America) her

Singing is ...

"I'll never forget my summer at Tanglewood . . . a w

At the Concert

'Tanglewood on Parade' A Brilliant Program

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. —Listeners with an ear for good music and an eye for a bargain gathered at the Berkshire Festival yesterday for the annual "Tanglewood on Parade."

For the normal admission price, the listener was offered almost continuous music throughout the afternoon and evening, climaxing in a gala concert by the Boston Symphony.

The activities were for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer training ground for young musicians.

The seemingly endless rains which have been plaguing Tanglewood all summer were wonderfully absent, and members of the audience were free to stroll from one event to another and to picnic on the spacious lawns.

★ ★ ★

THE AFTERNOON'S music was as diversified as it was limitless. There were performances by members of the Berkshire Music Center of chamber orchestral works by Bach, Ravel, and Bartok.

The Young Artist Orchestra of the Boston University Tanglewood Institute performed the Beethoven Third Leonore Overture and excerpts from Stravinsky's "Petrushka."

There were excerpts from contemporary operas, an outdoor suppertime concert of wind music by Beethoven and Stravinsky, and much, much more.

The wealth of talent defied belief. And no wonder, for there are 40 Berkshire Music Center alumni in the Boston Symphony alone, and former conducting fellows include Leonard Bernstein and Seiji Ozawa.

The Boston Symphony's Gala Concert continued the afternoons' diversified programing.

★ ★ ★

ERICH LEINSDORF, the orchestra's music director, lead performances of Strauss' "Don Juan" and the Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

Benjamin Britten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra" was conducted by Charles Wilson, the BSO's assistant conductor.

Gunther Schuller, who along with Seiji Ozawa will head Tanglewood next season, conducted his own "Journey into Jazz." The work, writen in 1962, was designed to introuduce children to the elements of jazz.

The humorist Sam Levenson, a long-time supporter of the Music Center, was the narrator in both the Britten and Schuller.

In a change of pace from their usual conducting duties, Mr. Leinsdorf and Mr. Wilson played a duo-piano accompaniment to the cello sections performance of "The Swan" from Saint-saens' "Carnival of the Animals."

Beverly Sills' talents were recognized by Erich Leinsdorf long before her current international prominence and she has been a frequent visitor to Tanglewood.

Last night she offered the Czardas from Johann Strauss' Czardas from Johann Strauss', "Die Fledermaus" and Vilia from Lehar's "The Merry Widow." Her brilliant vocalism was matched by her charmingly unaffected stage presence.

The evening concluded with a glorious display of fireworks over the lake adjoining the Tanglewood grounds. It was a fitting ending to what had been a truly gala occasion for all concerned.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Wednesday, August 20, 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF

Concert Review

Tanglewood-On-Parade

By MARTHA deB. BEAVER

The colmination of intensive summer musical studies at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, occurred (and occurs annually) during the day-long Tanglewood-on-Parade Gale. This event benefits and involves all departments of the BMC, and is one that has become a tradition anticipated with great pleasure and a sense of participation in a worthwhile musical happening. A particularly effortless (almost) way to introduce the young, and inexperienced, to the joys of music performed in a variety of mediums:

Threatening weather which expended itself by the opening hour of 2 p.m., evidently kept attendance figures at 4,842, and what a pity!

Activities have been expanded to include the New England Conservatory and Boston University Institutes. Fanfares (percussion and brass usually) sound more often than usual; one by Aaron Copland, called "Fanfare for the Common Man" was heard just before the evening Gala concert at 8, adding to the overall festive atmosphere.

Alternating between Chamber Music Hall, Theatre-Concert Hall, Rehearsal Hall, the lawns, and the Big Shed, students from many states and countries, demonstrated their talents, vocal, instrumental and compositional, to the as varied groups of meandering but definitely interested visitors, in an informal and enjoyable manner. Programs' content leaned toward 20th century composers, and included Contemporary Educational Patterns based on African rhythms (New England Conservatory), exploratory compositions, and jazz improvisations. Boston University's TI Young Artist Orchestra (high school students) gave a commendable concert in the shed, playing Beethoven's Leonore overture, No. 3, Saint-Saens' cello concerto with Richard Weiss, and Stravinsky's Music from Petroushka.

As is customary, picnics, modest and elegant, were in evidence all over the extraordinarily beautiful grounds, another pleasureable part of this unique event.

That evening was my grandson Donald's first attendance at a formal concert. Just 6, he (including others his size) was intent on every move (the fanfare was endured, though "loud," and instrumentally fascinating). He read the "paper" (program) several times in order to know exactly what was happening, clutching his ticket stubs like any good concert-goer. We brought him into the Shed after Leindsdorf's and the BSO's resplendent rendition of Richard Straus' Don Juan.

This was for his special enlightenment from the narration by Sam Levenson of Benjamin Britten's "Young Persons' Guide to the Orchestra." It proved rewarding to him, as well as other young and adults. Harps were easily recognized (they sounded like pianos sometimes) and violins, but cellos took a little longer to identify, whey, we don't know. Later we learned that brother Jamie, 4, (on the lawn) was directing and pantomiming a swan when Charles Wilson and Leinsdorf, at two pianos performed The Swan excerpt from Saint-Saens' "Carnival of the Animals," Mr. Leinsdorf directed (from his piano) Wilson and the eight cellos (sounding like one) involved in this quite lovely transcription.

Following intermission, Leinsdorf thanked all who were responsible for the Berkshire Music Center's success, and presented awards to worthy students. These were: the Koussevitsky Tanglewood Composition prize to Bruno Amato, and the Margaret Grant Memorial Composers' prize to William Douglas. Cynthia Cole, violinist, received the Joseph Silverstein prize, while Juan Ramirez-Hernandez accepted the Henry B. Cabot prize for violin. The Judd Post Memorial prize went to Charlotte Povia, contralto, and the High Fidelity Magazine Award to Richard Taylor, baritone. Steven Dunne received the Gregor Piatagorsky prize for cellist, and David Levine, pianist, the Benjamin H. Delson Memorial prize.

C. D. Jackson prizes went to: Harry Maddox, trombone; Dean Anderson, percussion; Marion Gibson, oboe; Richard Wasley, clarinet; Lewis Ranger, trumpet; Timothy Valentine, oboe; Michael Johns, horn; Paul Berns, percussion. Lawrence Wolf, bass, received the Albert Spalding prize for instrumentalist, while Elvaro Cassuto and Yoau Talsni accepted the Koussevitsky Memorial Conducting prize and Eleanor Crane Memorial prizes.

The Gala Concert's second half then continued with an amusing, appealing, informative and thoughtfully written "Journey into Jazz," directed by the composer, Gunther Schuller, and narrated by Sam Levenson with his own special brand of humorous and sympathetic nuances. Besides the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this featured alto and tenor saxophones Carl Atkins and Jerry Coker; Clark Terry, trumpet; (the tale revolves around this instrument), David Baker, bass, and Mel Lewis, drums.

Personable Beverly Sills then devoted her nationally known vocal talents to Lehar's nostalgic Velia from "The Merry Widow" and Strauss' (Johann) Czardas from "Die Fledermaus," conducted by Charles Wilson with finely integrated balance. After the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" by Wagner, dramatically directed by Leinsdorf, the young and young-at-heart were treated to a dazzling array of fireworks bursting above Stockbridge Bowl (Lake Mahkeenac).

Whitestone

'JOURNEY INTO JAZZ' is conducted by composer Gunther Schuller at last night's "Tanglewood on Parade," with Sam Levenson narrating. A total of 4,842 persons were present for the annual display of talent by the Berkshire Music Center.

Music Review

Tanglewood on Parade

THE ANNUAL "Tanglewood on Parade" is in reality a sort of a graduation exercise ceremony of the Berkshire Music Center, for whose benefit the day is organized and for which the faculty, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the guest artists donate their services. It culminates with a gala concert. My advice would be not to miss it another year if the event is in any way comparable to the one executed yesterday.

The afternoon is a three-ring circus of music with demonstrations of every type of the art in which instruction is given at the Center, from fanfares on the lawns to recitals in the various concert halls of string and woodwind chamber music, orchestra, solos and new compositions, culminating in an evening concert in the Shed. For breadth of comprehension, novelty, education and pure fun, Tanglewood on Parade is not excelled by any other activity of the season, and this includes the Pops.

* * *

ERICH LEINSDORF, the musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began and ended the festivities with Strauss's "Don Juan" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. At intervals during the evening, he appeared as master of ceremonies distributing prizes to the students and also as contortionist-pianist-conductor of the Boston orchestra's cello section doing the Saint-Saens "Swan" from "The Carnival of Animals."

A mere catalogue will register the immense pleasure the variety show afforded all those present and should bring tears to any who stayed away. Benjamin Britten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra" and Gunther Schuller's "Journey Into Jazz" are both for narrator and orchestra and are both unsurpassed for high spirits and whipped cream on vitamins and calories. Charles Wilson conducted the Britten, Schuller did his own, and Sam Levenson was the narrator in both works. Both these numbers may come under the heading of "amusements," which they certainly are, but they are much more. If you like your spring tonic with orange juice or in the antipodal formula, this is an excellent way to take it, at all seasons of the year.

* * *

LEVENSON needs no encomium but his confession, in the program notes, that he started out to be a violinist, is additional support for the felicity of choosing him for last night's job. Furthermore, he added, that his "greatest asset was my phenomenal memory. I made the same mistakes over and over again."

And as the prize which the children search for in their cereal packages, there was the little attraction of a young singer trying to make her way in the musical world: one Beverly Sills doing the "Vilia" from Franz Lehar's "The Merry Widow" and the Czaeda from Johann Strauss's, "Die Fledermaus," with Charles Wilson conducting a very discreet orchestral accompaniment.

* * *

THE INTERNATIONAL star Miss Sills at this point scarcely needs any confirmative tribute but the exquisite artistry she brought to her two light and enchanting excerpts, plus the ravishing appearance she always makes, but added Pelion upon Ossa in the most lavish musical Sybaritism.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 50,100

AUG 20 1969

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 26 1969

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 20 1969

125

400 Students Display Talents At Tanglewood on Parade

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has ~~been given the best of~~ weather this summer for its series of concerts at Tanglewood, but the Berkshire Music Center, at the same address, was graced Tuesday by a beautiful day for its annual display of talent called Tanglewood on Parade.

Give Eight Concerts

There have been three groups hard at work here all summer in the advanced study classes and seminars, about 160 Tanglewood fellows and about 240 college and high school students dancing, singing and playing instruments with the Boston University Tanglewood Institute and the New England Conservatory Tanglewood Institute.

Tuesday in groups of varying size, they gave eight concerts beginning at 2. The gates opened at 1 and the first brass fanfare announcing the start of the festivities was at 1.50. There were listeners waiting at the gates.

The biggest concert started at 8 in the shed and included some illustrious names.

Sam Levenson, former school teacher and present television comedian, narrated Gunther Schuller's "Journey Into Jazz" and Benejamin Britten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra."

Beverly Sills of the New York City Opera and concert houses all over the world (and my favorite soprano sang excerpts from Strauss, "Die Fledermaus" and Lehar's "Merry Widow."

Erich Leinsdorf as well as Gunther Shuller and Charles Wilson conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

5 Jazz Stars

Five illustrious jazz musicians performed in Schuller's "Journey Into Jazz" Carl Atkins, alto sax; Jerry Coker, tenor Sax; Clark Terry, trumpet; David Baker, bass; Mel Lewis, drums.

At one point, for an excerpt from Saint-Saens "Carnival of the Animals," Leinsdorf and Wilson, conductors, played a piano duet with nine members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra cello section.

The muscial day ended after 10 with fireworks high over Lake Mahkeenac, a clear view from the spacious lawns of Tanglewood but not before a lot of beautiful and bizarre music had been heard by 4842 listeners, which was the gate count for the evening concert.

Prizes Announced

The music center's prizes were announced at intermission. There were two composition prizes for Bruno Amato and William Douglas, two prizes for conducting for Elvaro Cassuto and Yoau Talsni, two prizes for singing for Charlotte Povia and Richard Taylor and 13 prizes for instrumentalists for Cynthia Cole, Juan Ramirez-Hernandez, Steven Donne, David Levine, Harry Maddox, Dean Anderson, Marion Gibson, Richard Wasley, Lewis Ranger, Timothy Valentine, Michael Johns, Paul Berns and Lawrence Wolf.

The music heard during the afternoon and evening included all forms and styles and sizes. Composers included, in order of first appearance, Strauss, Bach, Tavel, Bartok, anonymous African, student's improvization and experimentation, Beethoven, Saint-Seans, Stravinsky, Francaix, Mozart, Barber, Poulenc, Menotti, Britten, Moore, Westergaard, Huggler, Copland, Schuller, Lehar and Wayner.

Program to Benefit Berkshire Music Center

LENOX — "Tanglewood-on-Parade," the annual benefit for the Berkshire Music Center, tomorrow presents varied demonstrations by the students and faculty, starting at 2 p.m. in the theater-concent hall. Major orchestral concerts include the Boston University Young Artist Orchestra at 2:30 in the music shed, and Boston Symphony Orchestra at 8.

The latter, after several revisions, offers the orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf, Charles Wilson and Gunther Schuller, also Sam Levenson as narrator for Briten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra" and Schuller's "Journey into Jazz."

Beverly Sills, soprano, will sing numbers from "Die Fledermaus" and "The Merry Widow." Fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl will follow the concert.

Tanglewood On Parade To Benefit Scholarships

Tanglewood On Parade, an all-day program of musical entertainment whose proceeds benefit the Berkshire Music Center's student scholarship fund, began today with a performance by the Berkshire String Chamber Orchestra.

The 2 p.m. event was followed by an appearance of the New England Conservatory Tanglewood Institute at 2:15 and the Boston University Young Artists Orchestra at 2:30.

A Composers' Forum began at 3:15 with the BU Tanglewood Institute's demonstration scheduled for 4; an opera at 4:30; fanfare at 5:50; a concert by the Berkshire Music Center's winds and brass sections; and a final fanfare at 7:50.

A sequence of "Gala Concerts," beginning at 8, will conclude the day's program. A multiple of artists and conductors will perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

~~Scheduled~~ concerts include: "Don Juan" by Strauss conducted by Eric Leinsdorf; "Young Person's Guide To The Orchestra" by Britten with Charles Wilson conducting and narration by Sam Levenson; "The Swam" from "Carnivals of the Animals" by Saint-Saens, conducted by Gunther Schuller and narrated by Levenson.

Schuller will also direct his own composition, "Journey Into Jazz." Under the baton of Conductor Wilson, soprano Beverly Sills will sing "Chardes," a selection from the opera "Die Fledermaus" by Strauss and "Velia" from Lehar's "The Merry Widow".

A fireworks display will conclude the evening's activities.

Leindorf will conduct his final concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Sunday at 2:30. The program features "The Royal Hunt and Storm" from Berlioz's "The Trojans" and Beethoven's "Symphony No. 9."

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 18 1969

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

AUG 19 1969

126

Baldwin Grants Fellowships At Berkshire Music Center

Wulsin Fellowships were awarded by Baldwin Piano & Organ Co. this summer to four piano students at the 1969 session of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass. This year's recipients are F. John Adams, Ron Daniels, David Levine, and Idith Zvi. The annual scholarships are presented by Baldwin in memory of the late Lucien Wulsin, longtime Baldwin president. The Berkshire Music Center is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer educational center for the advanced study of music.

J. John Adams, vocal coach and vocal pianist at the Center, received both his Bachelor and Master of Music degrees from Harvard University. He was accompanist and later assistant conductor of the Harvard Glee Club and was also chosen organist for the First International University Choral Festival. He has studied abroad with Nadia Boulanger and at Harvard with Elliot Forbes.

Ron Daniels, from Portola Valley, Calif., has attended both San Francisco State College and San Francisco Conservatory of Music. He is affiliated with the San Francisco Conservatory Artists Ensemble and the Richmond Symphony Chorus.

David Levine, from Brooklyn, N. Y., has studied at the Academia Chigiana and the Manhattan School of Music. Currently Mr. Levine is studying with Claude Frank and Richard Goode at Mannes College of Music.

Idith Zvi is from Israel where she studied at the Samuel Rubin Academy in Tel-Aviv. Presently she is studying with Claude Frank at Mannes College of Music. In the summer of 1968 she was a participant in the Marlboro Music Festival.

THE FOUR 1969 WULSIN FELLOWS at Tanglewood receive the congratulations of Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center, and Jack Romann, Baldwin concert and artist manager. From left to right are F. John Adams, Ron Daniels. Mr. Schuller, Idith Zvi, David Levine, and Mr. Romann. The fellowships are awarded each summer to students at the Center by Baldwin Piano & Organ Company in honor of the firm's late president Lucien Wulsin, Sr.

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC FESTIVAL

'Wozzeck' Will Get Plenty of Critical Attention

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

A record number of music critics will review Alban Berg's controversial opera, "Wozzeck," given in a concert version by members of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood on Monday evening, Aug. 11.

It marks the opening of the Music Critics Association's annual convention at Tanglewood.

"Wozzeck" had much the same traumatic effect on its first audiences in 1925 as Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" in 1913.

Difficulties

The entire score of "Wozzeck", atonal without adhering to the 12-tone technique, is organized in abstract musical forms. It is a story of romantic unfaithfulness, murder and suicide.

After 45 years, it's nonsense to review "Wozzeck" as a "contemporary" work. But the heinous difficulties of performing it are just as great.

One of its leading singers (a tenor) told us recently of the frustrations involved. There are not only the pure mechanics of singing it, but its preparation by several conductors.

"I wish they'd get together with Erich Leinsdorf, who is going to conduct the actual performance," said the tenor, "and find out exactly what he expects."

It will be performed in the huge music shed in a semi-dramatic fashion with minimum props and no curtain.

What has happened in composition since 1925 has made "Wozzeck" virtually immune to critical harpoons.

After its Berlin premiere, one critic wrote, "As I left the State Opera last night, I had a sensation of not coming out of a public institution, but out of an insane asylum."

A distinguished New York critic said, "It is my private opinion that Berg is just a bluff. But even if he isn't, it is impossible to deny that his music (?) is a soporific, by the side of which the telephone book is a strong cup of coffee."

Tuesday night, Aug. 12, the critics will attend a performance by the Fillmore and Joshua Light Show. The next night they're scheduled to hear the Berkshire Center's performance of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat."

Activities

Between these delights, the critics will resort to panel discussions, matters pertaining to their new magazine, American Musical Digest, and a debate with various conductors.

Incidentally, the magazine has just been awarded a grant of $115,000 from National Endowment of the Arts with which to function for a one-year period.

One member has facetiously suggested that one session be entitled "The Twilight of the Music Critics — Kritikdammerung?"

It's a parody of "Gotterdammerung" by Richard Wagner who would have been in complete accord with title and implication.

A SPECIAL EVENING in memory of Ruth St. Denis will be tonight in the Ted Shawn Theater at Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival. Host is Walter Terry, dance critic of the Saturday Review whose topic is "We celebrate Ruth St. Denis — We do not Mourn Her."

Films will show Miss St. Denis' career from teenager to dowager dancer. Her husband, Ted Shawn, until recently confined to a hospital in Pittsfield, is scheduled to speak.

Shawn went into the hospital one-and-a-half hours before the opening of his 37th season, the first he'd ever missed. He was hospitalized for treatment of an infection in the bronchial tubes causing a cough that wouldn't stop.

WHAT IS DESCRIBED as "the first concert hall built exclusively for chamber music in New York City" will open Sept. 11 by a number of participants including violinist James Oliver Buswell IV who played in Worcester's Community Concerts in 1967.

The Alice Tully Hall, seating 1,096, is located in the Juilliard School building, Lincoln Center.

A HIGHLY disenchanting sight at Worcester Auditorium in 1947 was organist Richard Ellsasser's traipse across the stage in a cape that was prudently discarded when he reached the console.

The flowing cloak would have hampered Leo Sowerby's pedal concerto, "Pageant." It requires the playing of several hundred notes with the footsies in a couple of minutes.

Ellsasser has improved his act. He is to play at the Hammond Muesum in Gloucester, Wednesday, and the program will include his own Concert Study in D minor, based on a theme by Pietro Yon, late organist of St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York.

It is announced that Ellsasser will play 3,000 pedal notes in three minutes. Those with a view may count them to make certain that there's no hanky-panky about it.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 20 1969

New England News

Electronic Music, Too

Festival Features Varied Program

Electronic music, chamber and orchestral work, and opera and dance selections will all be presented during the 1969 Festival of Contemporary Music being co-sponsored for the sixth year by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Premiere Works

The festival, featuring premiere works specially commissioned by BMC and Fromm, will run from July 30 through Aug. 3 and Aug. 11 through 18 at Tanglewood.

The schedule is as follows: July 30, Gunther Schuller conducts BMC with works by Halffter and premiere piece, "Event II," by Theodore Antoniou; July 31 and Aug. 13, chamber music and premiere of dance work, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," with Michael Tilson Thomas conductor; Aug. 3, chamber music; Aug. 11 and 17, Erich Leinsdorf conducts the BMC Orchestra and Vocal Fellows in complete performances of Alban Berg's opera, "Wozzeck,"; Aug. 13, Stravinsky ballet, "L'Histore du Soldat," with Mr. Leinsdorf conductor; Aug. 14, chamber music and premiere works by Edwin Dugger and Phillip Rhodes, with Mr Schuller, Mr. Thomas and Paul Zufofsky conductors.

All concerts will be at 9 p.m., except for an all-electronic program to be presented on the lawn Aug. 16 at 4:30. The festival will conclude with a music forum by composers studying at BMC. This is slated for Aug. 18 at 9.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 26 1969

New ballet at Tanglewood

James Waring's new ballet, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," will have its premiere at Tanglewood at 9 a.m. July 31, on a program of contemporary music.

Set to a score by Robert Ceely of the New England Conservatory, the ballet will be performed and designed by students at Indian Hill, a summer arts workshop in Stockbridge.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 23 1969

New England News

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 28 1969

Contemporary Festival to Open

LENOX — The 1969 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored for the sixth year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented in two parts this year. The first is from tomorrow through Sunday, and the second, from August 11 through 18. Electronic music, chamber and orchestral music, opera and dance will be presented.

On Aug. 11 and Aug. 17, Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center (BMC), will conduct two complete performances of Alban Berg's opera, "Wozzeck" with the BMC Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is preparing the singers. On Aug. 13, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Stravinsky's ballet "L'Histoire du Soldat" with choreography by Joseph Gifford and stage direction by Ronald Irving.

Four BMC-Fromm commissions will be premiered. On Wednesday, Theodore Antoniou's "Events II" will be heard on a BMC Orchestra program conducted by Gunther Schuller, head of Contemporary Music Activities at BMC. On Thursday and Aug. 13, Robert Ceely's dance, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with choreography by James Waring. On Aug. 14, Phillip Rhodes' Autumn Setting will be premiered on a chamber music program which will also include Edwin Dugger's Intermezzi. Gunther Schuller will conduct the Dugger work.

Tanglewood Pioneers New Music

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Beginning next Sunday and continuing through Aug. 24, some 400 students from the United Stated and many foreign countries will be doing graduate study at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood.

Here is where the real musical news is made at Tanglewood.

It is the Berkshire Music Center, educational department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that uses all of Tanglewood's facilities.

Contemporary music is premiered and created at the center.

This summer the Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored jointly by the center and Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, will be presented in two parts, July 29-Aug. 2 and Aug. 11-17.

New Music Commissioned

Composers Theodore Antoniou, Robert Ceely, Edwin Dugger and Phillip Rhodes have been commissioned to write new works to be premiered during the "Festival within a Festival."

The Berkshire Center will present its own festival, exceeding in number of concerts the Berkshire Music Festival by the Boston Spmphony.

These Center concerts are available to "Friends of the Berkshire Music Center," who contribute varying amounts toward its maintenace.

Of the 400 students attending this summer's session 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. These fellowships, from $450 upward, are provided from various sources including Young Artists Awards, operated in Worcester.

Also Art, Theater, and Dance

The fellowship program provides instruction and coaching by members of the Boston Symphony and a distinguished guest faculty for young instrumentalists, singers, composers and conductors who have completed their formal training and are embarking on professional careers.

Four-, six-, and eight-week programs will also be offered by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music.

Boston University's Tanglewood Institute offers programs in music, art, theater and dance. The Conservatory's programs are in contemporary composition, jazz and music education.

The Berkshire Center will offer a full schedule of orchestra, chamber music and composers' forum concerts through the summer.

In addition, members of the Vocal Fellowship program will appear as soloists in the Boston Symphony's concert performance of Verdi's "Otello," conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in July 26.

A JUNIOR VERSION of the Tanglewood Center will be in progress from July 7 to Aug. 1 at Barlin Acres, the sumptuous 400-acre estate in Boylston, once a home of the late George Sumner Barton, Worcester industrialist.

Conducted as a music camp, it will offer a wide variety of instruction and opportunities for group participation to boys and girls from 10 to 17.

Purpose of the new music center is to stimulate talent in children and young people in natural surroundings where recreation, nature study, arts and crafts are all a part of the campers' daily routine.

The music camp's director is Owen F. Ryder. Choral music and music appreciation will be taught by Rev. Arthur A. Ouillette.

Ernest J. Reopel Jr. is band director. Other faculty members are Sister Mary Barbara, S.M., piano; Joan L. Sheary, dance; George Lessard, brass instruments; Leo P. Boucher, strings; Mrs. Jean M. Davis, musical theory; Stephen Barnicle, general music, theory and recorder, and Ralph Pupkar, athletic director.

Futher information may be obtained by contacting Miss Gloria M. Fontaine. Barlin Acres Music Camp, 51 Elm St., Worcester 01609, Tel. 791-7171, Ext. 74.

TWO FORMER WORCESTER organists are among the 12 who will present a series of summer concerts on the famed instrument in Methuen Memorial Music Hall.

John Ogasapian, now organist and choirmaster at St. Anne's Episcopal Church in Lowell and assistant professor of music at Lowell State College, will be heard on July 16.

Philip Beaudry's recital is scheduled for Aug. 27. He is now a pipe organ builder in Malden, Mass., and a former organist of First Baptist Church in Boston.

There is an admission charge of $1.50 except to sustaining members.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUN 22 1969

New England

128

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 35,500

JUL 31 1969

FESTIVAL 'OTELLO'

Over the next couple of weeks, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, with the help of the Fromm Foundation and under the guidance of Gunther Schuller, will feature a good deal of new or almost new music. In this series, there will also be two classics from the early part of this century, Berg's "Wozzeck" (August 11 and 17) and Stravinsky's "Histoire du Soldat," both with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the professional-student forces of the Berkshire Music Center.

Otherwise, Tanglewood [illegible] usual [illegible]

Tanglewood to Debut 'Aggressive' Score

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — "Music has to be for the audience, but I don't know how to do it," said Theodore Antoniou, composer, in the cafeteria at Tanglewood. "I have t odo it my way. It's an emotional thing."

Performance Tonight

He was talking about his approach to the fulfillment of A commission for a new piece he had written for performance tonight in the theater-concert hall as part of the opening program of the Festival of Contemporary Music.

Antoniou is one of several composers who have written new pieces for the festival under commission by the Fromm Foundation and the Berkshire Music Center.

He is one of the new breed of innovators in sound in that his music sounds chaotic to listeners thoroughly conditioned by traditionalism. He reluctantly concedes that his music might be called post-serial. Like most artists, he objects to fixed classifications.

His new piece is called "Events II," and is scored for full orchestra. It will be conducted tonight by Gunther Schuller.

Theater News and Views

Not Confined

To try to describe it would be senseless. It is much too complex. But some of its Aspects may be identified. Antoniou says, of the forthcoming performance, "It will be very aggressive."

His reference to the style, "post-serial," indicates that he uses (sometimes) 12-tone rows as kernels from which to develop sequences without feeling obliged to be confined by the rows; it means, also, that he makes extensive use of percussive instruments.

Especially evident to the tender ears of those not Acquainted with what has been happening to new serious music in recent years, the young composers' entrancement with highly complex rhythms and tone colors and their lack of interest in melody and harmony except as something to be Avoided.

Old structural forms are anathema to the new breed. Often they invent their own musical forms, and frequently, as in Antoniou's case, they use the germ of musical materials on which a piece might be based to generate its own form.

Serious Approach

The few words of description with which Antoniou prefaces his orchestral score for "Events, II" are an indication of the seriousness with which young composers plan works which sound mixed-up to casual concert-goers.

But before I quote them, I'll list some of the ideas, materials and techniques with which Antoniou is concerned in his combinations:

Asymetric rhythms, spontaneous improvisation, movement of apparent sound source within the orchestra, different ways of playing the same instrument, instrumental dialogues, electronic modulations, stereophonic movement of sound around the audience, expression of linguistic phenomena in musical form (i.e., alliteration, anagrams), musical parody, "abstract folklore," extreme limits of instrumental sound, musical interpretation of Op art, parallel and constrasting juxtaposition of light with sound; silence, "total concert" . . . combined light, movement, Sound, audience involvement; "controlled noise."

Born In Greece

Antoniou is 34, bushy-haired, born in Greece, speaks four languages, short, unmarried, articulate and talkative, very energetic and enthusiastic, amiable and quick to laugh, intensely serious about his music but easy for a conductor to negotiate with, quick witted, highly intelligent. . ... busy.

Here are the notes he has written for the three sections of his "Events II," the latest of about 35 works composed for all instrumental and vocal combinations since 1961. . . .

"Events, musical and otherwise, determine the technique, form and general function of all elements of the piece. At some level musical and extra-musical ideas are integrated.

"Organized Noise"

"I. Antitheta (antithetics); material in antithesis. Sustained sounds simultaneously with polyrhythmic sections in extreme dynamics. Contolled improvisations against strict in-tempo passages.

"II. Homonyma (homonyms): different senses expressed by analogous forms. A continuous 'organized noise 'as a ——— background accompanies an abstract dirge.

III. Antinoma (antinomies): the optional tape consists of electronic modulations and mixtures in (8) different languages of the homonymous document-collage poem by Nanos Valaoritis. Sound events from polyrhythmic structures appear each time in different length, articulation, synchronization and character."

THEODORE ANTONIOU

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 30 1969

Work composed by Amherst residents to premiere August 14 at Tanglewood

Amherst Record, Wednesday, July 9, 1969 8

847

An Amherst minister's wife and a young professor have been making beautiful music together. This writer-composer duo is Pat Schneider, wife of the Rev. Peter Schneider of Wesley Methodist Church, and musician Phillip Rhodes, who spent this past school year teaching at Amherst College.

Their current work, "Autumn Setting," a piece for soprano and string quartet, will be premiered at Tanglewood on August 14. It will be presented at Amherst College in December with Phyllis Brynjulson and the Vaghi String Quartet.

PAT SCHNEIDER

The accomplishments of these two artists take on added merit when you learn that Rhodes is only 29, Pat Schneider just a few years more. They met when the composer and his wife joined the Methodist Church. When Rhodes received a commission from the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, he asked to see some of Mrs. Schneider's poetry for possible use as a text.

"Pat is one of the finest musical poets I ever ran across," says Rhodes. "She's very quick and very good." The admiration is mutual.

TRAVELING SALESMAN

Phillip Rhodes' musical career began in Forest City, North Carolina when a traveling salesman sold him a clarinet. He joined school bands and was encouraged by his high school band director. Today, Rhodes is a strong advocate of public school music programs.

For the past year, Rhodes, his wife Jane and daughter Anna, 3, made their home at 522 S. Pleasant Street. Rhodes has high praise for his year in Amherst. Both he and his wife liked the town very much. He added that this area of the country has advantages for a professional musician because Boston, New York, Tanglewood, Yale and Marlboro are all within reasonable distance. He hopes to return to Amherst for the December performance of "Autumn Setting."

Referring to Amherst College, Rhodes says, "I've never been, seen or heard of any place I'd rather teach." He stated that the school had many good musicians, interested students and a fine chairman of the music department.

For the next two years, Rhodes will work in Louisville, Kentucky as composer-in-residence. He will compose for the city's ballet, opera, orchestra and theater. His first year's schedule includes a ballet score and a series of short pieces with the Louisville Orchestra for educational TV. His second year will include a full-scale opera for which he has asked Pat Schneider to write the libretto. His work in Louisville is part of a program funded by the Ford Foundation and administered by the Contemporary Music Project of the Music Educators National Conference in Washington, D. C.

TALENT AS A CHILD

Pat Schneider's career can be traced to her childhood in St. Louis. Her mother, who had little money for plays and concerts, consciously read and recited poetry to her family. Pat developed a love of verse and was writing several poems a day by the time she was ten. This talented poetess is today a devoted mother, wife and churchwoman. She has three children: Becky 10, Laurel 8, and Paul 6. Her typewriter rests in the kitchen where she handles cooking and writing with equal ease.

Her work to date includes a good deal of poetry, and plays that have been performed in east and west coast locations and on TV. This past year, she was a teaching assistant at UMass, where she is studying theater. In addition, Mrs. Schneider has written a Christmas drama for which she has asked Rhodes to write music. "I love 'Amahl,'" she says, "but I think we should be able to see something else on TV too."

Then there is the opera with Rhodes. Pat says it is the biggest opportunity she ever had, and that it scares her! She describes Rhodes' music as fantastically difficult to perform. She feels it is gifted with both the strangeness of new sound and appeal to the ear.

Mrs. Schneider agress with drama critics who regard the church as a prime source of new life for the theater. She sees economic and thematic problems leading the commercial theater to emphasize sex rather than sexuality and violence rather than conflict. She believes that people have a need to be affirmative and that they will find the freedom for this in church-centered productions.

Mrs. Schneider believes that any valid outlook, even critical, should have a commitment behind it. Visitors at the big, rambling parsonage on Pleasant Court learn that she expresses this philosophy not only in her writing, but in her everyday life too. She is a valuable addition to the Amherst community.

-- Ruth Miller

PHILLIP RHODES

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,342

JUL 9 1969

Notes on Music and Dance

Contemporary Festival Opens

The sixth annual Contemporary Music Festival at Tanglewood opens tonight at 9 o'clock with Gunther Schuller conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in a program that includes "Events II' by Theodore Antoniou, one of four commissioned works to be premiered during the festival.

The Contemporary Music Festival is jointly sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation. This season it will be presented in two parts, the first running through Sunday, August 3, and the second running August 11 through August 18.

OTHER PREMIERES will be Robert Creely's dance "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" with choreography by James Waring on August 13; Phillip Rhoads' "Autumn Setting" on August 14 and Edwin Dugger's "Intermezzi," also on August 14.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Vocal Fellows on August 11 and August 17 in two full performances of Berg's opera "Wozzeck." On August 13 he will conduct Stravinsky's ballet "L'Histoire du Soldat" with choreography by Joseph Gifford.

The full listing of concerts, with times and places, may be obtained through the Berkshire Music Center. Tickets are on sale at the box office.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

JUL 30 1969

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

JUL 31 1969

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

JUL 31 1969

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

JUL 31 1969

Resident scores new ballet

Tanglewood, in Lenox, will offer the first dance program in its history on Thursday, July 31. The program will feature a new ballet, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum", choreographed by James Waring, with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

The score, by Robert Ceely of Brookline and the New England Conservatory of Music, was especially commissioned for the annual festival of contemporary chamber music. Dancers and scenic collaborators are from Indian Hill, a summer arts workshop in Stockbridge.

The ballet will be repeated on a second program in the theater at Tanglewood on Wednesday, Aug. 13.

Contemporary Music Set at Berkshire Fete

The 1969 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored for the sixth year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented in two parts.

The first is from Tuesday, July 29 through Sunday, August 3, and the second, from Monday, August 11 through Monday, August 18. Electronic music, chamber and orchestral music, opera and dance will be presented.

On Monday, August 11 and Sunday August 17, Erich Leinsdorf, Director of the Berkshire Music Center (BMC) will conduct two complete performances of Alban Berg's opera Wozzeck with the BMC Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is preparing the singers.

On Wednesday, August 13, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Stravinsky's ballet "L'Histoire du Soldat" with choreography by Joseph Gifford and stage direction by Ronald Irving.

Four BMC-Fromm commissions will be premiered. On Wednesday, July 30, Theodore Antoniou's "Events II" will be heard on a BMC Orchestra program conducted by Gunther Schuller, Head of Contemporary Music Activities at BMC. On Thursday, July 31 and Wednesday, August 13, Robert Ceely's dance, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with choreography by James Waring. On Thursday, August 14, Phillip Rhodes' "Autumn Setting" will be premiered on a chamber music program which will also include Edwin Dugger's "Intermezzi". Gunther Schuller will conduct the Dugger work.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516

JUL 31 1969

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

JUL 31 1969

TIMES
WOBURN, MASS.
(E) 9,470

JUL 29 1969

Exposure to the New

LENOX — Since 1963 the Fromm Music Foundation has been to Tanglewood a 'festival within a festival,' generously supporting its week-long confrontation with contemporary music.

This summer's series began Wednesday night with a concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under Gunther Schuller, and as in the past the evening proved most valuable in letting us meet pieces previously unknown.

There's much to be said for 'Events II,' a joint commission given by the BMC and Fromm Foundation and written this year by Theodore Antoniou, an Athenian born in 1935. 'Antithetics' 'A Homonyms' and 'Antimonies' are the three contrasting 'Events', each of which is a musical realization of its titles. Throughout the three, 'Antoniou shows a marvelous ear for the distinctive timbral tastes of his instruments, and a sure knowledge of how to combine them to stunning effect.

And though he has a fine feel for colors, the pieces are never merely decorative, but scored at times with a crude gustiness and at times with delicacy, always with personality and purpose.

ANTONIOU has as well, a natural and persuasive-rhythmic sense, a sure formal grasp, and real compositional skill (how intelligently and responsibly—for example he uses the littel motvie that permeates the third piece—a consecutive second and fourth).

I felt however, that his gift for the dramatic gesture is much stronger than his feel for the lyric. It's not only that the kernal idea of the middle 'event is less personal than the conceptions of the outer ones — it's a dirge played by different instruments over a background of string sound'—but that the melodic material itself is somehow pale and lacking the character and consistency of the bordering movements.

Cristobal Halffter, born in Madrid in 1930, seems the most skillful adapter of modern modes. His 'Five Microformos' which I heard several seasons ago, immediately suggested the Schoenberg 'Five Pieces' as their source—and his 'Lines and Points' which Wednesday was given its first American performance by Schuller and Co., is indebted to Penderecki and the tonal waves and washed that have been pouring out of Poland since the early '60's.

As these pieces generally go, 'Lines and Points' is well put together, obviously the product of much care and thought. But except for a brief section that slowly and cumulatively builds from a single flute sonority I felt little direction to the piece and saw little reason why any two minute chunk say, couldn't have been lifted from its context and placed elsewhere without apparent damage. This may show insensitivity on my part, but I can't see that Halffter's work is other than overly self-serious and ultimately boring.

THE OTHER unknown piece was by the 37-year-old Peter Tod Lewis who in the fall will become director of the electronic studio at the University of Iowa.

His 'Images' is an empty and foolish composition — a highly conventional piece pretending to be modern. Lewis has dipped thrice into James Agee's memorable 'Let Us Now Praise Famous Men' and come up with three excerpts each of which he follows with a musical statement that attempts, I suppose to capture the poetic sense of the prose.

The readings I found far less meaningful than I remember them to be in their original context, and the music impresses me as being fundamentally dishonest in its sham modernity.

Under Schuller the BMC Orchestra did its best work of the season though in the Halffter there was so little attention paid to dynamics that the important voice was often buried.

Schuller himself did wonderful work, giving readings full of integrity and musicality and kind that keep this festival so worthwhile.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 3 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
AUG 2 1969
New England

Leinsdorf to Conduct at Festival

DANIEL BARENBOIM is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood as guest conductor today at 2:30.

The 1969 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored for the sixth year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will present electronic music, chamber and orchestral music, opera and dance.

On Monday, August 11, and Sunday, August 17, Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center (BMC) will conduct two complete performances of Alban Berg's opera Wozzeck with the BMC Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. Charlie Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is preparing the singers. On Wednesday, August 13, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Stravinsky's ballet L'Histoire du Soldat with Choreography by Joseph Gifford and stage direction by Ronald Irving.

On Wednesday, Aug. 13, Robert Ceely's dance, Beyond the Ghost Spectrum will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with choreography by James Waring. On Thursday Aug. 14, Phillip Rhodes' Autumn Setting will be premiered on a chamber music program which will also include Edwin Dugger's Intermezzi. Gunther Schuller will conduct the Dugger work.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934
AUG 5 1969

TURNTABLE and PODIUM

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Part of the Festival of Contemporary Music being held at Tanglewood this past week and next week is a pair of concert performances of Berg's magnum opus, the opera Wozzeck. The concert performances will be given next Monday and Sunday evenings at 9 p.m. (Aug. 11 and 17) at the Music Shed.

* * *

For the occasions Erich Leinsdorf will conduct students enrolled in the Berkshire Music Center summer school.

Leinsdorf has distinguished himself in various performances of the suite of music Berg excerpted from the opera, and if the quality of his conducting of the complete opera approaches the fabulous way he does the suite, then both performances promise to be really something.

Wozzeck is the only contemporary opera to have secured a position in the operatic repertory. It is an amazing work, notable not only for its musical strengths but for adaptation of the libretto, psychological insight, and a daring dramatic realism that is truly thought-provoking.

* * *

I would go so far as to say that nothing in the piece is less than fantastic, not the least of which is the source of Berg's inspiration, namely Georg Buechner's drama. Written almost 150 years ago, it anticipates by about five generations the psychoanalytic hang-ups clarified by Freud. Not a single person in the opera is "normal," all are mildly insance or merely neurotic.

When one considers Buechner wrote such a drama at the time of his 20th birthday (he lived to be only 23) less than a decade after the death of Beethoven, one perceives how ahead of his time the playwright was.

* * *

Berg's adaptation cuts Buechner's drama from 23 scenes to 15, but the condensation produces, if anything, an even more potent realization of the grisly plot.

What is so amazing is Berg's musical treatment. Although ostensibly composed in Schoenberg's 12-tone idiom, the musical forms are nothing less than fugues, variations, inventions, and other remote classical structures. For the most part the music doesn't sound astringent or piercing, it somehow comes off as heady and romantic, and in one spot absolutely beautiful.

At all times the music seems subordinated to the story-line, faithfully reflecting the aberrations of the characters or describing the "lives of quiet desperation" each person leads in his struggle for survivial.

* * *

The music, of course, is considerably more important than most people notice. There is not a note that is superfluous or a part that doesn't belong. The astounding thing is Berg's solid construction, whose cumulative energies find their only possible logical and dramatic conclusions by the close of the work.

Boris Goldovsky once likened the opera to a bridge or a cathedral, whose physical dimensions produced a state of awe in the perceiver whether or not he understood the laws of physics that made the constructions possible.

That's the way it is with Wozzeck: subconsciously, Berg prepares you for certain episodes, and when they finally occur, feelings of destiny and penultimate resolution are evoked in the listener. Such a moment occurs in the death scene, which Berg prepares by quoting a single note, B-natural.

This consistent reference finds its harmonic destiny with a resolution to C after Wozzeck has killed Marie. But Berg doesn't stop there, he brings the B-natural back to haunt Wozzeck (the blood scene, the transition to the inn) until finally Wozzeck commits suicide.

Whatever you do, don't miss this fantastic work, it promises to be the highlight of the entire Tanglewood season.

Musical Festival

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — The 1969 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored for the sixth year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented in two parts. The first is from Tuesday, July 29 through Sunday, August 3, and the second, from Monday, August 11 through Monday, August 18. Electronic music, chamber and orchestral music, opera and dance will be presented.

On Monday, August 11 and Sunday August 17, Erich Leinsdorf, Director of the Berkshire Music Center (BMC) will conduct two complete performances of Alban Berg's opera Wozzeck with the BMC Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is preparing the singers. On Wednesday, August 13, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Stravinsky's ballet L Histoire du Soldat with Choreography by Joseph Gifford and stage direction by Ronald Irving.

FOSTER'S DEMOCRAT
DOVER, N. H.
(E) 15,450
AUG 7 1969

BARRAQUE POWER

Jean Barraque (imagine an acute accent on the final "e"—The Voice's printer doesn't have one) has embarked on a vast opus that he says may take his lifetime to complete—"La Mort de Virgile," a cantata based on Hermann Broch's correspondingly entitled German-language work. "Chant apres chant," the first installment of this cantata, was given its first American performance at Tanglewood (Lenox, Massachusetts) on August 3 as part of the Festival of Contemporary Music produced jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Foundation. Gunther Schuller, head of the center's contemporary-music fellowship program, conducted a team consisting of soprano Elsa Charlston, pianist Frederick Rzewski, and percussionists Dean Anderson, Paul Berns, Peter Carnevale, Joseph Conti, Linda Raymond, and John Soroka. The percussion instruments total 104.

The sung text, including considerable additions by the composer to Albert Kohn's French translation of Broch, deals with dreams, nightmares, and mental self-torture. And the 23-minute span of the music, filled on every page with the subtlest gradations of dynamic, attack, and timbre, reaches, despite all the subtlety, peaks of shattering force. The combination of sheer physical power and discipline is astonishing. Furthermore, there are soft, transparent distribution: vibraphones, marimba, and such, clearly of the order of delicacy typical of much in Boulez and casting a line of tradition all the way back to the Schoenberg of "Pierrot Lunaire."

On top of all that, the soprano vocal line, containing as it does such bel-canto machinery as trills and staccato runs, packs more conspicuously a built-in emotional charge of high-and-low-dynamic intensities so cannily used for purposes of "theatre" that it suggests Barraque may one day be regarded as the Space-Age Verdi.

I couldn't stay in the Berkshires until the actual public performance Sunday night, but a late-afternoon no-stopping final rehearsal, preceded by some wonderfully useful (to me) repeats of several passages, gave a great deal to ponder.

First of all, there was Miss Charlston's sense of pitch, especially on her entrances, most of which are not led by any pitched instruments. Then there was Mr. Rzewski's thunderously virtuoso bursts of pianism, not to mention the percussion group's alternating power and delicacy, or Mr. Schuller's balancing of tremendously pounding chord-rhythm structures and his command of the finest details.

Earlier in the afternoon at Tanglewood, the usual picnickers gathered in and around the 6000-seat Music Shed to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Daniel Barenboim in a program full of young, fresh views of some well-worn but mostly still alive music. First, Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture went its nicely paced way. Then Mr. Barenboim's wife, Jacqueline du Pre, played her super-romantic, super-virtuoso, and just plain super interpretation of Elgar's Cello Concerto. The young lady made her cello sing with a full, rich voice that first theme that sounds like a barcarolle shipped off to an Edwardian countryside. Her vigor in the allegro molto that ends the first half of the concerto drew audible "Brava's" from the orchestra members, and the whole performance was a love. Mr. Barenboim, after intermission accomplished some kind of miracle by making the most over-worked piece in the repertory, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, sound interesting to jaded ears. This had a lot to do with the young conductor's fresh ideas about heroic accent and genuine pianissimo and with the broad tempo of the finale up to a really whipped-up coda.

—Leighton Kerner

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 35,500
AUG 7 1969

Interesting Variety At Tanglewood

The sixth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins tomorrow evening, Aug. 8 at 9 p.m., when Karel Ancerl, Music Director of the Toronto Symphony, conducts the complete tone-poem cycle, "Ma Vlast" (My Country), by the czechoslavakian composer, Bendrick Smetana.

The following evening, Saturday, Aug. 9 at 8 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts Brahms' Piano concerto no. 1 with Van Cliburn as soloist. The remainder of the program includes Debussy's "Three nocturnes" with the Women of the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir and Kurt Weill's "Suite from the Threepenny Opera."

On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 10 at 2:30 p.m. Josef Krips, renowned Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, conducts Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Schubert's Symphony no. 9.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday, Aug. 8 at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for ticket holders for the 9 p.m. concert, features the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, an ensemble made up of the principals of the Orchestra and guest artists, playing music by Blacher and Thuille.

On Monday, Aug. 11 and Sunday Aug. 17, Erich Leinsdorf, Director of the Berkshire Music Center will conduct two complete performances of Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck" with the BMC Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is preparing the singers. On Wednesday, Aug. 13, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Stravinsky's ballet "L"Histoire du Soldat" with Choreography by Joseph Gifford and Stage direction by Ronald Irving.

Three BMC-Fromm commissions will be premiered. On Wednesday, Aug. 13, Robert Ceely's dance, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with choreography by James Waring. On Thursday Aug. 14, Phillip Rhodes' "Autumn Setting" will be premiered on a chamber music program which will also include Edwin Dugger's "Intermezzi." Gunther Schuller will conduct the Dugger work.

The fifth and final performance in this season's "Contemporary Trends" concerts at Tanglewood will be held Tuesday, Aug. 12 at 8 p.m. A special program that night will be "Bill Graham presents FROM THE FILLMORE: with Jefferson Airplane, B.B. King, and as special guest stars, The Who, with the Joshua Light Show."

TIMES REPORTER
BELLOWS FALLS, VERMONT
4,768
AUG 8 1969

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
AUG 7 1969

Contemporary music

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. - The 1969 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored for the sixth year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, is being presented in two parts. The second is from Monday, Aug. 11, through Monday, Aug. 18. Electronic music, chamber and orchestral music, opera and dance will be presented.

On Monday, Aug. 11, and Sunday, Aug. 17, Erich Leinsdorf, Director of the Berkshire Music Center (BMC) will conduct two complete performances of Alban Bert's opera "Wozzeck" with the BMC Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is preparing the singers. On Wednesday, Aug. 13, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Stravinsky's ballet "L'Histoire du Soldat" with Choreography by Joseph Gifford and stage direction by Ronald Irving.

On Wednesday, Aug. 13, Robert Ceely's dance, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with choreography by James Waring. On Thursday, Aug. 14, Phillip Rhodes' "Autumn Setting" will be premiered on a chamber music program which will also include Edwin Dugger's "Intermezzi." Gunther Schuller will conduct the Dugger work.

Exposure to the New

LENOX — Since 1963 the Fromm Music Foundation has been to Tanglewood a 'festival within a festival' generously supporting its week-long confrontation with contemporary music.

This summer's series began Wednesday night with a concert by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under Gunther Schuller, and as in the past the evening proved most valuable in letting us meet pieces previously unknown.

There's much to be said for 'Events II,' a joint commission given by the BMC and Fromm Foundation and written this year by Theodore Antoniou, an Athenian born in 1935. 'Antithetics' 'A Homonyms' and 'Antimonies' are the three contrasting 'Events' each of which is a musical realization of its titles. Throughout the three, 'Antoniou shows a marvelous ear for the distinctive timbral tastes of his instruments, and a sure knowledge of how to combine them to stunning effect.

And though he has a fine feel for colors, the pieces are never merely decorative, but scored at times with a crude gustiness and at times with delicacy, always with personality and purpose.

ANTONIOU has as well, a natural and persuasive-rhythmic sense, a sure formal grasp, and real compositional skill (how intelligently and responsibly—for example he uses the littel motvie that permeates the third piece—a consecutive second and fourth).

I felt however, that his gift for the dramatic gesture is much stronger than his feel for the lyric. It's not only that the kernal idea of the middle 'event is less personal than the conceptions of the outer ones — it's a dirge played by different instruments over a background of string sound'—but that the melodic material itself is somehow pale and lacking the character and consistency of the bordering movements.

Cristobal Halffter, born in Madrid in 1930, seems the most skillful adapter of modern modes. His 'Five Microformos' which I heard several seasons ago, immediately suggested the Schoenberg 'Five Pieces' as their source—and his 'Lines and Points' which Wednesday was given its first American performance by Schuller and Co., is indebted to Penderecki and the tonal waves and washed that have been pouring out of Poland since the early '60's.

As these pieces generally go, 'Lines and Points' is well put together, obviously the product of much care and thought. But except for a brief section that slowly and cumulatively builds from a single flute sonority I felt little direction to the piece and saw little reason why any two minute chunk say, couldn't have been lifted from its context and placed elsewhere without apparent damage. This may show insensitivity on my part, but I can't see that Halffter's work is other than overly self-serious and ultimately boring.

THE OTHER unknown piece was by the 37-year-old Peter Tod Lewis who in the fall will become director of the electronic studio at the University of Iowa.

His 'Images' is an empty and foolish composition — a highly conventional piece pretending to be modern. Lewis has dipped thrice into James Agee's memorable 'Let Us Now Praise Famous Men' and come up with three excerpts each of which he follows with a musical statement that attempts, I suppose to capture the poetic sense of the prose.

The readings I found far less meaningful than I remember them to be in their original context, and the music impresses me as being fundamentally dishonest in its sham modernity.

Under Schuller the BMC Orchestra did its best work of the season though in the Halffter there was so little attention paid to dynamics that the important voice was often buried.

Schuller himself did wonderful work, giving readings full of integrity and musicality and kind that keep this festival so worthwhile.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

AUG 2 1969

New England

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 3 1969

Leinsdorf to Conduct at Festival

DANIEL BARENBOIM is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood as guest conductor today at 2:30.

The 1969 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored for the sixth year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will present electronic music, chamber and orchestral music, opera and dance.

On Monday, August 11, and Sunday, August 17, Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Berkshire Music Center (BMC) will conduct two complete performances of Alban Berg's opera Wozzeck with the BMC Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. Charlie Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is preparing the singers. On Wednesday, August 13, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Stravinsky's ballet L'Histoire du Soldat with Choreography by Joseph Gifford and stage direction by Ronald Irving.

On Wednesday, Aug. 13, Robert Ceely's dance, Beyond the Ghost Spectrum will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with choreography by James Waring. On Thursday Aug. 14, Phillip Rhodes' Autumn Setting will be premiered on a chamber music program which will also include Edwin Dugger's Intermezzi. Gunther Schuller will conduct the Dugger work.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

AUG 5 1969

TURNTABLE and PODIUM

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Part of the Festival of Contemporary Music being held at Tanglewood this past week and next week is a pair of concert performances of Berg's magnum opus, the opera Wozzeck. The concert performances will be given next Monday and Sunday evenings at 9 p.m. (Aug. 11 and 17) at the Music Shed.

* * *

For the occasions Erich Leinsdorf will conduct students enrolled in the Berkshire Music Center summer school.

Leinsdorf has distinguished himself in various performances of the suite of music Berg excerpted from the opera, and if the quality of his conducting of the complete opera approaches the fabulous way he does the suite, then both performances promise to be really something.

Wozzeck is the only contemporary opera to have secured a position in the operatic repertory. It is an amazing work, notable not only for its musical strengths but for adaptation of the libretto, psychological insight, and a daring dramatic realism that is truly thought-provoking.

* * *

I would go so far as to say that nothing in the piece is less than fantastic, not the least of which is the source of Berg's inspiration, namely Georg Buechner's drama. Written almost 150 years ago, it anticipates by about five generations the psychoanalytic hang-ups clarified by Freud. Not a single person in the opera is "normal," all are mildly insance or merely neurotic.

When one considers Buechner wrote such a drama at the time of his 20th birthday (he lived to be only 23) less than a decade after the death of Beethoven, one perceives how ahead of his time the playwright was.

* * *

Berg's adaptation cuts Buechner's drama from 23 scenes to 15, but the condensation produces, if anything, an even more potent realization of the grisly plot.

What is so amazing is Berg's musical treatment. Although ostensibly composed in Schoenberg's 12-tone idiom, the musical forms are nothing less than fugues, variations, inventions, and other remote classical structures. For the most part the music doesn't sound astringent or piercing, it somehow comes off as heady and romantic, and in one spot absolutely beautiful.

At all times the music seems subordinated to the story-line, faithfully reflecting the aberrations of the characters or describing the "lives of quiet desperation" each person leads in his struggle for survivial.

* * *

The music, of course, is considerably more important than most people notice. There is not a note that is superfluous or a part that doesn't belong. The astounding thing is Berg's solid construction, whose cumulative energies find their only possible logical and dramatic conclusions by the close of the work.

Boris Goldovsky once likened the opera to a bridge or a cathedral, whose physical dimensions produced a state of awe in the perceiver whether or not he understood the laws of physics that made the constructions possible.

That's the way it is with Wozzeck: subconsciously Berg prepares you for certain episodes, and when they finally occur, feelings of destiny and penultimate resolution are evoked in the listener. Such a moment occurs in the death scene, which Berg prepares by quoting a single note, B-natural.

This consistent reference finds its harmonic destiny with a resolution to C after Wozzeck has killed Marie. But Berg doesn't stop there, he brings the B-natural back to haunt Wozzeck (the blood scene, the transition to the inn) until finally Wozzeck commits suicide.

Whatever you do, don't miss this fantastic work, it promises to be the highlight of the entire Tanglewood season.

Musical Festival

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — The 1969 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored for the sixth year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be presented in two parts. The first is from Tuesday, July 29 through Sunday, August 3, and the second from Monday, August 11 through Monday, August 18. Electronic music, chamber and orchestral music, opera and dance will be presented.

On Monday, August 11 and Sunday August 17, Erich Leinsdorf, Director of the Berkshire Music Center (BMC) will conduct two complete performances of Alban Berg's opera Wozzeck with the BMC Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is preparing the singers. On Wednesday August 13, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Stravinsky's ballet L'Histoire du Soldat with Choreography by Joseph Gifford and stage direction by Ronald Irving.

FOSTER'S DEMOCRAT
DOVER, N. H.
(E) 15,450

AUG 7 1969

BARRAQUE POWER

Jean Barraque (imagine an acute accent on the final "e"—The Voice's printer doesn't have one) has embarked on a vast opus that he says may take his lifetime to complete—"La Mort de Virgile," a cantata based on Hermann Broch's correspondingly entitled German-language work. "Chant apres chant," the first installment of this cantata, was given its first American performance at Tanglewood (Lenox, Massachusetts) on August 3 as part of the Festival of Contemporary Music produced jointly by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Foundation. Gunther Schuller, head of the center's contemporary-music fellowship program, conducted a team consisting of soprano Elsa Charlston, pianist Frederick Rzewski, and percussionists Dean Anderson, Paul Berns, Peter Carnevale, Joseph Conti, Linda Raymond, and John Soroka. The percussion instruments total 104.

The sung text, including considerable additions by the composer to Albert Kohn's French translation of Broch, deals with dreams, nightmares, and mental self-torture. And the 23-minute span of the music, filled on every page with the subtlest gradations of dynamic, attack, and timbre, reaches, despite all the subtlety, peaks of shattering force. The combination of sheer physical power and discipline is astonishing. Furthermore, there are soft, transparent distribution, vibraphones, marimba, and such, clearly of the order of delicacy typical of much in Boulez and casting a line of tradition all the way back to the Schoenberg of "Pierrot Lunaire."

On top of all that, the soprano vocal line, containing as it does such bel-canto machinery as trills and staccato runs, packs more conspicuously a built-in emotional charge of high-and-low-dynamic intensities so cannily used for purposes of "theatre" that it suggests Barraque may one day be regarded as the Space-Age Verdi.

I couldn't stay in the Berkshires until the actual public performance Sunday night, but a late-afternoon no-stopping final rehearsal, preceded by some wonderfully useful (to me) repeats of several passages, gave a great deal to ponder.

First of all, there was Miss Charlston's sense of pitch, especially on her entrances, most of which are not led by any pitched instruments. Then there was Mr. Rzewski's thunderously virtuoso bursts of pianism, not to mention the percussion group's alternating power and delicacy, or Mr. Schuller's balancing of tremendously pounding chord-rhythm structures and his command of the finest details.

Earlier in the afternoon at Tanglewood, the usual picnickers gathered in and around the 6000-seat Music Shed to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Daniel Barenboim in a program full of young, fresh views of some well-worn but mostly still alive music. First, Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture went its nicely paced way. Then Mr. Barenboim's wife, Jacqueline du Pre, played her super-romantic, super-virtuoso, and just plain super interpretation of Elgar's Cello Concerto. The young lady made her cello sing with a full, rich voice that first theme that sounds like a barcarolle shipped off to an Edwardian countryside. Her vigor in the allegro molto that ends the first half of the concerto drew audible "Brava's" from the orchestra members, and the whole performance was a love. Mr. Barenboim, after intermission accomplished some kind of miracle by making the most over-worked piece in the repertory, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, sound interesting to jaded ears. This had a lot to do with the young conductor's fresh ideas about heroic accent and genuine pianissimo and with the broad tempo of the finale up to a really whipped-up coda.

—Leighton Kerner

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 35,500

AUG 7 1969

Interesting Variety At Tanglewood

The sixth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins tomorrow evening, Aug. 8 at 9 p.m., when Karel Ancerl, Music Director of the Toronto Symphony, conducts the complete tone-poem cycle, "Ma Vlast" (My Country), by the czechoslavakian composer, Bendrick Smetana.

The following evening, Saturday, Aug. 9 at 8 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts Brahms' Piano concerto no. 1 with Van Cliburn as soloist. The remainder of the program includes Debussy's "Three nocturnes" with the Women of the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir and Kurt Weill's "Suite from the Threepenny Opera."

On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 10 at 2:30 p.m. Josef Krips, renowned Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, conducts Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Schubert's Symphony no. 9.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday, Aug. 8 at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for ticket holders for the 9 p.m. concert, features the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, an ensemble made up of the principals of the Orchestra and guest artists, playing music by Blacher and Thuille.

On Monday, Aug. 11 and Sunday Aug. 17, Erich Leinsdorf, Director of the Berkshire Music Center will conduct two complete performances of Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck" with the BMC Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is preparing the singers. On Wednesday, Aug. 13, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Stravinsky's ballet "L'Histoire du Soldat" with Choreography by Joseph Gifford and Stage direction by Ronald Irving.

Three BMC-Fromm commissions will be premierced. On Wednesday, Aug. 13, Robert Ceely's dance, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with choreography by James Waring. On Thursday Aug. 14, Phillip Rhodes' "Autumn Setting" will be premiered on a chamber music program which will also include Edwin Dugger's "Intermezzi." Gunther Schuller will conduct the Dugger work.

The fifth and final performance in this season's "Contemporary Trends" concerts at Tanglewood will be held Tuesday, Aug. 12 at 8 p.m. A special program that night will be "Bill Graham presents FROM THE FILLMORE: with Jefferson Airplane, B.B. King, and as special guest stars, The Who, with the Joshua Light Show."

TIMES REPORTER
BELLOWS FALLS, VERMONT
4,768

AUG 8 1969

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 7 1969

Contemporary music

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. - The 1969 Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored for the sixth year by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, is being presented in two parts. The second is from Monday, Aug. 11, through Monday, Aug. 18. Electronic music, chamber and orchestral music, opera and dance will be presented.

On Monday, Aug. 11, and Sunday, Aug. 17, Erich Leinsdorf, Director of the Berkshire Music Center (BMC) will conduct two complete performances of Alban Bert's opera "Wozzeck" with the BMC Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is preparing the singers. On Wednesday, Aug. 13, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Stravinsky's ballet "L'Histoire du Soldat" with Choreography by Joseph Gifford and stage direction by Ronald Irving.

On Wednesday, Aug. 13, Robert Ceely's dance, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas with choreography by James Waring. On Thursday, Aug. 14, Phillip Rhodes' "Autumn Setting" will be premiered on a chamber music program which will also include Edwin Dugger's "Intermezzi." Gunther Schuller will conduct the Dugger work.

130.

'Wozzeck' Is Offered by Students at Berkshire Center

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

AUG 13 1969 New England

By ALLEN HUGHES
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 12—For the general music public, Tanglewood means summer concerts of familiar well-loved music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an idyllic setting of magnificent lawns and monumental trees. The public treasures its serenity and stability, its firm grip on tradition, its richness in beauties for the eye and the ear—beauties that can be enjoyed passively.

For a much smaller but, in a sense, more potent and more significant group, Tanglewood means the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced study, where each summer, gifted young musicians from all over the world come for eight weeks of intensive professional training in the disciplines of their art. This year, there are 160 members of the center, all on full fellowships subsidized by the orchestra.

Last night, most, if not all of them, were involved in the presentation of a stunning demonstration of part of their work here, a performance of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," a challenging work that many professional companies are still reluctant to tackle.

It is an indictment of the pace at which our musical culture progress that this opera, a landmark in 20th-century music, should remain so little known and so alien to the musical experience of most performers and listeners 44 years after its premiere in 1925. It is to the credit of the Berkshire Music Center and Erich Leinsdorf that the decision was made to do "Wozzeck" this year.

It was obviously a gamble, but Mr. Leinsdorf explained the decision simply by saying: "We have tried to fill in the students on what happened to music between 1900 and 1950."

The original orchestral score of "Wozzeck" is extremely complex and difficult, and there may not be another major conductor in the world who would have committed himself to preparing and conducting it with a group of young, largely inexperienced instrumentalists who, less than two months ago, had never played together.

"When the Vienna Staatsoper did its first 'Wozzeck' many years ago," Mr. Leinsdorf said, "it had 34 orchestra rehearsals. We did it with one orchestra rehearsal and four dress rehearsals. These young people don't resist the music as the older professionals of 30 and 40 years ago did, and during rehearsals they went to their more experienced colleagues in the Boston Symphony and asked how seemingly impossible passages in the score could be played. This is what the music center is all about."

He was clearly proud of the results, and with good reason, for the performance was not only precise and smooth, but also lustrous in sound and explicitness in its dramatic and emotional import. The cast, with Richard Taylor in the title role and Alexandra Hunt as Marie, has been coached by the music center's vocal music department headed by Charles Wilson. The staging, on platforms behind the orchestra, was directed by Joseph Gifford and Andrew Raeburn. The achievements of all were laudable.

The effect of the performance was strong upon those who saw and heard it, but it probably was even greater upon the young musicians from seven countries—most of them between the ages of 21 and 25—who had a part in it.

Stephen Goble, a 20-year-old oboist from Boston, said: "It was especially difficult rhythmically, but it also gave me a whole new concept of tonality and showed me how much more stamina you need for something like this."

Michele Saxon, a 21-year-old double-bass player from the Juilliard School, agreed with Mr. Goble that Mr. Leinsdorf was "a fantastic teacher." She acknowledged that he had often been impatient, but, she said, "it was not impatience in a bad way, it was a drive for perfection."

The performance was given as part of the Festival of Contemporary Music being held here this week under the sponsorship of the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation.

"Wozzeck" will be repeated on Sunday night. Admission will be free to members of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and there will be a charge of only $1 to others. This should easily qualify as the best musical bargain of the summer.

Williamstown Musician Writes Tanglewood Ballet

"Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," a new ballet presented July 31 at Tanglewood, was written by a Williamstown native, Robert Ceely. Mr. Ceely is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur G. Ceely of Oblong Road, Williamstown. The elder Ceely, a retired Sprague Electric executive, is currently a selectman in his town.

Commissioned Work

Mr. Ceely, 39, was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation to write the ballet as part of their jointly sponsored festival of contemporary music program this season at Tanglewood. James Waring did the choreography for the work which will be repeated on Aug. 13. Michael Tilson Thomas, who succeeds Erich Leinsdorf as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall, will again conduct. John Dodd will do the lighting for the performance which features dancers from the Indian Hill Summer Arts Workshop in Stockbridge.

Mr. Ceely holds a bachelor of arts degree in music from the New England Conservatory of Music where he currently teaches. He has a master's degree from Mills College in California, and has done graduate study at Princeton University.

Mystery Ballet

The Williamstown musician, who noted that the Waring choreography for "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" was inspired by the mystery stories of the late H. P. Lovecraft, has composed several pieces of chamber music and done the background music for experimental films. His specialty however, is electronic music.

"This type of music consists of sounds made by electronic machines that are recorded and stored on tapes," explained Mr. Ceely. "It is a relatively new field. I am presently working on a piece that incorporates electronic sound and the soprano voice. I hope to bring out in electronic music that same sensitive quality of love that all good composers include in their works for regular instruments."

The repeat performance of Mr. Ceely's "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" will begin Wednesday evening at 9 in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 9 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

AUG 13 1969 New Engl

CRITIC-AT-LARGE by Byron Belt

'Wozzeck' Remains Timely

LENOX, Mass.—Alban Berg's Music Drama "Wozzeck" is 47 years old, and the events which seem to have inspired Georg Buechner's unusual drama of a pathetic victim of organized society transpired in 1821.

The combination of Buechner's psychologically fascinating tragedy, the almost unbearable impace of Berg's expressionistic musical setting and this week's superb performance at Tanglewood found "Wuzzeck" more timely and meaningful than ever.

Conducting "Wozzeck" for the first time, Erich Leinsdorf brought to the opera not only his usual keen sense of drama, musical phrasing and control, but an unusual insight into the extraordinary romantic pulse of this most contempory of modern musical masterworks.

* * *

IN A FEW REMARKS to a modest audience, which included dozens of writers attending the meeting of the Music Critics Association, maestro Leinsdorf described "Wozzeck" as a "sublime masterpiece." I was struck by his use of the term "sublime," but realizing the essential meaning of the word to describe something of "standing spiritual, intellectual or moral worth" I appreciated the precision of language which fully matched the distinction of his musical conception.

Better than any production within memory, the Tanglewood "Wozzeck" stripped the drama and music to the essentials, and unfolded a series of indelible scenes rich in the power to communicate their esentially nihilistic philosophy on the human condition, alternately compassionate and terrifying.

Conducting the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, comprised of outstanding young instrumentalists from all over America, Leinsdorf secured an orchestral performance that placed Berg's musical emphasis squarely where it belonged, in the pit—or rather on the front of the stage at the rear was reserved for a series of high platforms upon which the episodic action of the drama unfolded.

* * *

IF THE ORCHESTRAL performance could best be described as astounding, the vocalists were on a scarcely less exalted level.

With minimum action, props and lighting imaginatively conceived by Joseph Gifford and Andrew Raeburn, a dozen solo professional vocal artists brought "Wozzeck" vividly to life.

The opera was inevitably dominated by the singer of the title role, and that of his doomed mistress Marie. As the loutish but sensitive estranged anti-hero Wozzeck, Richard Taylor progressed from a somewhat hesitant first act to a death scene of compelling pathos. With an almost painfully expressive face and voice to match, Taylor is certainly a singer to watch.

* * *

ALEXANDRA Hunt, an auburn-haired beauty with the stage presence and voice of a major operatic artist was the most successful Marie in a distinguished list which has included Eleanor Steber, Evelyn Lear, and Christa Ludwig. Every gesture and vocal inflection thoroughly exploded with conviction and she proved that earlier performancesc in such works as Lee Hoiby's powerful "The Scarf" in a recent Emerald Opera Theater production were not isolated accomplishments, but steps toward what must surely be an outstanding career on the musical stage.

Joaquin Romaguera and Robert Kelly effectively coped with some of Berg's most cruel vocal writing, and David Ronson, Phyllis Elhady and Luther Enstad, were also impressive.

In the professionalism of the large singing cast and the astonishing virtuosity of his orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf could take great pride. It is a sad commentary on current Tanglewood priorities that such a major production was treated so cavilierly by poor promotion and other weaknesses which the brilliant young performers fortunately surmounted with courage and patience as well as ability.

"Wozzeck" will be repeated at Tanglewood this coming Sunday evening at *9 p.m. In the afternoon, New Jersey Symphony conductor Henry Lewis will direct the Boston Symphony with Marilyn Horne as vocal soloist. It should prove a memorable date for all lovers of opera.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 4'1,961 SUN. 423,790

AUG 13 1969

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,519 SUN. 59,0

AUG 14 1969

Satisfactory performance of Wozzeck at Tanglewood

By HARRY NEVILLE
Staff Writer

For its first Viennese production Alban Berg's opera "Wozeck" reqquired 34 rehearsals. Nothing less, it was felt, could do justice to the score.

Times have changed. "Wozzeck" today is not quite the startling thing it was in the 1920's, and performers have gotten use to scores of even greater technical and interpretive difficulty.

Monday night at Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center produced "Wozzeck" after only nine rehearsals. "There is no glory in numbers," explained Erich Leinsdorf, who yet could not resist the comparison — "Neither figure would matter if the performance were not satisfactory."

The Tanglewood performance was satisfactory indeed. The level of the orchestral playing was, in fact, astonishingly good in spite of youth and inexperience on the part of the players, nearly all of whom are students.

In matters vocal there was less cuase for rejoicing, but it was not to be expected that young singers should bring to these roles the extraordinary interpretive insights needed.

The most convincing portrayals were those of David Ronson as the doctor and Phyllis Elhady as Margret, the latter handling her voice with notable technical finesse.

Other soloists were more or less adequate, with Richard Taylor never really getting inside the part of Wozzeck and Alexandra Hunt straining at times with the difficult vocal lines of Marie.

Staging was kept at a bare minimum, there being no sets or props and action often being merely sketched or suggested. Neither acting nor singing was helped by the remote placement of the soloists on a small stage behind and above the instrumentalists.

Not only were the performers required to sing out over the sprawling orchestra, but they were also denied the benefit of any interreaction with the audience.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf was eager to bestow credit on all who participated in this production. He seemed especially proud of his orchestra, and rightly so.

But Leinsdorf himself was the real star of the occasion. He seems to "feel" this music as do few other conductors. With him there is absolutely none of the sense so often experienced, of the conductor's fulfilling a purely metronomic function. He was on top, so to speak, of every note, every phrase and every nuance.

The result was the kind of lucid, expressive reading that made his performances of other music of the Viennese school—notably that of Schoenberg and Webern—such exciting events of the past season in Boston.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 12 1969

Music Review

'Wozzeck' Opera at Tanglewood

By JAY ROSENFELD

ONE of the major achievements of the 1969 Tanglewood season was the presentation last night in the Shed of Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck." Erich Leinsdorf conducted the orchestra and chorus personnel from the Berkshire Music Center.

It may be a case of the forest and the trees, but there is no other opera where the background of the libretto looms so large in any consideration of the music. "Wozzeck" was a book by George Buchner, a contemporary of Wagner and Verdi although he did not live to reach his 24th birthday. Psychoanalytical elements are of major importance in the play, and it is altogether remarkable that Buchner should anticipate involvement of a modern half-mad schizophrenia in the title role.

Wozzeck was an uneducated, uncomprehending soldier, an orderly of a captain and an experimental white mouse for a military doctor, who used him as sort of a guniea pig, while all the other characters in the barracks treated him with ridicule and subjected him to humilitations. It isn't a pretty role. It calls for a baritone in both sepaking an dsinging roles. Richard Taylor's portrayal was deeply true. He must be a sort of Barnaby Rudge.

Marie was most effectively sung and acted by soprano Alexandra Hunt. She is not quite so aptly analogous a Dolly Varden. Yet as mother of Wozzeck's child, paramour of the boastful drum-major, the heroic tenor Luther Enstad, she was the worthy pivot of the drama.

The entire cast was well-chosen. The captain was buffo tenor Robert Kelly; the doctor, buffo bass David Ronson; Andres, Wozzeck's fellow soldier, was lyric tenor Joaquin Romaguera; Margret, Marie's chum, contralto Phyllis Elhady; and the little boy, who in the book was near 3 but last night was necessarily somewhat older, was John Parke.

* * *

BERG calls for a huge orchestra. The vocalists, placed on a platform to the rear of the stage, wore costumes and dramatized sufficiently to convey the essence of the plot, although this is a work in which some acquaintance with the progress of the action is practically imperative.

The music is intangible. It has the effect of clouds, sometimes wispy and ethereal, at other moments heavy, fearfully threatening and, for these ears, just as indefinitely assimilated and retained.

Leinsdorf's task was doubly formidable, having an extremely difficult score and an assembly of not thoroughly experienced musicians. However, the essential spirit of the mounting tension was built up and conveyed to a fascinated audience, and this was the measure of the performance.

* * *

IT DOES not seem that the old conventional style of opera could have served for this macabre tale. Thus Berg in 1922, completely saturated with the new Viennese Schoenbergian language, was an ideal translator of the century-old and century-neglected story.

The operatic record at Tanglewood this summer has been a seven-league-boot course in the evolution of musical drama. The "Seraglio," for instance, had a proper overture; "Otello" made use of but a few bars of musical tumult to establish the atmosphere of a storm; "Wozzeck" opens with the captain being shaved by his batman, Wozzeck.

There was but one intermission last night. As the second half was about to begin, Leinsdorf made a few succinct and terse remarks in which he reminded the audience of the many (did he say 34?) rehearsals the Vienna Hofopera orchestra required to mount the opera the first time, while his incumbents last night had been allowed but nine. Yet, he added significantly, the young today do not "resist" this music as older people would.

It must be said that his orchestra exposed less timidity than might have been expected under the circumstances. The generation gap may account for some of that, but the master hand at the helm was mainly responsible for keeping things on course.

Dance concerts at Tanglewood

By MARGO MILLER
Globe Staff

LENOX—The Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center has traditionally been a performer's forum for concert music and during the days of Boris Goldovsky, for opera.

Last summer Boston University moved some art and theater courses adjacent to Tanglewood. This season, B.U.'s Joseph Gifford has devised a modern dance and movement curriculm, with a faculty that includes the mime Lotte Goslar, and the modern dancer-choreographer Mary Anthony.

For its part, the Berkshire Music Center, through the Fromm Foundation, commissioned Robert Ceely to do a dance score and James Waring its choreography. Erich Leinsdorf, the B.S.O. conductor, and the students prepared Stravinsky's "L'histoire du soldat," which was choreographed by Gifford and costumed by Miss Goslar.

The Ceely-Waring "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" had its premiere July 31, with Michael Tilson Thomas conducting, and was repeated Aug. 13, when Thomas conducted the Stravinsky for an indisposed Leinsdorf.

Somewhere in this parade of facts is the germ of a fine idea, on the part of Tanglewood and B.U. The conducting was good, as was the playing. The Theater-Concert Hall is not bad as a place to watch dance, through the glare of the EXIT signs disturbed John Dodd's lighting design.

Ceely's music, a mix of on-stage orchestral and space-throbbing tape, was dull, shapeless stuff, though. And Waring, who said that he actually set the only the last three minutes of the score, used the Ceely mostly as music interludes between dances done in silence. The divisions of sound and silence were the most effective part of "Ghost Spectrum."

By RACHELLE PATTERSON

Waring is the Hobbit of choreographers, scurrying his dancers through a private world Freighted with Meaning.

That was the trouble, too, with the Stravinsky as Tanglewood did it.

The narration that most people are familiar with is an anonymous text of rhymed couplets that is not very elegant but at least is succinct.

I have never heard the original French libretto by Stravinsky's longtime collaborator, Ramuz, but remarks Stravinsky has made about "Les Noces," which was in the works at the time he was composing "The Soldier's Tale" (1918), make me think he thought less was more: "My idea (for "Les Noces") was to compose a sort of scenic ceremony." That is to say, a ballet without plot.

"The Soldier's Tale" has a plot of sorts, a cautionary story about a young man destined to become the prey of the Devil. As with all folkish materials, detail is scant and we fill in and flesh out the moral. But not at Tanglewood. This Stravinsky was tarted up.

The narration, written in 1955 by N. Richard Nash, lengthens the piece to an hour and cutens it. Choreographer Gifford resists at first, then joins in with rock 'n' roll gyrations for the Devil (Robert Lowe) and Tanglewood's first striptease — for the Princess (Sandra Klosinski).

Edward Griefen was good as Phillipe the soldier and Ronald Irving was unembarrassed as the professor who lectures us on War.

True to Stravinsky's scheme, the seven-piece band of solo instruments was up there on stage (and conductor Thomas dashing in blazer and bandmaster pants). But the interplay. Stravinsky wanted between played and heard music and acted and spoken narration was fitful at best.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

AUG 15 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

AUG 16 1969

Music quality varies at Tanglewood festival

By HARRY NEVILLE
Staff Writer

As "a forum for new ideas and directions in music," Tanglewood's annual Festival of Contemporary Music must inevitably fail in much of its programming — fail, that is, in the sense of pleasing a large part of the audience.

In such an undertaking, the quality of the music is bound to vary wildly, with some that is exciting but poorly realized, some that is boring but slickly presented, and much written by composers of the who-cares-if-you-listen variety.

This writer attended the concerts of July 30, 31, and Aug. 14. The dross on the second and third programs (both chamber ensemble affairs) far outweighed the worthwhile, with nadirs being reached by Robert Ceely's "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" (matched in its banality by James Waring's choreography) and Luciano Berio's sadistically long "Differences" (which seemed not to make any at all).

On the brighter side were James Yannatos' "Suite for Six," a dryly humorous work which made its points tellingly and at once, and Phillip Rhodes' "Autumn Setting," for soprano and string quartet, which showed an unusual sensitivity to textual nuance as well as a refined gift for lyric vocal writing.

Claudio Spies' "LXXXV," for strings and clarinets, was written as an 85th birthday offering to Igor Stravinsky. It is a canonic piece containing a kind of composer's "in" joke with a number of technical references to the figures eight and five. Understated and quietly moving, it seemed a most fitting tribute to Stravinsky.

The July 30 concert was almost entirely of music for full orchestra, and it was an astonishingly good program. Observors of the contemporary musical scene have been telling us for some time that the symphony orchestra is no longer a viable medium for the composer, but this listener would tend to doubt that now.

This program contained works by Peter Lewis ("Images"), Theodore Antoniou ("Events II"), and Alexander Goehr ("Pastorals"), as well as a piece for 20 winds and tape ("Lineas y Puntos") by Cristobal Halffter.

The striking thing about all these works was the immense attractiveness of the music and the nearly complete absence of cliche.

Structurally some were quite complex, but all were articulated with a logic that was absolutely compelling. And the sonic surface was such that even the Friday afternoon patrons of Symphony Hall might have been intrigued.

Particularly outstanding was Goehr's "Pastorals," which in its marvelous inventiveness, formal perfection and haunting beauty, seemed to this listener very likely a kind of masterpiece.

Leinsdorf conducts

Berg's 'Wozzeck'

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" has remained one of contemporary opera's untouchables for several reasons. Not only is the tragic tale of a doomed subaltern depressing for most audiences but the difficulties presented by the score are all but insuperable except to the most practiced singers and musicians.

Therefore it was an accomplishment indeed for Erich Leinsdorf and members of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and vocal music program to present such a finished performance of "Wozzeck" as they did on Monday evening at Tanglewood. As Mr. Leinsdorf explained there were nine full orchestra rehearsals and four dress rehearsals (34 had been required when the opera had its premiere) and there was no question that everyone knew what he was doing. Working with these young forces, Mr. Leinsdorf achieved great effects of which Berg's score is full, even if the final impression of the evening was of a tremendous tapestry of orchestral sound with far-off voices on the musical backdrop.

As with the concert version of Verdi's "Otello" several weeks ago, the singers did a modified action version of the plot on a raised platform behind the orchestra. The result was that they were both physically and audibly on another level — a separation that disrupts the concentration essential to the rather intimate story of Wozzeck's relations with his superiors, his mistress, and his companions. The voices are, in fact, like orchestral instruments in this case, and would have been more effective emerging from the body of sound than being superimposed on it.

However performances of "Wozzeck" are too seldom heard at all, or with so many things right about them as this one, for physical arrangements to present a major block to one's appreciation.

Among the principals Richard Taylor as Wozzeck, Alexandre Hunt as Marie, and Phyllis Elhady as Margaret were vocally outstanding. The chorus, so deftly woven into the musical texture by Berg, was likewise effective.

The performance, which is part of the second week of Tanglewood's Festival of Contemporary Music, will be repeated on Sunday Aug. 17 at 9 p.m. in the shed.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

AUG 14 1969

B Worcester Telegram Saturday, Aug. 16, 1969

Modern Style Has Ardent Following

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Conclusive impressions were made at the final two concerts of the festival of contemporary music, Wednesday and Thursday nights in the theater-concert hall at Tanglewood.

This is the seventh summer that the festival, until now identified as American, has been presented by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

In spite of evacuees during and between intermissions, one could surmise that the composers are genuinely dedicated and not perpetrators of hoaxes.

Judging by attention of the surviving audience, applause and curtain calls, it was also evident that this music has a small but sincere following.

Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat" on Wednesday night was the festival's most anticipated work except for Berg's opera, "Wozzeck," presented earlier in the week and to be repeated Sunday at 9 p.m.

The Stravinsky work was a glaring disappointment.

Because of Erich Leinsdorf's indisposition, it was conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas. This was neither a loss nor a gain.

The six-player ensemble performed well. The music is anything but a Stravinsky bonanza, but it sounded just about as well as one has a right to expect.

Ronald Irving's narration of the professor's text was lifeless and sometimes incoherent. Members of the center's fellowship program and Boston University Tanglewood Institute danced with vitality but with amateurish overtones.

The entire performance lacked drive, polish and direction.

The balance of Wednesday's program was Robert Ceely's "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and center for this occasion.

Whatever its significance, Ceely's "Ballet in Four Parts" was stimulating to the ear and eye. The trick was to relate the small instrumental ensemble and rumbling sounds from various parts of the theater to the dancers' poses, movements, and the appurtenances.

The latter included a ladder, plants, Christmas decorations. Anguish and bewilderment were discernible. Muttered gutterals and shrieks were attention getters.

Thursday night's program was a collection of sound spasms.

It went even farther to prove that the new era is in full swing and you can't look the other way and pretend it isn't here.

It would serve no valid purpose to accept everything one heard Thursday night with an overall policy of tolerance or feigned compassion.

Two more commissioned works were Phillip Rhodes' "Autumn Setting "for soprano and string quartet, and Edwin Dugger's "Intermezzi."

Dugger evaluated the content and significance of "Intermezzi" in his own comment that "there is no beginning or end, only in between."

Rhodes' setting to Patricia V. Schneider's text had some descriptive influence. But separated bits of sentences obscured meaning. We're assuming, of course, that the words played a role in motivating the music.

The vocal part was sensitively sung by Elsa Charlston of Chicago, on fellowship at the center.

A suite for six by James Yannatos was a series of studies in sound with haphazard form and vague message. This was not visually reflected in the composer's lucid direction.

Luciano Berio's "Differences" had an abundance of tonal excitement. It combined five instruments (strings, woodwinds and harp with tape.

Tonal coloration was bright and the work systematically dramatized emotion.

If one broke down Robert Lewis' divertimento for six instruments into minute fragments, almost traditional material would be scattered about. Yoav Talmi's conducting contributed to its credence.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

AUG 16 1969

132.

THE ARIZONA REPUBLIC
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
D. 159,400 SUN. 237,568
AUG 17 1969

Wring out the old ring in the new

By BINA BREITNER
Republic Music Critic

LENOX, Mass. — People do not like modern music. The Tanglewood Shed is almost filled to its 6,000 capacity for concerts with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. People spill onto the lawn, for a total audience of 11,000, to hear Van Cliburn.

But only 300 come — or 150, if it's raining — to hear music of the 1960s performed by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under conductor Gunther Schuller.

The reasons could be related to any or all of the obvious problems: The music is unfamiliar — most of the works are receiving American premieres; no one except the specialist has heard of the composers; nearly everyone you ask dislikes "modern music," a term which unfortunately serves to classify anything written outside the major-minor harmonic system; the performers nor conductors are famous; the entire evening will be new, and therefore it appeals only to the adventuresome — hardly the majority of concertgoers.

(Two works heard at the Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored by the Fromm Foundation should receive international attention; "Events II" by Greek composer Theodore Antoniou and "Chant Après Chant" by French composer Jean Barraque. The former is scored for orchestra, the latter for soprano and percussion.)

Outside the symphony orchestra frame of reference, one finds new music at home in a specifically 20th Century medium, film. The old finds a place there too. "2001: A Space Odessey" used Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "Elvira Madigan" turned to Mozart. European film-makers have known for decades that classical or baroque music is a gold mine for film music. Composers today are making names for themselves through film scores — bigger names than they could make in the concert hall.

Other outlets for today's music include rock, and its older relatives, blues, soul, jazz, and even country music. But what the 19th Century did with tone poems, the 20th is doing with songs and light shows.

Today's frontier is electronic. The equipment is available, and the possibilities are begging to be explored. A new range of sounds is in the composer's grab-bag. Rock music writers (the few good ones) are using the new machines to expand their music. Popular forms of music reach a high audience.

While concert attendance gradually diminishes, film and rock-light-show attendance increases. An explanation may be left to Mr. McLuhan. The trend, in any case, is clear. Music goes where it finds new technical or compositional outlets.

Symphony orchestras know they are in a crisis. Finances are strained. The music programmed, except for favorites, does not draw audiences; we are the era of the performer, the conductor, orchestra, or soloist. The 11,000 here last weekend came for Cliburn, not to hear music of Kurt Weill, Debusy, or Brahms.

The Phoenix Symphony Orchestra has scheduled a stimulating season of guest conductors for 1969-70. Resident conductor Phillip Spurgeon has coordinated programming, however, that includes at most two composers representative of today's trends. The season should be successful, artistically and financially.

The years ahead, though, will demand creative programming. Audiences are not satisfied forever with the same music, worthwhile though it may be. Nor can an orchestra plan on new supporters contributing if its concerts are formalized and static.

NEWHOUSE NEWSPAPERS 19 August 1969

What satisfactions there were at Tanglewood as Erich Leinsdorf entered his final week as musical director of the usually aristocratic Bostonians, were in a repeat of the maestro's towering version of Alban Berg's powerful opera "Wozzeck."

Any work which tears so ferociously at the gut, blasts the mind so completely and sears the heart so savagely is something to experience. "Wozzeck" is such a work. The Tanglewood performances, featuring Alexandra Hunt and Richard Taylor, both superb in an excellent professional ensemble and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, brilliant beyond its years, have provided Mr. Leinsdorf with a departing triumph of magnificent proportions.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 35,500
AUG 21 1969

BMC'S 'WOZZECK'

The Berkshire Music Center, with its classes in composition, conducting, singing, and playing, and its too little publicized concerts, is what Tanglewood is really about. Not the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival concerts of mostly orthodox repertoire, which, except on special occasions, seem to have been attracting to Lenox, Massachusetts, audiences of ever smaller numbers in recent years.

But the good, old BMC, nurtured in the 1940s by Serge Koussevitzky and Aaron Copland, now guided by Erich Leinsdorf and Gunther Schuller, has been having a busy and rewarding summer. And one of the major rewards was the performance it gave in the evening of August 17 of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck."

The preparation under Leinsdorf had been uncommonly

Continued on next page

Continued from preceding page

painstaking, and the results were amazing, especially with the BMC orchestra of about 110 professional students and guest participants, including a musician of the high calibre of Paul Zukofsky as concertmaster. In fact, as far as the orchestral performance went, there was a realization of textures, phrasings, and sonic power far beyond anything achieved in this music by the Metropolitan Opera under either of the two excellent conductors handling it there, Karl Boehm and Colin Davis.

Whether it was because the Tanglewood people had more rehearsal time than the Met ever had, or because this summer's BMC Orchestra is a finer outfit than the Met's, and neither possibility can be discounted, Leinsdorf led a "Wozzeck" to the memory of its composer, to the ideals of the BMC and to his tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony. That tenure ends next Sunday, as most such tenures do, with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. But I wonder if this accomplishment with such fine, young musicians and such a complex score will not be the true valedictory.

The baritone for the title role, was Richard Taylor, and he proved himself a strongly gifted singer, a fine actor and a scrupulous musician, entirely successful at realizing the Sprechsgesang notations. The Marie was Alexandra Hunt, a beautiful young lady with a talent for expressing emotion and with a nicely textured soprano voice that sometimes didn't get through the bigger orchestral surges, perhaps because the economically staged action had been placed way up behind the on-stage orchestra. Other individual citations would have to include Phyllis Elhady's sultry Margret and Eugene Rabine's First Apprentice, but it was a triumph for everyone concerned.

There were such remarkable details as Leinsdorf's supervision of dynamics in the murder scene, from the high, whispered B in the violins to the bloodcurdling rise and ebb of the tympani; the light-fingered scale passages in the scene of Wozzeck drowning; the great, shattering climax of the final orchestral interlude in D minor, which never fell into sentimentality.

About the problem of the alternating song and speech-song in the scene with Marie reading the bible, Pierre Boulez has suggested that, because the Sprechsgesang line goes so high, the pitches should be lowered so Marie won't sound like a chirping ingenue. Leinsdorf had opted for another solution, which Boulez disfavors—letting Marie do the Sprechsgesang in full singing tone. This does wipe out Berg's intended contrast of vocal sound to match the contrast of Marie's careening thoughts in the scene. And it wiped out such contrast at Tanglewood. Actually, not many of the notes for Marie in that scene are that high. Perhaps, with a more dramatically careful articulation, the Sprechsgesang could be used as Berg wrote it.

Incidentally, "Wozzeck" pulled an audience of about two or three thousand, pretty good for an occasion not exactly trumpeted to the four winds by Tanglewood's publicity department. The Boston Symphony's festival concert in the afternoon of the same day drew about 5000, not very much by festival standards. Of course, the little gathering of 300,000 some miles due west of Tanglewood was something else. And slightly apropos, Tanglewood's biggest crowds this summer have gathered for Schuller's Tuesday-night series of jazz, rock, folk, and soul music, collectively titled "Contemporary Trends." Even Tanglewood seems to know where it is (at).

The Sunday afternoon session by the BSO, by the way, was a semi-"pops" affair listing Berlioz's "Corsair" Overture, his "Nuits d'Ete," a coupe of Mazart and Rossini arias and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." Henry Lewis, an old friend of the Washington Square Park concerts, conducted with lots of zip when it was needed. His wife, the often phenomenal mezzo, Marilyn Horne, was less than idiomatic but sounded beautiful in the "Nuits d'Ete," a little more to the dramatic point in Mozart's "Parto parto" and full of coloratura vitamins in Rossini's "Cruda sorta." The Tchaikovsky strings was loud, which is the best one can ever say for that score.

L.K.

36 San Francisco Chronicle Tues., Aug. 19, 1969

World of Music

A Patronage of Historic Importance

Robert Commanday

TANGLEWOOD has been clearly a house divided this summer. There is the Boston Symphony's larger portion, traditional programming for mass public events. Then there is the Berkshire Music Center's program, especially that part concentrating on contemporary music.

In short, Erich Leinsdorf, who concludes his career as the Boston Symphony's music director at the summer's end, has gone his way artistically. Meanwhile Gunther Schuller, who is Aaron Copland's successor as the head of the program for contemporary music, has gone another way entirely. Schuller's program is supported by one of new music's most devoted patrons, Paul Fromm of Chicago. Of 135 advanced musicians on fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center, 27 who are particularly suited by experience and special gifts for new music, are here courtesy of the Fromm Music Foundation. In addition, Fromm supports some of the visiting composers and their activities, in an internship program for six young music critics, and most recently, a new music library fund for the Berkshire Music Center. It's a patronage of historic importance.

Last week, the young new music-makers had their at-bats in a short contemporary music festival. Part of this week was given over to the now old-new classic, "Wozzeck," and to a massive Bill Graham-staged rock concert that drew a record crowd of 21,500. But the key activity took place in two chamber music concerts at midweek.

★ ★ ★

GETTING there is all the fun in new music, we are told, but it is more so if the composer has a clear idea where "there" is. Luciano Berio, one of the Berkshire Music Center's two composers-in-residence, last week reminded a symposium of the music critics' association that today's composers are less interested in form than formation, and that process was the essence of musical activity.

This is a perfectly valid idea, but when all was said and played at the week's two chamber music programs, the composers who had a firm, albeit perhaps subconscious, sense of direction were the ones that left the most striking impressions.

Edwin Dugger, a young composer on the UC Berkeley faculty, entitled his piece for 12 instruments, "Divertimenti." The program notes declared that he intended a sense of "in-between-ness," a process of hand-over-hand progression with new ideas canceling and succeeding the old, each then having a sense of being "in between."

The effect did not suggest his means of working it out — rather, the one movement "Divertimenti" had a propulsive line that moved with inordinate decisiveness and energy impelled by very strongly shaped ideas. Schuller conducted the 12 players in a sharp, exciting performance.

★ ★ ★

WHEN the novelty of a process or idea for a piece wears off, the musical work wants the grip of some larger or formal comprehension. With Berio's own "Differences," a work from 1959, the idea of fusing a live quintet with electronic tape and then gradually contrasting the two forces to the furthest extent, did not last week seem spine enough for such a long work. Berio's imcomparable fancy, his mercurial inspiration in detailed impulses, were fitfully fascinating, but not the entirety. Paul Zukofsky, exchanging his violin for a baton, directed a performance keen in all respects excepting that the electronic equipment was not fully up to the job.

In a divertimento for six instruments by Robert Lewis (from Maryland), everything sounded right and well-tailored, with subtly developed relationships and nuanced ideas, but not substantially engaging and distinctive. Yoav Talmi, a conducting fellow from Israel, directed.

Philip Rhodes' "Autumn Setting" for soprano (the vocal line lay too high) and string quartet was based on three poems of impressionistic imagery by Patricia Schneider. Its personality was rather plain and level. James Yannatos of the Harvard University faculty, led his "Suite for Six," a very light, insubstantial work which deserved the title "Divertimento" more than the others that actually bore it.

The score for a new dance work, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" by Robert Ceely succeeded in its purpose for dance partly on the strength of the dance process. Holding all together, even bridging some precarious lacunae was the wonderful, mysterious curiosity of the choreographer James Waring.

★ ★ ★

WARING'S 12 young dancers from the neighboring music camp in Stockbridge, Indian Hill, carried off a free-changing design of walking, crouching, huddling, spinning, even shouting. It was about youths finding and improvising individual fantasies, linked at various points by mysterious fraternal impulses. They danced to the music of the band which was also a part of the visible movement onstage, to electronic tape, to long silences that accepted gratefully any accidental external sounds — once, a particularly apt passing airplane seemed divinely cued.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
AUG 19 1969

SHORT AND SWEET AT LENOX

By GEORGE GELLES
MUSIC CRITIC

'Intermezzi' Top Music

LENOX — I found it unfortunate that Edwin Dugger's "Intermezzi" was placed at the end of a long evening last Thursday, for of the current crop of Fromm commissions, this was the most artful and least deserved the loss of both audience and attention that the late hour promised.

"Intermezzi" used as a singular is correct, for Dugger's piece is in one concise movement that blends two strains, one static, one volatile. It is instrumented, first of all, for string quintet, flute, clarinet, trumpet, trombone, and a varied and colorful battery.

The piece essentially reduces musical movement to two planes. There are sections of stasis, points of sustained repose that alternate throughout with passages virtuosically written and highly charged.

Neither of these strands is in any sense complete, both are inin sttates of 'becoming' rather than 'being.' And though "Intermezzi" is given a modicum of formal design through Dugger's use of a similar gesture at the starting and close, the piece is doubly open-ended in that it doesn't follow traditional formal procedures of exposition, development and musical closure. It might, rather, have been begun and ended, theoretically, at any time.

THE TENSION the piece generates is considerable, and the impression it gives is of a composer with a marvellous temporal sense — for he has judged keenly, to maximum advantage, both the overall length of the work and durations of the textural juxapositions — and a striking command of instrumental capabilities.

In any case, I hope the piece gets a Boston hearing.

As led by Gunther Schuller, it was an exhilarating few minutes of music.

The final Fromm work, heard at Tanglewood on the same concert, was the "Autumn Setting" of Phillip Rhodes. Musically the piece is bogged down around Berg, a rehashing of atonal ideas. As its text it takes some lines of Patricia V. Schneider (of whom I know nothing other than this).

There are a few pleasing images here ("a pale moon spills cold liquod light along the autumn hills"), but the tone of the whole production is pompous and weighty and studied. And for all the obvious care that went into its composition — and in spite of the fine performance given it by the Boston String Quartet of the N.E. Conservatory with soprano Elsa Charlston —

"Autumn Setting" sounds stale.

122

THE ARIZONA REPUBLIC
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
D. 159,400 SUN. 237,568

AUG 17 1969

Wring out the old ring in the new

By BINA BREITNER
Republic Music Critic

LENOX, Mass. — People do not like modern music. The Tanglewood Shed is almost filled to its 6,000 capacity for concerts with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. People spill onto the lawn, for a total audience of 11,000, to hear Van Cliburn.

But only 300 come — or 150, if it's raining — to hear music of the 1960s performed by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under conductor Gunther Schuller.

The reasons could be related to any or all of the obvious problems: The music is unfamiliar — most of the works are receiving American premieres; no one except the specialist has heard of the composers; nearly everyone you ask dislikes "modern music," a term which unfortunately serves to classify anything written outside the major-minor harmonic system; the performers nor conductors are famous; the entire evening will be new, and therefore it appeals only to the adventuresome — hardly the majority of concertgoers.

(Two works heard at the Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored by the Fromm Foundation should receive international attention; "Events II" by Greek composer Theodore Antoniou and "Chant Après Chant" by French composer Jean Barraque. The former is scored for orchestra, the latter for soprano and percussion.)

Outside the symphony orchestra frame of reference, one finds new music at home in a specifically 20th Century medium, film. The old finds a place there too. "2001: A Space Odessey" used Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "Elvira Madigan" turned to Mozart. European film-makers have known for decades that classical or baroque music is a gold mine for film music. Composers today are making names for themselves through film scores — bigger names than they could make in the concert hall.

Other outlets for today's music include rock, and its older relatives, blues, soul, jazz, and even country music. But what the 19th Century did with tone poems, the 20th is doing with songs and light shows.

Today's frontier is electronic. The equipment is available, and the possibilities are begging to be explored. A new range of sounds is in the composer's grab-bag. Rock music writers (the few good ones) are using the new machines to expand their music. Popular forms of music reach a high audience.

While concert attendance gradually diminishes, film and rock-light-show attendance increases. An explanation may be left to Mr. McLuhan. The trend, in any case, is clear. Music goes where it finds new technical or compositional outlets.

Symphony orchestras know they are in a crisis. Finances are strained. The music programmed, except for favorites, does not draw audiences; we are the era of the performer, the conductor, orchestra, or soloist. The 11,000 here last weekend came for Cliburn, not to hear music of Kurt Weill, Debusy, or Brahms.

The Phoenix Symphony Orchestra has scheduled a stimulating season of guest conductors for 1969-70. Resident conductor Phillip Spurgeon has coordinated programming, however, that includes at most two composers representative of today's trends. The season should be successful, artistically and financially.

The years ahead, though, will demand creative programming. Audiences are not satisfied forever with the same music. worthwhile though it may be. Nor can an orchestra plan on new supporters contributing if its concerts are formalized and static.

NEWHOUSE NEWSPAPERS 19 August 1969

What satisfactions there were at Tanglewood as Erich Leinsdorf entered his final week as musical director of the usually aristocratic Bostonians, were in a repeat of the maestro's towering version of Alban Berg's powerful opera "Wozzeck."

Any work which tears so ferociously at the gut, blasts the mind so completely and sears the heart so savagely is something to experience. "Wozzeck" is such a work. The Tanglewood performances, featuring Alexandra Hunt and Richard Taylor, both superb in an excellent professional ensemble and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, brilliant beyond its years, have provided Mr. Leinsdorf with a departing triumph of magnificent proportions.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 35,500

AUG 21 1969

BMC'S 'WOZZECK'

The Berkshire Music Center, with its classes in composition, conducting, singing, and playing, and its too little publicized concerts, is what Tanglewood is really about. Not the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival concerts of mostly orthodox repertoire, which, except on special occasions, seem to have been attracting to Lenox, Massachusetts, audiences of ever smaller numbers in recent years.

But the good, old BMC, nurtured in the 1940s by Serge Koussevitzky and Aaron Copland, now guided by Erich Leinsdorf and Gunther Schuller, has been having a busy and rewarding summer. And one of the major rewards was the performance it gave in the evening of August 17 of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck."

The preparation under Leinsdorf had been uncommonly

Continued on next page

Continued from preceding page

painstaking, and the results were amazing, especially with the BMC orchestra of about 110 professional students and guest participants, including a musician of the high calibre of Paul Zukofsky as concertmaster. In fact, as far as the orchestral performance went, there was a realization of textures, phrasings, and sonic power far beyond anything achieved in this music by the Metropolitan Opera under either of the two excellent conductors handling it there, Karl Boehm and Colin Davis.

Whether it was because the Tanglewood people had more rehearsal time than the Met ever had, or because this summer's BMC Orchestra is a finer outfit than the Met's, and neither possibility can be discounted, Leinsdorf led a "Wozzeck" to the memory of its composer, to the ideals of the BMC and to his tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony. That tenure ends next Sunday, as most such tenures do, with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. But I wonder if this accomplishment with such fine, young musicians and such a complex score will not be the true valedictory.

The baritone for the title role, was Richard Taylor, and he proved himself a strongly gifted singer, a fine actor and a scrupulous musician, entirely successful at realizing the Sprechsgesang notations. The Marie was Alexandra Hunt, a beautiful young lady with a talent for expressing emotion and with a nicely textured soprano voice that sometimes didn't get through the bigger orchestral surges, perhaps because the economically staged action had been placed way up behind the on-stage orchestra. Other individual citations would have to include Phyllis Elhady's sultry Margret and Eugene Rabine's First Apprentice, but it was a triumph for everyone concerned.

There were such remarkable details as Leinsdorf's supervision of dynamics in the murder scene, from the high, whispered B in the violins to the bloodcurdling rise and ebb of the tympani; the light-fingered scale passages in the scene of Wozzeck drowning; the great, shattering climax of the final orchestral interlude in D minor, which never fell into sentimentality.

About the problem of the alternating song and speech-song in the scene with Marie reading the bible, Pierre Boulez has suggested that, because the Sprechsgesang line goes so high, the pitches should be lowered so Marie won't sound like a chirping ingenue. Leinsdorf had opted for another solution, which Boulez disfavors—letting Marie do the Sprechsgesang in full singing tone. This does wipe out Berg's intended contrast of vocal sound to match the contrast of Marie's careening thoughts in the scene. And it wiped out such contrast at Tanglewood. Actually, not many of the notes for Marie in that scene are that high. Perhaps, with a more dramatically careful articulation, the Sprechsgesang could be used as Berg wrote it.

Incidentally, "Wozzeck" pulled an audience of about two or three thousand, pretty good for an occasion not exactly trumpeted to the four winds by Tanglewood's publicity department. The Boston Symphony's festival concert in the afternoon of the same day drew about 5000, not very much by festival standards. Of course, the little gathering of 300,000 some miles due west of Tanglewood was something else. And slightly apropos, Tanglewood's biggest crowds this summer have gathered for Schuller's Tuesday-night series of jazz, rock, folk, and soul music, collectively titled "Contemporary Trends." Even Tanglewood seems to know where it is (at).

The Sunday afternoon session by the BSO, by the way, was a semi-"pops" affair listing Berlioz's "Corsair" Overture, his "Nuits "Nuits d'Ete," a coupe of Mazart and Rossini arias and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." Henry Lewis, an old friend of the Washington Square Park concerts, conducted with lots of zip when it was needed. His wife, the often phenomenal mezzo, Marilyn Horne, was less than idiomatic but sounded beautiful in the "Nuits d'Ete," a little more to the dramatic point in Mozart's "Parto parto" and full of coloratura vitamins in Rossini's "Cruda sorta." The Tchaikovsky strings was loud, which is the best one can ever say for that score.

L. K.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

AUG 19 1969

36 San Francisco Chronicle Tues., Aug. 19, 1969

World of Music

A Patronage of Historic Importance

Robert Commanday

TANGLEWOOD has been clearly a house divided this summer. There is the Boston Symphony's larger portion, traditional programming for mass public events. Then there is the Berkshire Music Center's program, especially that part concentrating on contemporary music.

In short, Erich Leinsdorf, who concludes his career as the Boston Symphony's music director at the summer's end, has gone his way artistically. Meanwhile Gunther Schuller, who is Aaron Copland's successor as the head of the program for contemporary music, has gone another way entirely. Schuller's program is supported by one of new music's most devoted patrons, Paul Fromm of Chicago. Of 135 advanced musicians on fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center, 27 who are particularly suited by experience and special gifts for new music, are here courtesy of the Fromm Music Foundation. In addition, Fromm supports some of the visiting composers and their activities, in an internship program for six young music critics, and most recently, a new music library fund for the Berkshire Music Center. It's a patronage of historic importance.

Last week, the young new music-makers had their at-bats in a short contemporary music festival. Part of this week was given over to the now old-new classic, "Wozzeck," and to a massive Bill Graham-staged rock concert that drew a record crowd of 21,500. But the key activity took place in two chamber music concerts at midweek.

★ ★ ★

GETTING there is all the fun in new music, we are told, but it is more so if the composer has a clear idea where "there" is. Luciano Berio, one of the Berkshire Music Center's two composers-in-residence, last week reminded a symposium of the music critics' association that today's composers are less interested in form than formation, and that process was the essence of musical activity.

This is a perfectly valid idea, but when all was said and played at the week's two chamber music programs, the composers who had a firm, albeit perhaps subconscious, sense of direction were the ones that left the most striking impressions.

Edwin Dugger, a young composer on the UC Berkeley faculty, entitled his piece for 12 instruments, "Divertimenti." The program notes declared that he intended a sense of "in-between-ness," a process of hand-over-hand progression with new ideas canceling and succeeding the old, each then having a sense of being "in between."

The effect did not suggest his means of working it out — rather, the one movement "Divertimenti" had a propulsive line that moved with inordinate decisiveness and energy impelled by very strongly shaped ideas. Schuller conducted the 12 players in a sharp, exciting performance.

★ ★ ★

WHEN the novelty of a process or idea for a piece wears off, the musical work wants the grip of some larger or formal comprehension. With Berio's own "Differences," a work from 1959, the idea of fusing a live quintet with electronic tape and then gradually contrasting the two forces to the furthest extent, did not last week seem spine enough for such a long work. Berio's imcomparable fancy, his mercurial inspiration in detailed impulses, were fitfully fascinating, but not the entirety. Paul Zukofsky, exchanging his violin for a baton, directed a performance keen in all respects excepting that the electronic equipment was not fully up to the job.

In a divertimento for six instruments by Robert Lewis (from Maryland), everything sounded right and well-tailored, with subtly developed relationships and nuanced ideas, but not substantially engaging and distinctive. Yoav Talmi, a conducting fellow from Israel, directed.

Philip Rhodes' "Autumn Setting" for soprano (the vocal line lay too high) and string quartet was based on three poems of impressionistic imagery by Patricia Schneider. Its personality was rather plain and level. James Yannatos of the Harvard University faculty, led his "Suite for Six," a very light, insubstantial work which deserved the title "Divertimento" more than the others that actually bore it.

The score for a new dance work, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" by Robert Ceely succeeded in its purpose for dance partly on the strength of the dance process. Holding all together, even bridging some precarious lacunae was the wonderful, mysterious curiosity of the choreographer James Waring.

★ ★ ★

WARING'S 12 young dancers from the neighboring music camp in Stockbridge, Indian Hill, carried off a free-changing design of walking, crouching, huddling, spinning, even shouting. It was about youths finding and improvising individual fantasies, linked at various points by mysterious fraternal impulses. They danced to the music of the band which was also a part of the visible movement onstage, to electronic tape, to long silences that accepted gratefully any accidental external sounds — once, a particularly apt passing airplane seemed divinely cued.

SHORT AND SWEET AT LENOX

By GEORGE GELLES
MUSIC CRITIC

'Intermezzi' Top Music

LENOX — I found it unfortunate that Edwin Dugger's "Intermezzi" was placed at the end of a long evening last Thursday, for of the current crop of Fromm commissions, this was the most artful and least deserved the loss of both audience and attention that the late hour promised.

"Intermezzi" used as a singular is correct, for Dugger's piece is in one concise movement that blends two strains, one static, one volatile. It is instrumented, first of all, for string quintet, flute, clarinet, trumpet, trombone, and a varied and colorful battery.

The piece essentially reduces musical movement to two planes. There are sections of stasis, points of sustained repose that alternate throughout with passages virtuosically written and highly charged.

Neither of these strands is in any sense complete, both are inin sttates of 'becoming' rather than 'being.' And though "Intermezzi" is given a modicum of formal design through Dugger's use of a similar gesture at the starting and close, the piece is doubly open-ended in that it doesn't follow traditional formal procedures of exposition, development and musical closure. It might, rather, have been begun and ended, theoretically, at any time.

THE TENSION the piece generates is considerable, and the impression it gives is of a composer with a marvellous temporal sense — for he has judged keenly, to maximum advantage, both the overall length of the work and durations of the textural juxapositions — and a striking command of instrumental capabilities.

In any case, I hope the piece gets a Boston hearing.

As led by Gunther Schuller, it was an exhilarating few minutes of music.

The final Fromm work, heard at Tanglewood on the same concert, was the "Autumn Setting" of Phillip Rhodes. Musically the piece is bogged down around Berg, a rehashing of atonal ideas. As its text it takes some lines of Patricia V. Schneider (of whom I know nothing other than this).

There are a few pleasing images here ("a pale moon spills cold liquod light along the autumn hills"), but the tone of the whole production is pompous and weighty and studied. And for all the obvious care that went into its composition — and in spite of the fine performance given it by the Boston String Quartet of the N.E. Conservatory with soprano Elsa Charlston —

"Autumn Setting" sounds stale.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 176,688 SUN. 200,492

AUG 24 1969

133

The World Of Music

Avant-Garde Compositions Becoming More Complex, Introspective

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

LENOX, Mass. — Wet, muggy, or burning hot weather has been the lot of musical festivals around the land this summer and Tanglewood, the granddad of summer music centers. has not been an exception. But weather matters little in the midst of musical activities that can tax the ears and endurance of even the most enthusiastic listener. Nor do the young people who are gathered here for intensive study seem to be bothered by rain or sun despite the increasingly bizarre and lengthening hair styles of the young men.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its 88th season (32nd at Tanglewood), plays on weekends, while all sorts of music making goes on just about every day. The 210-acre estate in the Berkshires, where Emerson, Holmes, and Melville met and where Hawthorne wrote, throbs with activity and vitality — from playwriting to Ravi Shankar, from painting to piano seminars, from jazz to avant garde, from a new critics' institute to the Jefferson Airplane, and more.

Perhaps the most important of them all is the Contemporary Music Festival, initiated in 1963 through the vision of the Berkshire Music Center's outgoing director, Erich Leinsdorf, and Paul Fromm, whose music foundation lends generous support to it via commissions, performances, scholarships and stipends. It is important, because while prizes and commissions and publication of new ideas and directions in music are vital, more vital is the well-prepared performance of such music. Also, as composer, conductor, and conservatory director Gunther Schuller, who has headed the Center's composition department since Aaron Copland's 1965 retirement, states: "Music can only survive through the careful nurturing of the creative mind. But creation (composition) and recreation (performance) are inextricably linked; the one cannot survive without the other.

★ ★ ★

If anything at all was revealed this year from the Contemporary Music Festival, it was the fact that avant garde is getting more complex and more introspective. There were no cataclysmic breakthroughs. In fact, from one program which presented five composers, I came away with the distinct feeling that I had heard it before—not that this means there wasn't a differentiation in quality.

James Yannato's "Suite for Six" was an acceptable exercise. Luciano Berio's "Differences," scored for five instruments and tape, seemed deja vu and intricately complex.

What struck me as perhaps an innovation, and a very successful one, was the manner in which the now-traditional banshee wails of prepprepared tape had simmered down and was an integral part of the work.

Robert Lewis' "Divertimento for 6 Instruments" was academic. "Autumn Setting for Soprano and String Quartet" by Phillip Rhodes, a commissioned work, on the other hand seemed very successful. But again, it was in the tradition of several French composers who have done this sort of music years ago.

If anything, the compass of ideas seemed thin. It was greatly enhanced by the splendid singing of a young soprano, Elsa Charlston, who took her high E-flats and leaps like a seasoned veteran. To be sure, all this music makes the utmost demands on players.

The young instrumentalists handled it with precision, vitality, know-how, and, above all, devoted musicality. Gunther Schuller conducted the final work on that program, "Intermezzi," another commissioned work by Edwin Dugger, which with its full orchestral sound seemed the most polished work of the evening.

Compare this, however, with a previous night's performance of a work which is now 47 years old, the first atonal opera, "Wozzeck," by Alban Berg. With Erich Leinsdorf conducting a 98-piece orchestra (I hesitate to call it a student orchestra, since only some 14 rehearsals produced here what it took some 34 rehearsals for the Vienna Philharmonic to do) the work again proved an overwhelming emotional and dramatic experience. Berg's music remains a landmark and, it seems, while as yet little known, a point of emanation for what came afterwards and is yet to come. Acted out on an elevated platform in back of the orchestra, the action was reduced, of course, but suggestiveness of the characters was there.

If the histrionics allowed under such circumstances were limited, the young people's singing of the fiendishly difficult music was not. The voices soared and suffered, and the immensity of symbolism and tragedy rose from the orchestra as if to devour all humanity. And did these people play — like angels! It is hard to single out any of the singers, but Richard Taylor's "Wozzek" was exceedingly comprehensible and strong, as was Alexandra Hunt's "Marie." The whole presentation was awe-inspiring for its amazingly high standards.

★ ★ ★

A new version (with text by N. Richard Nash) of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat" tried to make an updated fairytale out of something that both by text and music had always impressed by its austerity and sparseness of means. Since its composition in 1918, it has been subjected to many versions, but this new one displeased me greatly, for I felt that it despoiled, in fact missed the basic idea of Stravnisky's lark. One must leave something to the listener, the spectator. Elaborate on a point, repeat it, mash it down, and you spoil and tire it. And that's what this version managed to do.

The small band on stage, under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas, played well enough, but the dancing was a mixture of ballet and itchy devils that at times looked like a burlesque of the whole thing.

The stylistic hodge-podge proved too much, and I am not sure yet if the devil didn't win the bout after all.

Robert Ceely's "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," another commissioned work, was danced by young people from the nearby Indian Hill Summer Arts Workshop at Stockbridge. The choreography by James Waring, with lots of posturing and walking, made sense but I have no idea how much it had to do with the music.

Almost 22,000 people occupied Tanglewood for the Jefferson Airplane, guitarist B. B. King, the Joshua Light Show, and The Who. The music for the most part was really quite nice, except for the ear-shattering, spine-freezing amplification that chased the squirrels away — and this listener after one hour. This concert was part of the recently inaugurated Contemporary Trends series, which also presented at various times Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Jackson, electronic music, the center's composer's forum, and the Boston Symphony in music by Stravinsky and Schoenberg.

"Young men and women studying here have grown up with popular music in all its guises and there is no reason why it shouldn't coexist amicably with what Shuller terms 'so-called serious music'," Leinsdorf stated, and of course, he is quite right.

If not quite that many people turned out for the traditional or old-time fare, more than 10,000 made it one Saturday evening to listen to a slightly vapid Boston Orchestra holding forth with the suite from Kurt Weill's "Three Penny Opera," played perhaps too preciously; Debussy's "Nocturnes," with the women of the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus seated among the instrumentalists in the final "Sirens," although they couldn't lure me anywhere; and finally a lethargic performance of Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 in D minor with Van Cliburn as the soloist. During the eight curtain calls, he and Leinsdorf engaged in some taffy-pulling as to who was going out from the wings to brave the multitudes.

But perhaps the most traditional program of them all: Haydn, R. Strauss, and Schubert, with guest-conductor Josef Krips, turned into a splendid occasion. The orchestra played like the honed instrument it is, and Haydn's sunny "Surprise Symphony" (No. 94), Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Schubert's usually somewhat tiring Symphony in C, all sounded extraordinarily crisp, delightful, and joyous.

"And after only two rehearsals," he said to me after the concert. "They played as if we had been together for 30 years!" Apparently not only the audience liked it. The orchestra people applauded and stomped the floor for him.

What did it all prove? There is really no such thing as "types" of music, except that which is good and that which is bad (and then, of course, it shouldn't be called music), and how well it is done. There should be no competition, no vying for special honors or partisanship in music between the old and the new. We must go on, searching and not always finding. This is the very seed and promise of life.

INNOVATIONS. QUITE NATURALLY, ARE DAILY TOPIC AT TANGLEWOOD
From left, Paul Fromm, Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss, and Gunther Schuller

DANCE

Tanglewood

By MARION SAWYER

NEW YORK, N. Y.
CHELSEA NEWS
W. 4,500

SEP 4 1969

During a rainy week in the Berkshires, the most interesting dancing I came across was not at Jacob's Pillow but at Tanglewood: one of the Contemporary Chamber Music programs featuring Stravinsky's 'L'Histoire du Soldat' (1918) and 'Beyond the Ghost Spectrum' (1969) by Robert Ceely, both with choreographic setting.

The Stravinsky is a great favorite with choreographers although it imposes a narrative burden no one seems able to transcend. Joseph Gifford was no luckier than the rest. His efforts hardly rose above mime and were out of key with the ironic tone of the music and narration. Gifford's vitality, in fact, showed only in misplaced burlesque of the devil and the princess, the roles being executed with youthful verve by Robert Lowe and Sandra Klosinski.

Coming to 'Beyond the Ghost Spectrum' was something else again.

The immense changes that have swept through the performing arts in the past decades have made the term 'contemporary' about as meaningless for music and dance as for art and literature. It is true that Stravinsky and Robert Ceely are coeval in that they are both alive at this moment. So are Joseph Gifford and James Waring, the choreographer of 'Spectrum.' But in this program it was not a question of similarities, or even differences, among de facto contemporaries so much as of a distinct before-and-after cleavage. 'Spectrum,' in spite of its hard-to-identify happenings, is of now. It participates in, lights up a portion of, where we are in the realm of feeling.

Not that Waring impresses as an onrushing modern or hot-eyed vanguardist. He gently explores the surreal instead of reaching for Pop images. Instead of hard-edge he coaxes forth a few tendrils of art nouveau, much etiolated by blight. A little snow falling from the flies, a garden lattice carried on stage, a couple of oval pincushion-backed chairs hint of a chill, jejune emotional season. But it goes beyond Prufrockery. Shorter pieces (the only kind I have seen before) do not give a fair idea of Waring's scope. His world is one in shards, fixated a few hours after a cataclysm. The worst has happened and among the survivors there is a definite if feeble tropism toward the light.

Waring isn't even modern in his dance technique. He is ballet-based and his dancers are ballet-trained. But such wan, rachitic types! (or so they come across). His staring masked girls and Raggedy Andy boys are indeed like ghosts of the too, too solid Sylphides, Giselles and Alphonses that still strain, in any proper ballet company, to leave this lumpen bourgeois existence behind. In 'Beyond the Ghost Spectrum' Waring and dancers colonize a limbo shot through with unexpected compassion and grace.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 116,500

AUG 28 1969

RETROSPECTIVE

The end of August is the time when music critics can get dizzy from looking back on the 11½-month season just past and putting into some kind of calendar the announcements, press releases, and flying rumors about the 1969-1970 onslaught coming up. It's a time for throwing out a ton of old ticket stubs, trying to keep the Fire Department from throwing out five tons of old programs, and resolving to return borrowed scores. And it's a time for remembering in relative calm the things that made one anything but calm.

Here are some of these things, following no particular chronological or categorical order—

Pierre Boulez conducting thoroughly elu[illegible] polish[illegible] long, soft, [illegible] show of which Leonard Bernstein ended his 10 years as the Philharmonic's music director.

Erich Leinsdorf's luminous performance of Berg's "Wozzeck" with the brilliant young orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center and some very talented singers at Tanglewood earlier this month.

The fantastically beautiful playing of the Cleveland Orchestra under George Szell, especially in the Mahler Ninth.

Beverly Sills's classically wicked laughter as the Queen in 'The Golden Cockerel" at the City Opera, and her heartbreaking "Semele" for the Caramoor Festival, in both instances involving some of the most sovereign singing available to the public today.

The Berkshire Music Center's amazing performance of Jean Barraque's "Chant apres chant" a few weeks ago, a work full of musicodramatic subtlety and smashing power, combining density and propulsion.

There were the other great singers, great instrumentalists, and great conductors (not very many of this category, actually), but you can surely make up your own list. Aside from the Barraque and some of the more obviously sincere parts of Penderecki's "St. Luke Passion," not much in the way of really good new music reached these ears. Maybe next year, as they used to say in Brooklyn.

BY WAY OF a slightly corrective postscript, last week's review of the Tanglewood "Wozzeck" suffered a bit from proofreader's blight. The damaged portion should have indicated that Leinsdorf had conducted a performance "that did honor to one of the most hauntingly beautiful operas ever written, to its composer's memory," et cetera. Also, I'm not always quite so ungrammatical as was suggested by the printed words, "the Tchaikovsky strings was loud." "Strings" didn't belong in the sentence, and my tantrum on reading the word was even louder.

—Leighton Kerner

134

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

NOV 17 1968

A CRITICS' Workshop will be held at Tanglewood from Aug. 3 to 24, 1969, financially sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

General format of the workshop was worked out last summer by representatives of the Music Critics Association, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Fromm Foundation, and Berkshire Music Center.

Up to six professional critics will receive fellowships covering their expenses while they are at Tanglewood. They will work under a senior music critic who will join the Berkshire Center faculty during the three-week period, which coincides with the Festival of Contemporary American Music.

Chairman of the supervising committee is Elliott W. Galkin, music critic for the Baltimore Sun, assisted by Raymond Morin, Worcester Telegram, and Charles B. Fowler, editor of the Music Educators Journal.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D. 136,878 SUN. 375,725

JAN 14 1969

Music Critics

Named To Panel

DR. ELLIOTT W. GALKIN, music critic for The Sun, has been appointed chairman of a national panel of music critics which will develop and administrate a Music Critic's Internship Program to take place at the Tanglewood Music Festival, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, next summer.

The panel will be composed of three prominent music critics who are also distinguished educators, it was announced by Dr. Boris Nelson, president of the Music Critics Association. They are Charles Fowler, editor of the Music Educators Journal; Raymond Morin, music critic for the Worcester Telegram; and Dr. Galkin.

Dr. Fowler is a graduate of the State University of Potsdam, Northwestern University and Boston University, and has held Danforth Grants for teaching and research. He is the author of many articles on music as well as the book, "The Search for Musical Understanding."

Mr. Morin, a graduate of the University of Michigan, and a former student at the New England Conservatory and the Institute of Musical Art in New York, is also the author of a variety of articles on music in newspapers and journals.

Paris Conservatory

Dr. Galkin, a graduate of the Paris Conservatory, and the Ecole Normale de Musique de Paris, received his Ph. D. in musicology at Cornell University. A member of Phi Beta Kappa, he has received Danforth Grants for research in the humanities, a grant from the French Government for study in Paris, and a Fulbright Grant for study in Vienna, where he was an apprentice conductor at the Staatsoper.

He is chairman of the Music Department at Goucher College, Chairman of the Music History and Literature Department at the Peabody Conservatory, and Conductor of the Baltimore Chamber Orchestra; he has translated many articles for publication in English, and is the author of approximately five hundred reviews and articles on musical subjects.

Under the terms of the Music Critics Program, which is subsidized by the Fromm Foundation, six young music critics will be invited to be in residence at the Tanglewood Festival for a period of three weeks.

Berkshire Festival

In cooperation with the administrators of the Berkshire Festival, and under the guidance of senior critic, they will attend rehearsals of the Tanglewood Orchestra, the Boston Symphony, and the various musical organizations participating in the annual Fromm Foundation Contemporary Music Festival which takes place at the end of every Tanglewood season.

"The objective," explained Dr. Nelson, music critic of the Toledo Blade and director of Fine Arts at the University of Toledo, "is to create a dynamic forum where young critics can be provided with opportunities to hear the most contemporary kinds of music under ideal conditions; and from their discussions among themselves, with the Senior Critic, and with the various composers and performers who will be present at Tanglewood, they will be able to gain authoritative insights into—and new sympathies for—the development of contemporary music in the United States.

"This is the first program of its kind in the world, and we are confident that it will develop into one of the most dynamic and imaginative projects in American music, with important consequences for the future of contemporary composition in this country."

Music Critic Internship Scheduled at Tanglewood

A music critic internship program will be conducted at the Berkshire Music School at Tanglewood next summer.

Six young music critics will be invited to spend three weeks at the Contemporary American Music Festival. The project is sponsored by the Music Critics' Association and is subsidized by the Fromm Foundation.

The six young critics will be selected by a three-member panel appointed to administer the program. Members of the panel are Dr. Charles Fowler, editor of the Music Educators Journal; Raymond Morin, music critic for The Worcester Telegram; and Dr. Elliot W. Galkin, music critic for the Baltimore Sun.

Galkin is chairman of the panel.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,892

FEB 16 1969

The Phoenix Gazette
D. 92,030

JUL 4 1969

SIX MUSIC critics representing newspapers and periodicals ranging from New York to California have been chosen to participate in the first Music Critic Association internship program at Tanglewood. According to Elliott W. Galkin, music critic of The Baltimore Sun and chairman of the program, Bina Breitner of The Arizona Republic is among the six.

The program is subsidized by the Fromm Foundation. In cooperation with the Berkshire Music Center and under the guidance of a senior music critic, the interns will attend rehearsals and study scores as they are played by the festival orchestra and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

JUL 2 1969

Music Critics To Meet At Tanglewood

LENOX — The annual conference of the Music Critics Assn. will be held at Tanglewood this year, from Monday, Aug. 11 through Thursday, Aug. 14.

Critics may register on Monday afternoon or night if they wish to hear the Berkshire Festival performance of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," a concert version under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Regular sessions of the conference will begin Tuesday and continue through Thursday afternoon.

Among others, there will be a session on "Composers in Crisis," one dealing with the "Critics Institute," one of the business of the MCA and the American Musical Digest, and a free-for-all session for critics. One session proposed may be entitled "The Twilight of the Music Critics — Kritikdammerung?"

Leinsdorf, Tanglewood are in the music news

By ALFRED BURKE
Sun Music Critic

Music

LOWELL — Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will conduct two programs to be given during the annual meeting of the Music Critics Association, Inc., to take place at Tanglewood Aug. 11-14. Heading the session will be Boris Nelson, association president.

Among the musical events available to those attending will be a concert performance of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" (Monday evening), a concert of rock music - contemporary trends — (Tuesday evening), chamber music (Wednesday evening) and on Thursday, Stravinsky's, "Histoire du Soldat," a work including a dance group. Maestro Leinsdorf will direct on Monday and Thursday.

The conference session will take place Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. The subject Tuesday will be "Composers in Crisis". Another session will be concerned with the "Critics Institute", and the final day will find a free-for-all session at which time all attending critics will be invited to actively participate. Plans have not been completed for a panel session with various conductors taking part.

As previously announced, John Ogasapian, organist and choirmaster at St. Anne's church, and assistant professor of music at Lowell State college, will be the guest artist at next Wednesday evening's summer organ series program in the Memorial Music hall, Methuen. His program will include: Variations on a Knight's Song (Antonio de Cabezon), Prelude and Fugue in G Minor (Buxtehude), Choral-Prelude, "Blessed Jesus, We are Here" (J. S. Bach), Toccata and Fugue in F Major (J. S. Bach), Choral in A minor (Franck), Partita - "There is a Reaper Called Death" (David), Divertissement (Vierne), Modere et Expressif (Fleury), and Prelude and Fugue in B Major (Dupre).

The next two weekends at the Berkshire Festival offer programs featuring the music of Rossini, Scharwenka, Stravinsky, Prokofiev, Tchaikovsky, Beethoven, Brahms, Verdi and Sibelius. Leinsdorf and Charles Wilson will conduct. Pianists Gilbert Kalish, Earl Wild, Andre Watts and Vladimir Ashkenazy and violinists Paul Zukofsky and Pinchas Zukerman will be soloists. Vocal artists include Maralin Niska, soprano; Richard Cassilly, tenor, and Sherril Milnes, baritone. Appearing with the above-named singers will be the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir. The vocalists will be presented in a concert version of Verdi's "Otello" which will be sung in Italian.

One of the popular "Weekend Preludes" will be presented at 7 p.m. at the July 18 concert. In the main concert Rossini's "L'Italian in Algeri" (Overture); the Piano Concerto No. 1 (Wild), by Scharwenka and Stravinsky's "The Rites of Spring" will be heard.

Erich Leinsdorf

On Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., there will be an open rehearsal. The concert for that evening and the performing soloist will be announced at the concert. Closing the program will be "Romeo and Juliet" a suite by Prokofiev. The Sunday afternoon program will be all Tchaikovsky, in which the Introduction to Act II of "Swan Lake", the Violin Concerto (Zukerman), and the Symphoy No. 5 will be performed.

The following weekend also will start with a Friday evening Weekend Prelude. The main concert will provide an evening of Beethoven and Brahms. The Beethoven list will offer the Overture "Egmont" and the Symphony No. 1. The Brahms Concerto No. 2 (Watts) will complete the event. An open rehearsal will take place Saturday morning. The Verdi opera will be the evening's musical fare. On Sunday Charles Wilson will conduct the Symphony No. 2 by Sibelius and the Beethoven "Emperor" Piano Concerto with Vladimir Ashkenazy as soloist.

Highlight of the Festival will come on Aug. 19 when Tanglewood–on-parade will be the order of things. This sparkling event is an all-day session which will benefit and involve all the departments of the Berkshire Music Center, climaxed by an evening concert with the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, and closing on a traditional note in the form of a brilliant display of fireworks.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
(E) 48,850 (S) 39,575

JUL 13 1969

Critics Assn. To Meet At Tanglewood

The 1969 meeting of the Music Critics Assn. will be held at Tanglewood from Aug. 11 through 14. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be host for the conference, which takes place during the seventh week of the Orchestra's Berkshire Festival. The meeting is also concurrent with the second week of the annual festival of contemporary music, sponsored by the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

Miles Kastendieck will be conference chairman. Already announced are panel discussions on the current state of composition, the financial crisis of the arts, and the state of criticism.

The Baldwin Piano Co. has arranged a demonstration of its new ED-1 electro concert grand piano, used with orchestra for the first time July 18 by Earl Wild, playing Scharwenka's first piano concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

Among those invited to participate in the discussions are Erich Leinsdorf, Gunther Schuller, Paul Fromm, Luciano Berio, Donald Martino, Theodore Antoniou, Alexander Goehr, Phyllis Curtin, Ralph Burgard, Richard Wangerin, Elliott Galkin and Clark Mitze.

The participating critics are also invited to attend several concerts of the festival of contemporary music, including a performance of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. They are also invited to the Boston Symphony's three Berkshire Festival Concerts on the weekend of Aug. 15. Erich Leinsdorf, Max Rudolf and Henry Lewis will conduct, with soprano Marilyn Horne as soloist on Lewis's program.

Kastendieck, in announcing the conference program, noted that all music critics, editors and writers are invited to attend, whether or not they are currently members of the Music Critics Assn. Those interested should write or phone the Boston Symphony's Press Office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240. The phone number is (413)637-1600.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
(E) 11,496

047

JUL 23 1969

BSO To Host Music Critics

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will host the 1969 meeting of the Music Critics Association at Tanglewood from Aug. 11 through 14.

Miles Kastendieck, conference chairman, has planned panel discussions on the current state of composition, the financial crisis of the arts and the state of criticism. There will also be an introduction to the new Critics Institute and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Acoustic Research, Inc., will host a press conference on new broadcasting techniques. The Baldwin Piano Co. will demonstrate its new electro-concert grand piano which Earl Wild used at Tanglewood at July 18.

Several members of the BSO will participate in the discussions. Interested critics, writers and editors are invited.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 26 1969

134

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

NOV 17 1968

A CRITICS' Workshop will be held at Tanglewood from Aug. 3 to 24, 1969, financially sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

General format of the workshop was worked out last summer by representatives of the Music Critics Association, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Fromm Foundation, and Berkshire Music Center.

Up to six professional critics will receive fellowships covering their expenses while they are at Tanglewood. They will work under a senior music critic who will join the Berkshire Center faculty during the three-week period, which coincides with the Festival of Contemporary American Music.

Chairman of the supervising committee is Elliott W. Galkin, music critic for the Baltimore Sun, assisted by Raymond Morin, Worcester Telegram, and Charles B. Fowler, editor of the Music Educators Journal.

THE SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
(MORNING)
D 186,878 SUN 375,725

JAN 14 1969

Music Critics

Named To Panel

DR. ELLIOTT W. GALKIN, music critic for The Sun, has been appointed chairman of a national panel of music critics which will develop and administrate a Music Critic's Internship Program to take place at the Tanglewood Music Festival, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, next summer.

The panel will be composed of three prominent music critics who are also distinguished educators, it was announced by Dr. Boris Nelson, president of the Music Critics Association. They are Charles Fowler, editor of the Music Educators Journal; Raymond Morin, music critic for the Worcester Telegram; and Dr. Galkin.

Dr. Fowler is a graduate of the State University of Potsdam, Northwestern University and Boston University, and has held Danforth Grants for teaching and research. He is the author of many articles on music as well as the book, "The Search for Musical Understanding."

Mr. Morin, a graduate of the University of Michigan, and a former student at the New England Conservatory and the Institute of Musical Art in New York, is also the author of a variety of articles on music in newspapers and journals.

Paris Conservatory

Dr. Galkin, a graduate of the Paris Conservatory, and the Ecole Normale de Musique de Paris, received his Ph. D. in musicology at Cornell University. A member of Phi Beta Kappa, he has received Danforth Grants for research in the humanities, a grant from the French Government for study in Paris, and a Fulbright Grant for study in Vienna, where he was an apprentice conductor at the Staatsoper.

He is chairman of the Music Department at Goucher College, Chairman of the Music History and Literature Department at the Peabody Conservatory, and Conductor of the Baltimore Chamber Orchestra; he has translated many articles for publication in English, and is the author of approximately five hundred reviews and articles on musical subjects.

Under the terms of the Music Critics Program, which is subsidized by the Fromm Foundation, six young music critics will be invited to be in residence at the Tanglewood Festival for a period of three weeks.

Berkshire Festival

In cooperation with the administrators of the Berkshire Festival, and under the guidance of senior critic, they will attend rehearsals of the Tanglewood Orchestra, the Boston Symphony, and the various musical organizations participating in the annual Fromm Foundation Contemporary Music Festival which takes place at the end of every Tanglewood season.

"The objective," explained Dr. Nelson, music critic of the Toledo Blade and director of Fine Arts at the University of Toledo, "is to create a dynamic forum where young critics can be provided with opportunities to hear the most contemporary kinds of music under ideal conditions; and from their discussions among themselves, with the Senior Critic, and with the various composers and performers who will be present at Tanglewood, they will be able to gain authoritative insights into—and new sympathies for—the development of contemporary music in the United States.

"This is the first program of its kind in the world, and we are confident that it will develop into one of the most dynamic and imaginative projects in American music, with important consequences for the future of contemporary composition in this country."

Music Critic Internship Scheduled at Tanglewood

A music critic internship program will be conducted at the Berkshire Music School at Tanglewood next summer.

Six young music critics will be invited to spend three weeks at the Contemporary American Music Festival. The project is sponsored by the Music Critics' Association and is subsidized by the Fromm Foundation.

The six young critics will be selected by a three-member panel appointed to administer the program. Members of the panel are Dr. Charles Fowler, editor of the Music Educators Journal; Raymond Morin, music critic for The Worcester Telegram; and Dr. Elliot W. Galkin, music critic for the Baltimore Sun.

Galkin is chairman of the panel.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,892

FEB 16 1969

The Phoenix Gazette
D. 92,030

JUL 4 1969

SIX MUSIC critics representing newspapers and periodicals ranging from New York to California have been chosen to participate in the first Music Critic Association internship program at Tanglewood. According to Elliott W. Galkin, music critic of The Baltimore Sun and chairman of the program, Bina Breitner of The Arizona Republic is among the six.

The program is subsidized by the Fromm Foundation. In cooperation with the Berkshire Music Center and under the guidance of a senior music critic, the interns will attend rehearsals and study scores as they are played by the festival orchestra and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

JUL 2 1969

Music Critics To Meet At Tanglewood

LENOX — The annual conference of the Music Critics Assn. will be held at Tanglewood this year, from Monday, Aug. 11 through Thursday, Aug. 14.

Critics may register on Monday afternoon or night if they wish to hear the Berkshire Festival performance of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," a concert version under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Regular sessions of the conference will begin Tuesday and continue through Thursday afternoon.

Among others, there will be a session on "Composers in Crisis," one dealing with the "Critics Institute," one of the business of the MCA and the American Musical Digest, and a free-for-all session for critics. One session proposed may be entitled "The Twilight of the Music Critics — Kritikdammerung?"

Leinsdorf, Tanglewood are in the music news

By ALFRED BURKE
Sun Music Critic

Music

LOWELL — Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will conduct two programs to be given during the annual meeting of the Music Critics Association, Inc., to take place at Tanglewood Aug. 11-14. Heading the session will be Boris Nelson, association president.

Among the musical events available to those attending will be a concert performance of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" (Monday evening), a concert of rock music - contemporary trends — (Tuesday evening), chamber music (Wednesday evening) and on Thursday, Stravinsky's "Histoire du Soldat," a work including a dance group. Maestro Leinsdorf will direct on Monday and Thursday.

The conference session will take place Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday. The subject Tuesday will be "Composers in Crisis". Another session will be concerned with the "Critics Institute", and the final day will find a free-for-all session at which time all attending critics will be invited to actively participate. Plans have not been completed for a panel session with various conductors taking part.

As previously announced, John Ogasapian, organist and choirmaster at St. Anne's church, and assistant professor of music at Lowell State college, will be the guest artist at next Wednesday evening's summer organ series program in the Memorial Music hall, Methuen. His program will include: Variations on a Knight's Song (Antonio de Cabezon), Prelude and Fugue in G Minor (Buxtehude), Choral-Prelude, "Blessed Jesus, We are Here" (J. S. Bach), Toccata and Fugue in F Major (J. S. Bach), Choral in A minor (Franck), Partita - "There is a Reaper Called Death" (David), Divertissement (Vierne), Modere et Expressif (Fleury), and Prelude and Fugue in B Major (Dupre).

The next two weekends at the Berkshire Festival offer programs featuring the music of Rossini, Scharwenka, Stravinsky, Prokofiev, Tchaikovsky, Beethoven, Brahms, Verdi and Sibelius. Leinsdorf and Charles Wilson will conduct. Pianists Gilbert Kalish, Earl Wild, Andre Watts and Vladimir Ashkenazy and violinists Paul Zukofsky and Pinchas Zukerman will be soloists. Vocal artists include Maralin Niska, soprano; Richard Cassilly, tenor, and Sherril Milnes, baritone. Appearing with the above-named singers will be the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir. The vocalists will be presented in a concert version of Verdi's "Otello" which will be sung in Italian.

One of the popular "Weekend Preludes" will be presented at 7 p.m. at the July 18 concert. In the main concert Rossini's "L'Italian in Algeri" (Overture); the Piano Concerto No. 1 (Wild), by Scharwenka and Stravinsky's "The Rites of Spring" will be heard.

Erich Leinsdorf

On Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., there will be an open rehearsal. The concert for that evening and the performing soloist will be announced at the concert. Closing the program will be "Romeo and Juliet" a suite by Prokofiev. The Sunday afternoon program will be all Tchaikovsky, in which the Introduction to Act II of "Swan Lake", the Violin Concerto (Zukerman), and the Symphoy No. 5 will be performed.

The following weekend also will start with a Friday evening Weekend Prelude. The main concert will provide an evening of Beethoven and Brahms. The Beethoven list will offer the Overture "Egmont" and the Symphony No. 1. The Brahms Concerto No. 2 (Watts) will complete the event. An open rehearsal will take place Saturday morning. The Verdi opera will be the evening's musical fare. On Sunday Charles Wilson will conduct the Symphony No. 2 by Sibelius and the Beethoven "Emperor" Piano Concerto with Vladimir Ashkenazy as soloist.

Highlight of the Festival will come on Aug. 19 when Tanglewood--on-parade will be the order of things. This sparkling event is an all-day session which will benefit and involve all the departments of the Berkshire Music Center, climaxed by an evening concert with the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, and closing on a traditional note in the form of a brilliant display of fireworks.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
(E) 43,850 (S) 39,575

JUL 13 1969

Critics Assn. To Meet At Tanglewood

The 1969 meeting of the Music Critics Assn. will be held at Tanglewood from Aug. 11 through 14. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be host for the conference, which takes place during the seventh week of the Orchestra's Berkshire Festival. The meeting is also concurrent with the second week of the annual festival of contemporary music, sponsored by the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

Miles Kastendieck will be conference chairman. Already announced are panel discussions on the current state of composition, the financial crisis of the arts, and the state of criticism.

The Baldwin Piano Co. has arranged a demonstration of its new ED-1 electro concert grand piano, used with orchestra for the first time July 18 by Earl Wild, playing Scharwenka's first piano concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

Among those invited to participate in the discussions are Erich Leinsdorf, Gunther Schuller, Paul Fromm, Luciano Berio, Donald Martino, Theodore Antoniou, Alexander Goehr, Phyllis Curtin, Ralph Burgard, Richard Wangerin, Elliott Galkin and Clark Mitze.

The participating critics are also invited to attend several concerts of the festival of contemporary music, including a performance of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. They are also invited to the Boston Symphony's three Berkshire Festival Concerts on the weekend of Aug. 15. Erich Leinsdorf, Max Rudolf and Henry Lewis will conduct, with soprano Marilyn Horne as soloist on Lewis's program.

Kastendieck, in announcing the conference program, noted that all music critics, editors and writers are invited to attend, whether or not they are currently members of the Music Critics Assn. Those interested should write or phone the Boston Symphony's Press Office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240. The phone number is (413)637-1600.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
(E) 11,406

JUL 23 1969

BSO To Host Music Critics

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will host the 1969 meeting of the Music Critics Association at Tanglewood from Aug. 11 through 14.

Miles Kastendieck, conference chairman, has planned panel discussions on the current state of composition, the financial crisis of the arts and the state of criticism. There will also be an introduction to the new Critics Institute and the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Acoustic Research, Inc., will host a press conference on new broadcasting techniques. The Baldwin Piano Co. will demonstrate its new electro-concert grand piano which Earl Wild used at Tanglewood at July 18.

Several members of the BSO will participate in the discussions. Interested critics, writers and editors are invited.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 26 1969

135

CRITICUS ASS'N. ← →

TANGLEWOOD Institute

FOSTER'S DEMOCRAT
DOVER, N. H.
(E) 15,450
JUL 25 1969

Music Critics Association Meeting

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Massachusetts — The 1969 meeting of the Music Critics Association will be held at Tanglewood from August 11 through 14. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be host for the conference, which takes place during the seventh week of the Orchestra's Berkshire Festival. The meeting is also concurrent with the second week of the annual Festival in Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

Miles Kastendieck will be Conference Chairman. Already announced are panel discussions on the curent state of composition, the financial crisis of the arts, and the state of criticism. There will be an introduction to the new Critics Institute sponsored by the Music Critics Association and a Critics Free-for-all, a wide ranging open discussion. The Boston Symphony and Acoustic Research, Inc., will be hosts at a press conference reception at which new 4-channel stero broadcasting techniques, developed in conjunction with WCRB, Waltham, and WBGH, Boston, will bepublicly demonstrated for the first time.

The Baldwin Piano Company has arranged a demonstration of its new ED 1 electro concert grand piano, used with orchestra for the first time on July 18 by Earl Wild, playing Scharwenka's first piano concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

Among those invited to participate in the discussionare Erich Leinsdorf, Gunther Schuller, Paul Fromm, Luciano Berio, Donald Martino, Theodore Antoniou, Alexander Goehr, Phyllis Curtin, Ralph Burgard, Richard Wangerin, Elliott Galkin, Clark Mitze, and of course, members of the press.

The participating critics are also invited to attend several concerts of the Festival of Contemporary Music, including a performance of Alban Berg's Wozzeck, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Vocal Fellows. They are also invited to the Boston Symphony's three Berkshire Festival concerts on the weekend of August 15. Erich Leinsdorf, Max Rudolf, and Henry Lewis will conduct, with soprano Marilyn Horne as soloist on Mr. Lewis's program.

Mr. Kastendieck, in announcing the conference program, noted that all music critics, editors, and writers are invited to attend, whether or not they care currently members of the Music Critics Association. Those interested should write on phone the Boston Symphony's Press Office at Tanglewood, Leonx, Massachusetts, 01240. The phone number is 413 637-1600.

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 362,408
JUL 27 1969

Time for Tanglewood

By IRVING LOWENS
Music Critic of The Star

The country's leading music critics are going to be having a pretty busy time of it for the next few weeks, but not necessarily writing for their papers. A fair number of them are going back to the study desk.

Beginning tomorrow, the Music Critics Association will be unveiling its first Tanglewood workshop and seminar, a three-week affair conjointly sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, the Berkshire Music Center, and the MCA.

The workshop-seminar will be closely integrated with Tanglewood's annual Festival of Contemporary Music, a unique "festival within a festival" (also sponsored by the Fromm Foundation) which temporarily turns the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra into the country's avante garde musical capital.

The affair has been designed to give half a dozen younger practicing critics (working under the general supervision of senior critics) maximum exposure to what today's serious composers are doing. They will have an opportunity not only to hear a wide variety of difficult new works, but to discuss them with those intimately connected with their creation—the composers themselves and the musicians who perform them. They will also be writing about this music and criticiz-

See CRITICS, Page C-4

CRITICS: Workshops

Continued from Page C-1

ing, among themselves, their views.

Chosen for the first MCA workshop-seminar are Bina Breitner (Phoenix Arizona Republic), Anita D. Earle (Chicago Daily News), Ylda Novik (Washington Evening Star), Geraldine E. Ostrove (Baltimore Symphony Orchestra program annotator), Carolyn Raney (Baltimore Sun) and Michael Sherwin (High Fidelity/Musical America).

Chairman of the selection committee and general administrator of the workshop-seminar is Elliott W. Galkin, music critic of the Baltimore Sun. Among the senior critics participating will be Miles Kastendieck (Christian Science Monitor), Irving Lowens (Washington Evening Star), Raymond Morin (Worcester Telegram), Boris Nelson (Toledo Blade) and Thomas Willis (Chicago Tribune).

Meanwhile, later in the week—on Friday to be exact—a seven-day opera workshop and seminar for music critics under the sponsorship of the Corbett Foundation of Cincinnati will be starting at the Aspen (Colo.) Music School.

Paul Hume, music editor of of the Washington Post, is the supervising critic at Aspen. The purpose of the Aspen workshop-seminar is to give music critics who have had limited background and experience in the workings of opera an opportunity for first-hand study of the opera world. With the Aspen faculty, Hume will conduct daily seminars in each of the major areas of opera production, discussions of the historical background of opera from the standpoint of musical style and production, and will lead critical sessions on the reviews to be written following each opera or concert.

Selected to go to Aspen are Carl Cunningham (Houston Post), Donald Dierks (San Diego Union), Glenn Giffin (Denver Post), Peter Hellman (New York Magazine) and Kathleen Morner (Chicago Sun-Times). They will observe the training and coaching of 14 young singers, in residence at the Aspen Music Festival this summer thanks to the Corbett Foundation, as they prepare for their performances in Mozart's "Abduction From the Seraglio" and rehearse for an evening of opera excerpts. The critics will also have a chance to talk with leading technical and musical personnel who will be directing the group at Aspen.

As if this were not enough of a busman's holiday, the Music Critics Association will be holding its annual conference at Tanglewood, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play host to the nation's musical press from Aug. 11 to 14.

Among the more titillating non-musical events programmed are panel discussions on "Composers at the Crossroads" (with Luciano Berio, Theodore Antoniou, Alexander Goehr and Donald Martino), "Crisis in the Arts—Pay or Perish" (with Ralph Burgard, Richard Wangerin and Clark Mitze) and "Twilight of the Critics: Kritikerdaemmerung?" (with Gunther Schuller, Erich Leinsdorf and Phyllis Curtin).

In announcing the four-day program, Miles Kastendieck, conference chairman, noted that all music critics, editors and writers are invited to attend the conference, whether or not they are currently members of the Music Critics Association. Professionals (and professionals-to-be) interested should write or phone the Boston Symphony's press office at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass. 01240; phone 413—637-1600) for details on accommodations and other information.

Tanglewood Pops

Over the last few years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., has become a bastion of contemporary "classical" music.

Last year, a series called Tanglewood Trends was inaugurated to cover what the orchestra calls "the best in current non-classical musical expression."

Here is the schedule of coming events:

July 29: Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, The Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra.

Aug. 12: Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, The Who, The Joshua Light Show.

New York Post
D. 707,120 SAT. 369,902
AUG 1 1969

Music Critics Assn. to Meet

The 1969 meeting of the Music Critics Assn. will be held at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Aug. 11-14. The Boston Symphony will be host for the conference which takes place during the seventh week of the Orchestra's Berkshire Festival. Miles Kastendieck, N. Y. correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor, is conference chairman.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
(E) 48,850 (S) 39,575
AUG 3 1969

Critic discusses future, past conclaves

By ALFRED BURKE
Sun Music Critic

LOWELL—The Music Critics' Association's 1969 convention, slated to get underway Aug. 11 (through the 14th) at Tanglewood, will be led by that distinguished critic and writer, Miles Kastendieck. Kastendieck, as convention chairman, will head all the session's meetings.

The conclave will be in session during the seventh week of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival. And the meetings will be concurrent with the second week of the annual Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

There will be a number of panel sessions whose purpose will be to discuss the various phases of composition in its current state; the financial crisis of the arts, and the state of criticism. An introduction to the new Critics Institute sponsored by the Music Critics Association and a critics' free-for-all—a wide ranging open discussion also are on tap.

The Boston Symphony and a research organization will serve as hosts at a press conference reception at which new 4-channel stereo broadcasting techniques, developed in conjunction with a Boston and Greater-Boston broadcasting combine, will be publicly demonstrated for the first time.

Among those invited to participate in the discussions are Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the BSO; Gunther Schuller, composer, writer and president of the New England Conservatory of Music; opera soprano Phyllis Curtin, and Paul Fromm, Luciano Berio, Donald Martino and Theodore Antoniou. Also, Alexander Goehr, Ralph Burgard, Richard Wangerin, Elliott Galkin, Clark Mitze and members of the press actively interested in the arts.

Participating critics will be guests at several concerts at the Festival of Contemporary Music, including a performance of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck", to be conducted by Maestro Leinsdorf, with the Berkshire Music Center orchestra and Vocal Fellows. They will also attend as guests the Boston Symphony Orchestra's three Berkshire Festival programs, scheduled for the weekend starting with the Friday evening, (Aug. 15), concert.

Conducting these concerts will be Erich Leinsdorf, Max Rudolf and Henry Lewis. Soprano Marilya Horne will be the soloist for the concert to be directed by Mr. Lewis.

New England has served as host for critic and composer conferences many times. One of the most outstanding of these affairs was the one held at Harvard University during the late 1940s. The gathering of the "minds" was described as the most impressive endeavor of its type ever held in this country. Critics and composers came from every part of the world, and this being the first assignment of major proportions we ever attended, there was the opportunity of gaining valuable knowledge as well as much-needed experience

Max Rudolf

Coming to our aid were the late Cyrus Durgin of this city who was, during his time, one of the leading metropolitan music columnists and critics; and the other, Warren Storey Smith, professor emeritus in history at the New England Conservatory of Music and dean of New England press music critics for many years. During one of the luncheon periods our friend Cyrus introduced us to the late critic, Olin Downes.

One of Mr. Downes' colleagues was Virgil Thompson the distinguished critic, educator, author, conductor and composer of many excellent pieces which included opera, symphony, chamber pieces, songs and sonatas for various instruments. He was the main speaker for the final session and we were impressed by his sincerity and unaffected manner in delivering a message—a message that without doubt was valuable to everyone assembled in Sanders theater.

A year or two later we were invited to attend another such session. This was held in Hartford, Conn., and was sponsored by the Hartt Foundation and a leading newspaper. One of the suprising revelations of this two day affair was the critical account of a performance of Bizet's "Carmen"—written by the executive publisher of the sponsoring publication. This was not too surprising when it was learned that this talented gentleman had a finished education in music. It has always amazed us however, how he could create such a clear picture of what had happened on stage, especially in a space of about five paragraphs.

Durgin was the main speaker and his discourse on music and its place in the non-metropolitan areas gained for him a standing ovation at the close of festivities.

136

THE ARIZONA REPUBLIC
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
D. 159,400 SUN. 237,568
AUG 3 1969

Bina to Tanglewood

Republic music critic awarded fellowship in intern program

Bina Breitner, music critic for The Arizona Republic, has been awarded a three-week fellowship to a Music Critics Internship Program at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this summer.

Bina

The program, subsidized by the Fromm Foundation, is a project of the Music Critics Association.

Six young music critics from around the country have been selected to attend the program, which is scheduled concurrently with the Contemporary American Music Festival at Tanglewood. Dates of the project are July 28 to Aug. 17.

Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a 210-acre estate in the town of Lenox, Mass., in the Berkshire Mountains. At Tanglewood every summer is the Berkshire Festival (BSO concerts), as well as the Berkshire Music Center, a summer music academy whose students also present concerts. Guest conductors and artists participate in what has become one of the most active and respected summer music festivals in the nation.

Senior members of the critics program are Charles Fowler, editor of the Music Educators Journal; Raymond Morin, music critic for the Worcester Telegram; and Elliott W. Galkin (chairman), music critic for the Baltimore Sun.

The other five young critics, in addition to Miss Breitner, are Anita D. Earle, music reviewer for the Chicago Daily News and the California Post-Advocate; Ylda Novic, contributing critic for the Washington Evening Star; Geraldine E. Ostrove, program annotator for the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra series and the Peabody Conservatory "Candlelight Series"; Carolyn Raney, contributor to the Cleveland Plain Dealer; and Michael Sherwin, writer for Musical America, High Fidelity, and Stereo Review.

The six interns will attend rehearsals and study scores, as well as attend performances of orchestral, chamber, operatic and rock music.

Legislatures Give More

U.S. Funds Spur Arts Councils

By S. GORDON GAPPER
Journal Music Critic

LENOX, Mass. — An investment of $1,700,000 in federal funds for the arts has stimulated appropriations of more than four times that amount for state arts councils by 48 state and three territorial legislatures for the fiscal year just begun.

Members of the Music Critics Association were told this Wednesday at their 17th annual meeting at Tanglewood Music Center here. But it was one of the few happy financial things they heard about the status of the arts in the United States.

Officials of arts councils and symphony orchestras are talking in terms not only of drastic new money-raising methods but of basic changes in ideas about so-called cultural activity in the light of public apathy. Some would even ask their communities: "Is your symphony orchestra really necessary?"

THE RAY of sunshine came from Ralph Burgard, director of state and city relations for the Associated Councils of the Arts, an organization based in New York City. He pointed out that the state and territorial appropriations this year amount to $7,360.00, partly in response to federal allocations. Thirty-four of the states and the three territories increased their appropriations to their state arts councils. Six decreased them, and 11 appropriated the same amount as last year.

Burgard gave credit to the National Endowment for the funds to the states in the first place. He said he believes the action has started a chain reaction at the local level where the government funds will be used alongside an estimated $14 million in private funds this year.

Maximum possible federal grant to any state has been $30,909 through fiscal 1969. Burgard said ACA officials hope this total will be increased this year.

BUT GLOOMY statistics were given by Richard Wangerin, St. Louis, president of the American Symphony Orchestra League.

Some examples:

Between 1962 and 1967, gross budgets of major symphonies increased 78.8 per cent. Earnings increased only 58.6 per cent by comparison, and operating deficits increased an average of 114.2 per cent.

In 1962-63, six orchestras had budgets of more than $1 million; in 1967-68, 17 had budgets of more than $1 million.

Six of them have deficits of over $1 million each. The net deficit of 24 orchestras, for example, amounted to $2,675,000, or over $100,000 each. (Compare the Flint Symphony's $20,000).

IN THE five years surveyed symphonies' earning power through ticket sales dropped from 55 per cent to 48 percent of their budgets on the average. In cold cash, in the five years the over-all amount symphonies needed in contributed income rose from $14 million to $44 million.

"We are afraid," said Wangerin, "of the tiring of the volunteer, who keeps being asked to raise more money and still sees no end in sight."

Although many people have doubted the Nixon administration will be greatly interested in providing money for the arts, Burgard did point out that the Nixon plan for sharing certain federal tax money with the states and cities could conceivably end with some benefit to the arts in time.

REGARDLESS, both men described the idea of regional cooperation of orchestral organizations (some are already working together) as a means of economy and of strengthening the so-called smaller symphonies.

Tanglewood itself, home of the Berkshire Music Festival and summer haunt of the Boston Symphony, apparently ran into a moneymaker Tuesday night and at the same time chalked up a record.

The biggest Tanglewood crowd ever — over 22,000 — showed up, not for the Boston Symphony, but for a concert by the rock groups The Who, B.B. King and the Jefferson Airplane. Officials said the largest previous crowd was about 16,000 for a "classical" concert in 1965.

The Flint Journal
FLINT, MICH.
D. 115,014 SUN. 115,373
AUG 14 1969

Critics Elect

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The National Music Critics Association elected officers Thursday, naming Boris E. Nelson of the Toledo Blade to a second term as president.

The critics are meeting at Tanglewood, Mass., as guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center.

UTICA PRESS
Friday, August 15, 1969

Boris Nelson Heads Music Critics Group

LENOX, Mass. (AP)—The National Music Critics Association elected officers Thursday, naming Boris E. Nelson of the Toledo Blade to a second term as president.

The critics are meeting at Tanglewood, Mass., as guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center.

Chosen for two-year terms in addition to Nelson were Miles Kastendieck of the Christian Science Monitor, Irving Lowens of the Washington Evening Star and William Littler of the Toronto Star, vice presidents; Mark Acheson of the Southampton Press, secretary; and Jay Rosenfeld of the Berkshire Eagle, treasurer.

Raymond Morin of the Worcester Telegram, David Kozinski of the Wilmington Journal and Martha Clem of the Berkshire Eagle were elected to the executive board.

Forty-two members of the association are attending the four-day conference.

TELEGRAPH
NASHUA, N. H.
(E) 19,203
AUG 15 1969

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
(E) 14,465
AUG 15 1969

SENTINEL
WATERVILLE, MAINE
(M) 21,324
AUG 15 1969

Music Critics Hold Election Of Officers

Special to The Journal

LENOX, Mass.—Boris Nelson of the Toledo Blade has been re-elected president of the Music Critics Association, an international organization devoted to the improvement of music criticism in the press.

Others elected at the annual meeting during the Tanglewood Festival here are:

First vice president, Miles Kastendieck, New York music critic of the Christian Science Monitor; second vice president, Irving Lowens of the Washington Evening Star; third vice president, William Littler of the Toronto Star; secretary, Marcus Acheson, music critic of the Southhampton, N.Y., Press, and treasurer, Jay C. Rosenfeld of the Berkshire Eagle, Pittsfield, Mass.

The nominating committee included S. Gordon Gapper of The Flint, Mich., Journal, former secretary of the association.

The association will begin next month publication of a periodical, American Musical Digest, devoted to criticism of American music and musicians extracted from newspapers and magazines in the United States and abroad.

Melodies mingle with scenic beauty at Tanglewood

Sunday, Aug. 10, 1969 X The Arizona Republic N-3

By BINA BREITNER

TANGLEWOOD, Mass. — The Berkshire Festival had already been under way for several weeks when I and five other music critics arrived from around the nation to attend a three-week seminar in contemporary music.

I had never been to Tanglewood, and even the descriptions of its beauty do not match its natural wonder.

The sounds of a bassoonist repeating a Hindemith phrase mingle all day with operatic melodies, orchestral fragments, a jazzy saxophone and the comfortable conversation of musicians gathered on the grass or in clumps of cafeteria tables.

Bina

Best of all, though, is the view of green mountainsides, miles of trees and lawns leading down to a serene blue lake, sunsets that match Arizona's in grandeur, if not in colors, and perpetually mingling billows of grey fog and clouds.

TANGLEWOOD is a 210-acre estate near Lenox, in western Massachusetts, close to the New York border. It belongs to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and they, among others, inhabit it during the summer.

This year, for the first time the Music Critics Association is sponsoring, with funds from the Fromm Foundation, an informal school to help the nation's music critics more fully understand the nature of contemporary music.

My colleagues and I will be here through next Sunday.

We have been involved so far in two concerts, several rehearsals, conversations with composers Peter Tod Lewis and Theodore Antoniou, a session of criticizing each other's reviews and analysis by BSO conductor Erich Leinsdorf of Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck," which will be performed here tomorrow and Sunday in one of several indoor and outdoor auditoriums.

THE MUSICAL FARE is not limited to 20th century orchestral or operatic works. The Festival of Contemporary Music of the Berkshire Music Center (academy of music) also includes modern chamber music, jazz and rock.

The night we arrived, we had a jazz concert featuring the unlikely combination of soul-tingling gospel singer Mahalia Jackson, the not-very-big big band sounds of the Thad Jones/Mel Lewis Orchestra, and the frenetic jazz brilliance of avant-garde composer-saxophonist - trumpeter-violinist Ornette Coleman and his quartet.

Later, we had an exhausting encounter with orchestral works of Cristobal Halffter (b. 1930, Madrid), Lewis (b. 1932, Charlottesville, Va.), Antoniou (b. 1935, Athens, and the violent composer of the evening), Walter Piston (b. 1894, Rockland, Maine, the old master of the program), and Alexander Goehr (b. 1932, England). Tonight we have the modern chamber music.

BILL GRAHAM of the Fillmores East and West is presenting the next "Contemporary Trends" concert Tuesday. We missed Janis Joplin, the Butterfield Blues Band, Tim Hardin and more rock stars who appeared before we arrived. Graham's concert will offer us Jefferson Airplane, The Who, B. B. King and Joshua Light Show. We will also have an electronic music concert Saturday.

Downtown Lenox, if one may so exaggerate, is only two miles from Tanglewood, quite near our dormitory at Berkshire Christian College.

It's a charming New England town filled with clapboard houses with porches and white fences, small shops and art galleries, Old World hotels and trees to hide the necessary gas stations. The streets are narrow and the atmosphere is one of calm and small town trust.

In the near future we will have a great deal more music; two more senior critics, (Miles Kastendieck and Tom Willis) to assist Elliott Galkin, our leader the last few days; more sessions discussing purpose, content, and style of music criticism; meeting with composers; and vistas to make the music a visual as well as aural pleasure.

When time permits, I will provide you with more details. It may take a while because if the lake doesn't tempt me, a rehearsal or a mountainside will.

AMUSEMENTS

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 189,425 SUN. 302,445
AUG 6 1969

murs of mass approval rise over countless audiences when good quality show tunes, patriotic airs and personable vocalists, or soloists are presented. I am confident that our very competent Symphony Orchestra can perform even such mundane fare to perfection.

Insofar as attracting music lovers to the Symphony's own series at Music Hall, one can only observe the history of the Boston Pops. One cannot quibble with the Pop's success in catering to that large segment of music lovers now present on the American scene.

George Smith's affable personality, his lively programs and apt vocalist and soloist choices have gained him popularity through the years as a master of his trade in the Park Board concerts.

His personal advice and a perusal of his programs of the past ten years would be most helpful to companies financing the concerts, and finally to the Symphonic programmer for the ultimate long-lastingness of this worthwhile endeavor. Sincerely, MR. AND MRS. VICTOR F. JELEN.

ONE OF THE MAIN TOPICS to be discussed at sessions of the Music Critics Association meeting next week at Tanglewood (near Lenox, Mass.) will be the financial plight of major, minor and community orchestras in the USA. Linked with this subject will be, of course, the "hot" topic of merging orchestras — a matter of heated discussion in Buffalo (N. Y.) for instance, where the money situation was so desperate that an emergency (successful) drive for funds to support the orchestra only staved off an "inevitable crisis." A merger of the Buffalo and Rochester orchestras is being weighed carefully by all parties involved.

There was talk last year of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra joining forces with the Dayton Philharmonic to help solve mutual financial problems. "Patriotic" Daytonians displayed indignation at what they called "bull-dozer tactics"; later CSO Manager Lloyd H. Haldeman admitted that supporters of the Dayton Philharmonic status quo "kicked us in the teeth." (Haldeman did not initiate this idea, by the way.)

I will report on "merger-itis" (and other orchestra problems) from Tanglewood when I attend the MCA conference.

136

THE ARIZONA REPUBLIC
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
D. 159,400 SUN. 237,568

AUG 3 1969

Bina to Tanglewood

Republic music critic awarded fellowship in intern program

Bina Breitner, music critic for The Arizona Republic, has been awarded a three-week fellowship to a Music Critics Internship Program at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this summer.

Bina

The program, subsidized by the Fromm Foundation, is a project of the Music Critics Association.

Six young music critics from around the country have been selected to attend the program, which is scheduled concurrently with the Contemporary American Music Festival at Tanglewood. Dates of the project are July 28 to Aug. 17.

Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a 210-acre estate in the town of Lenox, Mass., in the Berkshire Mountains. At Tanglewood every summer is the Berkshire Festival (BSO concerts), as well as the Berkshire Music Center, a summer music academy whose students also present concerts. Guest conductors and artists participate in what has become one of the most active and respected summer music festivals in the nation.

Senior members of the critics program are Charles Fowler, editor of the Music Educators Journal; Raymond Morin, music critic for the Worcester Telegram; and Elliott W. Galkin (chairman), music critic for the Baltimore Sun.

The other five young critics, in addition to Miss Breitner, are Anita D. Earle, music reviewer for the Chicago Daily News and the California Post-Advocate; Ylda Novic, contributing critic for the Washington Evening Star; Geraldine E. Ostrove, program annotator for the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra series and the Peabody Conservatory "Candlelight Series"; Carolyn Raney, contributor to the Cleveland Plain Dealer; and Michael Sherwin, writer for Musical America, High Fidelity, and Stereo Review.

The six interns will attend rehearsals and study scores, as well as attend performances of orchestral, chamber, operatic and rock music.

Legislatures Give More

U.S. Funds Spur Arts Councils

By S. GORDON GAPPER
Journal Music Critic

LENOX, Mass. — An investment of $1,700,000 in federal funds for the arts has stimulated appropriations of more than four times that amount for state arts councils by 48 state and three territorial legislatures for the fiscal year just begun.

Members of the Music Critics Association were told this Wednesday at their 17th annual meeting at Tanglewood Music Center here. But it was one of the few happy financial things they heard about the status of the arts in the United States.

Officials of arts councils and symphony orchestras are talking in terms not only of drastic new money-raising methods but of basic changes in ideas about so-called cultural activity in the light of public apathy. Some would even ask their communities: "Is your symphony orchestra really necessary?"

THE RAY of sunshine came from Ralph Burgard, director of state and city relations for the Associated Councils of the Arts, an organization based in New York City. He pointed out that the state and territorial appropriations this year amount to $7,360.00, partly in response to federal allocations. Thirty-four of the states and the three territories increased their appropriations to their state arts councils. Six decreased them, and 11 appropriated the same amount as last year.

Burgard gave credit to the National Endowment for the funds to the states in the first place. He said he believes the action has started a chain reaction at the local level where the government funds will be used alongside an estimated $14 million in private funds this year.

Maximum possible federal grant to any state has been $30,909 through fiscal 1969. Burgard said ACA officials hope this total will be increased this year.

BUT GLOOMY statistics were given by Richard Wangerin, St. Louis, president of the American Symphony Orchestra League.

Some examples:

Between 1962 and 1967, the gross budgets of major symphonies increased 78.8 per cent. Earnings increased only 58.6 per cent by comparison, and operating deficits increased an average of 114.2 per cent.

In 1962-63, six orchestras had budgets of more than $1 million; in 1967-68, 17 had budgets of more than $1 million.

Six of them have deficits of over $1 million each. The net deficit of 24 orchestras, for example, amounted to $2,675,000, or over $100,000 each. (Compare the Flint Symphony's $20,000).

IN THE five years surveyed symphonies' earning power through ticket sales dropped from 55 per cent to 48 percent of their budgets on the average. In cold cash, in the five years the over-all amount symphonies needed in contributed income rose from $14 million to $44 million.

"We are afraid," said Wangerin, "of the tiring of the volunteer, who keeps being asked to raise more money and still sees no end in sight."

Although many people have doubted the Nixon administration will be greatly interested in providing money for the arts, Burgard did point out that the Nixon plan for sharing certain federal tax money with the states and cities could conceivably end with some benefit to the arts in time.

REGARDLESS, both men described the idea of regional cooperation of orchestral organizations (some are already working together) as a means of economy and of strengthening the so-called smaller symphonies.

Tanglewood itself, home of the Berkshire Music Festival and summer haunt of the Boston Symphony, apparently ran into a moneymaker Tuesday night and at the same time chalked up a record.

The biggest Tanglewood crowd ever — over 22,000 — showed up, not for the Boston Symphony, but for a concert by the rock groups The Who, B.B. King and the Jefferson Airplane. Officials said the largest previous crowd was about 16,000 for a "classical" concert in 1965.

The Flint Journal
FLINT, MICH.
D. 115,014 SUN. 115,373

AUG 14 1969

Critics Elect

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The National Music Critics Association elected officers Thursday, naming Boris E. Nelson of the Toledo Blade to a second term as president.

The critics are meeting at Tanglewood, Mass., as guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center.

UTICA PRESS
Friday, August 15, 1969

Boris Nelson Heads Music Critics Group

LENOX, Mass. (AP)—The National Music Critics Association elected officers Thursday, naming Boris E. Nelson of the Toledo Blade to a second term as president.

047

The critics are meeting at Tanglewood, Mass., as guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center.

Chosen for two-year terms in addition to Nelson were Miles Kastendieck of the Christian Science Monitor, Irving Lowens of the Washington Evening Star and William Littler of the Toronto Star, vice presidents; Mark Acheson of the Southampton Press, secretary; and Jay Rosenfeld of the Berkshire Eagle, treasurer.

Raymond Morin of the Worcester Telegram, David Kozinski of the Wilmington Journal and Martha Clem of the Berkshire Eagle were elected to the executive board.

Forty-two members of the association are attending the four-day conference.

TELEGRAPH
NASHUA, N. H.
(E) 19,203

AUG 15 1969

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
(E) 14,465

AUG 15 1969

SENTINEL
WATERVILLE, MAINE
(M) 21,324

En AUG 15 1969 En

Music Critics Hold Election Of Officers

Special to The Journal

LENOX, Mass.—Boris Nelson of the Toledo Blade has been re-elected president of the Music Critics Association, an international organization devoted to the improvement of music criticism in the press.

Others elected at the annual meeting during the Tanglewood Festival here are:

First vice president, Miles Kastendieck, New York music critic of the Christian Science Monitor; second vice president, Irving Lowens of the Washington Evening Star; third vice president, William Littler of the Toronto Star; secretary, Marcus Acheson, music critic of the Southhampton, N.Y., Press, and treasurer, Jay C. Rosenfeld of the Berkshire Eagle, Pittsfield, Mass.

The nominating committee included S. Gordon Gapper of The Flint, Mich., Journal, former secretary of the association.

The association will begin next month publication of a periodical, American Musical Digest, devoted to criticism of American music and musicians extracted from newspapers and magazines in the United States and abroad.

Melodies mingle with scenic beauty at Tanglewood

Sunday, Aug. 10, 1969 X The Arizona Republic N-3

By BINA BREITNER

TANGLEWOOD, Mass. — The Berkshire Festival had already been under way for several weeks when I and five other music critics arrived from around the nation to attend a three-week seminar in contemporary music.

I had never been to Tanglewood, and even the descriptions of its beauty do not match its natural wonder.

The sounds of a bassoonist repeating a Hindemith phrase mingle all day with operatic melodies, orchestral fragments, a jazzy saxophone and the comfortable conversation of musicians gathered on the grass or in clumps of cafeteria tables.

Bina

Best of all, though, is the view of green mountainsides, miles of trees and lawns leading down to a serene blue lake, sunsets that match Arizona's in grandeur, if not in colors, and perpetually mingling billows of grey fog and clouds.

TANGLEWOOD is a 210-acre estate near Lenox, in western Massachusetts, close to the New York border. It belongs to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and they, among others, inhabit it during the summer.

This year, for the first time the Music Critics Association is sponsoring, with funds from the Fromm Foundation, an informal school to help the nation's music critics more fully understand the nature of contemporary music.

My colleagues and I will be here through next Sunday.

We have been involved so far in two concerts, several rehearsals, conversations with composers Peter Tod Lewis and Theodore Antoniou, a session of criticizing each other's reviews and analysis by BSO conductor Erich Leinsdorf of Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck," which will be performed here tomorrow and Sunday in one of several indoor and outdoor auditoriums.

THE MUSICAL FARE is not limited to 20th century orchestral or operatic works. The Festival of Contemporary Music of the Berkshire Music Center (academy of music) also includes modern chamber music, jazz and rock.

The night we arrived, we had a jazz concert featuring the unlikely combination of soul-tingling gospel singer Mahalia Jackson, the not-very-big big band sounds of the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra, and the frenetic jazz brilliance of avant-garde composer-saxophonist-trumpeter-violinist Ornette Coleman and his quartet.

Later, we had an exhausting encounter with orchestral works of Cristobal Halffter (b. 1930, Madrid), Lewis (b. 1932, Charlottesville, Va.), Antoniou (b. 1935, Athens, and the violent composer of the evening), Walter Piston (b. 1894, Rockland, Maine, the old master of the program), and Alexander Goehr (b. 1932, England). Tonight we have the modern chamber music.

BILL GRAHAM of the Fillmores East and West is presenting the next "Contemporary Trends" concert Tuesday. We missed Janis Joplin, the Butterfield Blues Band, Tim Hardin and more rock stars who appeared before we arrived. Graham's concert will offer us Jefferson Airplane, The Who, B. B. King and Joshua Light Show. We will also have an electronic music concert Saturday.

Downtown Lenox, if one may so exaggerate, is only two miles from Tanglewood, quite near our dormitory at Berkshire Christian College.

It's a charming New England town filled with clapboard houses with porches and white fences, small shops and art galleries, Old World hotels and trees to hide the necessary gas stations. The streets are narrow and the atmosphere is one of calm and small town trust.

In the near future we will have a great deal more music: two more senior critics, (Miles Kastendieck and Tom Willis) to assist Elliott Galkin, our leader the last few days; more sessions discussing purpose, content, and style of music criticism; meeting with composers; and vistas to make the music a visual as well as aural pleasure.

When time permits, I will provide you with more details. It may take a while because if the lake doesn't tempt me, a rehearsal or a metalside will murs of mass approval rise over countless audiences when good quality show tunes, patriotic airs and personable vocalists, or soloists are presented. I am confident that our very competent Symphony Orchestra can perform even such mundane fare to perfection.

AMUSEMENTS

Insofar as attracting music lovers to the Symphony's own series at Music Hall, one can only observe the history of the Boston Pops. One cannot quibble with the Pop's success in catering to that large segment of music lovers now present on the American scene.

George Smith's affable personality, his lively programs and apt vocalist and soloist choices have gained him popularity through the years as a master of his trade in the Park Board concerts.

His personal advice and a perusal of his programs of the past ten years would be most helpful to companies financing the concerts, and finally to the Symphonic programmer for the ultimate long-lastingness of this worthwhile endeavor. Sincerely, MR. AND MRS. VICTOR F. JELEN.

ONE OF THE MAIN TOPICS to be discussed at sessions of the Music Critics Association meeting next week at Tanglewood (near Lenox, Mass.) will be the financial plight of major, minor and community orchestras in the USA. Linked with this subject will be, of course, the "hot" topic of merging orchestras — a matter of heated discussion in Buffalo (N. Y.) for instance, where the money situation was so desperate that an emergency (successful) drive for funds to support the orchestra only staved off an "inevitable crisis." A merger of the Buffalo and Rochester orchestras is being weighed carefully by all parties involved.

There was talk last year of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra joining forces with the Dayton Philharmonic to help solve mutual financial problems. "Patriotic" Daytonians displayed indignation at what they called "bull-dozer tactics"; later CSO Manager Lloyd H. Haldeman admitted that supporters of the Dayton Philharmonic status quo "kicked us in the teeth." (Haldeman did not initiate this idea, by the way.)

I will report on "merger-itis" (and other orchestra problems) from Tanglewood when I attend the MCA conference.

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 189,425 SUN. 302,445

AUG 6 1969

136-a

Changes Are Necessary, Critic Learns

Hard Times Face Musicians

By S. GORDON GAPPER
Journal Music Critic

HANOVER N. H. — The way you hear it these days—from composers, conductors and performers — the changes which have taken place in music are nothing compared with what we are about to receive.

Conversations during the annual conference at Tanglewood in Massachusetts and here at Dartmouth College's seventh annual Congregation of the Arts make it as clear as a New England mountain stream that these changes are going to surge from the concert audience to the parlor piano.

And both of those, incidentally, are in danger of being swept out to sea.

There is an intensity, indeed a desperation, in the musical scene today as concerned persons try to find the answer to holding audiences against the threats — if that is what they are — of economics and technology. To take an example of the latter first:

The critics en masse were able to hear the Baldwin electronics piano, which was first played in public by Lorin Hollander last February to a limited audience in New York City.

It was demonstrated in the shed at Tanglewood the other day. It is a concert grand without sounding board. Instead, the string vibrations are picked up electronically and reproduced through loudspeakers under the instrument.

The sounds available to the pianist are much softer and louder than those he can make with a conventional piano. Moreover, through the use of two pedals he can vary the intensity of sound as much as he likes to give a tremolo effect and can confine his effects to either end of the keyboard. Eventually, the controls will be placed close to the keyboard and he will be able to vary timbre as well as volume, thus adding vastly to the capabilities of the piano. The sound, too, can be channeled to other speakers.

All this is not to plug the Baldwin Piano and Organ Co. (the other major American piano distributor apparently is not interested) but simply to show how far the use of electronically modified instruments has gone beyond the "traditional" audience's fikes and dislikes. The company expects it to take some time to get into real production — perhaps a year — and is making no prediction about price.

The critics also were given a demonstration of "domestic" four channel stereophonic sound, which will be available in the Boston area this fall (if you have four stereo radio sets) and undoubtedly will be found everywhere before too long.

Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be broadcast in this area from two FM stations. The effect of having speakers for different channels at the four corners of the room is, as they say, total concert hall realism. The broadcasts will be sponsored, one feels obliged to say, by the firm which helped develop the technique, Acoustic Research, Inc., Cambridge, Mass.

What all this — live or recorded — is going to do to the concert hall audience is anybody's guess. Or would be if it weren't for an uncomfortable fact already noted by John Hamilton, director of Dartmouth College's electronic music studio.

That is that for the first time last season, audiences for symphony orchestras in the United States dropped.

This does not mean that the cultural boom in the United States has gone bust; it means that the stream of music is beginning to flow into entirely new channels and that the custodians and purveyors of music —those who pay and those who play —are going to pull farther away from their already alienated audiences unless something drastic is done.

Ralph Burgard, an official of the Associated councils for the Arts, a national body serving state and local arts councils, told the critics at Tanglewood:

"New forms of regional cooperation are going to be important — for economy and for reaching new audiences."

He gave as an example the cooperation of several musical organizations (symphony orchestras and others) in Ontario, which have a centralized, computerized mailing, a unified box office and a common employe insurance play.

He believes actual mergers of orchestras (such as those proposed for Buffalo and Rochester in New York, or Cincinnati and Indianapolis) "are not going to be much of a factor."

He added that a national scientific survey had indicated that music and sex (not necessarily in that order) have given individuals their most important experiences.

Which seems to give force to his argument that "the money crisis has to be solved" and that the arts deserve "higher priority" than they have had "in the nation's business."

Richard Wangerin, president of the American Symphony Orchestra League, outlined the so-called Missouri Plan in which the Missouri State Council for the Arts is involved. The object is to have the St. Louis Symphony and the Kansas City Philharmonic take part in small-town orchestra series.

First-chair players in the two large orchestras would be available to give clinics in high schools and also as soloists in concertos with the poorer orchestras. And the local orchestras would be invited to send stands of players to take part in rehearsals and performances of the larger orchestras.

The scheme, Wangerin said, would raise the artistic standards of the smaller orchestras and at the same time broaden the earning power and audience of the larger orchestras.

Music lovers are now aware that the Minneapolis Symphony's title has been broadened to Minnesota and that rumors are rife as to the Detroit Symphony's intentions to get on concert series in outstate Michigan, including that of the Flint Symphony.

Whether or not you believe such moves are advantageous to both parties, Wangerin said, they "need understanding on both sides" to make them work.

Symphonic costs are up, Wangerin pointed out, because payrolls keep climbing.

Although orchestral players' salaries average under $10,000, he said, the scale for players in the top ten orchestras began last year at $10,000.

Basic payment for the Philadelphia Orchestra, he said, is $16,080 per man and "that's for a 20-hour week and includes seven weeks' vacation."

Of that, he said, $14,000 represents what the sponsoring society has to raise and the rest what each player gets from the orchestra's recording contract. (Some orchestras, including the Boston Symphony, are now signing contracts with European record companies because reproduction costs are much cheaper across the water).

Erich Leinsdorf, retiring conductor of the Boston Symphony, observed for the critics that it is rehearsals and not performances that cost money, since there are more of them, and that "there has been a steady erosion" of rehearsal time resulting from decisions in musician - management salary negotiations.

The result of fewer rehearsals is, he said, that some orchestras are giving fewer programs than before, even if the number of concerts has increased. They are, in other words, sticking pretty much to familiar, well-rehearsed material.

It is readily demonstrable that this is not keeping young audiences, and Conductors, and Marion Di Bonaventura, the music director of Dartmouth's summer arts program, believes that if economics has to be a determining factor in the survival of music, some drastic changes have to be made in how the music business is run.

"Music is at a crossroads," he told me," or rather at a dead end, because its economic life is threatened. Music will have to have a day of reckoning."

One part of the solution as he sees it appears paradoxical.

He suggests that in view of the increased length of most orchestras' seasons, the membership of orchestras could be increased from about 100 to about 140 to make them more flexible in length of employment and styles of program (the effective size of two large orchestras which merge, it has been suggested, would be reduced to about that figure.

He also suggests that it is "absolutely imperative that audiences be brought past Ravel and Debussy"—that is, into the vast contemporary literature which many orchestras ignore, despite young people's interests.

He believes that many persons stay away from concerts because they hear enough traditional music piped into offices, stores, elevators and airline terminals.

To Hamilton, the electronic composer surrounded by $50,000 worth of equipment (making the Dartmouth studio one of the top five in the United States.), the corner has been turned.

He looks forward to a computer hookup (which some other schools have) which will make the electronic composer's work a lot easier. Even now, he told me, the technical knowledge required to compose music electronically is "much less crucial" than it was when composers began playing with sine tones.

There are still only about 200 commercial records of electronic music, said Hamilton, running his hands along Dartmouth's huge stock of unpublished tapes by most of the world's masters of electronic music. But the supply is increasing and Hamilton gave this example of the demand.

Dartmouth has issued a disc of works by finalists in its 1968 International Electronic Music Competition. Before the recent LP, "Switched-on Bach," made from a Moog synthesizer, hit the stands, the Dartmouth disc had sold 4,000 copies. Since "Bach" appeared, the Dartmouth disc sold 25,000 copies in a similar time period.

Having heard something familiar played electronically, people are more willing to listen to original electronic composition, he believes.

The same kind of equipment that is sending astronauts to the moon and back turns up in the composition of electronic music and Di Bonaventura had something to say about this: "I find it quite grotesque that these heroic men played "Take Me Back to Houston." I would have found it equally grotesque if they had played "Aida." They still would have proved themselves victims of our cultural environment."

The Flint Journal, Flint, Michigan
Monday, August 18, 1969

Critics, We Hate You: That's Brief Comment Of a Noted Composer

By JOHN DWYER

"MUSIC critics, I think, have a kind of neurotic need to be loved. But this is manifestly impossible. The fact is, we hate you."

The speaker was modern composer Gunter Schuller, at the recent gathering of music critics from about 25 states and Canada, at the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood, Mass.

Mr. Schuller, on a panel with other composers, a leading soprano, a publisher and a Boston Symphony Orchestra official, said he had 25 years of experience with music critics to back his statement, and added that about 95 per cent of music critics were inept, inaccurate, insensitive, hopelessly biased.

His two biggest hang-ups were leading critics of New York and Boston, which happen to be his home working territory. Mr. Schuller is head of the New England Conservatory and a frequent conductor of programmed composer in Manhattan.

* * *

A SCHULLER OPERA highly esteemed in the German press was downgraded in New York. A Schuller series of modern works by many composers in Carnegie Recital Hall has not had easy going. The Schuller book, "Early Jazz" (Oxford University Press, 1968) has occasioned some sharp dissent, but worse, some indifferent and lackadaisical comment here and there. In my view it is an excellent and penetrating work, miles above all but a handful of texts on the subject.

Mr. Schuller continued: Even when music critics praised him, it tended to be fatuous and for the wrong reasons. In summary, he couldn't see that any worthy purpose at all was served by the critical profession, though one thing was clear: Adverse criticism, particularly in the last decade, has had no effect whatever on his upward progress as composer, conductor and administrator. As indeed it hasn't.

* * *

WELL, IT WAS more than uncomfortable. Decent critics suffer acutely from their own printed sins, which cannot really be erased by any ensuing, amending comment. And they seem to share a collective guilt, as it was obvious here, at accounts of manifest unfairness or lack of comprehension anywhere in the profession.

Still, something was terribly wrong. Critic Elliott Galkin of the Baltimore Sun responded first, while most of us were trying to sort out our malfeasances from a blanket indictment.

Dr. Galkin had been running the Music Critics Association's first Berkshire Internship Program for six young critics, or young at the trade. His mission was to encourage them to write well, fairly and clearly, seek high standards and mature perspective and, perhaps above all, develop a sense of commitment to a profession of reasonable dignity which might result in some contribution to art.

* * *

HE DESCRIBED these aims versus the morbid prospect outlined by composer Schuller. He said that in all justice a critic or composer should be judged by the best he has done. And he wasn't going to be told by any disgruntled composer or anyone else that his efforts (very wearying and freely given efforts, I will add) to raise critical standards and goals were worthless, and that he ought to close up shop.

He said much more that was pointed, and at length Mr. Schuller replied that Dr. Galkin's critical writings were fine, but a rare exception. That was hardly the point.

For myself I didn't know what to do about the Schuller implacable impasse, really, but I called for and got the floor, rose and said: "Mr. Schuller, I love you." It drew some relieved laughter, and from Mr. Schuller the only smile, I believe, in a somber session.

From there, I suggested that Mr. Schuller should get around more, possibly take residence in Buffalo, Montreal, Toronto other music centers where music including the wildest avant-garde is greeted with interest and at the very least, careful reporting.

* * *

IN SUCH CENTERS composers are among the most avid newspaper readers, and if they are not always cited for excellence, they are paid close attention and the object is to understand them and convey their ideas to the public.

From there on it was rather jumbled and not very orderly, with comments flying around, triggered by these two statements. In truth, there was no articulate conclusion on either side and composer Schuller had to hurry off to rehearsal of a modern program for the festival.

However, I think I can put together what Dr. Galkin and I had in mind, though I do not know Dr. Galkin except by honored reputation and there was no collaboration before or after:

If 95 per cent of music critics are to be disqualified (Mr. Schuller's unilateral assumption, but we'll assume it) that still leaves 5 per cent of critics to be reckoned with on a serious basis. It could be argued quite as well that only 5 per cent of composers are worth critical comment. History, not music critics, gives the second assumption more support than the first.

* * *

NOW, THEN, visualize a music critic addressing a gathering of composers and saying: "You seem to have an unassimilated childhood desire to be loved, but the fact is, we music critics hate you.

"About 95 per cent of you write worthless trash. Of the rest, you probably please us for the wrong reasons. Your activity in writing down notes and making sounds, therefore, we cannot classify as art. The profession of composing, in short, has no artistic basis at all. And we have 25 years of listening experience to clinch the argument."

Such a music critic making such a statement to any composers, bad or good, would be repudiated by the best of his critical colleagues, I think, and his remarks rejected in toto on the grounds of rank prejudice.

It is my hope that some day composer Schuller will see the connection.

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, August 23, 1969

1366

MUSIC: The Function of Criticism

By PAUL FROMM

The only excuse I can offer for what might otherwise seem presumptuous — a discussion of music criticism — is my eagerness to promote and improve the cultural climate for music. My credentials consist simply of forty years spent listening to music and my desire to increase my own capacities and awareness as a listener. Also, I have a profound longing to live in a community where the significance of music is recognized as an integral part of our cultural and intellectual life, where the sustenance and development of the music of our own time is a deeply felt responsibility.

Since music criticism is the only available channel of general information on music, I have always turned to it with hopeful expectancy. Thus there is no hint of any professional involvement in my attitude toward criticism. I, as an individual, merely would hope to benefit from good music criticism; and I would therefore be most grateful were it to achieve its highest potential.

The question might then be asked of me, how optimistic am I that it will fulfill a useful role in the future? My reaction whenever anyone asks me about the state of musical life in any of its forms is rather like that of a meteorologist who is asked about his prognosis for the day's weather. "Optimistic," he says. "But," the enquirer persists, "if you are so optimistic, why do you look so worried?" "Because," he answers, "I am not at all sure that my optimism is justified."

I do not pretend to predict the future of music criticism, and I certainly do not wish to pass judgment on what the critics have done or are doing. To do so would be as presumptuous for me as it is for some of our music journalists to presume to legislate what music should be, rather than communicating what it is. Instead, I will suggest to you, the critics, what has proved must useful to me, both as your reader and as a music lover. I will also indicate what has not been helpful, and I will conclude by mentioning what I look forward to finding in future criticism. My hope is that these comments may be useful to you.

However, I am not suggesting that any imperatives exist, or that the way to meet your obligations to the reader is to write down to him. Just as composition and performance should realize the composer's ideas, so music criticism should satisfy the writer's sense of professionalism. The only obligation to the reader is to inform and to educate. And this obligation can be met only by good critical judgments, and these, in turn, depend on uncompromising self-criticism.

The music critic has special responsibilities. While the performer and the composer influence the cultural climate by the nature and quality of their work, the professional critic — who also has the right to pursue his own ends — because of the position he holds, has a great influence on the way in which the work of the performer and composer is understood. Therefore, he, too, influences the cultural community. He has the power to help or hinder his readers in achieving enlightened and informed contact with the musical activity around them.

If you critics feel that music criticism has fulfilled its responsibilities to the utmost, you will not find my dissatisfactions with the past or my hopes for the future either interesting or useful. But you are here, presumably, because of your own concern about the role of music journalism. Perhaps you, too, are not entirely satisfied with it. Or perhaps you think that its influence has declined and wish to recapture its earlier importance. But since the importance of music criticism in the past was largely of a commercial nature, I can hardly believe that you would participate in a serious musical forum if you hoped merely to revive this kind of commercialism. So I assume that, far from feeling nostalgia for music criticism of the past, you are looking searchingly into the question of what it can become.

Paul Fromm looks over the score of "Events II" with the composer, Theodore Antoniou. The work was commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation and had its first performance on July 30 at the Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood.

Some of the salient features of music journalism as it has been, and as it largely still is, constitute formidable barriers to such a hopeful development. In particular, what I miss is a concentration on what must ultimately be the critical issue and the only real news in music: The awareness of the characteristics of an individual composition. Instead, there is an unfortunate preoccupation with the activity rather than the object. Yet the activity exists only for the object — the individual musical composition and even a "literature" of music is no more than a collection of individual compositions, a clear case of a whole that is indeed less than the sum of, or even one of, its parts.

This concentration on the activity tends to obstruct the reader's awareness of the object. Often it takes the form of an espousal of an ideological position about music, the advocacy of a particular "style," and more often the rejection of some other "style." However, ideology is, in fact, utterly irrelevant in music: Ideology concerns itself with the way things have been done in general rather than the way in which a particular thing has been done. As a matter of fact, outside of journalism, talk about "styles" and "kinds of music" has very little currency among musicians, especially composers, and particularly contemporary American composers. Accordingly, to write about music in ideological terms is to report inaccurately on the state of musical thought and activity, and to create a journalistic world of music that is in no way recognizable as the world of music itself. Thus, when ideological points are made under the guise of reportage, the objective of musical clarification is not well served. For example, phrases like "post-Webern serialism" are used as code words. I do not approve of such simplifications and I urge you not to approve of them either. And, indeed, one wonders whether such pseudo-descriptive terms are in the best traditions of journalism or intellectual honesty. It seems to me that music journalism could more usefully turn our attention to what the writer himself finds interesting, and hence thinks that we, too, might find interesting.

Also, one wonders what could possibly be a writer's reason for disparaging a certain way of composing music or a particular piece. To hurt someone's feelings? To turn away others even though they might otherwise find a particular piece or performance worthwhile? To influence a "market place" that scarcely exists?

What relevance is there in the question of how many composers are doing a particular kind of thing at a particular time? There is, after all, only one Tristan and Isolde, only one Theory of Relativity, only one Finnegan's Wake, only one Principia Mathematica. What if no one was ever inspired to imitate or develop a given musician's ideas? Does this mean that his work should not have existed, or that it had no value as a creation of the human imagination? A journalistic world where uniqueness is negatively associated with value and quality is indeed at odds with our intellectual and cultural traditions. How many fugue composers would there have to be to justify the works of J. S. Bach?

To speak of that composer, an ideological anachronism in his own time, raises the issue of the pertinence of another idea that frequently appears in newspaper columns: The idea of "musical progress." Composers are often castigated for their "exhausted style." This is especially vexing in the case of music that is presumed to be "twelve-tone," or "traditional" in some obvious way. Imagine criticizing Beethoven for writing his Ninth Symphony in the same tonal system that everyone knew and was supposedly tired of because he had used it in his First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh and Eighth!

I am deliberately refraining from quoting any particular writer because I do not wish to appear to be raising issues of personality. To do so would merely obscure issues which I believe to be vital. Nor would I wish to tell any critic that he should not have written something that he did, in fact, write. To do so would be to be guilty of precisely what I find most obstructive in music criticism: The attempt to legislate what other people ought to be interested in, or, more especially, what they ought not to be interested in.

But if neither of these is the purpose of ideological-legislative writing about music, what is its social or musical purpose, its intellectual locus? Music, after all, has no physical effects; it can not actually be bad for people who are interested in it. And it certainly can not harm those who pay no attention to it. So at best, ideological writing is an excuse for making judgments on the basis of the gross characteristics of pieces rather than their special, individual characteristics; or a way of castigating people whom the writer dislikes or disapproves of. Or it could be a way of helping or hurting whole groups of people economically or professionally, and that surely would be an abuse of a position of influence. Or is it that perhaps ideology and its accompanying air of controversy make good copy? Conflicts between things and persons are no doubt quicker to arouse interest than serious information about what lies within those things or people. I am aware that the "our-side — their-side" formula, intellectually impoverished though it may be, seems to satisfy the needs of a considerably larger number of public-communication purposes than to capture the aesthetic experience of an encounter with a work of art. But, assuming this formula does have a commercial or persuasive value at the gut level for politicians, or "absolute truth" value for revivalist clergymen, what possible value can commercial considerations have for music where originalities and subtleties of ideas and compositions are what count?

Let me hasten to add at this point that the issues are just as germane for non-musicians writing about music as for professional music critics. Nor are composers immune from similar presumptions. Consider the remark made by Arnold Schoenberg in a letter to Rudolf Kolisch about Kolisch's analysis of one of Schoenberg's Quartets. Schoenberg said that it was not useful to know "how it is done, but only what it is." Now, even a moment's reflection reveals the vacuousness of such a remark, for obviously to speak of "how it is done" can only be a metaphoric description of "what it is." How it was done is thus a hypothetical question; even "what it is" depends on who is talking about it. The composer himself can only be talking about "what it is," despite his supposedly privileged access to the information about "how it is done." Such privileged access is no guarantee against nonsense. Suppose, for example, that I announced that I was going to draw an elephant, and produced what plainly was a horse. Would my insistence that I had drawn an elephant make the results any less a picture of a horse to everyone else? Or, what is more to the point, should it create such an impression?

But the critic may ask, "How can I communicate the sense of a piece I have heard only once to readers who have never heard it and have never studied music?" One obvious answer is: "Study it, and don't write about it after hearing it

See FROMM, Page C-8

The Fromm Music Foundation is an institution which has actively supported the cause of contemporary music in this country for many years. One of its major activities has been the sponsorship (jointly with the Berkshire Music Center) of an annual festival of contemporary music at Tanglewood.

This summer, the foundation underwrote the cost of a three-week music critics' institute sponsored by the Music Critics Association at Tanglewood in association with the contemporary "festival within a festival." The purpose was to give half a dozen professional writers about music a chance to investigate in depth, through direct contact with the composers and performers, some of the difficult works in new styles that were presented.

Paul Fromm, the Chicago wine-merchant who established the foundation bearing his name, is a music-lover of discernment and wide background. The cogent remarks here printed were delivered at the opening session of the 16th annual conference of the Music Critics Association, which took place last month at Tanglewood.

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 362,408
SEP 7 1969

FROMM: Critics Role

Continued From Page C-4

only once if you can't make sense of it." One of the most valuable services a critic can render is to point out explicitly that a single hearing of something as complex as even the simplest musical composition is hardly a satisfactory way to experience it. If being uninformed qualifies one to make a judgment, nothing that is sophisticated or complex will be valued. Yet Western culture places its highest value on achieving coherence where there is great complexity. If a work were judged solely on the basis of a single encounter, what would one think of the creations of Faulkner, Joyce or Jackson Pollock? What a single hearing tends to encourage is, in fact, the promulgation of facile, readily evocative music.

Another mistake, I think, is the notion that the reader wants or needs something that will convey the "sense" of a piece that he has not heard. But the fact is that there is no reason to value genuinely informative music criticism before one has heard the composition. Every word, every supposedly descriptive phrase, has a multitude of possible musical referents. Words can convey meaning only in conjunction with the concrete sounds of a piece. Therefore, it would be enormously valuable to a listener to provide him with information that he could use either in anticipation of listening or as restrospective elucidation. In such terms, criticism is indeed a form of basic analysis, and requires the full attention and capacity for musical understanding that only a highly sophisticated musician can have. Thus, the criitc, as a musician who writes, has the further burden of developing a clear and simple vocabulary, understandable to a reader uninitiated in musical terminology. This is a formidable task, but an essential one. Its performance would remove music criticism from the realm of vague talk that often is obscure and frivolous.

However, even a writer who lacks the expertise to be a music critic can do worthwhile journalistic work. He can report on musical life, thus helping create public awareness and a milieu for music. Moreover we need informed watchdogs to remind our musical custodians of their deficiencies with regard to their public responsibilities. For example, no one even remembers to play Stravinsky's more recent music, even though everyone talks about Stravinsky. And, although statements of personal preferences reveal only how the writer happens to feel about a composition or a composer's work, expressions of enthusiasm are surely a good thing. At the very least they indicate the depth of the engagement that music is capable of engendering. A critic's praise, though it cannot guarantee widespread enthusiasm, can stimulate interest; and this can result in the performance of a work so that others can hear it and decide for themselves. Without the commitment of critics and performers many works of esoteric composers would remain unfamiliar. Under no circumstances can I see any virtue in preventing performances.

In fact, there is so much to be done that I am at a loss to understand why music critics would wish to dwell on irrelevant musical concerns instead of writing on music and musical life in a meaningful way. Music, in its devotion to ideas, is forever renewing itself with each composition and each performance. But the new is only that which has never previously been known. It is merely the particular and the unique, not the unprecedented. The critic's task in regard to new or apparently new music continues to be both a challenging and productive one. In the hope of encouraging you in this task, I offer a remark Thomas Mann made in his introduction to Hesse's Demian. Demian says: "The new is beginning and for those who cling to the old the new will be horrible. What will you do?" Mann suggests that the right answer would be: "Assist the new without sacrificing the old. The best servitors of the new . . . may be those who know and love the old and carry it over into the new."

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 318,026 SUN. 362,403
AUG 15 1969

NEWS OF MUSIC

Spectaculars Enliven Critic's Conference

By IRVING LOWENS
Music Critic of The Star

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass.—The annual conference of the Music Critics Association, which came to an end here yesterday, coincided with the second week of the Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

It was, without question, one of the more spectacular conferences in the association's somewhat staid 16-year history, and it was matched, to a certain extent, by some extremely spectacular musical events.

Tanglewood itself was considerably shaken when a reported 22,000 people, most of them of the pre-30, long-haired variety, showed up Tuesday for a rock concert featuring B. B. King, The Who, The Jefferson Airplane, and The Joshua Light Show. The well-behaved crowd was easily the largest in Tanglewood's history, more than doubling the number attracted by Van Cliburn and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the previous weekend.

The rock affair, presented under the rubric of "The Fillmore at Tanglewood," was one of a series of weekly Tuesday night "contemporary trends" concerts which have been jamming the 6,000-seat music shed and overflowing its ample capacity all summer. There is by no neans unanimous approval of the series, but there is no way to disregard the importance of such huge manifestations of desire to experience one type of organized sound.

Of somewhat greater musical substance was a quite extraordinary concert performance Monday of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," presented by the students comprising the Berkshire Music Center's orchestra and members of the center's vocal music program. Under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, making one of his final conducting appearances as director of the center, the difficult opera received an incandescent reading—certainly one which would have been a credit to any of the world's great opera companies. Well under half of the available seats were filled.

Still another type of spectacular transpired on Wednesday evening, when Stravinsky's "Histoire du Soldat" and Robert Ceely's "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum" (a work newly commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation) were performed in danced versions.

Joseph Gifford's choreography of the "Histoire" was matched in vulgarity and ineptitude by the pseudo-profundities of the English text by N. Richard Nash very roughly based on Ramuz' innocent but poignant little tale—a considerable achievement. The Ceely work seemed to me less offensive but no less pretentious. The evening was a sad waste of the tremendous talents of the young people who danced and played the music.

Last nights' concluding Fromm concert, during which world premieres by Robert Lewis, Phillip Rhodes and Edwin Dugger were heard, also turned out to be pretty much love's labor lost. It is unfortunate that the five pieces heard during the evening were all stylistically pretty much of a piece. The self-imposed musical ghetto into which they were thrust emphasized similarities in complexity and texture and minimized individuality.

The 45 or so critics from all over the country and Canada attending the conference had much to occupy their attention, in addition to the formal concerts, however, and the Wednesday afternoon discussion of the topic, "The Twilight of the Critics: Kritikerdaemmerung," provoked a spectacular verbal brawl which doubtless will become part of the folklore of music criticism in the future.

Gunther Schuller, head of the Berkshire Music Center's fellowship program and contemporary music activities, became, in effect, the spokesman of a five-member jury of musicians which weighted music criticism in the balance, found it wanting and condemned it to death.

Schuller led a blistering attack on all music criticism, called the profession obsolete and castigated its members — 95 percent of them — as ignorant, obscurantist and hostile to contemporary composers and performers. His sentiments were seconded by such distinghished musicians as Metropolitan Opera soprano Phyllis Curtin, who attacked Harold Schonberg of the New York Times (not present at the critics' conference) by name, citing specific instances of that writer's sins of omission and commission.

The critics, somewhat taken aback by the violence and emotionalism of the charges — such discussions usually are conducted on a much more genteel level—recovered from their shock rapidly and gave as good as they got. Some semblance of sanity was restored to the session when Jay Rosenfeld, music critic of the home-town Berkshire Eagle, took the floor to characterize Paul Fromm, the wine-merchant whose foundation was responsible for the week's music-making, as "the vintner of our discontent."

The visiting critics also had the opportunity to witness several spectacular advances in musical technology which may well affect the shape of music in years to come.

A four-channel stereo system developed by Acoustic Research was demonstrated, and the professional listeners heard, with astounding clarity not evident in the music shed, the true brilliance of the "Wozzeck" performance they had attended a few days earlier.

Beginning this fall, the four-channel system, which necessitates simultaneous broadcast by two multiplexing radio stations, will be utilized for Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts in its home city.

Equally spectacular in its potential was a new electronic grand piano still in the process of development by the Baldwin Piano Co. Some of its capabilities were shown by Luciano Berio, who is composing a large-scale work for the extraordinary instrument, which marks a major forward step in the development of the pianoforte.

Also on display was the first edition of a music critics' institute organized by the association at Tanglewood under Fromm Foundation sponsorship. Six critics had been in residence here for two weeks prior to the association's annual conference, studying the complexities of contemporary music under the guidance of senior critics and discussing problems of their craft with composers, performers and amongst themselves.

Officers elected for the 1969-71 period at the association's business meeting were Boris Nelson (Toledo Blade), president; Miles Kastendieck (Christian Science Monitor), Irving Lowens (Washington Evening Star), William Littler (Toronto Daily Star), Vice Presidents; Mark Acheson (Southampton Press), Secretary; Jay Rosenfeld (Berkshire Eagle), treasurer; David Kozinski (Wilmington Evening Journal), Martha Clem (Butler Eagle) and Raymond Morin (Worcester Telegram), board members-at-large.

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 189,425 SUN. 302,445
AUG 17 1969

'Rock' And 'Pop' May Support 'Classics'

Music Beat

Henry S. Humphreys

TANGLEWOOD (Lenox), Mass. — When I was in Tanglewood for the annual meeting of the Music Critics Association two years ago, I was aware of an optimistic and idealistic atmosphere in all phases of both the MCA conference and the regularly scheduled Berkshire Festival activities.

This year, there was a feeling, that we — not only music editors but creative and performing musicians as well — were in the midst of a confrontation closely linked with all the problems of inflation and even international crises.

Specifically, although the beautiful grounds of Tanglewood were still there to inspire the music lover who also happened to be a nature lover, the sight of veritable mountains of debris (bottles, sandwich bags, etc., etc.) being hauled away last Wednesday morning made it obvious that times had changed.

I refer, of course, to the aftermath of the appearance of The Jefferson Airplane which was a howling success, drawing almost 22,000 rock fans. The Jefferson Airplane, which had been preceded on this "Trends" series by such popular events as Janis Joplin, The Iron Butterfly and Mahalia Jackson, impressed the visiting music critics as quite an unusual invasion of a once sacrosanct stronghold of what is generally called "classical" music. It cannot be ignored that it is better to have The Jefferson Airplane and other profitable mass-popular events than to worry about where the money is coming from to maintain the very high standards of the regular Boston Symphony Tanglewood Concert Series.

THE MUSIC critics, who arrived Monday, were treated to an outstanding concert performance of Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" under Erich Leinsdorf's remarkable baton; even more amazing was the fact that the participants were not the Boston Symphony members or professional singers, but young members of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra and Vocal Fellows of the Center. Many critics, who heard this event, felt that it was on a par with the best performances in Europe or the United States.

THIS WRITER arrived in time to learn that the only way he could get to The Jefferson Airplane performance was to take a helicopter. The roads were jammed with cars from all points, loaded with Jefferson Airplane fans. After the concert, cars passed by our hotel until almost 2 a. m.

I am telling you this so that you can understand that, whether we like it or not, the music world has changed, and the day may come when every serious musical program will have to be financed by mass-popular music events that actually make a big profit.

WEDNESDAY was the day of verbal fireworks at the music critics' meeting. In the morning, a panel comprising Irving Lowens, Richard Wangerin, of the American Symphony Orchestra League, and Ralph Burgard, of the Associated Councils of the Arts, tackled head-on the agonizing question of where the money is coming from to support our major, minor, and community orchestras. Wangerin started the meeting off on the doleful note that the United States orchestras incurred in the 1968-69 season a total deficit of two-and-one-half million dollars.

"Frankly," Wangerin said, "Many orchestras will probably go under, much as we hate to say it." The ASOL fears, according to Wangerin, that volunteer symphony workers will simply get tired of putting in hours of work only to hear that the deficit is growing astronomically in spite of all their efforts. The problem of merging orchestras was discussed cogently, I feel, but there was not enough time at this meeting to go into specific and detailed merger proposals.

Throws 'Bomb'

Gunther Schuller, formerly first horn in the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Now New England Conservatory director told assembled music critics they should be "abolished" at the Tangelwood MCA meeting.

Burgard of the ACA did not feel that many orchestras would merge until several more seasons had elapsed; mostly because it is such a complicated procedure. Like his colleague, Wangerin, Burgard was greatly concerned with the tax reforms in Washington, which could "mess up" large gifts to orchestras and other fine arts activities. Burgard pointed out that the Canadians have worked out a much better system for governmental support of the arts.

This rather gloomy session was entitled "Pay Or Perish" and many critics had the impression — after the smoke had cleared — that both the ASOL and the ACA were hoping somehow for miracles, part of which could possibly be created by the press constantly calling attention to this crisis through articles and special columns. What the solution really is, only the Celestial Conductor really knows at this point.

I SPOKE of "fireworks," but perhaps I should have used the word "Molotov Cocktail" — which was exactly the effect of guest panelist Gunther Schuller's devastating attack on music critics in the Wednesday afternoon session entitled "Twilight Of The Critics" — Kritikerdaemmerung?" I should say at this point that not the least surprising thing about this firebomb is that Schuller hurled it into our midst two years ago in the 1967 Tanglewood Music Critics' Conference; it was almost as though we were listening to a tape of Gunther's previous denunciation of the music journalistic profession. Not only that, but another guest panelist, Phyllis Curtin, also cut music reviewers down to size in a repeat, more or less, of her remarks two years ago in the same controversial panel discussion.

Schuller's remarks and the "critical" reaction are certainly worth a separate article—even though, frankly, with this eminent and gifted gentleman, every knock is a boost. Suffice it to say that Gunther quite frankly admitted he hates music critics, even though he would rather love them. And the critics, who did finally get the floor, insisted that they did not hate Schuller, on the contrary, they had often praised him in the highest terms. But, as I said, it would be a pity not to tell you more about this in a separate discussion.

Later in the afternoon, members of the MCA gathered at the delightfully secluded Lenox Club to hear some of the new four-channel stereo broadcast tapes prepared by The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Acoustic Research for broadcasts of the BSO over WCRB and WGBH. And, truly, the fidelity of sound with this new technique is amazing.

WEDNESDAY night we heard a "way-out" contemporary music festival featuring Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat" (very fine young musicians and pantomime-dancers) and a new work, Robert Ceely's "Beyond The Ghost Spectrum," commissioned by the Fromm Foundation.

A REPORT on the new Baldwin electronic piano, as demonstrated during this MCA conference, will follow this article shortly.

Boris Nelson, Music Editor of the Toledo Blade, was reelected president of the MCA at Thursday mornings' business meeting. Also discussed was the new music critics' magazine, American Musical Digest, which now has permanent offices in New York City and several thousands subscriptions preparatory to its first official issue early this fall.

Thursday afternoon, music critics were guests of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas D. Perry Jr. (Mr. Perry is the manager of The Boston Symphony Orchestra and official host of this MCA conference). Incidentally, this genial BSO manager is a cousin to Phoebe (Mrs. James) Mixter.

Jim Mixter is a Baldwin Piano Company executive, who is President of the Cincinnati Summer Opera and extremely active in all Queen City music projects.

New Programs at Tanglewood

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 14 1969

By JAY ROSENFELD

THERE'S a revival of the old-time excitement at Tanglewood this half-week. The convergence of several powerful elements, focusing support and encouragement to musical progress, has presented several evidences of unusual vitality in the direction of a vigorous future.

Monday night there was the opera "Wozzeck." Last night, there was Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat" (The Soldier's Tale) and a new ballet, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," composed by Robert Ceely and commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

These events are the result of several factors: the vision of the "Academy" president, Gunther Schuller; the personal participation in these happenings of Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the current national convention at Tanglewood of the Association of Music Critics; and the intelligent munificence, and presence, too, of Paul Fromm.

LAST NIGHT Leinsdorf was indisposed and his place as conductor of the Stravinsky work was taken by Michael Tilson Thomas.

The original narrative by Charles Ferdinand Ramuz, the Swiss poet, was not used. A 1955 version, freely adapted from the Ramuz story and written by N. Richard Nash, was substituted. The narrator, Ronald Irving of the theatre faculty at Boston University, was dressed in academic gown and seated at a classroom desk with map behind him. He recited a fantastic and witty spoof in which the nation of Myopia has conferences to settle threats of war with its neighbor, Fallacia (or was it Phallusia?). The pantomime took place on a couch and surrounding approaches. Three protagonists took in rumors at the borders and disposed of them to everyone's satisfaction.

The other half of the evening was a presentation in which a small orchestra was assisted alternately by electronic tapes and a company of a dozen dancers from the Indian Hill summer arts workshop. Ceely used an expanded ensemble based on the Stravinsky pattern, one each of the extremes of the string registers, a quartet of reeds and three brass.

* * *

AFTER the intermission, Schuller brought Fromm to the stage, where the latter made a short address. He announced still more evidence of his benevolence, specifically to the Berkshire Music Center but more properly to American music in general. He handed Schuller a check to establish a library fund at the Center in the name of Leinsdorf, to honor the retiring conductor.

The theatre was crowded beyond its capacity last night and invisible bubbles of anticipatory prospects were almost tangible. The elements now in the Music Center retort could promise formulas which could be of high service and profit for the future.

138

'Desperate' Division Found Between Old and New in Music

By S. GORDON GAPPER
Journal Music Critic

If there was a theme to the Music Critics Association's recent annual meeting at Tanglewood, Mass., and to Dartmouth College's annual Congregation of the Arts, which some of us visited immediately afterward, it could be put like this:

While moon trips and the sophisticated technology they represent are taken for granted, many Americans seem unreceptive to the fact that music has made the same enormous strides in the use of equipment and the exploration of sound in the same incredibly short time.

The "old" and the "new" in music seem desperately — some would say fatally — divided, and we found musicians, musical administrators and fellow critics hard put to find ways to bridge this special kind of generation gap in what should be a happy whole.

If there were enough money, the cracks in the musical plaster could be papered over. But since it seems unlikely that tax money will ever be available in this country in the quanities it is in Europe for support of the arts, and since many large foundation grants are running out, musical organizations are having to rethink their structures and talk in terms of revolutionary changes.

In places, we may before long see regional music bodies large enough in numbers to be able to offer different types and styles of professional music to different audiences, although advocates are not very good at explaining how increased travel is to be paid for.

And that's only one practical detail that needs working on; the ideological and local "political" problems will be even more difficult of solution.

IT IS interesting at Tanglewood, near Lenox, to see the musical Janus (Roman god of doors) at work — one face looking back, the other forward.

On the one hand, the Boston Symphony Orchestra draws huge crowds to the shed for its summer festival to hear good old standard works in abundance. On the other is one of the country's most flourishing contemporary music festivals, the culmination of a summer school in which the under-25s, mainly, tangle with the most difficult of up-to-date scores.

Private subsidy is not dead, of course. The "now" scene is financed by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Paul Fromm himself, a wine merchant, admits he spends part of his fortune on this aspect of Tanglewood "to improve my own awareness" of what's going on in music.

He will also subsidize for a second year an institute for young or inexperienced music critics to help improve the standards of musical writing in the press.

Such altruism, and such love of watching new things develop in the artistic field, is rather rare, and there is no telling what seeds it is planting in music's garden.

MEANWHILE, there were blossoms enough to sniff around Nathaniel Hawthorne's cottage at Tanglewood. One of them is a perennial nearly half a century old, Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck."

The Boston's conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, who is retiring about this time and says "contemporary music is not written for a middle-class audience," directed the student orchestra and singers in a work which to many minds still is "terribly modern."

The performance was in a sense staged. The singers appeared behind and above the orchestra and were costumed.

They had obvious problems making their voices traverse the orchestral sound but projected well enough to convince the listener of their talent. Richard Taylor, New York, was Wozzeck and Alexandra Hunt, Omaha, Marie. The orchestra, surely very "middle class," would be the envy of most universities or large cities.

It was a stirring performance of a work already entrenced in the repertoire but so unlike Verdi that it rarely filters down to the community opera level. And that's a shame, because it represents a particularly intense philosophy of drama.

NOTHING else during a week of the contemporary festival seemed quite as successful, although this was more the fault of composers and stage directors than the young musicians, who have exceptional gumption about today's scores.

(In the words of Theodore Antoniou, a young Greek composer who was in residence at Tanglewood this summer, "Notation is one of the biggest problems of contemporary music." We had the opportunity to study one of his scores, and he's right.)

For works smaller than the likes of "Wozzeck," Leinsdorf, director of the entire Berkshire Center, defers to the head of the contemporary program, composer Gunther Schuller, and the school's conducting fellows.

Michael Tilson Thomas, Los Angeles, took care of Stravinsky's little dance with commentary, "L'Histoire du Soldat" (The Soldier's Story"), also 50 years old and with a message so obvious that it's hardly worth the bother of reviving unless the interpretation is less tediously silly than it was at Tanglewood. Thomas's seven-piece band did a first-rate job, however.

On the same program was a work commissioned by the center and Fromm, Robert Ceely's "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," also a short ballet with a small orchestra and tape accompaniment.

Ceely teaches at the New England Conservatory. I found his combination of instrumental and electronic music attractive, but the dance, abstract but geometric in its patterns, quite uninspiring.

There were five pieces on another program:

● James Yannatos's 1968 "Suite for Six," played by (you guessed it) six instrumentalists who are occasionally required to shuffle and make other sounds. Yannatos, a Harvard professor (now do you see why contemporary music isn't middle class?), conducted.

● Luciano Berio's 10-year-old "Differences" for five instruments and tape, Paul Zukofsky conducting. Berio was one of my favorite "now" composers even before I heard his "Visages" produced earlier this year at Ann Arbor complete with "sight effects."

It was he who pointed out to the critics at Tanglewood the "perishable nature" of music (particularly now that tapes are so common but deteriorate comparatively fast), and, quite rightly, I think, declared that the terms "beauty" and "ugliness" are obsolete when discussing today's music.

(To put the prodigy Antoniou in parentheses again, he seemed to agree on the "perishable" idea, saying, "I can only work with what I hear now. Next year I may be doing something else in music because of new ideas.")

● Robert Lewis's "Divertimento for Six Instruments" in its first performance. Yoav Talmi, Israel, conducted this work by a teacher at Goucher College and Johns Hopkins University.

● Phillip Rhodes's "Autumn Setting," a Berkshire-Fromm commission scored for soprano and string quartet and conducted by the composer. This was the most interesting work of the evening, to my mind, and not just because of the vocal gymnastics of Elsa Charlston, Chicago.

It proves that poetry (pieces by Patricia V. Schneider) can still be imaginatively set to music without a lot of the wrenching and distortion which seem so common. It was, if one must avoid the word "beautiful," pleasant.

Rhodes is a new species: From a job at Amherst College he is going to Louisville, Ky., as that city's "professional-in-residence" under a Music Educators National Conference program.

● Edwin Dugger's new "Intermezzi," also a Berkshire - Fromm commission. Schuller conducted the small ensemble. Dugger's at Berkley.

Most of the above names may mean nothing to the reader now. But he is advised to keep them in mind, because some day, you know . . .

In any case, we cannot be sure that the appeal of all this is as limited as Leinsdorf and others would have us believe. There were some provocative words for the critics from Ralph Burgard, an official of the Associated Councils for the Arts, New York, a body servicing state and city arts councils. He said:

"The democratic idea is catching up with the arts. There is a feeling that everyone should have a crack at everything along the line.

"Premises like the one that says only 2 per cent of the population is interested in the arts are being examined. Attitudes about art institutions and their relevance to our society are changing today.

"And the change is part of the rebellion in which the middle class wants to gain some control over its existence and do things for itself."

Burgard said the "confrontation with the slums" has produced significant artistic results; for example, he said, the Model Cities project for Seattle included a "large" appropriation for the arts because they were "the only part of the program that can give people a community identity and common purpose and possibly lead to these at other levels."

Composer Otto Luening, a venerated pioneer in electronic music, couldn't resist a grin, however. He indicated that electronic music, which is very "now" just now, may soon be in its biggest fight against standard middle class likes. Why?

"It's in the schools now. Now you'll have trouble."

FROM the seventh Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood to Dartmouth College's seventh Congregation of the Arts is not such a big step, geographically or musically, except for some differences of approach.

Dartmouth's congregation and its home, the Hopkins Center in the heart of Hanover, N.H., are, if not unique (and they may well be), at least highly unusual. But their story rates separate treatment, and this it will get next Sunday.

The Flint Journal
FLINT, MICH.
D. 115,014 SUN. 115,373

AUG 24 1969

Music's 'Rich Uncle' Sees Critic in Role of Educator

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

Few men are more qualified to comment on the current musical scene than Paul Fromm. A successful Chicago-based wine merchant who has followed music for 40 years, Fromm, through his Fromm Music Foundation, has supported generously since its inception the periodical "Perspectives of New Music", has long aided the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, and has co-commissioned, with the Center, several works per season from young composers.

Fromm gave a talk on music criticism a short while ago at Tanglewood to members of the ~~Music Critic~~ Association. What he said was so sound, and of such general interest to anyone who reads criticism, that his words are worth excerpting here.

For Fromm, interest in criticism springs "from a sincere desire to increase my capacities and awareness as a listener . . . Since music criticism is the only channel of generally available information for the cultural community, its potential capacity to inform significantly is so obvious that I have always turned to it with hopeful expectancy." The music critic, then, holding crucial ground between composer and audience, "has the power to help or hinder his readers in achieving the most enlightened and informed contact with the musical activity around them."

★

Having set the stage in these tones, Fromm got to the essence of his ideas. "What I miss in the criticism I read is a concentration in what must ultimately be the only critical issue and the only real news in music: an awareness of the characteristics of an individual composition. There is, in general, an unfortunate orientation toward the activity rather than the object . . ."

The critic's business is the music itself, and he must summon all his knowledge and taste and skill in forming a vocabulary to get his ideas, his perceptions about pieces, across to his readers.

What happens often instead, as Fromm accurately noted, is that music jounalists deal in empty slogans about styles and schools, in ideology in large part foreign to the workaday world inhabited by composers and conductors and practicing musicians.

"It is hard to see what musical enlightenment is conveyed" — Fromm continued — "and one wonders whether the purely persuasive use of apparently descriptive terms is in the highest traditions of journalism or intellectual honesty. It seems to me that what music jounalists can most usefully do is to turn our attention to things the writer himself finds interesting, and hence thinks that we too might find interesting."

Finally, Fromm offered a suggestion: ". . . what would be enormously valuable for a listener would be to provide him with information that he could use ether in anticipation of an actual hearing or as retrospective elucidation. In this sense, criticism is indeed a form of basic analysis . . ."

To my understanding, these are the words of a true amateur, of a man seeking a better understanding of the thing he loves.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950

AUG 24 1969

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

AUG 24 1969

Music Critics Scored at Tanglewood Forum

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Two composers, a Met soprano and an administrator took severe issue with the functions and validity of music criticism in a recent panel discussion at Tanglewood.

It was one event of a four-day conference held by the Music Critics Association.

Miles Kastendieck, music critic for the Christian Science Monitor (in New York) was chairman of the session that degenerated from veiled sarcasm to heated debate.

Critics' Critics

Panelists were Gunther Schuller and Robert Lewis, composers; Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Harry Kraut, administrator of the Berkshire Music Center; Lawrence K. Miller, editor of the Berkshire Eagle.

Had the panelists' view been acted upon, the title of the discussion would have had instantaneous application.

It was called "Kritiner daemmerung," or "Twilight of the Critics," and obvious parody on the Wagnerian opera title.

Too Negative

Kraut's comment that "the public is beginning to think there's something wrong with serious music because so much is being written about it negatively" had been instigated by the previous night's event at Tanglewood.

An audience of 22,000, the largest in Tanglewood history, had turned out for performances of rock, blues and psychedelic lights. Performers were B.B. King, The Who, and the Jefferson Airplane. Visual accompaniment was provided by the Joshua Light Show from Fillmore East, a rock music show place in New York City.

The largest Tanglewood audience for this summer's "serious music" had been 11,300, for Van Cliburn.

Serious Criticism

Kastendieck opined that the serious music critic is being replaced by the pop critic whose objective is to report on events rather than subject them to critical judgment.

This conformed to editor Miller's opinion that while music reviews are more necessary than ever, they would serve better purpose if they contained more objective reporting.

Miss Curtin availed herself of this golden opportunity to unburden herself of her grievances against the critics.

She listed a number of instances in which she felt herself unfairly or distortedly judged by critics. Identifying the erring gentlemen by name, Miss Curtin defended herself against their "misjudgments" — being criticized for "perfect diction" because it lessened the musical potency of her performance, failing to project the dramatic significance of an operatic role because the New York critic was unaware of her relationship to another of the operatic characters.

Lewis was content to say that he noted no decline in the influence of music criticism, but objected to the use of "sarcastic humor" as a camouflage for the critic's lack of know-how.

Schuller was unrelenting in his open scorn of music criticism, in general.

Speaking as a composer, he said to the critics, "we hate you and you hate us."

"The trouble is that we have no recourse," he said. "Most composers are afraid to write letters of protest to newspaper editors because the next time they may get even harsher treatment."

He continued, "you critics use your powers negatively and destructively. We're not in an even battle. You should be abolished until we're on an even footing."

Schuller stated emphatically that no critic should review a new work until he has studied the score diligently in advance.

Naming prominent critics from New York and Boston, he said, "I hate to read their reviews. When they are severely critical, I become angry. When they write nice things, it embarrasses me."

Schuller brought up the time-worn argument that reviews of new works should not be written immediately after performances, but should be considered for several days before judgment is made.

Euopean Efforts

Some of the European critics have solved this bugaboo by writing a weekly wrap-up of events, availing theselves of the advantage to make comparative evaluations.

The critics' rebuttal to what Schuller called an "unfair battle" was as vocally ardent as the attack.

While there was no retreat on either side, the critics defended the position that they cannot be expected to serve as seers of composers' meanings via ambiguous methods.

The critics also maintained that each of them has a one-man opinion which, in essence is what the composer expresses in his own way, presumbaly without coaching or consultation.

New England Newsclip

Jay Rosenfeld Elected Officer

Jay Rosenfeld, music critic for The Berkshire Eagle, was elected treasurer of the National Music Critics Association. He will serve a two-year term.

The member critics recently held their annual meeting at Tanglewood as the guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Boris E. Nelson of the Toledo (Ohio) Blade was voted president and Miles Kastendieck of the Christian Science Monitor, vice president.

EAGLE
CLAREMONT, N. H.
(E) 6,709

AUG 23 1969

138

'Desperate' Division Found Between Old and New in Music

By S. GORDON GAPPER
Journal Music Critic

If there was a theme to the Music Critics Association's recent annual meeting at Tanglewood, Mass., and to Dartmouth College's annual Congregation of the Arts, which some of us visited immediately afterward, it could be put like this:

While moon trips and the sophisticated technology they represent are taken for granted, many Americans seem unreceptive to the fact that music has made the same enormous strides in the use of equipment and the exploration of sound in the same incredibly short time.

The "old" and the "new" in music seem desperately — some would say fatally — divided, and we found musicians, musical administrators and fellow critics hard put to find ways to bridge this special kind of generation gap in what should be a happy whole.

If there were enough money, the cracks in the musical plaster could be papered over. But since it seems unlikely that tax money will ever be available in this country in the quanities it is in Europe for support of the arts, and since many large foundation grants are running out, musical organizations are having to rethink their structures and talk in terms of revolutionary changes.

In places, we may before long see regional music bodies large enough in numbers to be able to offer different types and styles of professional music to different audiences, although advocates are not very good at explaining how increased travel is to be paid for.

And that's only one practical detail that needs working on; the ideological and local "political" problems will be even more difficult of solution.

IT IS interesting at Tanglewood, near Lenox, to see the musical Janus (Roman god of doors) at work — one face looking back, the other forward.

On the one hand, the Boston Symphony Orchestra draws huge crowds to the shed for its summer festival to hear good old standard works in abundance. On the other is one of the country's most flourishing contemporary music festivals, the culmination of a summer school in which the under-25s, mainly, tangle with the most difficult of up-to-date scores.

Private subsidy is not dead, of course. The "now" scene is financed by the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Paul Fromm himself, a wine merchant, admits he spends part of his fortune on this aspect of Tanglewood "to improve my own awareness" of what's going on in music.

He will also subsidize for a second year an institute for young or inexperienced music critics to help improve the standards of musical writing in the press.

Such altruism, and such love of watching new things develop in the artistic field, is rather rare, and there is no telling what seeds it is planting in music's garden.

MEANWHILE, there were blossoms enough to sniff around Nathaniel Hawthorne's cottage at Tanglewood. One of them is a perennial nearly half a century old, Alban Berg's opera "Wozzeck."

The Boston's conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, who is retiring about this time and says "contemporary music is not written for a middle-class audience," directed the student orchestra and singers in a work which to many minds still is "terribly modern."

The performance was in a sense staged. The singers appeared behind and above the orchestra and were costumed.

They had obvious problems making their voices traverse the orchestral sound but projected well enough to convince the listener of their talent. Richard Taylor, New York, was Wozzeck and Alexandra Hunt, Omaha, Marie. The orchestra, surely very "middle class," would be the envy of most universities or large cities.

It was a stirring performance of a work already entrenced in the repertoire but so unlike Verdi that it rarely filters down to the community opera level. And that's a shame, because it represents a particularly intense philosophy of drama.

NOTHING else during a week of the contemporary festival seemed quite as successful, although this was more the fault of composers and stage directors than the young musicians, who have exceptional gumption about today's scores.

(In the words of Theodore Antoniou, a young Greek composer who was in residence at Tanglewood this summer, "Notation is one of the biggest problems of contemporary music." We had the opportunity to study one of his scores, and he's right.)

For works smaller than the likes of "Wozzeck," Leinsdorf, director of the entire Berkshire Center, defers to the head of the contemporary program, composer Gunther Schuller, and the school's conducting fellows.

Michael Tilson Thomas, Los Angeles, took care of Stravinsky's little dance with commentary, "L'Histoire du Soldat" (The Soldier's Story"), also 50 years old and with a message so obvious that it's hardly worth the bother of reviving unless the interpretation is less tediously silly than it was at Tanglewood. Thomas's seven-piece band did a first-rate job, however.

On the same program was a work commissioned by the center and Fromm, Robert Ceely's "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," also a short ballet with a small orchestra and tape accompaniment.

Ceely teaches at the New England Conservatory. I found his combination of instrumental and electronic music attractive, but the dance, abstract but geometric in its patterns, quite uninspiring.

There were five pieces on another program:

● James Yannatos's 1968 "Suite for Six," played by (you guessed it) six instrumentalists who are occasionally required to shuffle and make other sounds. Yannatos, a Harvard professor (now do you see why contemporary music isn't middle class?), conducted.

● Luciano Berio's 10-year-old "Differences" for five instruments and tape, Paul Zukofsky conducting. Berio was one of my favorite "now" composers even before I heard his "Visages" produced earlier this year at Ann Arbor complete with "sight effects."

It was he who pointed out to the critics at Tanglewood the "perishable nature" of music (particularly now that tapes are so common but deteriorate comparatively fast), and, quite rightly, I think, declared that the terms "beauty" and "ugliness" are obsolete when discussing today's music.

(To put the prodigy Antoniou in parentheses again, he seemed to agree on the "perishable" idea, saying, "I can only work with what I hear now. Next year I may be doing something else in music because of new ideas.")

● Robert Lewis's "Divertimento for Six Instruments" in its first performance. Yoav Talmi, Israel, conducted this work by a teacher at Goucher College and Johns Hopkins University.

● Phillip Rhodes's "Autumn Setting," a Berkshire-Fromm commission scored for soprano and string quartet and conducted by the composer. This was the most interesting work of the evening, to my mind, and not just because of the vocal gymnastics of Elsa Charlston, Chicago.

It proves that poetry (pieces by Patricia V. Schneider) can still be imaginatively set to music without a lot of the wrenching and distortion which seem so common. It was, if one must avoid the word "beautiful," pleasant.

Rhodes is a new species: From a job at Amherst College he is going to Louisville, Ky., as that city's "professional-in-residence" under a Music Educators National Conference program.

● Edwin Dugger's new "Intermezzi," also a Berkshire - Fromm commission. Schuller conducted the small ensemble. Dugger's at Berkley.

Most of the above names may mean nothing to the reader now. But he is advised to keep them in mind, because some day, you know . . .

In any case, we cannot be sure that the appeal of all this is as limited as Leinsdorf and others would have us believe. There were some provocative words for the critics from Ralph Burgard, an official of the Associated Councils for the Arts, New York, a body servicing state and city arts councils. He said:

"The democratic idea is catching up with the arts. There is a feeling that everyone should have a crack at everything along the line.

"Premises like the one that says only 2 per cent of the population is interested in the arts are being examined. Attitudes about art institutions and their relevance to our society are changing today.

"And the change is part of the rebellion in which the middle class wants to gain some control over its existence and do things for itself."

Burgard said the "confrontation with the slums" has produced significant artistic results; for example, he said, the Model Cities project for Seattle included a "large" appropriation for the arts because they were "the only part of the program that can give people a community identity and common purpose and possibly lead to these at other levels."

Composer Otto Luening, a venerated pioneer in electronic music, couldn't resist a grin, however. He indicated that electronic music, which is very "now" just now, may soon be in its biggest fight against standard middle class likes. Why?

"It's in the schools now. Now you'll have trouble."

FROM the seventh Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood to Dartmouth College's seventh Congregation of the Arts is not such a big step, geographically or musically, except for some differences of approach.

Dartmouth's congregation and its home, the Hopkins Center in the heart of Hanover, N.H., are, if not unique (and they may well be), at least highly unusual. But their story rates separate treatment, and this it will get next Sunday.

The Flint Journal
FLINT, MICH.
D. 115,014 SUN. 115,373
AUG 24 1969

Music's 'Rich Uncle' Sees Critic in Role of Educator

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

Few men are more qualified to comment on the current musical scene than Paul Fromm. A successful Chicago-based wine merchant who has followed music for 40 years, Fromm, through his Fromm Music Foundation, has supported generously since its inception the periodical "Perspectives of New Music", has long aided the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, and has co-commissioned, with the Center, several works per season from young composers.

Fromm gave a talk on music criticism a short while ago at Tanglewood to members of the ~~Music Critic~~ Association. What he said was so sound, and of such general interest to anyone who reads criticism, that his words are worth excerpting here.

For Fromm, interest in criticism springs "from a sincere desire to increase my capacities and awareness as a listener . . . Since music criticism is the only channel of generally available information for the cultural community, its potential capacity to inform significantly is so obvious that I have always turned to it with hopeful expectancy." The music critic, then, holding crucial ground between composer and audience, "has the power to help or hinder his readers in achieving the most enlightened and informed contact with the musical activity around them."

★

Having set the stage in these tones, Fromm got to the essence of his ideas. "What I miss in the criticism I read is a concentration in what must ultimately be the only critical issue and the only real news in music: an awareness of the characteristics of an individual composition. There is, in general, an unfortunate orientation toward the activity rather than the object . . ."

The critic's business is the music itself, and he must summon all his knowledge and taste and skill in forming a vocabulary to get his ideas, his perceptions about pieces, across to his readers.

What happens often instead, as Fromm accurately noted, is that music jounalists deal in empty slogans about styles and schools, in ideology in large part foreign to the workaday world inhabited by composers and conductors and practicing musicians.

"It is hard to see what musical enlightenment is conveyed" — Fromm continued — "and one wonders whether the purely persuasive use of apparently descriptive terms is in the highest traditions of journalism or intellectual honesty. It seems to me that what music jounalists can most usefully do is to turn our attention to things the writer himself finds interesting, and hence thinks that we too might find interesting."

Finally, Fromm offered a suggestion: ". . . what would be enormously valuable for a listener would be to provide him with information that he could use ether in anticipation of an actual hearing or as retrospective elucidation. In this sense, criticism is indeed a form of basic analysis . . ."

To my understanding, these are the words of a true amateur, of a man seeking a better understanding of the thing he loves.

ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 432,950
AUG 24 1969

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
AUG 24 1969

Music Critics Scored at Tanglewood Forum

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Two composers, a Met soprano and an administrator took severe issue with the functions and validity of music criticism in a recent panel discussion at Tanglewood.

It was one event of a four-day conference held by the Music Critics Association.

Miles Kastendieck, music critic for the Christian Science Monitor (in New York) was chairman of the session that degenerated from veiled sarcasm to heated debate.

Critics' Critics

Panelists were Gunther Schuller and Robert Lewis, composers; Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Harry Kraut, administrator of the Berkshire Music Center; Lawrence K. Miller, editor of the Berkshire Eagle.

Had the panelists' view been acted upon, the title of the discussion would have had instantaneous application.

It was called "Kritiner daemmerung," or "Twilight of the Critics," and obvious parody on the Wagnerian opera title.

Too Negative

Kraut's comment that "the public is beginning to think there's something wrong with serious music because so much is being written about it negatively" had been instigated by the previous night's event at Tanglewood.

An audience of 22,000, the largest in Tanglewood history, had turned out for performances of rock, blues and psychedelic lights. Performers were B.B. King, The Who, and the Jefferson Airplane. Visual accompaniment was provided by the Joshua Light Show from Fillmore East, a rock music show place in New York City.

The largest Tanglewood audience for this summer's "serious music" had been 11,300, for Van Cliburn.

Serious Criticism

Kastendieck opined that the serious music critic is being replaced by the pop critic whose objective is to report on events rather than subject them to critical judgment.

This conformed to editor Miller's opinion that while music reviews are more necessary than ever, they would serve better purpose if they contained more objective reporting.

Miss Curtin availed herself of this golden opportunity to unburden herself of her grievances against the critics.

She listed a number of instances in which she felt herself unfairly or distortedly judged by critics. Identifying the erring gentlemen by name, Miss Curtin defended herself against their "misjudgments" — being criticized for "perfect diction" because it lessened the musical potency of her performance, failing to project the dramatic significance of an operatic role because the New York critic was unaware of her relationship to another of the operatic characters.

Lewis was content to say that he noted no decline in the influence of music criticism, but objected to the use of "sarcastic humor" as a camouflage for the critic's lack of know-how.

Schuller was unrelenting in his open scorn of music criticism, in general.

Speaking as a composer, he said to the critics, "we hate you and you hate us."

"The trouble is that we have no recourse," he said. "Most composers are afraid to write letters of protest to newspaper editors because the next time they may get even harsher treatment."

He continued, "you critics use your powers negatively and destructively. We're not in an even battle. You should be abolished until we're on an even footing."

Schuller stated emphatically that no critic should review a new work until he has studied the score diligently in advance.

Naming prominent critics from New York and Boston, he said, "I hate to read their reviews. When they are severely critical, I become angry. When they write nice things, it embarrasses me."

Schuller brought up the time-worn argument that reviews of new works should not be written immediately after performances, but should be considered for several days before judgment is made.

Euopean Efforts

Some of the European critics have solved this bugaboo by writing a weekly wrap-up of events, availing theselves of the advantage to make comparative evaluations.

The critics' rebuttal to what Schuller called an "unfair battle" was as vocally ardent as the attack.

While there was no retreat on either side, the critics defended the position that they cannot be expected to serve as seers of composers' meanings via ambiguous methods.

The critics also maintained that each of them has a one-man opinion which, in essence is what the composer expresses in his own way, presumbaly without coaching or consultation.

New England Newsclip

Jay Rosenfeld Elected Officer

Jay Rosenfeld, music critic for The Berkshire Eagle, was elected treasurer of the National Music Critics Association. He will serve a two-year term.

The member critics recently held their annual meeting at Tanglewood as the guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Boris E. Nelson of the Toledo (Ohio) Blade was voted president and Miles Kastendieck of the Christian Science Monitor, vice president.

EAGLE
CLAREMONT, N. H.
(E) 6,709
AUG 23 1969

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 325,351 SUN. 396,682

AUG 24 1969

Music in Mid-America

The 1969 Music Critics Association conference at Tanglewood . . . see below.

By John Haskins
(The Star's Music Editor)

Lenox, Mass.—When music critics get together, their shop talk tends to be about music, and so it was at Tanglewood between August 11 and August 14, where the national Music Critics association met as guests of the Boston Symphony. In a busy four days 42 members of the association were told about how they should do their jobs, how they are really antediluvian survivals in a time when there is no need of them, how the future of art and concert music may rest squarely on their shoulders, and other inconsistencies not unfamiliar to a tribe which is used, in Byron's felicitous phrase, to being "hated, yet caressed."

It is amazing, sometimes, what music critics will put up with. One of the earliest panel sessions in a packed program arranged by senior critic and conference chairman, Miles Kastendieck (Christian Science Monitor) under the title, "Composers at the Crossroads," brought Greek composer Theodore Antoniou, Italian composer Luciano Berio, and American composer Otto Luening before the assembled critics as a panel under Kastendieck's chairmanship. It made for a fascinating two-hour session.

Antoniou, perhaps because of his youth, declined to open the proceedings, yielding to his colleague, Luciano Berio. In a lengthy address that might have been titled "Dada Triumphans" in deference to the land of Berio's origin, he spoke of the obsolescence of beauty and ugliness as concepts in artistic creation, of the materials of music—the sound sources—as being no longer of any importance, of only the sound experience being valuable, even viable. Significantly, he did not touch on the question of organization, with a view toward transmission of some kind of communication between a transmitter (the composer) and a receiver (the audience). In his view, the triumph of Dada in our time is complete.

Antoniou, once he could be prevailed upon to express some opinions, spent his time on an entirely technical discussion of the problem a composer has in transcribing his musical thought.

OTTO LUENING, who has been an official avant gardist since the memory of man wot not of, and has taken his lumps in the process many and many a time, emerged as a hero in his presentation. He goes back, back, back, to when he was a student of Ferruccio Busoni; to 1907, when Busoni enunciated in a monograph a new musical aesthetic; to the time, about then, when a primitive ancestor of the RCA synthesizer seemed to obviate the necessity for composers as they had been known. Luening is witty and formidably knowledgeable, and when he speaks of "cultural erosion" in our time, all should listen. He has been there and back, fighting the good fight all the way, and is a mellowed giant. Among the things he cited from Busoni's new aesthetic in music was the necessity for a time-span frame where a musical idea is concerned (if it is a two-minute idea, it should be expressed in two minutes; a ten-minute idea should have ten minutes; but it is terribly wrong to spend ten minutes on a two-minute musical idea). Luening made friends among the critics with his witty exposition, and everyone present was aware of the seriousness which lay beneath his apparent flippancy.

There was more in store for the critics in a panel session titled "Twilight of the Critics," which brought singer Phyllis Curtin, editor Lawrence Miller (The Berkshire Eagle), composer Gunther Schuller, manager Harry Kraut, and composer Robert Lewis before them on a panel. Curtin, always a pleasure to watch as well as to hear, complained about technical capacity among reviewers she has (sadly) known; Miller spoke as a responsible editor, stating his position that there should be more critical depth in newspaper writing; Schuller, as he had on a previous occasion, damned the whole tribe, and seemed to believe that any composer or performer ought to be entitled to equal time in a newspaper if a reviewer thought his piece or his performance a bore; Kraut, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony, looked for the day when the music critic fraternity might spend more time in promotion than in telling it like it is; and Robert Lewis, with no special quarrel to wage, spoke in a gentlemanly way about what good reviews could do for a career. Schuller roused some sparks from his captive audience, and delayed his appearance at a rehearsal some 30 minutes to take his innings during a very active discussion period.

IT CAN BE believed that 42 music critics, most of them representatives of metropolitan newspapers with large circulation, have some idea of the current financial crisis in the performing arts. To focus their awareness of the problem, Richard Wangerin, president of the American Symphony Orchestra League, and Ralph Burgard, president of Associated Councils of the Arts, addressed them and participated in brisk discussion.

One of the most promising—and, as it turned out, the least interesting—of the panel sessions was the traditional free-for-all which closes the annual conference. It did, however, produce an engaging pun from conductor Erich Leinsdorf, retiring musical director of the Boston Symphony. Milton Bass, arts and entertainment editor of the Berkshire Eagle, was advising the assembled critics (quite needlessly) that they must cover themselves, and be prepared for all contingencies. "If you leave a concert early, and something happens—say, the conductor drops dead," he began. From the other end of the table Leinsdorf growled, "Conductors don't drop dead, they just fake away!"

As there must be at any conference, there were more words than music, but music was not left out of the program. The musical events began with an absorbing concert version of Alban Berg's opera, "Wozzeck," with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, not the great Boston Symphony, but the student instrumentalists and vocal fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The performance was extraordinary, but this writer was not alone among his colleagues in being more absorbed in the work itself than in the performance.

THERE WERE perhaps 2,000 persons present for "Wozzeck," and though it was not really a public performance as most events which take place in the Shed at Tanglewood are, it was not likely to be a sellout. The following night, a concert devoted to contemporary trends attracted 22,300 persons to hear The Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, The Who, and the Joshua Light Show in the Shed, and on the vast green lawn outside.

The Fromm Music Foundation's annual festival of contemporary music provided two concerts on the conference program of events. An evening of chamber music and dance offered a campy version of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat," of which little is remembered beyond the comical sight of a hippie devil twirling his tail in the way beboppers used to twirl their key chains, and a Fromm-commissioned work, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," by Robert Ceely, which had reasonably interesting music and drearily affected choreography by James Waring. The other Fromm concert, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas and Gunther Schuller, offered, among several first performances, an exquisite commissioned work, "Autumn Setting," by Philip Rhodes. Scored for soprano and string quartet, the work benefitted from the precise and expressive singing of Elsa Charlston.

It is hard to say what the members of the Music Critics Association carried away from Tanglewood after their four days of music and talk. Fond feeling toward the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Center, certainly, as warm and friendly hosts for the conference. Fond remembrance, certainly, of Paul Fromm, who opened the conference schedule with a civilized speech that is well worth reprinting, and of Erich Leinsdorf, who made a very civilized speech in the final session of the conference. Fromm deserves an extra measure of gratitude for standing as patron of an internship program for junior critics which was in its final week (of three) during the conference. There was memorable stimulation, and some forgettable boredom, but it was a nice week to spend where there was action going.

139

Sight and Sound

Leinsdorf Advises Musicians and Critics

By R. C. HAMMERICH

Erich Leinsdorf composed a wise aphorism one afternoon recently at Tanglewood not long before he conducted his last concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Panel on Criticism

He was sitting informally as an accidental member of a panel discussing the status of music criticism during the annual meeting of the National Music Critics Association. There were about 40 members in a tent near Tanglewood's 6000-seat shed.

The day before, a composer and a soprano, both internationally known, had spent an hour severely scolding the writers for their transgression—that is, for not writing the way they, the composer and singer, wanted them to write.

On this sunny afternoon, the writers, a surprisingly sensitive lot, were pursuing the question in many directions (several of them petty), including the old one — for whom, exactly, are we writing?

Blunt Words

Leinsdorf sat quietly until invited to speak. Then, he said, the musicians ought to make music for the public and "the hell with the critics" and the critics ought to write for the public and "the hell with the musicians."

Remarks of this sort have not endeared Leinsdorf with some of his compatriots.

But he made several wise and witty remarks that afternoon. For instance, after one of the writers had been expounding on the unusual longevity enjoyed by famous conductors, he said, "Old conductors never die; they just fake away."

But the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in 1969 is old news now except that this is my last chance to correct an error I made last June when I said in print that the 24 basic concerts at Tanglewood, (the festival) make a profit because of the 6000-seat shed and vast lawns accommodating audiences up to 15,000.

Orchestral Eyebrows

More than a few official orchestral eyebrows went up when their eyes read that. They called to my attention, politely, that the orchestra loses money on every concert all year, and they gave me a copy of the official income-and-expense schedule for the 1967-68 season.

The schedule is divided into three sections: the winter, pops and esplanade concerts had an operating deficit of $613,207; the Berkshire Festival a deficit of $263,522; the Berkshire Music Center a deficit of $272,855.

The cost of operating the Tanglewood property was split equally and scheduled in the expenses of the Festival and Music Center at $71,469 each.

Two Big Items

The two biggest figures in the festival schedule are $488,697 as receipts from concerts and $478,230 as "compensation of players, conductors and soloists." To that expense must be added other concert costs as well as administration and the aforementioned Tanglewood property.

The figure most people are curious about, Leinsdorf's salary, is not listed because it is divided into many categories and entered on the books in several places as part of the administration of the orchestra, Symphony Hall, Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center as well as under concert expenses as conductor.

Very few people know the conductor's salary, and they aren't talking. The salaries of most of the orchestra members is hidden, also, but it is common knowledge that the annual base pay of the lowliest members (about one third of the orchestra) is $14,000.

The final announcements this summer by the orchestra press office at Tanglewood were issued after the second of the Fiedler concerts. They were encouraging.

The 14,554 who had attended the two pops concerts on Labor Day Weekend had contributed $45,000 to the deficit; the season's attendance at 41 events, although lower than last year, had poured in nearly $800,000 . . . a figure that is 17 per cent higher than any previous Tanglewood season. (The annual budget is $4,500,000).

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

SEP 7 1969

THE NORWALK HOUR, NORWALK, CONN.— TUESDAY, AUGUST 26, 1969

TANGLEWOOD IN REVIEW SERIES

This is the first in a series of analysis of what is going on in the music world today, particularly at Tanglewood, Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home, and scene of its summer programs, and the Berkshire Music Center, where students gather for advanced study and from which many of our leading figures in today's world of music have sprung.—R.E.H.

Unlike so many professional, business or service conferences held periodically since time immemorial for the purpose of the dissemination of knowledge, goods or services, this year the annual Music Critic's Conference at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony and of the Berkshire summer music school, in mid-August was for delegates a new experience in contemporary exposure.

Representing many of the major newspapers in this country and Canada, and meeting informally, twice daily at stated sessions, the critics came face to face with some of the performers and conductors they had often reviewed and the open sessions were deemed healthy for performer and writer, to the benefit of the reading public. Keeping informed with the contemporary trend is not easy at best, from the distant scene. That the conference, which followed a Critics Institute, in session for two weeks prior to the Critics Conference, the program was blended in to the "Contemporary Trends Festival," with many of the outstanding summer school students participating in major modern works. The critics likewise were initiated into what is "the happening" among the young today. They also had an opportunity to hear some of the Boston Symphony's finest in its great past.

Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was host to the opening reception and the concluding buffet supper. The former was on the Tanglewood grounds in a large tent where meetings were held. The other was at his home. The group was entertained at the home of Lawrence K. Miller, editor of the Berkshire Eagle, and at the Lenox club.

At the opening reception, Erich Leinsdorf met the visiting critics. He was a major figure on the panel at the concluding session, in which a free-for-all, from the panel, featuring Milton Bass of the Berkshire Eagle, and Mr. Leinsdorf, and from critics, brought to light some of the uneasiness that exists between what is being done in the music world and what is being said on the other hand.

Excerpts and highlights will come forth in a later article in this series when the programs, in music itself, and the speakers, representing or performing, composing or conducting music, will be discussed.

Outstanding events during the session included the student presentation of Wozzeck, by Alban Berg, and the Contemporary Trends concert, attended by a record breaking crowd of 22,000.

The Festival of Contemporary Music which was held at intervals throughout the center, in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation, brought to Music Critic's Assembly Paul Fromm, its founder and head, who was a key-note speaker at an early session. This foundation, dedicated to furthering contemporary music commissions new works, awards prizes for existing works, sponsors performances and the study and publication of contemporary music. Gunther Schuller who heads the New England Conservatory of Music as president was also a panelist. He conducted youth in orchestral presentations.

Since all of the ethnic cross-currents of today's contemporary creative efforts, whether in jazz, rock, folk, gospel, electronic or traditional fundamentally affect and will if the current trend continues, affect our music culture, Mr. Schuller believes in the breaking down of barriers which would confine these, by means of the vastly increased media of communication and dissemination now available.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 325,351 SUN. 396,682

AUG 24 1969

139

Music in Mid-America

The 1969 Music Critics Association conference at Tanglewood . . . see below.

By John Haskins
(The Star's Music Editor)

Lenox, Mass.—When music critics get together, their shop talk tends to be about music, and so it was at Tanglewood between August 11 and August 14, where the national Music Critics association met as guests of the Boston Symphony. In a busy four days 42 members of the association were told about how they should do their jobs, how they are really antediluvian survivals in a time when there is no need of them, how the future of art and concert music may rest squarely on their shoulders, and other inconsistencies not unfamiliar to a tribe which is used, in Byron's felicitous phrase, to being "hated, yet caressed."

It is amazing, sometimes, what music critics will put up with. One of the earliest panel sessions in a packed program arranged by senior critic and conference chairman, Miles Kastendieck (Christian Science Monitor) under the title, "Composers at the Crossroads," brought Greek composer Theodore Antoniou, Italian composer Luciano Berio, and American composer Otto Luening before the assembled critics as a panel under Kastendieck's chairmanship. It made for a fascinating two-hour session.

Antoniou, perhaps because of his youth, declined to open the proceedings, yielding to his colleague, Luciano Berio. In a lengthy address that might have been titled "Dada Triumphans" in deference to the land of Berio's origin, he spoke of the obsolescence of beauty and ugliness as concepts in artistic creation, of the materials of music—the sound sources—as being no longer of any importance, of only the sound experience being valuable, even viable. Significantly, he did not touch on the question of organization, with a view toward transmission of some kind of communication between a transmitter (the composer) and a receiver (the audience). In his view, the triumph of Dada in our time is complete.

Antoniou, once he could be prevailed upon to express some opinions, spent his time on an entirely technical discussion of the problem a composer has in transcribing his musical thought.

OTTO LUENING, who has been an official avant gardist since the memory of man wot not of, and has taken his lumps in the process many and many a time, emerged as a hero in his presentation. He goes back, back, back, to when he was a student of Ferruccio Busoni; to 1907, when Busoni enunciated in a monograph a new musical aesthetic; to the time, about then, when a primitive ancestor of the RCA synthesizer seemed to obviate the necessity for composers as they had been known. Luening is witty and formidably knowledgeable, and when he speaks of "cultural erosion" in our time, all should listen. He has been there and back, fighting the good fight all the way, and is a mellowed giant. Among the things he cited from Busoni's new aesthetic in music was the necessity for a time-span frame where a musical idea is concerned (if it is a two-minute idea, it should be expressed in two minutes; a ten-minute idea should have ten minutes; but it is terribly wrong to spend ten minutes on a two-minute musical idea). Luening made friends among the critics with his witty exposition, and everyone present was aware of the seriousness which lay beneath his apparent flippancy.

There was more in store for the critics in a panel session titled "Twilight of the Critics," which brought singer Phyllis Curtin, editor Lawrence Miller (The Berkshire Eagle), composer Gunther Schuller, manager Harry Kraut, and composer Robert Lewis before them on a panel. Curtin, always a pleasure to watch as well as to hear, complained about technical capacity among reviewers she has (sadly) known; Miller spoke as a responsible editor, stating his position that there should be more critical depth in newspaper writing; Schuller, as he had on a previous occasion, damned the whole tribe, and seemed to believe that any composer or performer ought to be entitled to equal time in a newspaper if a reviewer thought his piece or his performance a bore; Kraut, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony, looked for the day when the music critic fraternity might spend more time in promotion than in telling it like it is; and Robert Lewis, with no special quarrel to wage, spoke in a gentlemanly way about what good reviews could do for a career. Schuller roused some sparks from his captive audience, and delayed his appearance at a rehearsal some 30 minutes to take his innings during a very active discussion period.

IT CAN BE believed that 42 music critics, most of them representatives of metropolitan newspapers with large circulation, have some idea of the current financial crisis in the performing arts. To focus their awareness of the problem, Richard Wangerin, president of the American Symphony Orchestra League, and Ralph Burgard, president of Associated Councils of the Arts, addressed them and participated in brisk discussion.

One of the most promising—and, as it turned out, the least interesting—of the panel sessions was the traditional free-for-all which closes the annual conference. It did, however, produce an engaging pun from conductor Erich Leinsdorf, retiring musical director of the Boston Symphony. Milton Bass, arts and entertainment editor of the Berkshire Eagle, was advising the assembled critics (quite needlessly) that they must cover themselves, and be prepared for all contingencies. "If you leave a concert early, and something happens—say, the conductor drops dead," he began. From the other end of the table Leinsdorf growled, "Conductors don't drop dead, they just fake away!"

As there must be at any conference, there were more words than music, but music was not left out of the program. The musical events began with an absorbing concert version of Alban Berg's opera, "Wozzeck," with Erich Leinsdorf conducting, not the great Boston Symphony, but the student instrumentalists and vocal fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The performance was extraordinary, but this writer was not alone among his colleagues in being more absorbed in the work itself than in the performance.

THERE WERE perhaps 2,000 persons present for "Wozzeck," and though it was not really a public performance as most events which take place in the Shed at Tanglewood are, it was not likely to be a sellout. The following night, a concert devoted to contemporary trends attracted 22,300 persons to hear The Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, The Who, and the Joshua Light Show in the Shed, and on the vast green lawn outside.

The Fromm Music Foundation's annual festival of contemporary music provided two concerts on the conference program of events. An evening of chamber music and dance offered a campy version of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat," of which little is remembered beyond the comical sight of a hippie devil twirling his tail in the way beboppers used to twirl their key chains, and a Fromm-commissioned work, "Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," by Robert Ceely, which had reasonably interesting music and dreariy affected choreography by James Waring. The other Fromm concert, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas and Gunther Schuller, offered, among several first performances, an exquisite commissioned work, "Autumn Setting," by Philip Rhodes. Scored for soprano and string quartet, the work benefitted from the precise and expressive singing of Elsa Charlston.

It is hard to say what the members of the Music Critics Association carried away from Tanglewood after their four days of music and talk. Fond feeling toward the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Center, certainly, as warm and friendly hosts for the conference. Fond remembrance, certainly, of Paul Fromm, who opened the conference schedule with a civilized speech that is well worth reprinting, and of Erich Leinsdorf, who made a very civilized speech in the final session of the conference. Fromm deserves an extra measure of gratitude for standing as patron of an internship program for junior critics which was in its final week (of three) during the conference. There was memorable stimulation, and some forgettable boredom, but it was a nice week to spend where there was action going.

Sight and Sound

Leinsdorf Advises Musicians and Critics

By R. C. HAMMERICH

Erich Leinsdorf composed a wise aphorism one afternoon recently at Tanglewood not long before he conducted his last concert as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Panel on Criticism

He was sittiing informally as an accidental member of a panel discussing the status of music criticism during the annual meeting of the National Music Critics Association. There were about 40 members in a tent near Tanglewood's 6000-seat shed.

The day before, a composer and a soprano, both internationally known, had spent an hour severely scolding the writers for their transgression—that is, for not writing the way they, the composer and singer, wanted them to write.

On this sunny afternoon, the writers, a surprisingly sensitive lot, were pursuing the question in many directions (several of them petty), including the old one — for whom, exactly, are we writing?

Blunt Words

Leinsdorf sat quietly until invited to speak. Then, he said, the musicians ought to make music for the public and "the hell with the critics" and the critics ought to write for the public and "the hell with the musicians."

Remarks of this sort have not endeared Leinsdorf with some of his compatriots.

But he made several wise and witty remarks that afternoon. For instance, after one of the writers had been expounding on the unusual longevity enjoyed by famous conductors, he said, "Old conductors never die; they just fake away."

But the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in 1969 is old news now except that this is my last chance to correct an error I made last June when I said in print that the 24 basic concerts at Tanglewood (the festival) make a profit because of the 6000-seat shed and vast lawns accommodating audiences up to 15,000.

Orchestral Eyebrows

More than a few official orchestral eyebrows went up when their eyes read that. They called to my attention, politely, that the orchestra loses money on every concert all year, and they gave me a copy of the official income-and-expense schedule for the 1967-68 season.

The schedule is divided into three sections: the winter, pops and esplanade concerts had an operating deficit of $613,207; the Berkshire Festival a deficit of $263,522; the Berkshire Music Center a deficit of $272,855.

The cost of operating the Tanglewood property was split equally and scheduled in the expenses of the Festival and Music Center at $71,469 each.

Two Big Items

The two biggest figures in the festival schedule are $488,697 as receipts from concerts and $478,230 as "compensation of players, conductors and soloists." To that expense must be added other concert costs as well as administration and the aforementioned Tanglewood property.

The figure most people are curious about, Leinsdorf's salary, is not listed because it is divided into many categories and entered on the books in several places as part of the administration of the orchestra, Symphony Hall, Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center as well as under concert expenses as conductor.

Very few people know the conductor's salary, and they aren't talking. The salaries of most of the orchestra members is hidden, also, but it is common knowledge that the annual base pay of the lowliest members (about one third of the orchestra) is $14,000.

The final announcements this summer by the orchestra press office at Tanglewood were issued after the second of the Fiedler concerts. They were encouraging.

The 14,554 who had attended the two pops concerts on Labor Day Weekend had contributed $45,000 to the deficit; the season's attendance at 41 events, although lower than last year, had poured in nearly $800,000 . . . a figure that is 17 per cent higher than any previous Tanglewood season. (The annual budget is $4,500,00-0).

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

SEP 7 1969

THE NORWALK HOUR, NORWALK, CONN.—TUESDAY, AUGUST 26, 1969

TANGLEWOOD IN REVIEW SERIES

This is the first in a series of analysis of what is going on in the music world today, particularly at Tanglewood, Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home, and scene of its summer programs, and the Berkshire Music Center, where students gather for advanced study and from which many of our leading figures in today's world of music have sprung.—R.E.H.

Unlike so many professional, business or service conferences held periodically since time immemorial for the purpose of the dissemination of knowledge, goods or services, this year the annual Music Critic's Conference at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony and of the Berkshire summer music school, in mid-August was for delegates a new experience in contemporary exposure.

Representing many of the major newspapers in this country and Canada, and meeting informally, twice daily at stated sessions, the critics came face to face with some of the performers and conductors they had often reviewed and the open sessions were deemed healthy for performer and writer, to the benefit of the reading public. Keeping informed with the contemporary trend is not easy at best, from the distant scene. That the conference, which followed a Critics Institute, in session for two weeks prior to the Critics Conference, the program was blended in to the "Contemporary Trends Festival," with many of the outstanding summer school students participating in major modern works. The critics likewise were initiated into what is "the happening" among the young today. They also had an opportunity to hear some of the Boston Symphony's finest in its great past.

Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was host to the opening reception and the concluding buffet supper. The former was on the Tanglewood grounds in a large tent where meetings were held. The other was at his home. The group was entertained at the home of Lawrence K. Miller, editor of the Berkshire Eagle, and at the Lenox club.

At the opening reception, Erich Leinsdorf met the visiting critics. He was a major figure on the panel at the concluding session, in which a free-for-all, from the panel, featuring Milton Bass of the Berkshire Eagle, and Mr. Leinsdorf, and from critics, brought to light some of the uneasiness that exists between what is being done in the music world and what is being said on the other hand.

Excerpts and highlights will come forth in a later article in this series when the programs, in music itself, and the speakers, representing or performing, composing or conducting music, will be discussed.

Outstanding events during the session included the student presentation of Wozzeck, by Alban Berg, and the Contemporary Trends concert, attended by a record breaking crowd of 22,000.

The Festival of Contemporary Music which was held at intervals throughout the center, in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation, brought to Music Critic's Assembly Paul Fromm, its founder and head, who was a key-note speaker at an early session. This foundation, dedicated to furthering contemporary music commissions new works, awards prizes for existing works, sponsors performances and the study and publication of contemporary music. Gunther Schuller who heads the New England Conservatory of Music as president was also a panelist. He conducted youth in orchestral presentations.

Since all of the ethnic cross currents of today's contemporary creative efforts, whether in jazz, rock, folk, gospel, electronic or traditional fundamentally affect and will if the current trend continues, affect our music culture, Mr. Schuller believes in the breaking down of barriers which would confine these, by means of the vastly increased media of communication and dissemination now available.

140!

Music

Style Clash At Tanglewood

By Robert Commanday

THE YOUNGER generation took over at the Berkshire Music Center last week. While the Boston Symphony was going its traditional Haydn-Brahms way under Erich Leinsdorf and guest conductors that included Josef Krips, the marvelous "youngsters," the Berkshire Music Center's Fellows, were doing something different — new music.

From the days of Bernstein, Shaw, Hendl, Foss, Lipkin and other Koussevitzky youngsters, contemporary music is an old Tanglewood legacy. It was shined up again last week in special new music concerts.

Tanglewood dramatizes, even emphasizes today's confrontation between new-old styles by keeping them neatly compartmentalized in separate, side-by-side concerts. It attempts no reconciliation, no interaction. Sunday, matinee traditionalists came out in force. 5500 of them, for Krips' Haydn-Strauss-Schubert program. For Monday nights' "Wozzeck" by the Music Center Fellows under Leinsdorf's direction, a light crowd of 3000 appeared. But for Tuesday's "Trends" Concert where San Francisco's Bill Graham presented the Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, The Joshua Light Show, THE WHO, an astounding 21,500 were there. It was an all-time record for Tanglewood, for Graham and for the lawn clean-up crew. Then followed contemporary chamber concerts on Wednesday and Thursday, to proper houses of about 1000.

Artistic Inequity

Commenting on the discrepancies in the turnouts, Luciano Berio, composer-in-residence at the Music Center, deplored the artistic inequity, and attacked the banality of the Boston Symphony's programs and viewpoint. Leinsdorf, an ultimate realist who is approaching his final week as the Boston Symphony Director, found in the circumstances justification for his "concentric circles" theory of stylistically segregated programs for separate audiences — in short, give 'em what they want. The management, out for dollars to balance the BSO's increasingly unwieldly budget, were happy about the box office for the pops programming. Rock and Van Cliburn support "Wozzeck" and the Fromm Music Foundation takes care of Tanglewood's responsibilities towards new music.

The real winners, both on the giving and receiving ends, were the young Fellows, the advanced or pre-professional players and singers drawn from all over. What they will bring back to their home communities in added skills and commitment for new music may be the most important, far-reaching contribution of the Tanglewood summer.

Their "Wozzeck" deserved the widest exposure. After 13 rehearsals under the painstaking Leinsdorf, it had both clarity and sweep to an extraordinary degree.

The large Berkshire Music Center Orchestra occupied most of the Concert Shed's stage with singers and their semi-staged, modern dress production on a narrow raised area behind. The arrangement emphasized Berg's tremendous wealth of continuous orchestral drama and expression at the same time however, withholding some of the immediate, personal impact of the living drama. Leinsdorf gave it more heart than his customary style making this a peak performance. The Tanglewood shell added sonorous juices, more in fact than was ideal for voices.

The singing cast led by Richard Taylor (Wozzeck), Alexandra Hunt (Marie), Robert Kelly (the Captain), David Ronson (the Doctor) and Eugene Rabine (first apprentice) did exceptionally well.

Chamber Ensembles

What was accomplished on "Wozzeck's" large scale by the cast and big orchestra of Tanglewood Fellows was matched in chamber ensembles on the two midweek evenings of contemporary music (reviewed in Tuesday's Chronicle).

Hardly anyone except Berkshire Music Center faculty can have a proper idea of the entire activity there. The most important part of it occurs in day-in, day-out chamber music rehearsals in studios almost hidden around the rolling acres of the Tanglewood estate.

Boston Symphony principals and other distinguished musicians coach the ensembles in repertoire of all kinds. Gunther Schuller was unquestionably the busiest of these coaches and he spent his days running from rehearsal to rehearsal carrying a bag lunch he never seemed to be able to stop and eat.

I was drawn to one Schuller rehearsal of a work completed at Tanglewood by Kathleen St. John, a Fellow in composition and a Berio pupil from Juilliard. Entitled "The Cage," it was a strange piece made of rough-hewn materials and textures created by guided improvisation. It had the unusual scoring for three double string basses, five bassoons, harp, clarinet, flute and bass drum.

As the rehearsal progressed, Miss St. John learned much, everybody did, Schuller too, as he worked out some still hazy notation and orchestration problems. One big tie-up over the fermatas was resolved by Schuller's cueing in everything; he was as busy as a puppeteer doing a crowd scene. It was a very patient and creative teaching performance, as Schuller was literally building Miss St. John's work in rehearsal.

After changing an indica-

See Page 31

THEODORE ANTONIOU (left), COMPOSER, MEETS THE CRITICS

TAYLOR SINGS "WOZZECK" AS LEINSDORF CONDUCTS THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRA

The Tanglewood Fellows

Continued from Page 30

tion in the double reeds' parts, he noted to all in earshot — "Lesson No. 1. Most oboeists and bassoonists today can't flutter-tongue." Then, turning to the players to whom he had been dictating many changes, he said in a good-humored tone, "Do it again, and if you don't write it down, I'll kill you."

Critic's Convention

Meanwhile, back behind the big concert shed, 40-odd visiting music critics were gathered in a convention of their Music Critics' Association. One would have thought that the critics' daytime program would have focused considerable attention on those rehearsals and the opportunities to study new works in preparatory stages and have musical discussions with composers and performers. But there was only little of that.

Mostly, the critics spent their days listening to panels talk on pertinent topics, and to critics of critics scold them for, among manifold other sins, not going o more rehearsals and studying new music in advance of performances.

As if this circular circumstance was not ironic enough, the rehearsal sounds that came loud and clear from the adjoining main shed, provided editorial backgrounds for the discussions. Thus, while Theodore Antoniou, Luciano Berio and Otto Luening chewed over the subject "Composers at the Crossroads," the air was clouded by the electronic science-fictional sounds of "The Jefferson Airplane," The Who and other rock groups as they prepared for Bill Graham's evening extravaganza.

On another occasion, while the critics were still mulling over the arts' grim financial crisis in the session "Pay or Perish," the musical accompaniment was by the Boston Symphony under guest conductor Henry Lewis, spending its invaluable rehearsal time going over and over an obvious and climactic passage from "Francesca Da Rimini."

Brooding about that conspicuous waste and the similar concurrent activities of the Philadelphia and Cleveland Orchestras at their summer festivals trying to woo the mob public while losing both money and musical ground, I found a certain conclusion inescapable. The symphony orchestra, an incomparable instrument for giving musical pleasure, is probably the world's most inefficient money-making machine. Yet it is that latter function which determines the policies and keeps uppermost the endlessly repetitious programming of all the tried and true masterpieces.

Pops Programming

The composers who addressed the critics, slammed the hardest at the pops programming. Otto Luening described it as inducing cultural erosion, a process not unlike soil erosion, in which overplaying gradually destroys a Beethoven or Dvorak symphony the same way it obliterates pop tunes, albeit more quickly in the latter case.

Berio was more direct. He blasted away at Tanglewood itself. "The very essence of music is betrayed in a typical situation of the Boston Symphony on a Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood," he said. He described picnic-listening as a ritual, and empty fetish. The side-by-side juxtaposition of that with the Monday night "Wozzeck" he found incredible, possible "only in the United States."

Berio and Luening agreed that the artists' reaction to all this has led to a current view whereby "the work of art is defined less and less as a unique object to be preserved eternally." In the face of the popularizing of the masterpiece and eroding of the artistic experience, the Dadaists made their early attack on the eternity idea by painting a mustache on "La Gioconda" (Luening wryly observed that the painting is now worth a fortune). It was the beginning of the attitude of art as a perishable commodity. The panellists went on to discuss the manifestations of this in new music today.

It seemed to me that Berio and Luening actually established themselves in two roles. In their own music which must in one way or other, reflect their reaction to the phenomenon and effect of popularized programming, they function as composers. As panelists, however, making comment on the cultural scene, they became music critics, no less so than had they written and published their remarks.

So it was with the other panelists. Thus, members of the Music Critics Association were given much to chew on from composers and from performers like Erich Leinsdorf and Phyllis Curtin, all of whom, temporarily at least, became card-carrying music critics.

And however the musical problems and matters at hand were received, later to be dealt with or not by the full-time critics at their typewriters, only one thing was certain during this multiphasic Tanglewood week: those destined to deal most importantly and directly with most of these issues, were somewhere else on the grounds, practicing hard, getting ready.

MOZART'S "Cosi Fan Tutte" will be performed in English by the Western Opera Theater at 3 p.m. today in Forest Meadows, San Rafael. Shigemi Matsumoto (left) as Despina, is here shown in her doctor disguise, with Lawrence Boyll and Sheila Marks. The cast includes Donna Petersen, Allan Monk and William Fleck. Richard Woitach conducts.

1969 TRENDS 1969 TRENDS 1969 TRENDS

The photographs on these pages were taken at Tanglewood's Contemporary Trends concerts by ~~Stephen Koch~~, Joel Librizzi and Whitt Birnie.

TUESDAYS AT TANGLEWOOD

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 30 1969

1969 TRENDS 1969 TRENDS 1969 TRENDS

FUN AT HOME AND ABROAD

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 30 1969

141

142.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
JUL 8 1969 E

This Week at Tanglewood

LENOX — Music is available six days a week at Tanglewood, varying from "rock" to symphonies and costing from a dollar to $8.50.

The Tuesday "Tanglewood Trends" Concerts, so popular with the younger crowd last year, have been increased to five.

Tonight at 8 brings Janis Joplin and Orpheus, and July 15 "The Iron Butterfly" and the "Staple Singers." Reserved seats in the big shed range from $4.00 to $6.50, or lawn admission can be enjoyed for $3.00.

Events sponsored by Berkshire Music Center require a low-priced Friends season membership or a contribution of one dollar per person at the gate.

Such programs, at 9 p.m. in the Theater, include tomorrow, the Music Center Orchestra, Joseph Silverstein, conductor, and Thursday, July 10, a vocal concert.

Sunday, July 13, at 10 a.m. in the Theater, small groups will present chamber music.

Saturday's 10:30 a.m. B.S.O. rehearsal in the shed is open to the public at $2.50, unreserved.

Major concerts this coming weekend by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in ensembles up to 50 players, offer reserved seats from $3.50 to $8.50 or optionally lawn admission at $3.00.

Friday, July 11 at 7 p.m. the Weekend Prelude presents Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist, in music of Bach. This program is free to patrons of the 9 p.m. concert, in which Erich Leinsdorf conducts the B.S.O. in Bach's four orchestral suites.

Janis Joplin

Saturday at 8 p.m. Leinsdorf presents a concert version of Mozart's "The Abduction From the Seraglio," with Beverly Sills, George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, Raymond Michalski, the Tanglewood Choir and the B.S.O.

Sunday at 2:30 p.m. David Zinman, young American conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, will direct the Boston Symphony in Mozart's "Linz" Symphony No. 36, Graaf's "Symphony for Strings," Handel's "Concerto Grosso in G," Op. 6, and the Bach, "Triple Concerto in A minor," featuring Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist, Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Robert Levin, harpsichordist.

J. F. K.

Beverly Sills

Janis Joplin Casts Spell Over 7671 Fans

By WALTER MAYFIELD
Union Staff Writer

LENOX — Janis Joplin is a great performer who gives — voice, body, soul, hair, hips, arms and legs. Everything goes into the act of this marvelous entertainer.

Contemporary Star

With state cops on either side of the stage, she was star attraction of the first contemporary trends concert this season at Tanglewood Tueday night.

Magic is what she has, and the kids know it. After a sluggish first hour, during which they listened indifferently to Orpheus, a four - piece rock group, at intermission many of the 7671 persons attending streamed down the aisles and stood on the sides to catch a glimpse of their idol.

For a while it looked like she wouldn't continue after the first 10 minutes when she walked off the stage and spoke to a police official. Under Janis' glare, the state troopers then moved from in front of the stage and stood at the sides, mostly out of view.

Janis Gives

Hiting an empty cowbelt with a drum stick, gyrating the pink yarn tied around her black satinned hips, no matter what she does, Janis gives

So many performers just come on and do their act, but this young woman with the long brown hair parted in the center, bathed in magenta and blue spotlights, is really there.

Youngsters from 9 or 10 upwards kept slipping down the aisles, bendingover to avoid being seen by ushers, just to kneel and squat down front before Janis for a few minutes before being told to move on.

Gets Strong Support

She gets strong support from a combo of first-class musicians, all ofwhom look as though they are having as good time as she is when she sings "Summertime," or "Maybe."

When you see Joplin you wonder if you may not be looking at another Judy Garland. She is a thrilling singer.

"Well, if it isn't everybody out there, if it isn't Tanglewood," were the opening words to Orpheus' musical hour which preceded Janis Joplin.

Incense Burns

While incense sticks burned on either side of the bass, two guitars and drums manned by the quartet, some in the audience held their ears shut, so loud was the volume in the front section.

The loudness was estimated at somewhere just below the intense pain level for many but the audience and the group slowly warmed up and after about 40 minutes, someone turned down the instrument sound and up the voices. Songs like "Good Day, Sunshine," and "I Can't Find the Ttime" were very enjoyable.

While the drummer wiped his nose on his sleeve, and a photographer took pictures during the songs, Orpheus played about 15 loud, rhythmic renditions but the audience remained cool to the end. Perhaps we were all just stunned (not stoned) but it seemed tome that Orpheus was just okay at the first contemporary trends concert.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 9 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 9 1969

Music Review

Joplin-Orpheus Concert

WARMING TO A highly responsive crowd, Janis Joplin blasted the Tanglewood Shed last night with vibrations unaccustomed to those surroundings. The concert marked the opening of the Tuesday Tanglewood Trends series, devoted exclusively to the contemporary scene.

Labeled as one of today's foremost female superstars of rock, Janis served up blues with screaming urgency. The electrified sounds of tortured passion charged not only the aficionados of rock, who sat just yards in front of the speakers, but to the hordes who descended to the lawns.

Miss Joplin rightly shared credit with her outstanding five-piece accompaniment. While she visually communicated the audible rock in emotional and sensual dance, the audience often danced with her.

* * *

ORPHEUS, a rock group discovered in Boston, preceded Miss Joplin on the program. Plagued by technical problems, the group never was able to draw the enthusiasm that was being reserved for Janis.

The crowd of 7,671, turned on to a near frenzy, demanded two encores. Crowds at the front of the Shed pushed to the stage to touch the hand Janis extended. Visibly moved by the enthusiasm, she pulled an admirer to the stage to dance out a song.

Iron Butterfly will be appearing July 15 at Tanglewood in the Tuesday contemporary series.

—W.B.

Whitestone

THE TWAIN MET at Tanglewood last night when Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf greeted rock singer Janis Joplin before her performance in the Contemporary Trends series. A crowd of more than 7,000 attended the concert.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 9 1969

Janis Joplin, Orpheus Open Tuesday Trends

Tuesday Tanglewood Trends started at the Berkshire Festival in Lenox on Tuesday, July 8, with Janis Joplin as the featured artist and joined on the bill by Orpheus.

The contemporary trends series was inaugurated at Tanglewood in the summer of 1968 to present the best in current non-classical musical expression. The series was so successful that it has grown to five this season, all on Tuesday evenings at 8 p.m. in the shed.

On July 15, the second trends concert features The Iron Butterfly and The Staple Singers. On July 22, Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin appear. On July 29, Mahalia Jackson, the great gospel singer, appears with Ornette Coleman and The Thad Jones/Mel Lewis Orchestra. August 12 brings a special program, "Bill Graham presents From the Fillmore" Jefferson Airplane, B.B. King, and special guest stars, The Who, with the Joshua Light Show."

Gunther Schuller, Head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center, under whose auspices the trends concerts are presented, said, when the series was announced last season, "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends."

The artists engaged are not booked into Tanglewood as 'packages' but are specifically selected by Mr. Schuller for their contemporary musical relevance.

Also on Tuesday evenings, though not part of the trends series are the pension fund concert of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra, with Joan Kennedy as narrator of 'Peter and the Wolf,' on Aug. 5 at 8 p.m., and the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala on Aug. 19, featuring a concert with the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras and Tanglewood Choir conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Tickets for the Tuesday trends concerts are on sale now at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240, in person or by mail.

Janis Joplin Opens Series At Tanglewood

LENO X —The first of this season's five Tuesday evening 'contemporary trends' concerts at Tanglewood — called Tuesday Tanglewood Trends — is tonight at 8 in Tanglewood's 6000-seat music shed. Janis Joplin is the featured artist, joined on the bill by Orpheus.

Janis Joplin came to national prominence in 1966 when she began to sing with Big Brother and The Holding Company. Now a major star of records and one of the best and best-known current rock artists, she is certainly one of the most popular.

Orpheus, a four-man group, winner of the 1968 Broadside Poll and the 1968-69 Playboy Readers Poll, is known both for TV apearances and recordings.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 8 1969

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260
JUL 6 1969

JANIS JOPLIN will be shrieking and moaning out under the stars Tuesday night when she appears at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony, in Lenox, Mass. The concert, the first in a new series, starts at 8 p.m.

Joplin Concert To Be Tuesday

Janis Joplin, national recording artist, will present the first contemporary trends concert at Tanglewood this season on Tuesday at 8:00 p.m. in the Shed. Also on the program is the four-man rock group, Orpheus.

The contemporary series was inaugurated last year and has been expanded this season to "Tuesday Tanglewood Trends" which includes five concerts.

Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood box office in Lenox.

Berkshire Eagle

Hartford Times 6 Jul

JANIS JOPLIN. Janis will belt it out in her inimitable way on Tuesday evening at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., at 8 p.m. Janis, who seems to like this neck of the woods, will also be at the Yale Bowl, New Haven, Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are available through the Tanglewood box office and the New Haven Jaycees, respectively.

Janis Joplin In Concert At Tanglewood

Janis Joplin and Orpheus were featured last night at 8 at Tanglewood's Main Shed in Lenox, as part of the Berkshire Festival Contemporary Trends program.

Contemporary Trends brought rock, jazz, Indian, and folk music to Tanglewood last year, and Miss Joplin's performance marks the first of five Tuesday programs to be offered this year, in the Main Shed.

Other performances include: the Iron Butterfly and the Staple Singers on July 15; Joni Mitchell, The Paul Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin on July 22; an all - jazz program of Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, and the Thad Jones - Mel Lewis Orchestra on July 29; and "Filmore at Tanglewood" with the Joshua Light Show, consisting of The Who, B. B. King, and the Jefferson Airplane on August 12.

On August 5 at 8 p.m., Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops will appear in the Shed in theeir annual concert benefitting the Orchestra's Pension Fund. They will play while Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, narrates Peter and the Wolf.

Three groups will perform for the "Tanglewood on Parade" program, August 19. The annual, day-long gala will begin with performances by Boston University musicians and Tanglewood Fellowship Chamber Music groups, and will be climaxed with a combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras Program, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, traditionally closing with fireworks display.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800
JUL 9 1969 N Eng

At the Concert

Janis Alive, Well at Tanglewood

By FRED LeBRUN

Lenox, Mass.— Janis Joplin has finally come alive.

Long recognized as one of the best of the new breed of white blues singers, Janis Joplin delivered some of the old promise—and a little more—in a great show that left a young Tanglewood crrowd last night wondering why she wasn't always like this.

The last few years have disappointed those who expected Janis to fulfill the oracle as the best that is.

THE FEMALE Jim Morrison established herself as potentially the greatest as the leader of the west coast underground sound of a few years ago. Her group, Big Brother and the Holding Company, was the innest of the in.

Then she fired Big Brother and his bag and cast around for the back-up sound that wasn't there before. Until now, it has been a lean year.

In a recent concert at State University in Albany Janis was not there yet; the back-up was strained, her voice lacked the characteristic power, and the short show made few friends.

But last night the doubts and disappointments disappeared; Janis was in control and big and powerful and loose, and the audience loved it.

WHEN Janis Joplin is on she is exciting. She knows what she's doing to a fault, controlling her back-up instruments and the mood of the audience with the same precision she controls that great soft and gritty voice.

JANIS JOPLIN

Dresseed in a blue satin blouse and blue bellbottoms and steeped in the hard-driving drone of two guitars, an organ, drums, two saxs and a horn, she moved her body like wet spaghetti in a wind storm and grabbed the mike.

Janis Joplin is not pretty, but neither was Edith Piaf or Billie Holiday. Like the blues immortals, the face is morror to all our souls, everchanging, crying more than laughing because that's the way things are.

AN OLD chestnut like "Summertime" is a great vehicle for that face and voice. Sometimes a controlled screech, sometimes the sound of a little girl, but always where Janis wants to be. You'd think pandemonium was loose on the stage until you see the writhing form in blue point one finger at the organist and he scurries to pick up a bar. The appearance is loose, but the workings are very well rehearsed, very tight.

That is the essence of professionalism; art is made to look like nature.

One sour note on the evening; police and Tanglewood ushers were quite rude to the performers by constantly removing young fans who wanted a close look.

At one point Janis was so irritated she walked off the stage. Later she said: "They don't understand; they just don't know." The audience was with her.

THE FIRST GROUP to appear on the program was Orpheus, a very talented rock group composeed of four men who had a lot of trouble with their equipment.

Unfortunately talent—and properly functioning equipment—is not enough. It takes showmanship, even if it's super cool anti-showmanship, to make it. They haven't and they didn't.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,000
JUL 10 1969

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
JUL 10 1969

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200
JUL 10 1969 E

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100
JUL 10 1969

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,975
JUL 10 1969 E

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144
JUL 9 1969

142.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
JUL 8 1969

This Week at Tanglewood

LENOX — Music is available six days a week at Tanglewood, varying from "rock" to symphonies and costing from a dollar to $8.50.

The Tuesday "Tanglewood Trends" Concerts, so popular with the younger crowd last year, have been increased to five.

Tonight at 8 brings Janis Joplin and Orpheus, and July 15 "The Iron Butterfly" and the "Staple Singers." Reserved seats in the big shed range from $4.00 to $6.50, or lawn admission can be enjoyed for $3.00.

Events sponsored by Berkshire Music Center require a low-priced Friends season membership or a contribution of one dollar per person at the gate.

Such programs, at 9 p.m. in the Theater, include tomorrow, the Music Center Orchestra, Joseph Silverstein, conductor, and Thursday, July 10, a vocal concert.

Sunday, July 13, at 10 a.m. in the Theater, small groups will present chamber music.

Saturday's 10:30 a.m. B.S.O. rehearsal in the shed is open to the public at $2.50, unreserved.

Major concerts this coming weekend by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in ensembles up to 50 players, offer reserved seats from $3.50 to $8.50 or optionally lawn admission at $3.00.

Friday, July 11 at 7 p.m. the Weekend Prelude presents Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist, in music of Bach. This program is free to patrons of the 9 p.m. concert, in which Erich Leinsdorf conducts the B.S.O. in Bach's four orchestral suites.

Saturday at 8 p.m. Leinsdorf presents a concert version of Mozart's "The Abduction From the Seraglio," with Beverly Sills, George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, Raymond Michalski, the Tanglewood Choir and the B.S.O.

Sunday at 2:30 p.m. David Zinman, young American conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, will direct the Boston Symphony in Mozart's "Linz" Symphony No. 36, Graaf's "Symphony for Strings," Handel's "Concerto Grosso in G," Op. 6, and the Bach, "Triple Concerto in A minor," featuring Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flutist, Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Robert Levin, harpsichordist.

J. F. K.

Janis Joplin

Beverly Sills

Janis Joplin Casts Spell Over 7671 Fans

By WALTER MAYFIELD
Union Staff Writer

LENOX — Janis Joplin is a great performer who gives — voice, body, soul, hair, hips, arms and legs. Everything goes into the act of this marvelous entertainer.

Contemporary Star

With state cops on either side of the stage, she was star attraction of the first contemporary trends concert this season at Tanglewood Tueday night.

Magic is what she has, and the kids know it. After a sluggish first hour, during which they listened indifferently to Orpheus, a four-piece rock group, at intermission many of the 7671 persons attending streamed down the aisles and stood on the sides to catch a glimpse of their idol.

For a while it looked like she wouldn't continue after the first 10 minutes when she walked off the stage and spoke to a police official. Under Janis' glare, the state troopers then moved from in front of the stage and stood at the sides, mostly out of view.

Janis Gives

Hiting an empty cowbelt with a drum stick, gyrating the pink yarn tied around her black satinned hips, no matter what she does, Janis gives

So many performers just come on and do their act, but this young woman with the long brown hair parted in the center, bathed in magenta and blue spotlights, is really there.

Youngsters from 9 or 10 upwards kept slipping down the aisles, bendingover to avoid being seen by ushers, just to kneel and squat down front before Janis for a few minutes before being told to move on.

Gets Strong Support

She gets strong support from a combo of first-class musicians, all ofwhom look as though they are having as good time as she is when she sings "Summertime," or "Maybe."

When you see Joplin you wonder if you may not be looking at another Judy Garland. She is a thrilling singer.

"Well, if it isn't everybody out there, if it isn't Tanglewood," were the opening words to Orpheus' musical hour which preceded Janis Joplin.

Incense Burns

While incense sticks burned on either side of the bass, two guitars and drums manned by the quartet, some in the audience held their ears shut, so loud was the volume in the front section.

The loudness was estimated at somewhere just below the intense pain level for many but the audience and the group slowly warmed up and after about 40 minutes, someone turned down the instrument and up the voices. Songs like "Good Day, Sunshine," and "I Can't Find the Time" were very enjoyable.

While the drummer wiped his nose on his sleeve, and a photographer took pictures during the songs, Orpheus played about 15 loud, rhythmic renditions but the audience remained cool as the cool. Perhaps we were all just stunned (not stoned) but it seemed tome that Orpheus was just okay at the first contemporary trends concert.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 9 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 9 1969

Whitestone

THE TWAIN MET at Tanglewood last night when Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf greeted rock singer Janis Joplin before her performance in the Contemporary Trends series. A crowd of more than 7,000 attended the concert.

Janis Joplin Opens Series At Tanglewood

LENO X —The first of this season's five Tuesday evening 'contemporary trends' concerts at Tanglewood — called Tuesday Tanglewood Trends — is tonight at 8 in Tanglewood's 6000-seat music shed. Janis Joplin is the featured artist, joined on the bill by Orpheus.

Janis Joplin came to national prominence in 1966 when she began to sing with Big Brother and The Holding Company. Now a major star of records and one of the best and best-known current rock artists, she is certainly one of the most popular.

Orpheus, a four-man group, winner of the 1968 Broadside Poll and the 1968-69 Playboy Readers Poll, is known both for TV apearances and recordings.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 8 1969

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260
JUL 6 1969

Joplin Concert To Be Tuesday

Janis Joplin, national recording artist, will present the first contemporary trends concert at Tanglewood this season on Tuesday at 8:00 p.m. in the Shed. Also on the program is the four-man rock group, Orpheus.

The contemporary series was inaugurated last year and has been expanded this season to "Tuesday Tanglewood Trends" which includes five concerts.

Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood box office in Lenox.

Berkshire Eagle

JANIS JOPLIN will be shrieking and moaning out under the stars Tuesday night when she appears at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony, in Lenox, Mass. The concert, the first in a new series, starts at 8 p.m.

Hartford Times 6 Jul

JANIS JOPLIN. Janis will belt it out in her inimitable way on Tuesday evening at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass., at 8 p.m. Janis, who seems to like this neck of the woods, will also be at the Yale Bowl, New Haven, Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are available through the Tanglewood box office and the New Haven Jaycees, respectively.

Janis Joplin In Concert At Tanglewood

Janis Joplin and Orpheus were featured last night at 8 at Tanglewood's Main Shed in Lenox, as part of the Berkshire Festival Contemporary Trends program.

Contemporary Trends brought rock, jazz, Indian, and folk music to Tanglewood last year, and Miss Joplin's performance marks the first of five Tuesday programs to be offered this year, in the Main Shed.

Other performances include: the Iron Butterfly and the Staple Singers on July 15; Joni Mitchell, The Paul Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin on July 22; an all - jazz program of Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, and the Thad Jones - Mel Lewis Orchestra on July 29; and "Filmore at Tanglewood" with the Joshua Light Show, consisting of The Who, B. B. King, and the Jefferson Airplane on August 12.

On August 5 at 8 p.m., Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops will appear in the Shed in theeir annual concert benefitting the Orchestra's Pension Fund. They will play while Mrs. Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, narrates Peter and the Wolf.

Three groups will perform for the "Tanglewood on Parade" program, August 19. The annual, day-long gala will begin with performances by Boston University musicians and Tanglewood Fellowship Chamber Music groups, and will be climaxed with a combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras Program, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, traditionally closing with fireworks display.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800
JUL 9 1969 N Eng

At the Concert

Janis Alive, Well at Tanglewood

By FRED LeBRUN

Lenox, Mass.— Janis Joplin has finally come alive.

Long recognized as one of the best of the new breed of white blues singers, Janis Joplin delivered some of the old promise—and a little more—in a great show that left a young Tanglewood crrowd last night wondering why she wasn't always like this.

The last few years have disappointed those who expected Janis to fulfill the oracle as the best that is.

THE FEMALE Jim Morrison established herself as potentially the greatest as the leader of the west coast underground sound of a few years ago. Her group, Big Brother and the Holding Company, was the innest of the in.

Then she fired Big Brother and his bag and cast around for the back-up sound that wasn't there before. Until now, it has been a lean year.

In a recent concert at State University in Albany Janis was not there yet; the back-up was strained, her voice lacked the characteristic power, and the short show made few friends.

But last night the doubts and disappointments disappeared; Janis was in control and big and powerful and loose, and the audience loved it.

WHEN Janis Joplin is on she is exciting. She knows what she's doing to a fault, controlling her back-up instruments and the mood of the audience with the same precision she controls that great soft and gritty voice.

JANIS JOPLIN

Dressed in a blue satin blouse and blue bellbottoms and steeped in the hard-driving drone of two guitars, an organ, drums, two saxs and a horn, she moved her body like wet spaghetti in a wind storm and grabbed the mike.

Janis Joplin is not pretty, but neither was Edith Piaf or Billie Holiday. Like the blues immortals, the face is morror to all our souls, everchanging, crying more than laughing because that's the way things are.

AN OLD chestnut like "Summertime" is a great vehicle for that face and voice. Sometimes a controlled screech, sometimes the sound of a little girl, but always where Janis wants to be. You'd think pandemonium was loose on the stage until you see the writhing form in blue point one finger at the organist and he scurries to pick up a bar. The appearance is loose, but the workings are very well rehearsed, very tight.

That is the essence of professionalism; art is made to look like nature.

One sour note on the evening; police and Tanglewood ushers were quite rude to the performers by constantly removing young fans who wanted a close look.

At one point Janis was so irritated she walked off the stage. Later she said: "They don't understand; they just don't know." The audience was with her.

THE FIRST GROUP to appear on the program was Orpheus, a very talented rock group composeed of four men who had a lot of trouble with their equipment.

Unfortunately talent—and properly functioning equipment—is not enough. It takes showmanship, even if it's super cool anti-showmanship, to make it. They haven't and they didn't.

Music Review

Joplin-Orpheus Concert

WARMING TO A highly responsive crowd, Janis Joplin blasted the Tanglewood Shed last night with vibrations unaccustomed to those surroundings. The concert marked the opening of the Tuesday Tanglewood Trends series, devoted exclusively to the contemporary scene.

Labeled as one of today's foremost female superstars of rock, Janis served up blues with screaming urgency. The electrified sounds of tortured passion charged not only the aficionados of rock, who sat just yards in front of the speakers, but to the hordes who descended to the lawns.

Miss Joplin rightly shared credit with her outstanding five-piece accompaniment. While she visually communicated the audible rock in emotional and sensual dance, the audience often danced with her.

* * *

ORPHEUS, a rock group discovered in Boston, preceded Miss Joplin on the program. Plagued by technical problems, the group never was able to draw the enthusiasm that was being reserved for Janis.

The crowd of 7,671, turned on to a near frenzy, demanded two encores. Crowds at the front of the Shed pushed to the stage to touch the hand Janis extended. Visibly moved by the enthusiasm, she pulled an admirer to the stage to dance out a song.

Iron Butterfly will be appearing July 15 at Tanglewood in the Tuesday contemporary series.

—W.B.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 9 1969

Janis Joplin, Orpheus Open Tuesday Trends

Tuesday Tanglewood Trends started at the Berkshire Festival in Lenox on Tuesday, July 8, with Janis Joplin as the featured artist and joined on the bill by Orpheus.

The contemporary trends series was inaugurated at Tanglewood in the summer of 1968 to present the best in current non-classical musical expression. The series was so successful that it has grown to five this season, all on Tuesday evenings at 8 p.m. in the shed.

On July 15, the second trends concert features The Iron Butterfly and The Staple Singers. On July 22, Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin appear. On July 29, Mahalia Jackson, the great gospel singer, appears with Ornette Coleman and The Thad Jones/Mel Lewis Orchestra. August 12 brings a special program, "Bill Graham presents From the Fillmore: Jefferson Airplane, B.B. King, and special guest stars, The Who, with the Joshua Light Show."

Gunther Schuller, Head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center, under whose auspices the trends concerts are presented, said, when the series was announced last season, "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends."

The artists engaged are not booked into Tanglewood as 'packages' but are specifically selected by Mr. Schuller for their contemporary musical relevance.

Also on Tuesday evenings, though not part of the trends series are the pension fund concert of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra, with Joan Kennedy as narrator of 'Peter and the Wolf,' on Aug. 5 at 8 p.m., and the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala on Aug. 19, featuring a concert with the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras and Tanglewood Choir conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Tickets for the Tuesday trends concerts are on sale now at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240, in person or by mail.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 9 1969

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,000
JUL 10 1969

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
JUL 10 1969

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200
JUL 10 1969

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100
JUL 10 1969

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,975
JUL 10 1969

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144
JUL 9 1969

Rock-Jazz Beat

A Tense Performance

JANIS JOPLIN, ROCK IDOL, REFUSED TO PERFORM UNTIL POLICE HAD LEFT THE STAGE-FRONT AREA AT TANGLEWOOD TUESDAY EVENING. THEY SPOILED THE ATMOSPHERE, SHE SAID.

By James Ventola

Janis Joplin is tough, ten times tougher in person than on records. Right now she's an "important figure" in contemporary music. So Gunther Schuller, Head of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, brought her to the Yankee culture center Tuesday night because, "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkeshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends" (Tuesday Tanglewood Trends Concerts). But Janis Joplin is tough, and Mr. Schuller's "concert" became instead a confrontation and a challenge.

American Heritage

Tanglewood is an incredibly lovely spot on this planet, lovely in a way that only money can buy. To get there we had to go from Kenmore Square to Stockbridge, from the chaos of an irrational city to the well-trimmed order of an affluent country town, from an afternoon of smog and rush to an evening saunter of huge green lawn, picnic and baskings of the colorful children of the Symphony supporters. They lounge there, outside the music shed, necking and joking about the grass, but they are neat and clean and "decent" and make this place an Esplenade.

Inside the shed, the 1968 Broadside poll winning Orpheus tries frantically to get themselves together, but trouble with equipment and a paranoid reaction to the vibrations at the imposing Music Center combine to unhinge them. People listen, some are enthused, and some mill around. Loose at the center, loose at the circumference. Finally, a sustained drum solo pounds some sense into the thing, and a spark of contact flashes.

People In Blue

As Miss Joplin's new band begins to tune up, the center gets tighter. People move down front squeezing into seats they didn't buy, and wait. The band begins and is powerful and compelling as Janis Joplin comes out moving, dancing, smiling, singing and shouting. In the long blue riffs at the end of a verse she achieves the freedom of passion, the abandon of tears. She becomes what we have all been at times, and her voice calls us into those moments again. The initial connection is made, the sparks are there, the center is alive and throbbing. But there are resistors.

In front of the stage six Berkeshire County Policemen stand ready (for what?), and the eye sees more than the heart knows. They begin to clear people from the aisles down front, politely but visibly. The music says, "Dance, feel, love, hate, cry, shout, move," but the ordinance says, "Clear the aisles and stay in your place." And the cops are only doing the ushers' jobs. No blame. But after Chicago, few of the young people in the audience maintain critical distance, so the sight of the cops is as powerful an emotional force as the music.

The Battle

Janis Joplin is tough. She yells at the cops and then walks off stage until somebody decides to move them and let the ushers clear the aisles. Returning to a roar of approval and gratitude, she goes on to broaden the attack as she and Snookey Flowers urge the audience to abandon the safety of detachment and get into the feelings of the music. Dancing together, they transform the Music Shed into a cave, a dive, a womb of sexual energy. People begin to move and clap, participating in the mood, until the policemen and ushers are obliterated in their irrelevance. Free now to take the audience on her trip, Janis Joplin widens and heightens the connections until her energy is the only energy and she can finish the concert, as they say, "triumphantly."

As the house lights go up, six Berkeshire County Policemen appear on the stage (who's really in charge here)? The audience takes it as an affront, unwilling that the police regain even symbolic control, and they shout for more. Suddenly, Joplin and company return, and people are standing on their chairs or streaming down the aisles to the stage completely unhindered by police or ushers. There are no more spectators, there is only us as she sings, "Take another little piece of my heart, baby."

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUL 2 1969

Tanglewood Rocks

Janis Joplin, the Iron Butterfly, Butterfield Blues Band — at Tanglewood?

As a matter of fact, yes. These and other rock and pop attractions will be a part of the Berkshire Music Festival's new Tuesday Tangelwood Trends programs, a series of contemporary concerts sandwiched in with the summer festival's more traditional musical events.

The complete TTT schedule is: July 8, Janis Joplin, Orpheus; July 15, Iron Butterfly, Staple Singers; July 22, Joni Mitchell, Butterfield Blues Band, Tim Hardin; July 29, Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra; Aug. 5, Boston Pops at Tangelwood, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, with Joan Kennedy narrating "Peter and the Wolf"; Aug. 12, the Fillmore at Tanglewood, with the Joshua Light Show; Aug. 19, Tangelwood-on-Parade.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUL 2 1969

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Wednesday, July 2, 1969

... $51,000 ... d Arkansas. ... akes down ... one-shots.

"Your Own Thing" quietly has integrated the N.Y. cast, three roles . . . Even the Boston Symphony has gone on-the-rock: hired Fillmore East impresario Bill Graham to stage a rock-night at Tanglewood.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

JUL 13 1969

At Tanglewood

By OSCAR OBERLIN

On Sunday Leinsdorf conducted a program of Mozart before an audience of classicists. On Tuesday Janis Joplin tore the music shed apart before several thousand students, teenyboppers, swains, hippies and followers of the contemporary mode.

Such is life at Tanglewood.

Janis wore dark bellbottoms, loose silk blue blouse separated by a long red cord sash. When Janis sings everything moves, hands, legs, clothes, sash and most of all her mop of long blonde hair which played peekaboo with her face throughout the evening.

The "over-thirty" listeners who don't dig, had a hard time catching the lyrics. We even missed one as popular as "Summer Time." Janis did a bit with Snooky Flowers who plays brass. She sang "Maybe, Maybe, Baby" from her coming album. Also "Raise Your Hand", "Ball and Chain" and "Piece of my Heart". Her voice and the balanced back-up group which included organ, brass and guitar, over-filled the shed, whirled and hit the ears from all directions.

The sound came easier on the grass outside where Couples intertwined under blankets and swung with Gallo and 'Gansett as fitting accompaniment.

Janis' frenetic energy, bolstered by swigs at intervals, seemed epidemic. Ushers had a bit of a time with groups surging down the aisles where they weren't supposed to be but all in all it was a good summer evening for all.

Janis Joplin

The Orpheus group which preceeded her had trouble balancing the drum and three electrified guitars to the demands of the Shed. The result was too loud and too fuzzy. The treble was adjusted constantly but never made it. It was "electricificana non grata", an experience in decibellic rhythm. The lead guitarist said: "Sometimes everything goes like clockwork. Tonight everything is weird."

On Sunday David Dinman of the Boston Symphony will conduct a program of Mozart. As we said. Tanglewood has everything.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 38,000

JUL 14 1969

Contemporary Concerts At Tanglewood

Janis Joplin, rock singer, and the recording group, Orpheus, will appear at Tanglewood, Lenox, tomorrow at 8 p.m., in the first of the "contemporary trends" concerts, along with the Iron Butterfly and the Staple Singers.

Also appearing in the five-week series will be Joni Mitchell, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band and Tim Hardin, July 22; gospel singer Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman and the Thad Jones Mel Lewis orchestra, July 29. On Aug. 12, Jefferson Airplane, B.B. King, and The Who will appear with the Joshua Light Show.

Also on Tuesday evenings, though not part of the trends series, are the pension fund concerts of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra. Mrs. Joan Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf," August 5 at 8 p.m. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala on August 19 will feature a concert with the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras and Tanglewood Choir conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

HOUSTON CHRONICLE
D. 290,584 SUN. 333,794

JUL 10 1969

... is a good place to be tonight.

And guess who's going to Tanglewood? Janis Joplin, sizzling rock singer, who'll be joined by Orpheus, who is no relation to Gluck I'm here to tell you, but a four-man group winner of the 1968 Broadside Poll (the what?) and the 1968-69 Playboy Readers Poll. Somewhere in it all, the Boston Symphony is still heard.

JANIS JOPLIN appears with Orpheus Tuesday night in first of seven Tuesday Tanglewood Trends concerts this Summer.

143.

Janis Joplin Scores First Hit For Tanglewood Concert Series

Janis Joplin

By ROB AUTHIER
T-T Staff Reporter

Have you ever heard musical charisma? Some 7671 persons at the Janis Joplin concert in Lenox Tuesday did. And it was a memorable experience.

The program, the first in five Tanglewood Contemporary Trends Concerts, also headlined Orpheus, a boring co-star for the Music Shed's playbill. The four-piece rock group suffered equipment failure: broken guitar strings, burned fuses, maladjusted amplifiers that drowned out any socially relevant lyrics, and an ultra-high pitched lead guitar which pierced the seasoned ear.

In the words of second guitarist - vocalist Jack McKenes, "Everything is pretty weird here." And with the exception of a ten minute drum solo and a few good numbers like their hit "I Can't Find The Time," it was "pretty" strange.

After intermission the lights faded. The organ, bass and lead guitars and three pieces of brass were tuned. Out of the darkness into a thunderous applause came the former Big Brother and the Holding Company's lead singer Miss Janis Joplin.

She confronted an audience filled with young people robed in everything from bellbottoms to sleeping bags. After only ten minutes on stage, Miss Joplin left to complain about the state police and Shed officials who were trying to clear the aisles. The officials remained but the police officers were restationed in less obvious positions.

Dressed in a blue, low-cut, blouse with a pink yarn gyrating from her hips, Miss Joplin radiated blues from every part of her slender body, including a lot of heaviness from the soul. This was one of her "devious ways to put across what your talking about."

The blues artist received strong support from the seven-piece combo, directed by Snooky Flower, who starred in one jam number with Miss Joplin. All were highly professional.

She received a standing ovation at the concert's supposed finish. The applause would not cease, so the group came back from their dressing room to play "one more number." With everyone in the Shed standing on chairs, Miss Joplin screamed out her famous hit single, "Peace of My Heart." Some guy dressed in purple got up and hugged her, and the group finally tried to leave the stage again.

A steady beat of "We want more" rang out from the crowd, who would not leave. Miss Joplin and combo came out for one more song, ending with a singing solo. The drummer threw out his sticks, and the concert ended 20 minutes late.

"You know she's got it, cause it makes you feel good."

The other concerts scheduled for "Contemporary Trends" are: July 15, The Iron Butterfly, The Staple Singers; July 22, Joni Mitchell, Butterfield Blues Band, Tim Hardin; July 29, Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, Thad Jones - Mel Lewis Orchestra; Aug. 12, The Fillmore at Tanglewood, featuring the Joshua Light Show.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 15 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 18 1969

Rock-Jazz Beat

A Tense Performance

JANIS JOPLIN, ROCK IDOL, REFUSED TO PERFORM UNTIL POLICE HAD LEFT THE STAGE-FRONT AREA AT TANGLEWOOD TUESDAY EVENING. THEY SPOILED THE ATMOSPHERE, SHE SAID.

By James Ventola

Janis Joplin is tough, ten times tougher in person than on records. Right now she's an "important figure" in contemporary music. So Gunther Schuller, Head of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, brought her to the Yankee culture center Tuesday night because, "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends" (Tuesday Tanglewood Trends Concerts). But Janis Joplin is tough, and Mr. Schuller's "concert" became instead a confrontation and a challenge.

American Heritage

Tanglewood is an incredibly lovely spot on this planet, lovely in a way that only money can buy. To get there we had to go from Kenmore Square to Stockbridge, from the chaos of an irrational city to the well-trimmed order of an affluent country town, from an afternoon of smog and rush to an evening saunter of huge green lawn, picnic and baskings of the colorful children of the Symphony supporters. They lounge there, outside the music shed, necking and joking about the grass, but they are neat and clean and "decent" and make this place an Esplenade.

Inside the shed, the 1968 Broadside poll winning Orpheus tries frantically to get themselves together, but trouble with equipment and a paranoid reaction to the vibrations at the imposing Music Center combine to unhinge them. People listen, some are enthused, and some mill around. Loose at the center, loose at the circumference. Finally, a sustained drum solo pounds some sense into the thing, and a spark of contact flashes.

People In Blue

As Miss Joplin's new band begins to tune up, the center gets tighter. People move down front squeezing into seats they didn't buy, and wait. The band begins and is powerful and compelling as Janis Joplin comes out moving, dancing, smiling, singing and shouting. In the long blue riffs at the end of a verse she achieves the freedom of passion, the abandon of tears. She becomes what we have all been at times, and her voice calls us into those moments again. The initial connection is made, the sparks are there, the center is alive and throbbing. But there are resistors.

In front of the stage six Berkeshire County Policemen stand ready (for what?), and the eye sees more than the heart knows. They begin to clear people from the aisles down front, politely but visibly. The music says, "Dance, feel, love, hate, cry, shout, move," but the ordinance says, "Clear the aisles and stay in your place." And the cops are only doing the ushers' jobs. No blame. But after Chicago, few of the young people in the audience maintain critical distance, so the sight of the cops is as powerful an emotional force as the music.

The Battle

Janis Joplin is tough. She yells at the cops and then walks off stage until somebody decides to move them and let the ushers clear the aisles. Returning to a roar of approval and gratitude, she goes on to broaden the attack as she and Snookey Flowers urge the audience to abandon the safety of detachment and get into the feelings of the music. Dancing together, they transform the Music Shed into a cave, a dive, a womb of sexual energy. People begin to move and clap, participating in the mood, until the policemen and ushers are obliterated in their irrelevance. Free now to take the audience on her trip, Janis Joplin widens and heightens the connections until her energy is the only energy and she can finish the concert, as they say, "triumphantly."

As the house lights go up, six Berkeshire County Policemen appear on the stage (who's really in charge here)? The audience takes it as an affront, unwilling that the police regain even symbolic control, and they shout for more. Suddenly, Joplin and company return, and people are standing on their chairs or streaming down the aisles to the stage completely unhindered by police or ushers. There are no more spectators, there is only us as she sings, "Take another little piece of my heart, baby."

Tanglewood Rocks

Janis Joplin, the Iron Butterfly, Butterfield Blues Band — at Tanglewood?

As a matter of fact, yes. These and other rock and pop attractions will be a part of the Berkshire Music Festival's new Tuesday Tangelwood Trends programs, a series of contemporary concerts sandwiched in with the summer festival's more traditional musical events.

The complete TTT schedule is: July 8, Janis Joplin, Orpheus; July 15, Iron Butterfly, Staple Singers; July 22, Joni Mitchell, Butterfield Blues Band, Tim Hardin; July 29, Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra; Aug. 5, Boston Pops at Tangelwood, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, with Joan Kennedy narrating "Peter and the Wolf"; Aug. 12, the Fillmore at Tanglewood, with the Joshua Light Show; Aug. 19, Tangelwood-on-Parade.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUL 2 1969

LONG ISLAND DAILY PRESS
Wednesday, July 2, 1969

... $81,000
... d Arkansas.
... akes down
... one-shots.

"Your Own Thing" quietly has integrated the N.Y. cast, three roles . . . Even the Boston Symphony has gone on-the-rock: hired Fillmore East impresario Bill Graham to stage a rock-night at Tanglewood.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

JUL 13 1969

At Tanglewood

By OSCAR OBERLIN

On Sunday Leinsdorf conducted a program of Mozart before an audience of classicists. On Tuesday Janis Joplin tore the music shed apart before several thousand students, teenyboppers, swains, hippies and followers of the contemporary mode.

Such is life at Tanglewood.

Janis wore dark bellbottoms, loose silk blue blouse separated by a long red cord sash. When Janis sings everything moves, hands, legs, clothes, sash and most of all her mop of long blonde hair which played peekaboo with her face throughout the evening.

The "over-thirty" listeners who don't dig, had a hard time catching the lyrics. We even missed one as popular as "Summer Time." Janis did a bit with Snooky Flowers who plays brass. She sang "Maybe, Maybe, Baby" from her coming album. Also "Raise Your Hand", "Ball and Chain" and "Piece of my Heart". Her voice and the balanced back-up group which included organ, brass and guitar, over-filled the shed, whirled and hit the ears from all directions.

The sound came easier on the grass outside where Couples intertwined under blankets and swung with Gallo and 'Gansett as fitting accompaniment.

Janis' frenetic energy, bolstered by swigs at intervals, seemed epidemic. Ushers had a bit of a time with groups surging down the aisles where they weren't supposed to be but all in all it was a good summer evening for all.

Janis Joplin

The Orpheus group which preceeded her had trouble balancing the drum and three electrified guitars to the demands of the Shed. The result was too loud and too fuzzy. The treble was adjusted constantly but never made it. It was "electricificana non grata", an experience in decibellic rhythm. The lead guitarist said: "Sometimes everything goes like clockwork. Tonight everything is weird."

On Sunday David Dinman of the Boston Symphony will conduct a program of Mozart. As we said. Tanglewood has everything.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUL 10 1969

HOUSTON CHRONICLE
D. 290,584 SUN. 333,794

JUL 10 1969

... is a good place to be from ...

And guess who's going to Tanglewood? Janis Joplin, sizzling rock singer, who'll be joined by Orpheus, who is no relation to Gluck I'm here to tell you, but a four-man group winner of the 1968 Broadside Poll (the what?) and the 1968-69 Playboy Readers' Poll. Somewhere in it all, the Boston Symphony is still heard.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 38,000

JUL 14 1969

Contemporary Concerts At Tanglewood

Janis Joplin, rock singer, and the recording group, Orpheus, will appear at Tanglewood, Lenox, tomorrow at 8 p.m., in the first of the "contemporary trends" concerts, along with the Iron Butterfly and the Staple Singers.

Also appearing in the five-week series will be Joni Mitchell, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band and Tim Hardin, July 22; gospel singer Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman and the Thad Jones Mel Lewis orchestra, July 29. On Aug. 12, Jefferson Airplane, B.B. King, and The Who will appear with the Joshua Light Show.

Also on Tuesday evenings, though not part of the trends series, are the pension fund concerts of Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra. Mrs. Joan Kennedy will narrate "Peter and the Wolf," August 5 at 8 p.m. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala on August 19 will feature a concert with the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras and Tanglewood Choir conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

JANIS JOPLIN appears with Orpheus Tuesday night in first of seven Tuesday Tanglewood Trends concerts this Summer.

143

Janis Joplin Scores First Hit For Tanglewood Concert Series

Janis Joplin

By ROB AUTHIER
T-T Staff Reporter

Have you ever heard musical charisma? Some 7671 persons at the Janis Joplin concert in Lenox Tuesday did. And it was a memorable experience.

The program, the first in five Tanglewood Contemporary Trends Concerts, also headlined Orpheus, a boring co-star for the Music Shed's playbill. The four-piece rock group suffered equipment failure: broken guitar strings, burned fuses, maladjusted amplifiers that drowned out any socially relevant lyrics, and an ultra-high pitched lead guitar which pierced the seasoned ear.

In the words of second guitarist - vocalist Jack McKenes, "Everything is pretty weird here." And with the exception of a ten minute drum solo and a few good numbers like their hit "I Can't Find The Time," it was "pretty" strange.

After intermission the lights faded. The organ, bass and lead guitars and three pieces of brass were tuned. Out of the darkness into a thunderous applause came the former Big Brother and the Holding Company's lead singer Miss Janis Joplin.

She confronted an audience filled with young people robed in everything from bellbottoms to sleeping bags. After only ten minutes on stage, Miss Joplin left to complain about the state police and Shed officials who were trying to clear the aisles. The officials remained but the police offrcers were restationed in less obvious positions.

Dressed in a blue, low-cut, blouse with a pink yarn gyrating from her hips, Miss Joplin radiated blues from every part of her slender body, including a lot of heaviness from the soul. This was one of her "devious ways to put across what your talking about."

The blues artist received strong support from the seven-piece combo, directed by Snooky Flower, who starred in one jam number with Miss Joplin. All were highly professional.

She received a standing ovation at the concert's supposed finish. The applause would not cease, so the group came back from their dressing room to play "one more number." With everyone in the Shed standing on chairs, Miss Joplin screamed out her famous hit single, "Peace of My Heart." Some guy dressed in purple got up and hugged her, and the group finally tried to leave the stage again.

A steady beat of "We want more" rang out from the crowd, who would not leave. Miss Joplin and combo came out for one more song, ending with a singing solo. The drummer threw out his sticks, and the concert ended 20 minutes late.

"You know she's got it, cause it makes you feel good."

The other concerts scheduled for "Contemporary Trends" are: July 15, The Iron Butterfly, The Staple Singers; July 22, Joni Mitchell, Butterfield Blues Band, Tim Hardin; July 29, Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, Thad Jones - Mel Lewis Orchestra; Aug. 12, The Fillmore at Tanglewood, featuring the Joshua Light Show.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 15 1969

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 18 1969

144

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 10 1969

TREND CONCERTS AT TANGLEWOOD

THE IRON BUTTERFLY . . . a popular group who will appear Tuesday, July 15, in the Contemporary Trend concert at 8 p.m. in Tanglewood's big shed.

The first of this season's five Tuesday evening 'Contemporary Trends' concerts at Tanglewood — called Tuesday Tanglewood Trends — took place July 8 at 8:30 p.m. in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed. Janis Joplin was the featured artist, joined on the bill by Orpheus.

The Contemporary Trends series was inaugurated at Tanglewood in the summer of 1968 to present the best in current non-classical musical expression. The series was so successful that it has grown to five this season, all on Tuesday evenings at 8 p.m. in the Shed.

On July 15, the second Trends concert features the Iron Butterfly and The Staple Singers. On July 22, Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin appear. On July 29, Mahalia Jackson, the great gospel singer, appears with Ornette Coleman and the Thad/Mel Lewis Orchestra. August 12 brings a special program, "Bill Graham presents From the Fillmore: Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, and special guest stars, The Who, with the Joshua Light Show."

Gunther Schuller, Head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center, under whose auspices the Trends concerts are presented, said, when the series was announced last season, "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends." The artists engaged are not booked into Tanglewood as 'packages,' but are specifically selected by Mr. Schuller for their contemporary musical relevance.

Also on Tuesday evenings, though not part of the Trends series are the Pension Fund concert of Authur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra, with Joan Kennedy as narrator of 'Peter and the Wolf,' on August 5 at 8 p.m., and the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala on August 19, featuring a concert with the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras and Tanglewood Choir conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUL 11 1969

At Tanglewood

Contemporary and Classical; There's Room For Both!

The second weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens tonight with Music Director Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the four suites of Bach, the first time Mr. Leinsdorf has programmed them in a single concert.

The 9 p.m., Boston Symphony concert is preceded at 7 p.m. by the Weekend Prelude, in which the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, and principal cellist, Jules Eskin, will play two Bach compositions for unaccompanied strings.

On Saturday evening, July 12, Erich Leinsdorf conducts a complete concert performance in German of Mozart's opera, The Abduction from the Seraglio. Beverly Sills sings the role of Constanze and George Shirley is Belmonte.

David Zinman, the young American conductor if the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, returns to Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon July 13 at 2.30. He will conduct a program of music or chamber orchestra.

The weekend's Open Rehearsal s Saturday morning July 12 at 6.30.

Contemporary Trends

Tuesday Tanglewood Trends, a special series of contemporary musical concerts, began last Tuesday with Janis Joplin and Orpheus.

This series, presented in the shed each Tuesday at 8 p.m., was inaugurated last summer to present the best in current non-classical musical expression.

Gunther Schuller, head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center, said "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness if these new developments music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends."

Next Tuesday, the second trends concert features The Iron Butterfly and The Staple Singers. On July 22, Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin appear. On July 29, Mahalia Jackson, the great gospel singer, appears with Ornette Coleman and The Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra. August 12 brings a special program, "Bill Graham presents Fro mthe Filmore: Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, and special guest stars, The Who, in with the Joshua Light Show."

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUL 12 1969

Tanglewood Rock

The second concert in Tanglewood's 1969 contemporary trends series is Tuesday night at 8 p.m. in the 6000-seat music shed. The featured group is the "Iron Butterfly," who, in the past two years have risen from the Los Angeles underground to national prominence in the rock field.

Also on Tanglewood's second popular music concert are the world-famous "Staple Singers" from Chicago. The "Staple Singers" have appeared at Carnegie Hall and at the International Jazz Festival in Washington, D.C. They are the first gospel artists to be selected as the "new star" vocal group in 'Down Beat's" poll.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 15 1969

The Iron Butterfly Tonight At Music Shed

The second concert in Tanglewood's 1969 contemporary trends series is tonight at 8 in the 6,000-seat music shed. The featured group is the Iron Butterfly, who in the past two years has risen from the Los Angeles "underground" to national prominence in the rock field.

Early in 1968, the Butterfly's first LP appeared, and within a few weeks it was the best seller in Los Angeles and one of the top sellers across the country. The record, called "heavy" opened the doors for a national concert tour in April and May of 1968. It also established the Iron Butterfly's unique and original sound. Doug Ingle, leader of the group explains: "We didn't copy anyone nor were we influenced by anyone. We had an idea about a sound and how it should be expressed."

Other members of the group are Ron Bushy, drummer, Lee Dorman, bass guitarist and Erik Bran, lead guitar.

Also on Tanglewood's second trends program are the world famous Staple Singers from Chicago. The Staple Singers have appeared at Carnegie Hall and at the International Jazz Festival in Washington, D.C. and are the first Gospel artists to be selected as "new star" vocal group in Down Beat's international jazz critics' poll. Led by Mississippi-born Roebuck "Pop Staples," the family group is comprised of daughters Cleo and Mavis and son, Pervis. Blending melodic elements derived from the stateliness of the Negro spiritual with the rhythmic force of jazz-influenced Gospel singing, the Staple Singers have a unique Afro-American style.

Tickets for Tuesday Tanglewood Trends Concerts are on sale by mail or in person at the box office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., next Exits 1 and 2 of the Mass. Turnpike. Box seats are $6.50. General admission to the lawn is on sale only on the day of the concert.

The third of the Tuesday Tanglewood Trends Concerts is July 22, when Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band and Tim Hardin are on the bill.

Tuesday Tanglewood Trends

The summer of 1968 witnessed the inauguration of the Contemporary Trends concert series at Tanglewood. As a result of its overwhelming success the series has been extended this year in an effort to present the best in current nonclassical musical expression. Janis Joplin, one of the most popular of the current rock artists, opend the series on July 8. Iron Butterfly and the gospel-singing Staple Singers appear July 15. The third concert on July 22, a "must" for any afficionado of folk or blues, will feature the combination of Joni Mitchell, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin. Two more concerts offer a wide selection of more blues, jazz, gospel and rock.

The Contemporary Trends concerts are held Tuesdays at 8 p.m. in the Shed.

The Iron Butterfly are billed with The Staple Singers for the Tuesday Tanglewood Trend series on July 15.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 12 1969

Butterfly at Lenox

The second concert in Tanglewood's 1969 contemporary trends series comes tomorrow night at 8 in the Lenox, Mass., music shed. The featured group is the Iron Butterfly, who in the past two years have risen from the Los Angeles "underground" to national prominence in the rock field.

Early in 1968, the Butterfly's first LP appeared, and within a few weeks it was the No. 1 best seller in Los Angeles and one of the top sellers across the country. The record, called "Heavy," opened the doors for a national concert tour.

Also on Tanglewood's second trends program are the world famous Staple Singers from Chicago. The Staple Singers have appeared at Carnegie Hall and at the International Jazz Festival in Washington and are the first gospel artists to be selected as "new star" vocal group in an international jazz critics' poll.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656

JUL 14 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUL 15 1969

ROSE WALSH

Tanglewood Features Rock, Gospel Groups

Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home, Tanglewood, Lenox, is a mecca for all types of music buffs. Tuesday night the 6000-seat music shed will be well filled with contemporary music fans interested in hearing the Iron Buterfly group, which in two years has risen from the Los Angeles "underground" to national prominence in the rock field. Its leader, Doug Ingle, stresses, "We didn't copy anyone nor were we influenced by anyone. We had an idea about a sound and how it should be expressed." Ron Bushy is the drummer; Lee Dorman, bass guitarist, and Erik Brann, lead guitar.

Also on this second trends program will be the famed Staple Singers from Chicago. They have appeared at Carnegie Hall and at the International Jazz Festival in Washington, D.C., and are the first gospel artists to be selected as "new star" vocal group in Down Beat's international jazz critics poll.

Mississippi-born Roebuck "Pop" Staples leads his family group comprised of daughter Cleo and Mavis and son Pervis. They have a unique Afro-American style, blending melodic elements derived from the stateliness of the Negro spiritual with the rhythmic force of jazz-influenced gospel singing.

Tickets for the Tuesday Trend Concerts are on sale by mail or in person at the box office at Tanglewood, Lenox, near exits 1 and 2 of the Mass. turnpike. Phone reservations are accepted.

★ ★ ★

Iron Butterfly, Staple Singers on Tanglewood Slate

LENOX—The second concert in Tanglewood's 1969 contemporary trends series is Tuesday night at 8 in the 6000-seat music shed. The featured group is the Iron Butterfly, who in the past two years have risen from the Los Angeles "underground" to prominence in the rock field.

Also on Tanglewood's second trends program are the world famous Staple Singers from Chicago. The Staple Singers have appeared at Carnegie Hall and at the International Jazz Festival in Washington D.C., and are the first gospel artists to be selected as "new star" vocal group in Down Beat's international jazz critics' poll. Led by Mississippi-born Roebuck "Pop Staples," the family group is comprised of daughters Cleo and Mavis, and son, Pervis. Blending melodic elements derived from the stateliness of the Negro spiritual with the rhythmic force of jazz-influenced gospel singing, the Staple Singers have a unique Afro-American style.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 15 1969

144

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 10 1969

THE IRON BUTTERFLY . . . a popular group who will appear Tuesday, July 15, in the Contemporary Trend concert at 8 p.m. in Tanglewood's big shed.

TREND CONCERTS AT TANGLEWOOD

The first of this season's five Tuesday evening 'Contemporary Trends' concerts at Tanglewood — called Tuesday Tanglewood Trends — took place July 8 at 8:30 p.m. in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed. Janis Joplin was the featured artist, joined on the bill by Orpheus.

The Contemporary Trends series was inaugurated at Tanglewood in the summer of 1968 to present the best in current non-classical musical expression. The series was so successful that it has grown to five this season, all on Tuesday evenings at 8 p.m. in the Shed.

On July 15, the second Trends concert features the Iron Butterfly and The Staple Singers. On July 22, Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin appear. On July 29, Mahalia Jackson, the great gospel singer, appears with Ornette Coleman and the Thad/Mel Lewis Orchestra. August 12 brings a special program, "Bill Graham presents From the Fillmore: Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, and special guest stars, The Who, with the Joshua Light Show."

Gunther Schuller, Head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center, under whose auspices the Trends concerts are presented, said, when the series was announced last season, "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness of these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends." The artists engaged are not booked into Tanglewood as 'packages,' but are specifically selected by Mr. Schuller for their contemporary musical relevance.

Also on Tuesday evenings, though not part of the Trends series are the Pension Fund concert of Authur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra, with Joan Kennedy as narrator of 'Peter and the Wolf,' on August 5 at 8 p.m., and the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala on August 19, featuring a concert with the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras and Tanglewood Choir conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Tuesday Tanglewood Trends

The summer of 1968 witnessed the inauguration of the Contemporary Trends concert series at Tanglewood. As a result of its overwhelming success the series has been extended this year in an effort to present the best in current nonclassical musical expression. Janis Joplin, one of the most popular of the current rock artists, opend the series on July 8. Iron Butterfly and the gospel-singing Staple Singers appear July 15. The third concert on July 22, a "must" for any afficionado of folk or blues, will feature the combination of Joni Mitchell, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin. Two more concerts offer a wide selection of more blues, jazz, gospel and rock.

The Contemporary Trends concerts are held Tuesdays at 8 p.m. in the Shed.

The Iron Butterfly are billed with The Staple Singers for the Tuesday Tanglewood Trend series on July 15.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 12 1969

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUL 11 1969

At Tanglewood

Contemporary and Classical; There's Room For Both!

The second weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens tonight with Music Director Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the four suites of Bach, the first time Mr. Leinsdorf has programmed them in a single concert.

The 9 p.m., Boston Symphony concert is preceded at 7 p.m. by the Weekend Prelude, in which the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, and principal cellist, Jules Eskin, will play two Bach compositions for unaccompanied strings.

On Saturday evening, July 12, Erich Leinsdorf conducts a complete concert performance in German of Mozart's opera, The Abduction from the Seraglio. Beverly Sills sings the role of Constanze and George Shirley is Belmonte.

David Zinman, the young American conductor if the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, returns to Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon July 13 at 2.30. He will conduct a program of music or chamber orchestra.

The weekend's Open Rehearsal s Saturday morning July 12 at 6.30.

Contemporary Trends

Tuesday Tanglewood Trends, a special series of contemporary musical concerts, began last Tuesday with Janis Joplin and Orpheus.

This series, presented in the shed each Tuesday at 8 p.m., was inaugurated last summer to present the best in current nonclassical musical expression.

Gunther Schuller, head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center, said "I think it is significant and necessary that the Berkshire Music Center show its awareness if these new developments in music by instituting a series of concerts delineating these new trends."

Next Tuesday, the second trends concert features The Iron Butterfly and The Staple Singers. On July 22, Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin appear. On July 29, Mahalia Jackson, the great gospel singer, appears with Ornette Coleman and The Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra. August 12 brings a special program, "Bill Graham presents Fro mthe Filmore: Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, and special guest stars, The Who, in with the Joshua Light Show."

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUL 12 1969

Tanglewood Rock

The second concert in Tanglewood's 1969 contemporary trends series is Tuesday night at 8 p.m. in the 6000-seat music shed. The featured group is the "Iron Butterfly," who, in the past two years have risen from the Los Angeles underground to national prominence in the rock field.

Also on Tanglewood's second popular music concert are the world-famous "Staple Singers" from Chicago. The "Staple Singers" have appeared at Carnegie Hall and at the International Jazz Festival in Washington, D.C. They are the first gospel artists to be selected as the "new star" vocal group in 'Down Beat's" poll.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 15 1969

The Iron Butterfly Tonight At Music Shed

The second concert in Tanglewood's 1969 contemporary trends series is tonight at 8 in the 6,000-seat music shed. The featured group is the Iron Butterfly, who in the past two years has risen from the Los Angeles "underground" to national prominence in the rock field.

Early in 1968, the Butterfly's first LP appeared, and within a few weeks it was the best seller in Los Angeles and one of the top sellers across the country. The record, called "heavy" opened the doors for a national concert tour in April and May of 1968. It also established the Iron Butterfly's unique and original sound. Doug Ingle, leader of the group explains: "We didn't copy anyone nor were we influenced by anyone. We had an idea about a sound and how it should be expressed."

Other members of the group are Ron Bushy, drummer, Lee Dorman, bass guitarist and Erik Bran, lead guitar.

Also on Tanglewood's second trends program are the world famous Staple Singers from Chicago. The Staple Singers have appeared at Carnegie Hall and at the International Jazz Festival in Washington, D.C. and are the first Gospel artists to be selected as "new star" vocal group in Down Beat's international jazz critics' poll. Led by Mississippi-born Roebuck "Pop Staples," the family group is comprised of daughters Cleo and Mavis and son, Pervis. Blending melodic elements derived from the stateliness of the Negro spiritual with the rhythmic force of jazz-influenced Gospel singing, the Staple Singers have a unique Afro-American style.

Tickets for Tuesday Tanglewood Trends Concerts are on sale by mail or in person at the box office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., next Exits 1 and 2 of the Mass. Turnpike. Box seats are $6.50. General admission to the lawn is on sale only on the day of the concert.

The third of the Tuesday Tanglewood Trends Concerts is July 22, when Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band and Tim Hardin are on the bill.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 15 1969

Butterfly at Lenox

The second concert in Tanglewood's 1969 contemporary trends series comes tomorrow night at 8 in the Lenox, Mass., music shed. The featured group is the Iron Butterfly, who in the past two years have risen from the Los Angeles "underground" to national prominence in the rock field.

Early in 1968, the Butterfly's first LP appeared, and within a few weeks it was the No. 1 best seller in Los Angeles and one of the top sellers across the country. The record, called "Heavy," opened the doors for a national concert tour.

Also on Tanglewood's second trends program are the world famous Staple Singers from Chicago. The Staple Singers have appeared at Carnegie Hall and at the International Jazz Festival in Washington and are the first gospel artists to be selected as "new star" vocal group in an international jazz critics' poll.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656

JUL 14 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E)

JUL 15 1969

ROSE WALSH

Tanglewood Features Rock, Gospel Groups

Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home, Tanglewood, Lenox, is a mecca for all types of music buffs. Tuesday night the 6000-seat music shed will be well filled with contemporary music fans interested in hearing the Iron Buterfly group, which in two years has risen from the Los Angeles "underground" to national prominence in the rock field. Its leader, Doug Ingle, stresses, "We didn't copy anyone nor were we influenced by anyone. We had an idea about a sound and how it should be expressed." Ron Bushy is the drummer; Lee Dorman, bass guitarist, and Erik Brann, lead guitar.

Also on this second trends program will be the famed Staple Singers from Chicago. They have appeared at Carnegie Hall and at the International Jazz Festival in Washington, D.C., and are the first gospel artists to be selected as "new star" vocal group in Down Beat's international jazz critics poll.

Mississippi-born Roebuck "Pop" Staples leads his family group comprised of daughter Cleo and Mavis and son Pervis. They have a unique Afro-American style, blending melodic elements derived from the stateliness of the Negro spiritual with the rhythmic force of jazz-influenced gospel singing.

Tickets for the Tuesday Trend Concerts are on sale by mail or in person at the box office at Tanglewood, Lenox, near exits 1 and 2 of the Mass. turnpike. Phone reservations are accepted.

★ ★ ★

Iron Butterfly, Staple Singers on Tanglewood Slate

LENOX—The second concert in Tanglewood's 1969 contemporary trends series is Tuesday night at 8 in the 6000-seat music shed. The featured group is the Iron Butterfly, who in the past two years have risen from the Los Angeles "underground" to prominence in the rock field.

Also on Tanglewood's second trends program are the world famous Staple Singers from Chicago. The Staple Singers have appeared at Carnegie Hall and at the International Jazz Festival in Washington D.C., and are the first gospel artists to be selected as "new star" vocal group in Down Beat's international jazz critics' poll. Led by Mississippi-born Roebuck "Pop Staples," the family group is comprised of daughters Cleo and Mavis, and son, Pervis. Blending melodic elements derived from the stateliness of the Negro spiritual with the rhythmic force of jazz-influenced gospel singing, the Staple Singers have a unique Afro-American style.

Iron Butterfly "Mind Blowing" At Tanglewood Trends Concert

By ROB AUTHIER
T-T REPORTER

The "heavy but versatile" sounds of the Iron Butterfly blew the minds of more than 7751 listeners of the second Contemporary Trends Concert held on Tuesday night at Tanglewood in Lenox.

The Atco recording group, rose from the Los Angeles "underground" to top rock prominence with their first album, "Heavy", and then with a national concert tour in April and May of 1968. To say that they were received well at Tanglewood is a marked understatement.

Also on the bill for Tuesdays concert were The Staple Singers from Chicago, led by Mississippi born Roebuck "Pop" Staples. The group of black Gospel artists, whose performances included Carnegie Hall and the International Jazz Festival in Washington, D. C., put on a great show, with professional harmony, unusual "hand clapping" techniques, and steady instrumentation.

Their second song entitled "The Ghetto," was one of their better vocal tunes. "Pop" introduced the song with "if you've never seen a ghetto, come to Chicago and look me up."

"Pop's" three daughters, Cleo, Mavis and Yvonne, were dressed in marble swirl pant suits. The young man on bass guitar, who assisted lead guitarist, "Pop" was not introduced. Their final audience - participation songs really woke up the audience, who up to that time had remained silent. They were called for one encore, after a thunderous applause.

After intermission, from out of a pitch black stage and following the strains of the opening theme of "2001 A Space Oddyssey," came the hard-hitting "Iron Butterfly."

Bassist Lee Dormand of St. Louis, Mo., bathed in periodic red, blue and yellow lighting, greeted the crowd that had filled the front section seats, with "welcome to wherever we are."

Lead vocalist and leader of the group, Doug Ingle from Omaha, Nebraska, was dressed in red shirt, while lead guitarist Erik Keith Brann, of Boston, and Dorman wore tight-fitting white pants.

Seated at custom-made set of red Rogers drums, was drummer Ron Bushy of Washington, D. C. The sleeveless black surfer shirt that he wore, was taken off halfway into the performance.

Of the songs, which came from their two recorded albums "Heavy" and "Ball", and from a to-be-released album called "Metamorphosis" the outstanding selections were: "Possession," from "Heavy"; "My Mirage," dedicated to a Los Angeles pizza maker; their newly-released single, Time of Our Lives," from "Ball"; and Soul Experience from "Ball."

There was no holding the crowd and police and Shed officials could do nothing but keep the kids off the stage, when the group played their hit single, "In a Gadda- da Vida. The song was lengthened into an effective "jam", with leads by Brann, on Mosrite guitar; two leads by Ingle, on Vox organ; and a 20 minute solo by drummer, Bushy. The drummer received a standing ovation from the crowd, who remained standing until the end of the performance.

The "Butterfly" ended their performance with "The Iron Butterfly Theme."

With cries of "More", they returned from their dressing room. "You can't Win," from their first album, "Heavy," Finally ended the performance. Ingle, before leaving the stage, yelled "Have us black please."

With hands raised in the peace sign, the crowd filed out of the Shed.

On July 22, Joni Mitchell, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin will be featured at Tanglewood for the 8 p.m. concert; July 29 will feature Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, and the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra; and The Fillmore at Tanglewood, with the Joshua Light Show, will perform on August 12.

THE IRON BUTTERLY — From head to toe the latest thing. Members of the group include: kneeling, guitarist Erick Brann; standing from left, drummer Ron Bushey, bass guitarist Lee Dorman and lead vocalist and leader of the Iron Butterfly, Doug Ingle.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 17 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 16 1969

World of Rock

Iron Butterfly at Ease in Unusual Setting

By FRED LE BRUN

LENOX, Mass.—Balmy, rustic Tanglewood, with its spacious lawns and intent young musicians scurrying about carrying oboes and sheet music neatly tucked in plastic attache cases, seems a most unlikely place to encounter four young rock musicians relaxing.

"WE NEED a rest," was the simple answer given by Iron Butterfly's bass player Lee Dorman. The hit progressive rock group arrived at Tanglewood Monday night, gave a performance Tuesday night for about 8,000, and decided to stay through the week to rest before doing a string of one-night engagements throughout the East, and to absorb a little of the fascinating setting.

But the group wasn't allowed to rest altogether. As an experiment in communications, of dubious results, the Iron Butterfly yesterday discussed the why and how of their music with a class of music teachers concerned with contemporary musical trends.

In a long semi-circle the 13 teachers, varying in age and experience, and instructor Barbara Reeder listened intently to the four long-haired rock artists describe the problems and pit falls of electronic oriented music.

AT FIRST the questions asked them were artificial, and the answers incomplete and awkward. But the dialogue became more and more relaxed and natural as both groups overcame natural barriers. On the one hand, the Butterfly appeared to gain respect for the teachers—many of whom were young—when the musicians realized the class was not snobbish or antagonistic to modern sound.

The teachers too warmed to the personable, well-spoken young men when they realized the answers were genuine and meaningful. Despite the disparity in appearance, they became aware of a commonality: a deep, serious love of music.

Loudness, they explained, is necessary to convey much of the message in rock but too, electronics has not progressed technically to the point where effects can be drawn out of the equipment without top volume.

"When you're playing you can usually only hear yourself," explained 17-year-old Erik Brann. "We have to change volume and balance when people, bodies, are out there in the audience," he remarked of the differences between practice sessions and concerts. The differences in balancing—which can't be heard by the performers but only by the audience, necessitates using sound men who keep a constant check on the sound during the performance.

"WE ARE explorers in electronic sound for people to use eight years from now," said lead singer Doug Ingle of the kind of experimentation they are trying. Later, he added, "we won't know how successful we are until 10 years from now."

As to performing at Tanglewood, Doug commented on the differences between an outdoor and indoor performance for the rock musician: "Emotionally, I'd rather be outdoors; but acoustically, I'd rather be indoors." And of Tuesday night's performance Erik said: "It was a wild performance . . . people were trying to steal my shoes our road manager is still limping."

The four members of the group were candid about their musical backgrounds, and about

Continued on Page 7-B

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144

JUL 19 1969

Huge Amplifiers in Shed Make Concert a Big Blast

By FRANK V. McCARTHY

LENOX — The amplifiers stacked in two towers, each about 15 feet high, on the stage of the Shed at Tanglewood for last night's concert by the Iron Butterfly reportedly were rated at 1,200 watts.

This seemed like a lot, considering that Janis Joplin last Tuesday used amplifiers rated at only 700 watts, and they seemed like quite enough. The decibels generated by last night's apparatus are unknown, but they were sufficient to set one's bones vibrating—even though one sat at the rear of the Shed.

Despite the high gain on the electronic equipment, the sounds it emitted were seldom distinct. Announcements made between the numbers were unintelligible, and the sounds made by the various musical instruments were often indistinguishable from each other.

Standing in Seats

Applause after the first few numbers played by the Iron Butterfly was light. The audience's enthusiasm increased toward the end of the concert however, and during the final number a majority of those in the Shed were standing in the seats, including canvass box seats. Those stood up well considering that some people were jumping up and down on them. Other persons balanced themselves on the rails of the boxes.

As the crowd pressed forward, about a dozen sheriff's deputies and Stockbridge police took positions around and on the stage, frequently peering up in apparent wonder at the towering amplifiers.

The Iron Butterfly responded to audience enthusiasm with one encore, but omitted the psychedelic lighting used throughout the scheduled program. The encore was rendered under bare, white, unflashing lights.

In spite of calls for more, technical crews moved in after the first encore and began disconnecting wires. Since it was apparent that the Iron Butterfly could not perform unhooked from the Western Mass. Electric Co., the crowd quickly melted away.

Music Review

Rock at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD OPENED its gates last night to an enthusiastic young crowd of more than 7,700 in the second of its contemporary trends series. Featured were the Staple Singers, a relatively unknown gospel-rock quartet of father and three daughters, and the more popular hard-rock group, Iron Butterfly.

The Staple Singers lent interesting interpretations to recent popular hits like "Take a Load Off, Babe" by applying gospel rock touches. However, the words of several of the original selections would have been more appropriate to black oppression 10 years ago: "Riding the Bus," "Ghetto" and "Why'd You Ever Treat Me So Bad?" seemed to lack the impact of many black groups today. Syncopated hand-clapping during many of the numbers drew good audience participation and helped carry the performance.

* * *

IRON BUTTERFLY thundered into space for their portion of the concert with the theme from the film "2001, A Space Odyssey." Particularly effective was a piece titled "My Mirage," a story of the death of a close friend. A dramatic electric-organ solo effectively portrayed the somber mood of the incident.

After initially depending on volume and flashing lights for effect, the group settled into what proved to be its forté, extended improvisation on the various instruments. "In-a-gadda-da-vita" ("whatever life is to you") a competitive duet between drums and organ continuing for a full 20 minutes, brought the overflowingly responsive audience to its feet.

Joni Mitchell, Tim Harden and the Butterfield Blues Band will be appearing July 22 in the contemporary trends series.

WHIT BIRNIE.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 16 1969

'Iron Butterfly' Flips 6,000

By CHARLES F. HARRIS

LENOX — In the second of five "Tuesday Trends," Tanglewood last night let down its hair and experienced the Iron Butterfly.

The group began by breaking through the spell of intermission in almost total darkness, preceded by a roll of bass drums and a blast of French horns (both recorded) that Erich Leinsdorf might have envied.

The effect was almost unexpected, as the audience sat fixed, as if viewing a highway fatality.

Overcoming a lighting problem (Much of The Butterfly's effect is achieved through a fantastic light show, which wasn't helped by nearly 20 floodlights ringing the building's perimeter, necessitated, officials said, by insurance),

Gazette Review

The Butterfly transformed the passive, non-participating audience into a nearly hysterical crowd as the 6,000 seated rose and stood on their chairs for a closer look at the well amplified four.

Drum Solo

A bare-chested Ron Bushy hit the crowd with a ten-minute drum solo which first brought them to their feet in a frenzied shower of applause.

By the end of the concert, between 10 and 15 local and state police had joined the group to contain the surging crowd, swelled by those with lawn tickets, which threatened to engulf the stage.

The Iron Butterfly will be performing Sunday night at the Carousel Theater in Framingham.

Next Tuesday, the "Tuesday Trends" will host Joni Mitchell, who has written many of July Collins' top songs as well as Tim Hardin.

An organ lead, bass guitar, and a set of drums was all The Butterfly needed to produce their wide range of sounds.

One of the group's complement, Erik Bram, lead guitarist, hails from Boston.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 22 1969

New England Newspapers

Butterfly's Doug Ingle Tells About Shed Concert

The familiar hard-hitting bass voice of lead vocalist Doug Ingle of the Iron Butterfly was groggy and often completely inaudible. A telephone interview conducted Thursday morning by the T-T found the young bandsman beginning his fourth day without sleep.

Ingle attributed the vigil to a tight traveling schedule and long practice sessions in the Lenox Town Hall. The Iron Butterfly performed Tuesday night in Tanglewood's Music Shed for the second in a series of Contemporary Trends Concerts.

The sleepy murmurs on the phone sounded little like the 22-year-old Nebraska-born vocalist who lead his group through number after number Tuesday, and ended in a highly successful concert with the cry, "Have us back please."

The Butterfly just seemed to have it that night. The music, lighting, vocal arrangements, and especially the audience were "in the groove." The popular rock group, which rose from the Los Angeles "underground" to national prominence with three albums,—"Heavy," "Ball" and "In-A-Gadda-Da-Vida"—certainly lived up to its name. Iron Butterfuly connotes a heavy sound with light, appealing meanings and versatile talent.

Ingle was born September 9, 1946. Besides his role as lead vocalist and leader of the group, he plays the organ. He wrote both sides of the Butterfly's first Atco single, entitled "Possession" and "Unconscious Power."

The tired musician said that most of his spare time is spent outdoors. For this reason he found Tanglewood's open air Shed and spacious green lawn particularly pleasing. He did add that the "whole preparation and performance there were too rushed, but it was not the fault of the Tanglewood officials." His voice trailed off. He had fallen asleep, the phone cradled on his shoulder.

When aroused, Ingle commented on the message and mood of the Butterfly's music. "Our music must have depth for us and our audience to get into. We didn't copy anyone nor were we influenced by anyone; we had an idea about a sound and how it should be expressed."

Ingle also mentioned a preference for entertaining a variety of audiences. "We usually don't like to play two nights at the same place. That way, we can repeat the songs on a second night for a different crowd."

Other members of the group include Ron Bushy, drummer; Lee Dorman, bass guitarist; and 18-year-old lead guitarist Erik Keith Brann from Boston.

Iron Butterfly—

Continued from Page 14-B

the diverse paths that finally brought them together in Los Angeles. The backgrounds were similar: a love for music generally, coupled with some classical training, and finally the need to find a new way of expressing music. This led to rock, and was refined to one area of experimentalization.

"WE WANTED to do original music; we just got together, sticking our ideas together, and we discovered we fit," said drummer Ron Bushy.

Does it require a lot of practice, one teacher asked. "Yes, more than we have time for," was the immediate group answer.

"We have problems with singles because you have to reduce everything to two and a half minutes. The meaning is lost' explained Doug. "It's like the top layer of epithelium," added Ron the drummer.

Like jazz, improvisation—"along a certain backbone—" is a key to the Butterfly sound, both at concerts and during demanding recording sessions.

"IT'S NOT solos, or at the pace we play we'd all be lost in no time," Lee added.

After two hours the four walked out of the Hawthorne House practice room where the class met and walked back on the lawn. Last night they wanted to hear the Boston Symphony play, and Ron asked instructor Reeder, in all seriousness: "What's the chances of getting good seats."

The Iron Butterfly will be back July 28 for a show at the Colonie Summer Theatre and will probably play to a full house.

Remember, Monday, The New York Rock & Roll Ensemble and folk-singer Buffy St. Marie are at the Saratoga Performing Art's Center. Don't miss it.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 23 1969

Rock Talent Ups Tanglewood B.O.

Lenox, Mass., July 22.

Even in Tanglewood, the Berkshire Hills summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, rock singers and bands have proved—in line with the rest of the country—that they are big business.

Last Tuesday night (15), for instance, in the "popular Tuesday night concerts" or as billed, Contemporary Trends Concerts, the crack Iron Butterfly four-piece band and gospel-rock Staple Singers drew nearly 8,000 patrons (official figure). It was obvious that the bigger part of the audience in and outside the music shed was under 30.

What was unreported was that between 500 and 1,500 rock-crazy kids leaped over the high Tanglewood fence (it was anybody's guess how many made the leap) and thereby evaded the head count at the gate.

The Iron Butterfly blastoff was preceded by the Staple crew who were indeed good but obviously the crowd "warmups."

Janis Joplin (formerly with Big Brother & Holding Co.) and the Orpheus band lured 7,000 rock lovers the previous Tuesday (8). While 700-watt amplifiers were used for Miss Joplin's concert, two amplifiers for the Butterflies were placed in 15-foot towers on the shed stage. They rated a big 1,200 watts. . .and as one wag (over 30, of course) cracked: "You could hear the Butterflies up in Pittsfield, seven miles away.

The ear-piercing decibels attained by the Iron Butterfly drove listeners over 30 and not a few under 30 far from the shed.

Scheduled for tonight (Tues.) are Joni Mitchell, Tim Hardin & the Butterfield Band. Booked July 29 are Mahalia Jackson, with Ornette Coleman and the Thad Jones/Mel Lewis Orch.

The Iron Butterfly

Worcester Gazette
7-16-69

Iron Butterfly "Mind Blowing" At Tanglewood Trends Concert

By ROB AUTHIER
T-T REPORTER

The "heavy but versatile" sounds of the Iron Butterfly blew the minds of more than 7751 listeners of the second Contemporary Trends Concert held on Tuesday night at Tanglewood in Lenox.

The Atco recording group, rose from the Los Angeles "underground" to top rock prominence with their first album, "Heavy", and then with a national concert tour in April and May of 1968. To say that they were received well at Tanglewood is a marked understatement.

Also on the bill for Tuesdays concert were The Staple Singers from Chicago, led by Mississippi born Roebuck "Pop" Staples. The group of black Gospel artists, whose performances included Carnegie Hall and the International Jazz Festival in Washington, D. C., put on a great show, with professional harmony, unusual "hand clapping" techniques, and steady instrumentation.

Their second song entitled "The Ghetto," was one of their better vocal tunes. "Pop" introduced the song with "if you've never seen a ghetto, come to Chicago and look me up."

"Pop's" three daughters, Cleo, Mavis and Yvonne, were dressed in marble swirl pant suits. The young man on bass guitar, who assisted lead guitarist, "Pop" was not introduced. Their final audience - participation songs really woke up the audience, who up to that time had remained silent. They were called for one encore, after a thunderous applause.

After intermission, from out of a pitch black stage and following the strains of the opening theme of "2001 A Space Oddyssey," came the hard-hitting "Iron Butterfly."

Bassist Lee Dormand of St. Louis, Mo., bathed in periodic red, blue and yellow lighting, greeted the crowd that had filled the front section seats, with "welcome to wherever we are."

Lead vocalist and leader of the group, Doug Ingle from Omaha, Nebraska, was dressed in red shirt, while lead guitarist Erik Keith Brann, of Boston, and Dorman wore tight-fitting white pants.

Seated at custom-made set of red Rogers drums, was drummer Ron Bushy of Washington, D. C. The sleeveless black surfer shirt that he wore, was taken off halfway into the performance.

Of the songs, which came from their two recorded albums "Heavy" and "Ball", and from a to-be-released album called "Metamorphosis" the outstanding selections were: "Possession," from "Heavy"; "My Mirage," dedicated to a Los Angeles pizza maker; their newly-released single, Time of Our Lives," from "Ball"; and Soul Experience from "Ball."

There was no holding the crowd and police and Shed officials could do nothing but keep the kids off the stage, when the group played their hit single, "In a Gadda- da Vida. The song was lengthened into an effective "jam", with leads by Brann, on Mosrite guitar; two leads by Ingle, on Vox organ; and a 20 minute solo by drummer, Bushy. The drummer received a standing ovation from the crowd, who remained standing until the end of the performance.

The "Butterfly" ended their performance with "The Iron Butterfly Theme."

With cries of "More", they returned from their dressing room. "You can't Win," from their first album, "Heavy," Finally ended the performance. Ingle, before leaving the stage, yelled "Have us black please."

With hands raised in the peace sign, the crowd filed out of the Shed.

On July 22, Joni Mitchell, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin will be featured at Tanglewood for the 8 p.m. concert; July 29 will feature Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, and the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra; and The Fillmore at Tanglewood, with the Joshua Light Show, will perform on August 12.

THE IRON BUTTERLY — From head to toe the latest thing. Members of the group include: kneeling, guitarist Erick Brann; standing from left, drummer Ron Bushey, bass guitarist Lee Dorman and lead vocalist and leader of the Iron Butterfly, Doug Ingle.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 17 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 16 1969

World of Rock

Iron Butterfly at Ease in Unusual Setting

By FRED LE BRUN

LENOX, Mass.—Balmy, rustic Tanglewood, with its spacious lawns and intent young musicians scurrying about carrying oboes and sheet music neatly tucked in plastic attache cases, seems a most unlikely place to encounter four young rock musicians relaxing.

"WE NEED a rest," was the simple answer given by Iron Butterfly's bass player Lee Dorman. The hit progressive rock group arrived at Tanglewood Monday night, gave a performance Tuesday night for about 8,000, and decided to stay through the week to rest before doing a string of one-night engagements throughout the East, and to absorb a little of the fascinating setting.

But the group wasn't allowed to rest altogether. As an experiment in communications, of dubious results, the Iron Butterfly yesterday discussed the why and how of their music with a class of music teachers concerned with contemporary musical trends.

In a long semi-circle the 13 teachers, varying in age and experience, and instructor Barbara Reeder listened intently to the four long-haired rock artists describe the problems and pit falls of electronic oriented music.

AT FIRST the questions asked them were artificial, and the answers incomplete and awkward. But the dialogue became more and more relaxed and natural as both groups overcame natural barriers. On the one hand, the Butterfly appeared to gain respect for the teachers—many of whom were young—when the musicians realized the class was not snobbish or antagonistic to modern sound.

The teachers too warmed to the personable, well-spoken young men when they realized the answers were genuine and meaningful. Despite the disparity in appearance, they became aware of a commonality: a deep, serious love of music.

Loudness, they explained, is necessary to convey much of the message in rock but too, electronics has not progressed technically to the point where effects can be drawn out of the equipment without top volume.

"When you're playing you can usually only hear yourself," explained 17-year-old Erik Brann. "We have to change volume and balance when people, bodies, are out there in the audience," he remarked of the differences between practice sessions and concerts. The differences in balancing—which can't be heard by the performers but only by the audience, necessitates using sound men who keep a constant check on the sound during the performance.

"WE ARE explorers in electronic sound for people to use eight years from now," said lead singer Doug Ingle of the kind of experimentation they are trying. Later, he added, "we won't know how successful we are until 10 years from now."

As to performing at Tanglewood, Doug commented on the differences between an outdoor and indoor performance for the rock musician: "Emotionally, I'd rather be outdoors; but acoustically, I'd rather be indoors." And of Tuesday night's performance Erik said: "It was a wild performance . . . people were trying to steal my shoes our road manager is still limping."

The four members of the group were candid about their musical backgrounds, and about

Continued on Page 7-B

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144

JUL 19 1969

Huge Amplifiers in Shed Make Concert a Big Blast

By FRANK V. McCARTHY

LENOX — The amplifiers stacked in two towers, each about 15 feet high, on the stage of the Shed at Tanglewood for last night's concert by the Iron Butterfly reportedly were rated at 1,200 watts.

This seemed like a lot, considering that Janis Joplin last Tuesday used amplifiers rated at only 700 watts, and they seemed like quite enough. The decibels generated by last night's apparatus are unknown, but they were sufficient to set one's bones vibrating—even though one sat at the rear of the Shed.

Despite the high gain on the electronic equipment, the sounds it emitted were seldom distinct. Announcements made between the numbers were unintelligible, and the sounds made by the various musical instruments were often indistinguishable from each other.

Standing in Seats

Applause after the first few numbers played by the Iron Butterfly was light. The audience's enthusiasm increased toward the end of the concert however, and during the final number a majority of those in the Shed were standing in the seats, including canvass box seats. Those stood up well considering that some people were jumping up and down on them. Other persons balanced themselves on the rails of the boxes.

As the crowd pressed forward, about a dozen sheriff's deputies and Stockbridge police took positions around and on the stage, frequently peering up in apparent wonder at the towering amplifiers.

The Iron Butterfly responded to audience enthusiasm with one encore, but omitted the psychedelic lighting used throughout the scheduled program. The encore was rendered under bare, white, unflashing lights.

In spite of calls for more, technical crews moved in after the first encore and began disconnecting wires. Since it was apparent that the Iron Butterfly could not perform unhooked from the Western Mass. Electric Co., the crowd quickly melted away.

Music Review

Rock at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD OPENED its gates last night to an enthusiastic young crowd of more than 7,700 in the second of its contemporary trends series. Featured were the Staple Singers, a relatively unknown gospel-rock quartet of father and three daughters, and the more popular hard-rock group, Iron Butterfly.

The Staple Singers lent interesting interpretations to recent popular hits like "Take a Load Off, Babe" by applying gospel -rock touches. However, the words of several of the original selections would have been more appropriate to black oppression 10 years ago: "Riding the Bus," "Ghetto" and "Why'd You Ever Treat Me So Bad?" seemed to lack the impact of many black groups today. Syncopated hand-clapping during many of the numbers drew good audience participation and helped carry the performance.

* * *

IRON BUTTERFLY thundered into space for their portion of the concert with the theme from the film "2001, A Space Odyssey." Particularly effective was a piece titled "My Mirage," a story of the death of a close friend. A dramatic electric-organ solo effectively portrayed the somber mood of the incident.

After initially depending on volume and flashing lights for effect, the group settled into what proved to be its forté, extended improvisation on the various instruments. "In-a-gadda-da-vita" ("whatever life is to you") a competitive duet between drums and organ continuing for a full 20 minutes, brought the overflowingly responsive audience to its feet.

Joni Mitchell, Tim Harden and the Butterfield Blues Band will be appearing July 22 in the contemporary trends series.

WHIT BIRNIE.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 16 1969

'Iron Butterfly' Flips 6,000

By CHARLES F. HARRIS

LENOX — In the second of five "Tuesday Trends," Tanglewood last night let down its hair and experienced the Iron Butterfly.

The group began by breaking through the spell of intermission in almost total darkness, preceded by a roll of bass drums and a blast of French horns (both recorded) that Erich Leinsdorf might have envied.

The effect was almost unexpected, as the audience sat fixed, as if viewing a highway fatality.

Overcoming a lighting problem (Much of The Butterfly's effect is achieved through a fantastic light show, which wasn't helped by nearly 20 floodlights ringing the building's perimeter, necessitated, officials said, by insurance),

Gazette Review

The Butterfly transformed the passive, non-participating audience into a nearly hysterical crowd as the 6,000 seated rose and stood on their chairs for a closer look at the well amplified four.

Drum Solo

A bare-chested Ron Bushy hit the crowd with a ten-minute drum solo which first brought them to their feet in a frenzied shower of applause.

By the end of the concert, between 10 and 15 local and state police had joined the group to contain the surging crowd, swelled by those with lawn tickets, which threatened to engulf the stage.

The Iron Butterfly will be performing Sunday night at the Carousel Theater in Framingham.

Next Tuesday, the "Tuesday Trends" will host Joni Mitchell, who has written many of July Collins' top songs as well as Tim Hardin.

An organ lead, bass guitar, and a set of drums was all The Butterfly needed to produce their wide range of sounds.

One of the group's complement, Erik Bram, lead guitarist, hails from Boston.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM,
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 22 1969

New England News

Butterfly's Doug Ingle Tells About Shed Concert

The familiar hard-hitting bass voice of lead vocalist Doug Ingle of the Iron Butterfly was groggy and often completely inaudible. A telephone interview conducted Thursday morning by the T-T found the young bandsman beginning his fourth day without sleep.

Ingle attributed the vigil to a tight traveling schedule and long practice sessions in the Lenox Town Hall. The Iron Butterfly performed Tuesday night in Tanglewood's Music Shed for the second in a series of Contemporary Trends Concerts.

The sleepy murmurs on the phone sounded little like the 22-year-old Nebraska-born vocalist who lead his group through number after number Tuesday, and ended in a highly successful concert with the cry, "Have us back please."

The Butterfly just seemed to have it that night. The music, lighting, vocal arrangements, and especially the audience were "in the groove." The popular rock group, which rose from the Los Angeles "underground" to national prominence with three albums,—"Heavy," "Ball" and "In-A-Gadda-Da-Vida"—certainly lived up to its name. Iron Butterfuly connotes a heavy sound with light, appealing meanings and versatile talent.

Ingle was born September 9, 1946. Besides his role as lead vocalist and leader of the group, he plays the organ. He wrote both sides of the Butterfly's first Atco single, entitled "Possession" and "Unconscious Power."

The tired musician said that most of his spare time is spent outdoors. For this reason he found Tanglewood's open air Shed and spacious green lawn particularly pleasing. He did add that the "whole preparation and performance there were too rushed, but it was not the fault of the Tanglewood officials." His voice trailed off. He had fallen asleep, the phone cradled on his shoulder.

When aroused, Ingle commented on the message and mood of the Butterfly's music. "Our music must have depth for us and our audience to get into. We didn't copy anyone nor were we influenced by anyone; we had an idea about a sound and how it should be expressed."

Ingle also mentioned a preference for entertaining a variety of audiences. "We usually don't like to play two nights at the same place. That way, we can repeat the songs on a second night for a different crowd."

Other members of the group include Ron Bushy, drummer; Lee Dorman, bass guitarist; and 18-year-old lead guitarist Erik Keith Brann from Boston.

Iron Butterfly—

Continued from Page 14-B

the diverse paths that finally brought them together in Los Angeles. The backgrounds were similar: a love for music generally, coupled with some classical training, and finally the need to find a new way of expressing music. This led to rock, and was refined to one area of experimentalization.

"WE WANTED to do original music; we just got together, sticking our ideas together, and we discovered we fit," said drummer Ron Bushy.

Does it require a lot of practice, one teacher asked. "Yes, more than we have time for," was the immediate group answer.

"We have problems with singles because you have to reduce everything to two and a half minutes. The meaning is lost' explained Doug. "It's like the top layer of epithelium," added Ron the drummer.

Like jazz, improvisation—"along a certain backbone—" is a key to the Butterfly sound, both at concerts and during demanding recording sessions.

"IT'S NOT solos, or at the pace we play we'd all be lost in no time," Lee added.

After two hours the four walked out of the Hawthorne House practice room where the class met and walked back on the lawn. Last night they wanted to hear the Boston Symphony play, and Ron asked instructor Reeder, in all seriousness: "What's the chances of getting good seats."

The Iron Butterfly will be back July 28 for a show at the Colonie Summer Theatre and will probably play to a full house.

Remember, Monday, The New York Rock & Roll Ensemble and folk-singer Buffy St. Marie are at the Saratoga Performing Art's Center. Don't miss it.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 23 1969

Rock Talent Ups Tanglewood B.O.

Lenox, Mass., July 22.

Even in Tanglewood, the Berkshire Hills summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, rock singers and bands have proved—in line with the rest of the country—that they are big business.

Last Tuesday night (15), for instance, in the "popular Tuesday night concerts" or as billed, Contemporary Trends Concerts, the crack Iron Butterfly four-piece band and gospel-rock Staple Singers drew nearly 8,000 patrons (official figure). It was obvious that the bigger part of the audience in and outside the music shed was under 30.

What was unreported was that between 500 and 1,500 rock-crazy kids leaped over the high Tanglewood fence (it was anybody's guess how many made the leap) and thereby evaded the head count at the gate.

The Iron Butterfly blastoff was preceded by the Staple crew who were indeed good but obviously the crowd "warmups."

Janis Joplin (formerly with Big Brother & Holding Co.) and the Orpheus band lured 7,000 rock lovers the previous Tuesday (8). While 700-watt amplifiers were used for Miss Joplin's concert, two amplifiers for the Butterflies were placed in 15-foot towers on the shed stage. They rated a big 1,200 watts. . .and as one wag (over 30, of course) cracked: "You could hear the Butterflies up in Pittsfield, seven miles away.

The ear-piercing decibels attained by the Iron Butterfly drove listeners over 30 and not a few under 30 far from the shed.

Scheduled for tonight (Tues.) are Joni Mitchell, Tim Hardin & the Butterfield Band. Booked July 29 are Mahalia Jackson, with Ornette Coleman and the Thad Jones/Mel Lewis Orch.

The Iron Butterfly

Worcester Gazette
7-16-69

146

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,342

JUL 16 1969

JONI MITCHELL appears on July at 8 p.m. in the third of this season's "Trends" concerts at Tanglewood, along with Tim Hardin and the Butterfield Blues Band.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GT. BARRINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,650

JUL 17 1969

Third Trends Concert At Tanglewood Tuesday Evening

Tim Hardin, Butterfield Blues Band and Toni Mitchell will appear in the third of this season's "Trends" Concerts at Tanglewood.

Tim Hardin, at left, and the Butterfield Blues Band, above, appear at Tanglewood July 22. Joni Mitchell will also perform.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 19 1969

Tuesday Tanglewood Trends

The contemporary music concert series, Tuesday Tanglewood Trends, brings to the summer haunts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the sweetest folk and blues sounds on the contemporary music scene.

On the evening of July 22 in the third concert of the series, the shed will host Joni Mitchell, Tim Hardin and the Butterfield Blues Band.

A native of Saskatchewan, Canada, Joni has been spending her time south of the border. Known for her sincerity and simplicity, the Canadian folk singer charms her audience without any histrionics. Accompanying herself on acoustical guitar, Joni sings mostly her own compositions; the writing is graceful poetry, the melodies lilting and beautiful.

Tim Hardin, who wrote and sang the original "If I Were a Carpenter," will be adding his own brand of folk-rock to the performance. Known, as is Joni Mitchell, for the sensitivity of his music, Hardin has a voice that "quavers between the tugs of blues and the tender side of joy."

Paul Butterfield, the bluest white musician of this generation, will "bounce chords off the ceiling and up from the floor" in a characteristic fusion of modern sounds in an old style. With its various music and musicians, this concert should illume two contrasting colors in the spectrum of modern music that the Tanglewood series is designed to portray.

—S.R.K.

NYACK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS
D. 29,000

JUL 19 1969

Joni Mitchell Tops Tanglewood Program

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The third concert in Tanglewood's 1969 contemporary Trends Series is Tuesday, July 22 at 8 p.m. in Tanglewood's 6,000 seat music shed.

The evening's program presents three outstanding performers on today's folk-blues scene, Joni Mitchell, The Butterfield Blues Band and Tim Hardin.

Headlining the program is Joni Mitchell, the Canadian singer-songwriter. One critic has commented that "The purity and sincerity of her singing charms her audience without histrionics. Her lyric phrases are highly personal, poetic and understandable." Miss Mitchell's recent song, "Both Sides Now," also known as "Clouds", has been high on the hit song charts for several months.

Paul Butterfield of The Butterfield Blues Band is one of the rare white musicians who can authentically play the Blues. Growing up on the outskirts of Chicago's Black area, Butterfield came naturally to "soul" and the basic feeling of the blues. The Butterfield Blues Sound is a mixture of relaxed country blues infused with aggressive, hard-driving urban blues.

Tim Hardin wrote one of the most impressive of recent songs, "If I Were A Carpenter," and has also recorded it. Hardin, a 26-year-old guitar - and piano playing singer, writer, thinks of himself as a jazz artist, though there is a strong undertow of blues and country elements in his music. His voice is soft and his forte is the gentle song.

The fourth of the Tuesday Contemporary Trends Concerts is July 29, when Mahalia Jackson headlines an evening of gospel and jazz which also features Ornett Coleman and the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis orchestra.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

JUL 18 1969 E

Folk Concert At Tanglewood

The third concert in Tanglewood's 1969 contemporary trends series will be presented Tuesday evening at 8 p.m. in Tanglewood's 6000-seat music shed at Lenox, Mass. The program features three performers of today's folk blues scene: Joni Mitchell, The Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin.

Tickets are available by mail.

The fourth concert of the series will be July 29, when Mahalia Jackson headlines an evening of gospel and jazz which also features Ornett Coleman and the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis orchestra.

TIMES
WOBURN, MASS.
(E) 9,470

JUL 21 1969

Top Blues and Folk Music Artists At Tanglewood

The third concert in Tanglewood's 1969 contemporary Series is this Tuesday evening, the 22nd of July, at 8 p.m. in Tanglewood's 6000 seat music shed. The evening's program presents three outstanding performers on today's Folk-Blues scene, Joni Mitchell, The Butterfield Blues Band and Tim Hardin.

Headlining the program is Joni Mitchell, the Canadian singer - songwriter. One critic has commented that "The purity and sincerity of her singing charms her audience without histrinoics . . her lyric phrases are highly personal, poetic and understandable." Miss Mitchell whose recent song, Both Sides Now (also known as Clouds) has been high on the hit song charts for several months.

Paul Butterfield of The Butterfield Blues Band is one of the rare white musicians who can authentically play Blues. Growing up on the outskirts of Chicago's Black area, Butterfield came naturally to 'Soul' and the basic feeling of the Blues. The Butterfield Blues Band sound is a mixture of relazed country blues infused with aggressive, hard-driving urban Blues.

Tim Hardin wrote one of the most impressive of recent songs 'If I Were A Carpenter," and has also recorded it. Hardin, a 26 year old guitar and piano ing singer-writer, thinks of himself as a Jazz artist, though there is a strong undertow of Blues and country elements in his music. His voice is soft and his forte is the gentle song.

Tickets for the Tuesday Tanglewood Trends Concerts are on sale by mail or in person at the Tanglewood box office, and phone reservations are also accepted. The phone number is (413) 637-1600.

The fourth of the Tuesday Contemporary Trends Concerts is July 29, when Mahalia Jackson headlines an evening of Gospel and Jaz wzhich also features Ornett Coleman and the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis orchestra.

Tanglewood Has a Blues Program

If blues are your bag, Tanglewood is where you should be on Tuesday evening.

The third concert in the Tanglewood's 1969 contemporary Trends Series presents three outstanding performers in today's folk blues scene—Joni Mitchell, The Butterfield Blues Band and Tim Hardin.

The concert in Tanglewood's 6000-seat music shed begins at 8 p.m. Tickets are on sale by mail or in person at the Tanglewood Box office. Phone reservations are also accepted. The number is (413) 637-1600.

Other Tuesday event:

COMMONWEALTH CHAPTER, No. 408, B'nai B'th — annual summer luncheon and pool party at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Samuels, 42, Bear Hill Rd. Reading.

GARDNER MUSEUM, 280 The Fenway—3 p.m. free concert of music by Bach and Chopin.

MUSEUM OF FINE ARTS, 479 Huntington Ave.—11 a.m. talk by Morna Crawford, on "Painters of 17th Century Holland."

ORCHARD PARK, PLAYGROUND, Boston—11 a.m. and 2 p.m. free performance by the Boston Children's Theatre Stagemobile.

SUDBURY ART CENTER, 435 Concord Road, Sudbury—10 a.m. to 4 p.m. print Art Sale.

Send items for daily listing—one week in advance—to "Where To Go," Boston Herald Traveler, Boston, 02106.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,205 (S) 298,557

JUL 21 1969

Paul Butterfield Blues Band

Singers Beat Band at Lenox

By CHARLES F. HARRIS

LENOX —. A three-concert performance graced Tanglewood's Tuesday "Trends" last night with two truly fine performances and a third which didn't quite make it.

Tim Hardin began the evening by breaking a Tuesday pattern of rather passive receptions for the first performer as the audience throughout his concert expressed as much appreciation as possible, short of leaving their seats.

Hardin accompanied himself on either the guitar or piano, and proved equally adept as a musician.

He has that melancholy, sensitive sort of style that when coupled with his comfortable, relaxed, almost spontaneous stage (presence makes his one-man show a difficult one to follow.

Feel Good

Still bouncing around in his amiable sort of way backstage after his concert Hardin commented, "I just feel very good out there." He admitted, however, that he will "be glad to reach the level where I won't have to accompany myself; the level where I can enjoy a nucleus of about eight improvisatory musicians like myself."

Hardin's schedule for the immediate future includes both appearances at the Woodstock Festival (if they have it) and the Dick Cavitt Show.

The Paul Butterfield Blues Band next took the stage, and although they appeared to be as well organized as a street crowd, coordinated music fairly well.

Gazette Review

For the first time in two weeks, the police (who usually are kept busy keeping herd on lawn ticket holders who insist on trying to occupy space in the forward aisles) had free time on their hands.

A futile attempt to salvage the show came with a 10-minute jam session conducted by the bass guitarist, backed by drums and a cow bell.

The house warmed up a few degrees, but any effect was short lived.

Turn on Lights

Running through their allotted time and then some, someone got the bright idea that turning on the bright intermission lights might get rid of them, but it was well into intermission before the Butterfield Blues Band would finally admit defeat.

Joni Mitchell, a girl with a voice at least the equal of Judy Collins and a talent for accompanying herself that rivals Tim Hardin's, brought down the house at the conclusion of every one of her songs.

Her voice, beauty, and stage grace were a delightful change from the previous concert, and her audience wasted no time in making this fact only too apparent.

Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, and the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra will headline next week's Tuesday "trends" concert.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 23 1969

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 11,900

JUL 24 1969

Audience Disturbs Tanglewood Artists

BY ELLYN WEISS

Tuesday night's Tanglewood concert, part of the Tuesday night contemporary trends series, headlined Joni Mitchell, but it is only fair that I confess my biases at the outset: I went there for the Butterfield Blues Band - who I have been trying to see for the last six years - and the inimitable Paul Butterfield himself, the man who singlehandedly transformed the harmonica from a child's toy to a virtuoso instrument.

Butterfield carries a small army with him - 10 men in all - who play everything from wood block to double sax. The brass section keeps growing and now includes three saxophones and two trumpets. They put out a huge sound and were the only performers of the evening who really filled the huge Tanglewood shed and permeated beyond into the far reaches of the lawn.

The lawn at Tanglewood is a strange place, and this seems an appropriate spot to put in a word about the audience in general, which was for the most part "a down," at least for those of us who came to hear the music. The crowd ranged from young to younger and dressed from garish to bizaare, mainly Westchester Standard Hip.

The youngsters wouldn't sit still for a minute; they wouldn't listen to the musicians whom they had paid to hear, and they were continually engaged in a game of musical chairs, or elude-the-police, trying to move up into the better seats that hadn't been sold.

Joni Mitchell was visibly disturbed by the constant traffic, and although she received thunderous applause after every number, she had to ask the kids to lease listen to the words a few times.

But despite the competition, the performers were admirable. Tim Hardin, who began the evening, has a truly beautiful and lyrical voice. His delivery is subtle and his melodies sophisticated. The power of Hardin's music comes not from volume but from variety and genuinely - communicated feelings.

Hardin sings basically the same genre of city-folk as men like Tom Rush and Eric Anderson and he has the ability to develop a simpatico with the audience on a personal level that those who followed him did not.

At one point, he moved from the guitar to the piano and did a beautiful, fairly esoteric piece called "Once Touched by Flame," which amply rewarded the listener for the concentration it required of him. Of course, Hardin finished off his set with "If I Were A Carpenter." Somebody in the audience yelled, "That's your song," and it is.

Then Butterfield. This group has been playing out of Chicago for some years now, first to a small clique of initiates and later to a much wider audience. They were the first of the integrated blues bands, and their heritage is complex. They took from the black Chicago men like Howlin' Wolf, from the more polished white jazz men, and from everybody else who makes good music, and they made it all their own.

The drum player keeps a rhythm reminiscent of James Brown's Fabulous Flames, but he does it all on one set of drums, as opposed to the two that Brown carries.

The lead guitarist and the bass players, whose names I unfortunately don't know, were superb. At one point, an extended bass and percussion interlude literally moved everyone to the edge of his chair. I have never heard anyone do so much with instruments that are traditionally relegated to the rhythm section. The bass has come a long way since the days when taciturn men went plunk plunk at the back of the band.

They're great, they're variable, and they play their sound with an enthusiasm that cannot fail to come across.

Joni Mitchell is Joni Mitchell, a compliment in itself. She has a strong clear voice and an impressive range. She sang all her big numbers; "Chelsea Morning," "She's so Busy Being Free," "Michael From Mountains," and, of course, "Both Sides Now."

Besides singing so well, Miss Mitchell writes her own pieces, and the lyrics are thoughtful, the melodies perfect for her style. Her songs follow a prominent melodic line, and although the words are often melancholy, it is the swinging tunes that carry the day, and project an exuberance at being able to be here with you tonight.

I really did enjoy the concert, but I wish the Tanglewood people could find some way to eliminate the distractions, short of more uniformed presences.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 24 1969

Music Reivew

Blues-Jazz and Folk at Tanglewood

By PAT FRANCIS

BETWEEN THEM, Joni Mitchell, Tim Hardin and the Butterfield Blues Band captivated a crowd of 9,187 at Tuesday night's Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood.

From "Chelsea Morning" to the "Moon Song," Joni Mitchell's social commentary with soft words and lyrics was definitely audience-pleasing. Her message was clear: "Come on people, smile on your brothers, everybody get together, love one another right now." She accompanied some songs by guitar, some by piano.

* * *

THE BUTTERFIELD Blues Band featured a blues-jazz sound which was created with a 10-man combination, mostly of guitars and brass. Although some of the lyrics may have been hard to understand, the beat wasn't. The jazzy version of "More and More" featured a guitar and drum improvisation.

Accompanied only by his guitar, Tim Hardin sang his ballads, including "Turn the Page and Go On; Read the Poetry Wrong" and "Misty Roses" which sounded exactly like its title — soft and sweet, happy and sad at once. Called back to the stage, he sang "If I Were a Carpenter," his best-received song of the evening. He also did a piano accompaniment for "Once Touched by Flame" from his "Suite for Susan Moore and Damion."

Hardin joined Miss Mitchell at the end of the concert to sing, "A Simple Song of Freedom", with such words as "We the people here don't want the war."

* * *

THE ONLY SOUR note in an otherwise good concert was the musical chairs game that much of the crowd in the Shed seemed to be playing. They didn't stop when the music stopped or when it started, either.

Except for that, few people would have minded if the concert went on all night.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 24 1969

Enthusiastic Fan Seized at Tanglewood

LENOX — A music fan who tried to storm the stage at Tanglewood during a Contemporary Trends concert Tuesday night pleaded guilty yesterday in Lee District Court of disturbing the peace.

Stockbridge Police Chief William J. Obanhein said Carl E. Law, 26, of Montreal was arrested after he took several swings at sheriff's deputies trying to keep him away from the stage. Obanhein said Law continued to react violently and was locked up overnight in a padded cell at the county jail.

Law told Judge John J. Dwyer he had been taking cough medicine for medicinal purposes Tuesday and was "on edge." Judge Dwyer continued the case until Aug. 29 for finding and disposition.

At the Concert

3 Folk Singers Elicit Applause

By WALTER KOENIG

Some 9,000 plus persons sat in Tanglewood's music shed or lay about on the grass outside last night and listened to three top names in folk music today.

The audience enjoyed all three — Tim Hardin, Paul Butterfield and his blues band and Joni Mitchell — and left the summer music center in the Berkshires thoroughly entertained.

There was no doubt which side the audience was on. It called him back for two encores with loud applause. For the last encore Hardin sang his popular version of 'If I Were a Carpenter."

Hardin's guitar is excellent, although his country and western style sometimes clashes with his individualistic style of singing. Not surprisingly, his voice sounded much better on the two songs he did accompanying himself on the piano.

The Butterfield Blues Band followed him after a short intermission. From the first notes of Butterfield's beautiful harmonica, the air became electrically charged.

As a friend remarked about Butterfield's harp playing, "It takes the clothes off the audience and they sit there not in the least ashamed."

That used to be true of the entire group's sound. Alas, not so anymore. Butterfield's harp still has its effect, but now there's a slight chill in the air on some songs.

The band achieved its popularity on basic blues songs, gutsy sort of stuff. Now there is more contemporary music; which is all right, except the sound isn't as clean and a rehearsed feeling creeps in occasionally.

There's no faulting the musicianship, however: it's fantastic.

TIM HARDIN

Joni Mitchell is a young woman with a good singing voice, displayed to advantage by her frequent jumps into falsetto. She also has a remarkable gift for words.

She is, in fact, as much a poet as anything. She writes her own songs and music, the most well-known being "Both Sides Now" ("Clouds"), which has gained her all kinds of popularity within the last year or so.

All her songs have the touch of the poet: The ability to express the feeling of external reality.

In addition, she is a personable performer.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144

JUL 23 1969

Albany-Schenectady-Troy Times Union
Wednesday, July 23, 1969

At Tanglewood

Youthful Audience Appreciates Tim Hardin's Quiet Simplicity

By PETE GOODMAN

LENOX — The second of this summer's contemporary trends concerts, featuring the young pop artists Tim Hardin, the Butterfield Blues Band and Joni Mitchell, drew a Tanglewood audience where those over 30 were as rare as squalling infants at a golden agers' convention.

Voice a Relief

Tim Hardin's simple, tender songs and basic acoustic guitar opened the show in an atmosphere pleasantly mixed of grass (what cows eat) and incense.

His soft, velvety voice, sounding a little hoarse at times, was a relief from the overstrained power upon which many pop groups depend.

He sang to a knowing audience which applauded the first chords of each song. The power of Hardin's music seems to come from the simple, graceful lyrics skillfully supported by a folk guitar background.

Applause Out of Place

"Every time you give yourself not loving me, you upset the grace of living when you lie.

"If I were a carpenter and you were a lady, would you marry me anway, would you have my baby?"

He looks a bit like Donovan, the Scots singer whose angelic appearance and play on innocence sends the little girls wild, but Hardin doesn't wrack and torture his words as much.

Somehow, the quietness of his songs, delivered as in a living room or at most a quiet bar or late-evening party, seemed to be done injustice by the loud applause which brought the singer back for two encores. Gentle murmurs of approbation seemed more in order.

Butterfield Blues

The Paul Butterfield Blues Band is one of those groups making a successful mesh of jazz, blues and rock.

It combines jazz brass (saxophones and trumpets) with electric guitars and organ and blues-rock harmonica. Butterfield sings in a mixture of rock and blues styles epitomized in many respects by Janis Joplin.

The music has a brassy texture with a deep-felt funky, driving beat. As each number developed, Butterfield (vocal or harmonica) or one of his men would surge into jazz or blues solos.

Enthusiasm Overcomes

Butterfield was mostly blues, as was his green T-shirted lead guitar, who went on a good, wild light but always managed to find his home key and rhythm.

The general enthusiasm and vitality of the music overcame occasional technical lapses, as when Butterfield hung a bit too long thread from his harmonica and didn't seem to have the breath to finish it.

At one point, the bass guitar hit on a solid jazz solo, and the rest of the boys stood around and dug it, moving along with tambourine, sticks, or anything else. Their rhythms didn't quite support the bass, but he didn't seem to mind and finally they realized and stopped to let him be.

The music drew the kids to the front aisles like a magnet draws metal filings, and Berkshire County sheriffs didn't try too hard to move them.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 23 1969

148

Jazz at Tanglewood

Mahalia Jackson (left) and the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra perform in the Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood, July 29.

The Thad Jones - Mel Lewis Orchestra with Ornette Coleman and Mahalia Jackson bring jazz and gospel music to Tanglewood for the fourth concert in the contemporary music series, Tuesday Tanglewood Trends. This concert marks the first jazz group of the season.

"Queen of the Gospel Singers," Miss Jackson's powerful voice finds its origin in New Orleans, where as a girl she started singing in a church choir. No stranger to factory and field, Mahalia worked her way up to Chicago. Since then she has sung all over the world, performing for a while with Duke Ellington. She enjoys jazz and blues, but has remained faithful to gospel.

On the jazz end of the concert, Ornette Coleman brings a brand of music that has been acclaimed not only by peers but by those whose interests range from classical to rock music. As a leader of the "new-thing" jazz, Coleman has been awarded a Guggenheim commission. He has written several film scores.

Starting out as an informal group of free-lance musicians the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra has now cut three LPs. The band plays loose arrangements and solo improvisations written by its own members. This concert's program of gospel and jazz should illustrate where two long traditions of music are going now.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 26 1969

AT TANGLEWOOD: The Thad Jones/Mel Lewis Orchestra will perform on Tuesday, July 29th, at 8 p.m.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

JUL 27 1969 JUL 20 1969

MAHALIA JACKSON

Gospel, Jazz Artists Headline at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — On July 29 at 8 the fourth of the Tuesday Tanglewood plans to present gospel singer Mahalia Jackson, saxophonist Ornette Coleman, and the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra.

Mahalia Jackson, 'The Queen of the Gospel Singers,' began singing in her father's church in New Orleans. She has appeared throughout the United States, Europe and Asia and gave the first of her many Carnegie Hall recitals in 1950. She has been honored with invitations to perform in the White House for President Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson.

Saxophonist-composer Ornette Coleman is a leading innovator in both the Jazz and modern music worlds. Acclaimed by Leonard Bernstein and Gunther Schuller for his contributions to 'The New Thing Jazz,' Coleman has composed works for such diversified media as string quartets and films. He has recently returned from a European tour and is now working on a Guggenheim composer's grant for a composition for his group and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Mel Lewis, formerly a drummer with Stan Kenton, and Thad Jones, a member of Count Basie's trumpet section, formed their orchestra to give freelance musicians the opportunity to play big band arrangements for their own pleasure. For the past three years, the orchestra has appeared as the Monday night feature group at New York's Village Vanguard.

Tickets for this concert are on sale at the Tanglewood Box Office, Lenox, Massachusetts 01240. Tickets in the Shed are $4, 4.50, 5, 5.50, 6 and $6.50 (Box Seat). Admission to the Tanglewood Lawn is $3 and goes on sale at 6 p.m. the day of the concert.

The fifth of the Tuesday Tanglewood Trends is a Bill Graham presentation from the Fillmore including Jefferson Airplane, The Who, B. B. King, the Joshua Light Show and Christopher Tree. Tickets are now on sale for this concert.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

JUL 29 1969

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(E) 6,200

JUL 29 1969

At the Concert

Mahalia Jackson Still Captivating

By EDWARD SWIETNICKI

The rain-soaked Berkshire hills were alive with the sound of Mahalia Jackson laskt night.

Though nearly 60 and in ill health in recent years, the world-renowned gospel singer proved once again that she could captivate and enthrall a Tanglewood audience. And Miss Jackson enjoyed every minute of it too.

The world's most famous gospel singer didn't need a microphone Dbut she did use one) as she sang nearly a dozen hymns. By the time she started her second selection, "I Found The Answer," a devoted group in the audience, many of them young people, began hand-clapping earnestly in accompaniment.

WHEN MISS Jackson completed her fourth hym a young Negro man rushed to the front of the stage, asking for an autograph as Miss Jackson bowed for the applause.

"I will darling. Just let me finish the program," she said. Then she faced her audiencein, j smle spread-ing over her e began saying and singing "C'Mon Children, Let's Sing."

Miss Jackson, who sang in her minister father's fundamental church when she was only 15, still has a voice charged with the grandeur of God, a voice which can lull a baby angel to sleep on a cloud or, if it wants, fr)ighten a big devil back into hell.

AND THE famous gospel dinger improvised with her voice, changing form a deep bass to a near soprano wjen she felt the occasion for it.

Miss Jackson, who has been giving recitals at the Berkshires since the 1950s, attracted the applause of a nnmber of old and yoooaudience members.

"This is our kind of music," she said at the end of her concert as she went on for several minutes in a folksy reminiscent manner about her life and singing.

Her recital was part of Tanglewood's Contemporary Trends program, introduced last year to bring "new sounds" to the 6,000-seat music shed.

The contemporary jazz bands of Ornette Coleman, a skilled and competent musician, and of the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis completed last night's program. Mr. Coleman's four-man group sent a small, but fiercely loyal group in the audience into jazz exasies because of his intricate, highly-modernistic interpretations.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144

JUL 30 1969

'Trends' Concerts at Tanglew'd

"Contemporary Trends" concerts under the auspices of the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., continue during the current season with the following events: July 29, Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, Thad Jones Mel Lewis Orchestra . . . Aug. 5, Boston Pops at Tanglewood, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, Joan Kennedy, narrator in "Peter and the Wolf:" . . . Aug. 12, The Fillmore at Tanglewood with Joshua Light Show, . . . Aug. 19, "Tanglewood on Parade." For further information address the Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

JUL 25 1969

THE THAD JONES—Mel Lewis Orchestra is appearing on Tuesday, July 29 at 8 p.m. in the fourth of this season's "Trends" concerts at Tanglewood.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 28 1969

Mahalia Jackson, Orchestra At Tanglewood Tomorrow

The fourth of the Tuesday Tanglewood Trends tomorrow at 8 p.m. presents gospel singer Mahalia Jackson, saxophonist Ornette Coleman, the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra.

Mel Lewis, formerly a drummer with Stan Kenton, and Thad Jones, a member of Count Basie's trumpet section, formed their orchestra to give freelance musicians the opportunity to play big band arrangments for their own pleasure. For the past three years, the orchestra has appeared as the Monday night feature at New York's Village Vanguard.

Tickets for this concert are on sale at the Tanglewood Box Office in Lenox.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WEEKLY AMUSEMENTS

JUL 30 1969

Big Tanglewood Gate

Folk singer-songwriters Joni Mitchell and Tim Hardin and the Butterfield Blues Band drew 9,187 patrons to Tanglewood, the home of the Boston Symph. Tuesday night (22) in their segment of the "contemporary trends" series.

Mahalia Jackson is slated to perform tonight (Tues.). Joan Kennedy, Sen. Edward Kennedy's wife, is skedded to narrate "Peter and the Wolf" next Tuesday (5), with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops orch.

Jazz, Gospel Break a 'Trend'

By CHARLES F. HARRIS

Gazette Review

LENOX — Poor weather and a poor attendance were both in evidence last night as Tanglewood's Tuesday "Trends" broke away from its usual offering of popular music and attempted a questionable combination of contemporary jazz, gospel, and hard jazz.

With such a combination the abundance of empty seats could hardly be blamed solely on the weather.

The highlight of the evening came at the beginning, with a 45-minute session of contemporary jazz by the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra. The Berkshires swung to the 14-member ensemble's smooth blend of mellow brass and a red-hot piano.

Sax Duet

A fine saxophone duet by Eddie Daniels and Billy Harper moved the rather subdued audience as much as they were going to be moved for the remainder of the evening.

Mahalia Jackson's gospel singing proved rather disappointing. Reminiscent of a southern revival, any audience identification was lost in a variety of reactions ranging from boredom to sheer ecstasy.

Several slower numbers, particularly "Peace on Earth", were fairly universally well received, but constituted only a small part of Miss Jackson's repertoire. The greater part of her concluding quarter hour was devoted to a personal pitch for her book, her albums, and her next area appearance. A little of that goes a long way.

Ornette Coleman and his group, probably one of the finest groups left in hard jazz today, were very poorly received. A Mahalia Jackson audience may enjoy the contemporary jazz of the Jones-Lewis Orchestra, but they are definitely ill-suited for the straight jazz of Ornette Coleman.

From the opening number, a steady stream of people made their exit, further depleting an audience that was already at less than 50 per cent capacity.

The few hard core jazz fans in attendance sensed the almost tragic misfortune of Coleman's appearance in the same show as Miss Jackson.

A night of either gospel or hard jazz would have been fine, but combining the two proved rather ridiculous. Coleman and his three were extremely good, and they deserved a more receptive audience.

Next Tuesday, Tanglewood will feature the Boston Pops and a reading by Joan Kennedy of "Peter and the Wolf."

The Evening Gazette Worcester, Wed., July 30, 1969

Mahalia Jackson

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 30 1969

Ex-Resident To Play On Trends Program

Cliff Heather

Cliff Heather, a Pittsfield native, will play with the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis jazz orchestra which appears tonight at Tanglewood at 8.

Mr. Heather, employed by the Columbia Broadcasting System, is currently playing with Ray Block on the Ed Sullivan Show. Before leaving Pittsfield, Mr. Heather, who is a bass trombonist, played with the local bands of Ernie Andrews and Harold May. He has also played with several road bands and such orchestras as those of Al Goodman, Andre Kostelanetz and Percy Faith. In addition, he has played on the Bell Telephone Hour and on other similar symphonic programs.

Mr. Heather and his wife, the former Ruth Durant, now live in Forest Hills, N.Y. They have three married children. The Jones-Lewis Orchestra is sharing Tanglewood's contemporary trends program with Mahalia Jackson and Ornette Coleman.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 29 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 30 1969

Jazz at Tanglewood

By JOHN SCHWEIZER

A SPARSE CROWD of 4,500 persons showed up at Tanglewood last night for the only jazz offering of the Contemporary Trends concert series. Listeners heard samplings from jazz's roots (gospel), mainstream (big band) and avant-garde ("the new thing"), and they apparently liked what they heard.

* * *

LEADING off the three-hour program was the 16-piece Mel Lewis-Thad Jones Orchestra, a star-studded, modern version of the so-called big band. All five selections were outstanding in one respect or another, but the arrangements themselves were particularly imaginative.

Although several soloists had difficulty getting into grooves (notably trumpeter Richard Williams and tenor saxophonist Bill Harper, both on "Second Race," a medium-tempo blues), the rhythm section of drummer Mel Lewis, pianist Roland Hanna and especially bassist Eddie Gomez managed to spur most horn soloists into swinging.

Tenor saxophonist Eddie Daniels (his own man despite an obvious Sonny Rollins influence) took some wildly rhythmic choruses on "Lover Man." He then had it out with Coltrane-oriented Harper in a driving rock-ish blues, during which the pair traded fours and choruses in regular and stop-time.

* * *

GOSPEL GIANT MAHALIA Jackson was greeted with a standing ovation. She did not disappoint her fans as she swung through rocking hymns, and then stirred different emotions with truly soulful ballads. Unfortunately, speaker distortion marred part of her performance. She closed with a monologue that combined humor with preaching, and included reminiscing about her friendship with Mrs. Stephanie Barber, who ran the Music Inn here in the late '50s.

* * *

AS THE OLD man of jazz's "new thing," Ornette Coleman is finding himself more and more palatable to jazz moderates. His sheer technique on alto saxophone plus a natural propensity to swing (he paid his dues in rhythm and blues bands) was in clear evidence last night. Also integral in Coleman's present quartet is bassist Charles Haden, like Gomez, a technical superman who apparently plays what Ornette likes to hear.

The other half of the group, tenor saxophonist Dewey Redman and drummer Ed Blackwell, seems to contribute mostly to the quartet's "far out" reputation. Whereas Coleman swung with intensity and continuity, Redman's playing was disjointed and aimless. Blackwell, using drum rolls constantly, played numerous intricate patterns behind the hornmen, but without any particular empathy.

149

Tanglewood Program

Mahalia Jackson, the gospel singer; Ornette Coleman, saxophonist, and the Thad Jones/Mel Lewis Big Band will be heard at the Shed in Tanglewood, Mass., on Tuesday at 8 P.M. This is the fourth of five Tuesday Tanglewood Trend Concerts to be given this summer.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
JUL 25 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 1 1969

Mahalia and Stephanie

By Joan Mills

HOUSATONIC.

My friend Stephanie is forever doing something extraordinary or impossible or funny or endearing. "Dear," she says, wryly appraising herself, "if you could follow me around for a week, we'd have material for a book." Which is undoubtedly true, except I don't have the strength to follow Stephanie around for an entire week. Meanwhile, it lifts my heart to see her and I miss her when she's gone.

Last winter she and Phil went to California. When they came back, Stephanie said she thought she'd persuaded Mahalia Jackson to sing at Tanglewood.

"Oh, Stephanie," Mahalia said, "I'd rather just come and sing for you and Phil, like I did when you had that little Music Inn, 'cause I don't sing so much any more. I just like to sing for folks who really love me, like you do."

"But, Mahalia, dear," Stephanie said, "we don't own the inn any more. They'd love you at Tanglewood, too."

"I don't know, Stephanie, honey," Mahalia mourned. "You and Phil got me my start in that little place, and I was real happy there. You sure you couldn't buy it back?"

But it was arranged for Tanglewood. On Tuesday, Mahalia Jackson came to sing. The way she sang the Gospel, a handy preacher could have saved a thousand souls. Then, as if preparing us for her last song, she leaned across the podium and said, "They only give me 30 minutes, 'cause there's other music for you to listen to . . ."

"Stay!" pleaded the audience. "Don't go, Mahalia!"

"Now you hush!" she whispered into the microphone. "You just hush, now. That ain't nice, other people here to play for you. But while I'm here . . ."

Wild cheers.

". . . while I'm here, I just want to tell you I came 'cause of Stephanie."

Stephanie Who? several thousand people asked one another. Mahalia didn't say. Bob and I pecked delightedly at one another—our Stephanie, of course. Stephanie Barber.

"You see, Stephanie and Phil, when they had that little place ("What little place?" wondered the audience), there wasn't nobody payin' attention to this kind of music. Didn't understand us—thought we didn't belong. But Phil and Stephanie, they asked me to come up and sing for a night, and they made me so happy, I stayed for a week.

"And first thing I knew, these professors started comin' aroun' analyzin' me. I'd get outa bed in the mornin', there'd be a professor standin' there sayin', 'How she do that? How she sing that way?' Analyzin' me. Stephanie, she could see they was makin' me nervous, but I kept on singing for her and Phil and the folks there 'cause I knew they appreciated me.

"Money—well, I don't care about money. Lots of you folks out there think you gotta get some. Well, let me tell you—money is the roots of all evil. I give the best of my voice away for free, when I got love.

"We love you, Mahalia!" roared the hands and voices in the Shed.

"Lots of these music people, they still can't figure what I'm doin'. They say I'm singing to a beat of a 24-count, and they ain't no such thing. I say, 'What you mean—I'm stomping my own foot to my beat, ain't I? You tellin' me I'm doin' it wrong?'

"But Phil and Stephanie, they appreciated me, and when I left that little place, I missed 'em so. There was these people sayin', 'Can you sing at this college? Can you sing at that church?' and I was feelin' so low. I said to my accompanist, 'What that Stephanie do to me, I feel so bad?' "

I guess Miss Jackson knew she was among friends at Tanglewood, so she told us about old times and Europe and her heart attack and how much she weighted and her prayers for peace—and blithely overran her deadline.

"I'm comin' back next year to sing for you," she said at last. "I hope you young folks'll come. I love young folks. I wants to stay young myself, that's why. I love the old folks too, but they wants me to sing the old songs, and I'm gettin' too old myself to hold those long notes. They gotta come right from the diaphragm, and I can't do it no more. I almost lost that high note in 'Thank the Lord' tonight—you hear it? I'll be back though, and sing some more for you all and Stephanie."

Life is sometimes marvelous, I thought, sopping up happy tears in my Kleenex.

Later, at Phil and Stephanie's, Mahalia held Steffie's hand and sang more of the Word. I embraced her in a crush of ample bosom to ample bosom and thanked her for that incredible evening. I said, "You know, I love Stephanie about best in the whole world and tonight I decided I love you next."

"They gotta open them doors wide to let through all the folks love Stephanie," said Mahalia Jackson happily.

We followed her up a flight of stairs, which she took carefully, one at a time.

"I got a heart condition," I heard her say, "and you got a condition, you got to respect it, not pay no mind to how other people do, but just go your own best way."

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000
AUG 3 1969

AT TANGLEWOOD: The Jefferson Airplane will appear in concert on August 12th at 8 p.m.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 11 1969

THE JEFFERSON AIRPLANE is appearing in tomorrow's Tanglewood Trends concert at 8 p.m.

Tanglewood to Hold Pop Festival

Bill Graham, producer of Fillmore East and West, will make history at the Berkshire Music Festival, when he presents the first rock concert at Tanglewood, America's summer festival of classical music.

The program, scheduled for Aug. 12, "From The Fillmore," will bring to the Tanglewood audience important sounds in rock music today — Jefferson Airplane, The Who and B. B. King. The Joshua Light Show, which has created standards by which all other light shows are judged, will also be appearing. To complete the show, Christopher Tree will give a concert on his "Spontaneous Sounds."

Jefferson Airplane, founders of the San Francisco sound in rock (their latest record, "Bless Its Pointed Little Head," was recorded live at Fillmore West), will come to Tanglewood directly from their concerts at Fillmore East on Friday and Saturday, August 8 and 9.

B. B. (Blues Boy) King and his guitar, "Lucille," are well known to Fillmore audiences on both coasts, for it was at Fillmore West that King first became known to the young and enthusiastic audiences who admired his disciples — Eric Clapton of Cream, Mike Bloomfield and Bob "Bear" Hite of Canned Heat.

As for The Who, the British rock group, they have made several successful appearances at the Fillmores, the most recent being their two visits to Fillmore East in May and June of this year. On both occasions, The Who received full houses and standing ovations.

Christopher Tree and his Spontaneous Sounds will be making his first appearance under the auspices of Bill Graham. With a collection of over 200 percussion and wind instruments, he is truly a one man symphony — one who shuns most Western concepts of harmony and structure. Tree will perform on the lawn outside the Tanglewood concert hall for as long as the spirit moves him.

Inside, the performers will be backed by the Joshua Light Show, who have been resident artists of Fillmore East since its beginning. Headed by Joshua White, the team of seven people operate a variety of machinery to create a visual accompaniment to the sounds of the group.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
AUG 10 1969

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260
AUG 3 1969

LEONARD BERNSTEIN is the name of the light show's picture screen operator at the Filmore East's rock concert Tuesday at Tanglewood. Yes, that's the same Leonard Bernstein who formerly conducted the New York Philharmonic.

Bernstein reportedly gets his kicks handling the psychedelic lighting for the Joshua Light Show at the New York Filmore and will be on the stick when Bill Graham brings his Gotham gang to Tanglewood. How come Leonard wasn't with the Joshua Light Show during the Newport Jazz Festival — or was he?

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 10 1969

Tanglewood Trends Finale

Jefferson Airplane appears at Tanglewood, Aug. 12.

Saturday, August 2, 1969

way's "Hair" . . . On Tuesday, Aug. 12th, if you have nothing to do, go to Tanglewood, Mass. There you will see in one giant show the Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, and The Who. I have no idea where Tanglewood is from Schenectady, but just head east, and you will hit it sooner or later. The Who will perform part of their Rock Opera, and of course the Airplane will be the Airplane, while B. B. King is King of the Blues. Try to make it, and get some culture from the Boston Pops while you are there . . .

Top Five Albums

1—Blood Sweat and Tears — (Columbia)
2—Best of Cream (Atco)
3—Romeo & Juliet — Soundtrack (Capitol)
4—Tommy—The Who (Decca)
5—Crosby-Stills-Nash (Atlantic)

B. B. KING will appear at Tanglewood on Tuesday.

B. B. King

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 9 1969

The final concert in an imaginative series of modern music will be performed in the Tanglewood Shed on Aug. 12. Billed as "The Fillmore at Tanglewood," B.B. King, Jefferson Airplane and The Who will appear, accompanied by the Joshua Light Show.

The Airplane, one of the first San Francisco groups to gain a strong following, draws its sound from folk, jazz, blues, from Bach and even Indian ragas. Although part of a "revolutionary generation," the Airplane is a group whose music is more concerned with love than with revolution or protest. The voice of the "San Francisco Haight-Ashbury prophetess." Grace Slick, has stirred contemporary music lovers worldwide.

The Who, whose origin lies in the tougher sections of London, gained recognition in the United States with "Happy Jack." The four-man group, led by Roger Daltrey, was one of the first groups to incorporate electronic sounds such as amp feedback in their songs. Their most recent LP, "Tommy," a rock opera, further explores the interrelationship of each song within an album.

"Father of the Honky blues," B.B. (Blues Boy) King, is a musician whose influence on the modern music scene is only beginning to be recognized. Guitarists such as Eric Clapton and Michael Bloomfield are among those who acclaim King. B.B. King sings blues in a voice that is sweet but with a touch of huskiness. He is also a virtuoso on the guitar.

150.

AT RIGHT — Grass space was at premium last night in front of Tanglewood's big shed. Photo was taken 45 minutes before rock concert began.

New York Post
D. 708 180 SAT. 369,902
AUG 13 1969

Jefferson Airplane and The Who at Tanglewood

By JOSH MILLS

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Tanglewood Music Shed hosted two of the giants of rock last night in a setting usually reserved for classical music.

Six thousand persons gathered under the open air roof while thousands more lay outside under the stars to hear Jefferson Airplane and The Who.

The Airplane, foremost communicator of the West Coast sound, took a long time to get together. During their old favorites—"White Rabbit," "Plastic Fantastic Lever" and "Somebody to Love"—nothing really meshed, despite some fine vocals by Grace Slick, Marty Balin and Paul Kantner.

But after more than an hour things suddenly clicked on a piece called something like "Starship." The Airplane is strongest when it's jamming, and lead guitarist Jorma Kaukonen and Bass player Jack Casady began driving against one another, prodding each other deeper and deeper into the rythmns laid down by drummer Spencer Dryden.

In one moment the Airplane showed their genius. But it was quickly gone, and one was left with the impression that The Who had done a much stronger set.

The Who, England's hottest group, played every major song from their rock opera "Tommy." For encores they threw in their biggest hit, "My Generation," and also "Summertime Blues."

Nobody can top The Who at hard rock. Drummer Keith Moon proved again that he is unsurpassed at straight rock drumming. Bass player John Entwhistle and guitarist Pete Townshend can also match virtuosity with anyone.

Roger Daltrey, who sings lead, showed a sensitive yet strong voice.

Townshend, who writes most of The Who's material, is also a fine showman, pirouetting and leaping without missing a note.

B. B. King, backed by a solid blues band, contributed a fine warm-up set that got lost beneath the rock overload.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
(E) 48,850 (S) 39,575
AUG 14 1969

Movies TV Art

Music Review

Fillmore Fills Tanglewood

By PAT FRANCIS

LONG-HAIR MUSIC just doesn't mean the same thing any more. Ask the kids who were at Tanglewood last night.

About 22,000 (a record for a single performance) grooved as Fillmore (of New York and San Francisco) owner Bill Graham packed up his operation and brought it to Lenox for the last of this year's Contemporary Trends concerts. With him Graham brought B. B. King, the Who and the Jefferson Airplane as well as his own Joshua Light Show, which provided visual accompaniment for the music.

* * *

B. B. KING is a blues guitarist—with soul. His repertoire ran the gamut from blues to rock. His blues were blue and his rock had them calling for more.

The Who turned out to be a disappointment for some of the audience who were more familiar with the group's earlier music. Last night's songs were harder rock than they've been doing. However, "Pinball Wizard" was well-received.

For the Jefferson Airplane, there was no such problem. The Airplane, with Grace Slick, started with "White Rabbit" and ended with "The Ballad of You and Me and Pooneil." They never lost their audience for a minute. There were still cries for more after they played an encore.

* * *

INTERMISSIONS aren't usually noteworthy but last night the Joshua Light Show ad-libbed faces and phrases and showed excerpts from old movies, including "King Kong," while the group were setting up their equipment. It was definitely the best intermission I've ever attended.

As for the concert, ask the 22,000 long hairs.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 13 1969

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
AUG 14 1969

Rock Draws Record Crowd Of 22,000 to Tanglewood

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 13 — Attendance records were shattered at Tanglewood last night when a rock concert drew an audience of 22,000 people. The program featured B. B. King, the blues singer, the Who, an English rock group, and the Jefferson Airplane with the Joshua Light Show.

This was the fifth and last rock concert offered here this summer in a Tuesday-night series entitled "Contemporary Trends." Official records show that attendances in the range of 16,000 have been reached by some events in the past. Average attendance for the Boston Symphony's regular summer concerts here now runs to about 8,000.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Wednesday, August 13, 1969

Fantastic Show at Lenox

By FRED LE BRUN

LENOX, Mass. — A human wave drove, walked, rode, flew and otherwise assembled at Tanglewood last night to pay homage to three great musical acts in one play — B. B. King, The Who, and the redoubtable Jefferson Airplane all wrapped up by the Joshua Light Show.

Exactly how big a crowd was assembled in the parking lots, lawn areas, and in the seats will remain a mystery, but there were certainly more than enough people about, probably in the neighborhood of half a million.

Energy and enthusiasm in the group dynamics of an audience seem to progress geometrically to the arithmetic progression of people, last night being a good example. All three performers were brought back again and again for encores to the pulsating chant of "more, more, more,' while the milling thousands never quite settled down.

TANGLEWOOD is a nice setting for people, even a lot of people. But there has to be a limit, and it might have been reached last night.

The lawn for instance was a mass of contiguous bodies writhing, twisting, bumping and freezing more or less in unison. Being zonked out on the grass and listening to B.B.'s blues is great — but not if someone is stepping on your nose trying to get a better view.

Then there are the expensive seats. No matter how good they were, there were at least fifty people blocking any view, even of the exits.

It's sad but true; that many people just breathing is enough to drive an ardent listener to distraction — or shrieking back to the parking lot seeking refuge among the thousands of sleeping tin giants. So there you are.

ASIDE from that, the show was great. B.B. King seems to have a growing fan club in this area. It would appear his music might easily be over dazzled by the others on the card but not so. B.B. King got more encores than anybody else and deserved them.

The Who started slow but finished fast. The English group that originally made its mark by destroying its instruments after every performance has decided there's more money in practising.

Currently the Who have an unusually rich hit album on their hands in "Tommy," a rock opera on four sides about the perceptions of a deaf, dumb, and blind child. Their performance featured the organic unity of this excellent and innovative rock piece. For an encore: the great Eddy Cochrane's hit on Liberty of the late fifties, "Summertime Blues."

Peter Townshend displayed his unique guitar style to save the show for Who fans.

GRACE SLICK is not Jefferson Airplane. Janis Joplin is whatever group she's in, which led to the demise of Big Brother and the Holding Company. Janis moves, grooves, belts and hogs it all. But not Grace.

Grace has a commanding voice, different from Janis's but just as captivating to a rockman's ear. But Grace works with the Airplane. Marty Balin, Paul Kantner, Jorma Kaukonen, and Jack Casady, to produce the vocal blend at the root of the San Francisco sound.

"White Rabbit," and "Somebody to Love," already classics, were delivered with a voice that's getting better, if anything, and the new stuff Airplane did, from a forthcoming album, is very interesting.

Just a word about the Joshua Light Show: fantastic. You'd hardly think it could be done under the circumstances, but it was. The effects behind the performers on stage and augmented the show beautifully.

THE JEFFERSON AIRPLANE

CITIZEN
WINSTED, CONN.
(E) 4,300
AUG 13 1969

Jefferson Airplane And the Who At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Tanglewood Music Shed hosted two of the giants of rock Tuesday night in a setting usually reserved for classical music.

Six thousand persons gathered under the open air roof while thousands more lay outside under the stars to hear Jefferson Airplane and The Who.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
(E) 11,496
AUG 13 1969

Tanglewood Hosts Rock

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Tanglewood Music Shed hosted two of the giants of rock Tuesday night in a setting usually reserved for classical music.

Six thousand persons gathered under the open air roof while thousands more lay outside under the stars to hear Jefferson Airplane and The Who.

North Adams Transcript, Wednesday, August 13, 1969

22,000 at Tanglewood Rock Concert

By LEWIS C. CUYLER

TANGLEWOOD literally exploded last night with frenzied sound, swirling colors and thousands of young people who came to hear two top rock groups, a blues singer, and a spectacular light show.

When the four-hour concert was over the box office counted an attendance of approximately 22,000, easily exceeding the previous top attendance figure of 15,242 at a concert in 1965.

The crowd, overwhelmingly under the age of 30, heard B.B. King, a top blues singer, The Who, a rock group from England, and The Jefferson Airplane, another rock group which originated in San Francisco.

The most spectacular part of the program was the Joshua Light Show which accompanied each piece, flashing swirling colors on a huge screen behind the groups, in time to the music.

The colors represented virtually every shade in the spectrum and they never stopped. As the beat became intense, so did the color show, so that during the loudest, most frantic moments, the audience saw swirls, blobs and bubbles of color, contracting, expanding, or bouncing off of each other as they were literally assaulted by the sound. But sometimes the colors became things, such as a big blowup of a garish pinball machine in action, during a number by The Who about a pinball machine.

The groups were introduced by Bill Graham, who was described as "The Evangelist in the Rock Field." His reputation stems from his founding of the original Fillmore Auditorium in San Francisco, predecessor of the Fillmore West, where he began production of rock concerts. Eighteen months ago, he founded Fillmore East in New York City.

* * *

B.B. KING and his red guitar, "Lucille", with superb accompaniment by saxophones and a trumpet, set the tone for the evening. The crowd, which by this time jammed the aisles, hardly let him off the stage as he returned for several encores between chants of "We Want More."

The Who, a group of four Londoners who have been known to break their instruments at the climax of a concert, didn't do that last night, but did about everything else. Led by a barechested singer with a wild head of hair, the group turned up the gigantic amplifiers to a deafening pitch, drawing a shouting response from the crowd.

The Jefferson Airplane, a bit more subdued and somewhat more casual, was introduced with a film scene from the movie King Kong where double-wing vintage airplanes divebomb the huge gorilla as he clasps a woman atop the Empire State Building.

* * *

THE CROWD started to arrive almost two hours before the concert began to fill the lawn so that 45 minutes before it all began, grass space in front of the shed was at a premium.

The event was the final in a series of Tuesday night Contemporary Trend Concerts organized Gunther Schuller, head of the Berkshire Music Center, with the object of recognizing other than classical types of music, the traditional Tanglewood fare.

Earlier Trends concerts this year have included appearances of The Iron Butterfly, a rock group, the rock singer Janis Joplin, the gospel singer Mahalia Jackson and the folk singer Joni Mitchell.

Rock music certainly isn't for everyone, but its followers are as enthusiastic as any jazz or Dixieland buffs were in earlier years. Last night's response was a clear indication that Tanglewood can play a significant role in the development of contemporary music.

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87 000
AUG 13 1969

TANGLEWOOD HOSTS 2 OF GIANTS OF ROCK

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Tanglewood Music Shed hosted two of the giants of rock Tuesday night in a setting usually reserved for classical music.

Six thousand persons gathered under the open air roof while thousands more lay outside under the stars to hear Jefferson Airplane and The Who.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175
AUG 13 1969

Tanglewood Turns On For A Rock Concert

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Tanglewood Music Shed hosted two of the giants of rock Tuesday night in a setting usually reserved for classical music.

Six thousand persons gathered under the open air roof while thousands more lay outside under the stars to hear Jefferson Airplane and The Who.

150.

AT RIGHT — Grass space was at premium last night in front of Tanglewood's big shed. Photo was taken 45 minutes before rock concert began.

New York Post
D. 708 180 SAT. 369,902
AUG 13 1969

Jefferson Airplane and The Who at Tanglewood

By JOSH MILLS

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Tanglewood Music Shed hosted two of the giants of rock last night in a setting usually reserved for classical music.

Six thousand persons gathered under the open air roof while thousands more lay outside under the stars to hear Jefferson Airplane and The Who.

The Airplane, foremost communicator of the West Coast sound, took a long time to get together. During their old favorites—"White Rabbit," "Plastic Fantastic Lever" and "Somebody to Love"—nothing really meshed, despite some fine vocals by Grace Slick, Marty Balin and Paul Kantner.

But after more than an hour things suddenly clicked on a piece called something like "Starship." The Airplane is strongest when it's jamming, and lead guitarist Jorma Kaukonen and Bass player Jack Casady began driving against one another, prodding each other deeper and deeper into the rythmns laid down by drummer Spencer Dryden.

In one moment the Airplane showed their genius. But it was quickly gone, and one was left with the impression that The Who had done a much stronger set.

The Who, England's hottest group, played every major song from their rock opera "Tommy." For encores they threw in their biggest hit, "My Generation," and also "Summertime Blues."

Nobody can top The Who at hard rock. Drummer Keith Moon proved again that he is unsurpassed at straight rock drumming. Bass player John Entwhistle and guitarist Pete Townshend can also match virtuosity with anyone.

Roger Daltrey, who sings lead, showed a sensitive yet strong voice.

Townshend, who writes most of The Who's material, is also a fine showman, pirouetting and leaping without missing a note.

B. B. King, backed by a solid blues band, contributed a fine warm-up set that got lost beneath the rock overload.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
(E) 48,850 (S) 39,575
AUG 14 1969

Movies TV Art

Music Review

Fillmore Fills Tanglewood

By PAT FRANCIS

LONG-HAIR MUSIC just doesn't mean the same thing any more. Ask the kids who were at Tanglewood last night.

About 22,000 (a record for a single performance) grooved as Fillmore (of New York and San Francisco) owner Bill Graham packed up his operation and brought it to Lenox for the last of this year's Contemporary Trends concerts. With him Graham brought B. B. King, the Who and the Jefferson Airplane as well as his own Joshua Light Show, which provided visual accompaniment for the music.

* * *

B. B. KING is a blues guitarist—with soul. His repertoire ran the gamut from blues to rock. His blues were blue and his rock had them calling for more.

The Who turned out to be a disappointment for some of the audience who were more familiar with the group's earlier music. Last night's songs were harder rock than they've been doing. However, "Pinball Wizard" was well-received.

For the Jefferson Airplane, there was no such problem. The Airplane, with Grace Slick, started with "White Rabbit" and ended with "The Ballad of You and Me and Pooneil." They never lost their audience for a minute. There were still cries for more after they played an encore.

* * *

INTERMISSIONS aren't usually noteworthy but last night the Joshua Light Show ad-libbed faces and phrases and showed excerpts from old movies, including "King Kong," while the group were setting up their equipment. It was definitely the best intermission I've ever attended.

As for the concert, ask the 22,000 long hairs.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 13 1969

Rock Draws Record Crowd Of 22,000 to Tanglewood

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 13—Attendance records were shattered at Tanglewood last night when a rock concert drew an audience of 22,000 people. The program featured B. B. King, the blues singer, the Who, an English rock group, and the Jefferson Airplane with the Joshua Light Show.

This was the fifth and last rock concert offered here this summer in a Tuesday-night series entitled "Contemporary Trends." Official records show that attendances in the range of 16,000 have been reached by some events in the past. Average attendance for the Boston Symphony's regular summer concerts here now runs to about 8,000.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
AUG 14 1969

CITIZEN
WINSTED, CONN.
(E) 4,300
AUG 13 1969

Jefferson Airplane And the Who At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Tanglewood Music Shed hosted two of the giants of rock Tuesday night in a setting usually reserved for classical music.

Six thousand persons gathered under the open air roof while thousands more lay outside under the stars to hear Jefferson Airplane and The Who.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
(E) 11,496
AUG 13 1969

Tanglewood Hosts Rock

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Tanglewood Music Shed hosted two of the giants of rock Tuesday night in a setting usually reserved for classical music.

Six thousand persons gathered under the open air roof while thousands more lay outside under the stars to hear Jefferson Airplane and The Who.

North Adams Transcript, Wednesday, August 13, 1969

22,000 at Tanglewood Rock Concert

By LEWIS C. CUYLER

TANGLEWOOD literally exploded last night with frenzied sound, swirling colors and thousands of young people who came to hear two top rock groups, a blues singer, and a spectacular light show.

When the four-hour concert was over the box office counted an attendance of approximately 22,000, easily exceeding the previous top attendance figure of 15,242 at a concert in 1965.

The crowd, overwhelmingly under the age of 30, heard B.B. King, a top blues singer, The Who, a rock group from England, and The Jefferson Airplane, another rock group which originated in San Francisco.

The most spectacular part of the program was the Joshua Light Show which accompanied each piece, flashing swirling colors on a huge screen behind the groups, in time to the music.

The colors represented virtually every shade in the spectrum and they never stopped. As the beat became intense, so did the color show, so that during the loudest, most frantic moments, the audience saw swirls, blobs and bubbles of color, contracting, expanding, or bouncing off of each other as they were literally assaulted by the sound. But sometimes the colors became things, such as a big blowup of a garish pinball machine in action, during a number by The Who about a pinball machine.

The groups were introduced by Bill Graham, who was described as "The Evangelist in the Rock Field." His reputation stems from his founding of the original Fillmore Auditorium in San Francisco, predecessor of the Fillmore West, where he began production of rock concerts. Eighteen months ago, he founded Fillmore East in New York City.

* * *

B.B. KING and his red guitar, "Lucille", with superb accompaniment by saxophones and a trumpet, set the tone for the evening. The crowd, which by this time jammed the aisles, hardly let him off the stage as he returned for several encores between chants of "We Want More."

The Who, a group of four Londoners who have been known to break their instruments at the climax of a concert, didn't do that last night, but did about everything else. Led by a barechested singer with a wild head of hair, the group turned up the gigantic amplifiers to a deafening pitch, drawing a shouting response from the crowd.

The Jefferson Airplane, a bit more subdued and somewhat more casual, was introduced with a film scene from the movie King Kong where double-wing vintage airplanes divebomb the huge gorilla as he clasps a woman atop the Empire State Building.

* * *

THE CROWD started to arrive almost two hours before the concert began to fill the lawn so that 45 minutes before it all began, grass space in front of the shed was at a premium.

The event was the final in a series of Tuesday night Contemporary Trend Concerts organized Gunther Schuller, head of the Berkshire Music Center, with the object of recognizing other than classical types of music, the traditional Tanglewood fare.

Earlier Trends concerts this year have included appearances of The Iron Butterfly, a rock group, the rock singer Janis Joplin, the gospel singer Mahalia Jackson and the folk singer Joni Mitchell.

Rock music certainly isn't for everyone, but its followers are as enthusiastic as any jazz or Dixieland buffs were in earlier years. Last night's response was a clear indication that Tanglewood can play a significant role in the development of contemporary music.

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000
AUG 13 1969

TANGLEWOOD HOSTS 2 OF GIANTS OF ROCK

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Tanglewood Music Shed hosted two of the giants of rock Tuesday night in a setting usually reserved for classical music.

Six thousand persons gathered under the open air roof while thousands more lay outside under the stars to hear Jefferson Airplane and The Who.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175
AUG 13 1969

Tanglewood Turns On For A Rock Concert

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The Tanglewood Music Shed hosted two of the giants of rock Tuesday night in a setting usually reserved for classical music.

Six thousand persons gathered under the open air roof while thousands more lay outside under the stars to hear Jefferson Airplane and The Who.

Albany & Rochester Times Union
Wednesday, August 13, 1969

Fantastic Show at Lenox

By FRED LE BRUN

LENOX, Mass. — A human wave drove, walked, rode, flew and otherwise assembled at Tanglewood last night to pay homage to three great musical acts in one play — B. B. King, The Who, and the redoubtable Jefferson Airplane all wrapped up by the Joshua Light Show.

Exactly how big a crowd was assembled in the parking lots, lawn areas, and in the seats will remain a mystery, but there were certainly more than enough people about, probably in the neighborhood of half a million.

Energy and enthusiasm in the group dynamics of an audience seem to progress geometrically to the arithmetic progression of people, last night being a good example. All three performers were brought back again and again for encores to the pulsating chant of "more, more, more,' while the milling thousands never quite settled down.

TANGLEWOOD is a nice setting for people, even a lot of people. But there has to be a limit, and it might have been reached last night.

The lawn for instance was a mass of contiguous bodies writhing, twisting, bumping and freezing more or less in unison. Being zonked out on the grass and listening to B.B.'s blues is great — but not if someone is stepping on your nose trying to get a better view.

Then there are the expensive seats. No matter how good they were, there were at least fifty people blocking any view, even of the exits.

It's sad but true; that many people just breathing is enough to drive an ardent listener to distraction — or shrieking back to the parking lot seeking refuge among the thousands of sleeping tin giants. So there you are.

THE JEFFERSON AIRPLANE

ASIDE from that, the show was great. B.B. King seems to have a growing fan club in this area. It would appear his music might easily be over dazzled by the others on the card but not so. B.B. King got more encores than anybody else and deserved them.

The Who started slow but finished fast. The English group that originally made its mark by destroying its instruments after every performance has decided there's more money in practising.

Currently the Who have an unusually rich hit album on their hands in "Tommy," a rock opera on four sides about the perceptions of a deaf, dumb and blind child. Their performance featured the organic unity of this excellent and innovative rock piece. For an encore: the great Eddy Cochrane's hit on Liberty of the late fifties, "Summertime Blues."

Peter Townshend displayed his unique guitar style to save the show for Who fans.

GRACE SLICK is not Jefferson Airplane. Janis Joplin is whatever group she's in, which led to the demise of Big Brother and the Holding Company. Janis moves, grooves, belts and hogs it all. But not Grace.

Grace has a commanding voice, different from Janis's but just as captivating to a rockman's ear. But Grace works with the Airplane. Marty Balin, Paul Kantner, Jorma Kaukonen, and Jack Casady, to produce the vocal blend at the root of the San Francisco sound.

"White Rabbit," and "Somebody to Love," already classics, were delivered with a voice that's getting better, if anything, and the new stuff Airplane did, from a forthcoming album, is very interesting.

Just a word about the Joshua Light Show: fantastic. You'd hardly think it could be done under the circumstances, but it was. The effects behind the performers on stage and augmented the show beautifully.

151

22,000 Rock Fans Jam Tanglewood

By RALPH CONROY

LENOX — A crowd of about 22,000 teeny-boppers and young adults, largest attendance in the 20-year history of Tanglewood, crammed the Berkshire Music Center grounds last night for performances of rock, blues and psychedelic lights.

Previous attendance record at Tanglewood was 15,242 persons who turned out for a 1965 performance of Verdi's "Otello" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

'King of Blues'

Last night's performers included B. B. King, who bills himself as "King of Blues," a rock group from England called The Who, and a rock group from San Francisco, the Jefferson Airplane. Visual accompaniment was provided by the Joshua Light Show from Fillmore East, a discotheque in New York City.

A fellow wearing camouflage levis and a beard explained the psychedelic lighting to this reporter. He said that the light is projected on a screen from behind and that about 80 per cent of the light comes through. When asked how he knew so much about it, he said he was with the "Airplane," setting up their instruments.

Light shows have only been around for about two years on the East Coast but have been going for about five years on the West Coast, he commented. When asked if the bright lights are supposed to reproduce the effects of an acid trip, he smiled and faded away into the crowd.

Running Out Flat

B. B. King was warming up the audience. The light show was running flat out now. When King was hot, the lights were

Tanglewood
Continued on Page 23

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 13 1969

Tanglewood

Continued From Page 1

hot, blazing the screen with color and motion. When King ended a hot number, the lights started blipping, flashing like a quick-charging strobe light, or like a machine gun with the trigger taped back.

While the audience waited for the instruments to be set up and the sound to be wired for The Who, the light show people entertained. They flashed things like: Let's have a good hand for —pause—a picture of Doris Day, in soft focus, of course. Let's have a good hand for—pause—a picture of W. C. Fields.

Then The Who performed. The crowd pressed in toward the stage. The Who tried to get hot. The light show went full tilt. Every color you have ever seen, thought of or read of was splashed on the screen. All the colors and images, blurring, montaging, changing. Sometimes like a day-glo marble cake, sometimes like an artist's palette, spinning and cartwheeling, but always grooved to the mood of the performers. (See page 13 for review).

A rumor circulated that some "heads" had been busted in a pot party down in the garden. No one could confirm it. There was a heavy aerosol scent hanging outside, the sort used to spray a room Sunday morning after a Saturday night. A long time ago it was burning joss sticks to cover the smell. Last night it was aerosol cans.

Jefferson Airplane started about 10:30 and performed for the next two hours.

The crowd was well-mannered and no one seemed to get out of hand. With 22,000 people packed tightly together and the electricity generated by the performers, there was always the potential. But nothing much happened.

Tanglewood: Outside . . .

. . . and Inside

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 13 1969

22,000 'Fly' at Lenox

By CHARLES F. HARRIS

Gazette Review

LENOX — B. B. King, The Who, The Jefferson Airplane, and the Joshua Light Show teamed up last night to make the final Tanglewood contemporary "trend" concert a night to remember.

A crowd in excess of 22,000 filled the festival grounds for the five-hour plus concert brought to Tanglewood by the Bill Graham Filmore-East of New York.

Unfortunately, much of B.B. King's excellent performance was obliterated by hordes of latecomers. The ushers, in a break from normal policy, seated the crowd during his actual perfomance. Throughout the 6,000-seat shed crowded aisles successfully blocked vision for those seated.

During three standing ovations, which brought King out for two encores, much of the audience got to see him for the first time.

Light Show

Throughout all three concerts the Joshua Light Show illuminated a backdrop with some of the finest entertainment seen in that field. Much of the evening's enjoyment is to the credit of the Light Show.

The Joshua ensemble replaced one intermission with a 10-minute cut from the movie "King Kong," showing biplanes blasting the huge ape from his perch high atop the Empire State Building. Judging from the audience's reception, the idea was an excellent way to spend an intermission.

Before "The Who" got under way, police had relinqushed forward aisles to seat wayward lawn ticket holders; an action that blocked the flow of traffic and made everyone happy, save possibly the police and Tanglewood officials.

The 20 floodlights ringing the perimeter of the shed were off for the evening, greatly enhancing the light show.

"The Who," a four-member group with two guitars and drums set the pace with their recent release "I'm Free," and proceeded to bring the crowd to their feet on at least three occasions.

The audience again refused to allow the concert to end, remained on their feet until the group acknowledged their thunderous reception with an encore.

No Reaction

By the time the Jefferson Airplane took the stage the audience was reduced to complacency. A obviouly entertained crowd refused to react until near the concalsion of the concert; as applause was considerably diminished.

The airplane flew to a background of flowers and landscapes well co-ordinated with their repertoire. Visual and verbal sensations were fused into one as minds were swept up by the thrust of the mighty Jefferson Airplane.

Their initial conclusion was immediately rejected by the crowd as the very rafters shook to the thunderous ovation, and the Airplane returned for 20 minutes.

Next Tuesday Tanglewood will make a day of it, beginning at 2 p.m. with the Boston University Young Artist Orchestra and concluing with an 8 p.m. concert by the Boston Symphony.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG. 13 1969

Whitestone

AFTERMATH of last night's record crowd at Tanglewood was a gigantic clean-up job this morning.

The Tangled People

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I started to write a review of the Jefferson Airplane's excellent performance at Tanglewood's Aug. 12 rock concert but came to feel that it is more important to rap about what people experienced as a whole — and by this I mean the environment at Tanglewood.

A lot of "heads" were tangled up and trampled upon by others who just had to get one inch nearer to The Who and the Airplane. I don't know what it was all about; maybe someone (a Communist agent?) told them that if they got way up, right near the Airplane, and maybe even got to touch them, they would be instantly transformed and maybe even reach Nirvana.

But what started out as a very beautiful event turned into a mass of tangled juice-heads pushing, shoving and kicking, to get up to see the 9-by-12 light show projected on the screen, and maybe get just a little closer. I met one beautiful girl who had got there two hours early in order to put her blanket near the Shed, but 15 minutes before the concert all she could see were the bodies of people in front of her, and after The Who came on they were standing on her blanket, and even on her, so she had to move before they stepped on her.

I met one girl who refused to move; she was almost in tears. Her white blanket had turned black from hundreds of footprints, and she had red marks on her hands where people had trampled on her. Maybe if the management at Tanglewood had foreseen this response they would have scheduled two shows, instead of packing everyone into one concert — they might have made a lot more money, with a lot less trouble.

For those who could afford seats, none of this was evident, for they were very secure in their comfortable chairs, showing off their new $25 bell-bottoms, and trying to really feel the music without being too conspicuous in their enjoyment. If by chance a person from the $3 class wandered down the aisle toward the elite section he was quickly and roughly thrown back (and I mean thrown literally; one chick was hurled two feet) by some violent-type long-haired "ushers" (I think that they were Marines with wigs on).

While I was in California I went to many rock concerts, and people were content to feel the music without trampling and hassling everyone else. So what is the problem in the Berkshires? Is it that young people are so starved for any form of really good music that they must devour what little (and I mean little) music they do get? Right now I am too confused to give a solution to the problem, all I know is that the Tanglewood concert was a real bad trip.

ROBERT BUTTERWORTH,
41 Burke Ave.,
Pittsfield.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 14 1969

152

Tanglewood Concert Series Ends; B. B. King Among Best Summer Performers

The final program in Tanglewood's series of five Contemporary Trends Concerts rates the marked distinction of being the best organized, best attended and longest of all the Tuesday night offerings. The last was not, however, the series' plum.

The Trends concerts have rainbowed a full musical spectrum, from folk to jazz and rock to gospel. Outstanding performances were turned in by Janis Joplin, Iron Butterfly, Joni Mitchell and the Thad-Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra. Other memorable sessions were provided by Orpheus, Tim Hardin, the Staple Singers, Mahalia Jackson, the Butterfield Blues Band and Ornette Coleman.

Predominantly young audiences, a bit of a show in themselves, have patronized the series, and last Tuesday's record crowd was no exception. Bell bottomed and bespecled, the under 30 set populated the 6,000 seat Music Shed and sprawled over its grassy front carpet to hear B. B. King, the Jefferson Airplane, and The Who. The Joshua Light Show was another featured attraction.

B. B. King was definitely the star of Tuesday night's show. Supported by a five piece band, including an accomplished bass guitarist, a professionally fast drummer, and a well-timed three-piece brass section, King showed how "the King of the Blues" entertains 22,000 persons. The 43-year-old Mississippi-born son of a preacher was known as the Beale Street Blues Boy on Memphis radio. Later, he became known simply as "B.B.".

King, dressed in grey double-breasted suit, came back for two encores amidst the thunderous applause and cries of "we want more." The most enjoyable number played was his answer to "Why I sing the Blues." He bowed slightly with his hands cupped at his chest, and left with his famous guitar named "Lucille."

Tuesday's show was presented and organized by Bill Graham, founder of New York's eighteen month-old Fillmore East. During all performances, background effects and between-acts entertainment was provided by the Joshua Light Show, resident artists at Fillmore East since its beginning. The Light Show can be currently seen in John Schlesinger's film, "Midnight Cowboy." The light show was varied from rythmic movement in a slow-boat song to a psychedelic attack. During the two short intermissions, jokelines, pictures of such greats as W.C. Fields and Doris Day, and the concluding act of the movie King Kong was flashed on the stage-length screen, located behind the band area on the stage.

A pre-concert show was given by "Spontaneous Sound" who offered spontaneous compositions using gongs, tympani, cymbals, bells, chimes, flutes, reeds and a Tibetan Temple horn.

The second performers, The Who, gave an appreciably exciting exhibition of their popular tunes and styles. Despite equipment troubles at the start, their professional interpretation of "Pinball Wizard" and their knowledge of "how to turn a crowd on," saved them. They became progressively better as the concert went on, especially during one long sequence of songs, with the lead singer, garbed in a tassled cowboy shirt, swinging his microphone dangerously near the rest of the instruments, and with the best performance given by the lead guitarist, Peter Townshend.

Though the crowd demanded for "More," The Who left with a "Thanks and see you next time," instead of an encore.

Tim Hardin — Joni Mitchell

The Jefferson Airplane gave the most dissapointing performance with the only real entertainment during their hit, "White Rabbit." The six member group from San Francisco offered a different arrangement of "Somebody to Love," than that heard on two of their albums, "Surrealist Pillow" and "Bless Its Pointed Little Head," and was not enjoyed by the author of this review.

One member of the audience was heard to say that "if it wasn't for the pictures on the screen, I'd be asleep." It seemed that this was the reaction of other persons also, when many began walking out before the show had concluded. Individually, the musicians were very accomplished, especially the bass guitarist, drummer, and lead singer, Grace Slick, but great individual musical talent does not necessarily make for a good group of musicians. The show lasted until about midnight, the longest time of any Contemporary Trends Concert this summer.

On Aug. 19 at 8 p.m., the Berkshire Festival will feature Tanglewood on Parade, involving all departments of the Berkshire Music Center and climaxed by an evening concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, traditionally closing with a brilliant display of fireworks.

B. B. King

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

AUG 14 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 15 1969

Inadequate Review

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I was very disappointed in your Aug. 13 review of the Fillmore concert at Tanglewood. Your reviewer, Pat Francis, does not seem to have a basic knowledge of rock music, and therefore should not be called upon to judge the musical portion of a performance. Indeed, Miss Francis never forms any musical judgment at all. Rather, she reports audience reaction, which in no way constitutes a review, but a continuation of your news story.

Calling the Who "a disappointment", is simply wrong. Their performance was an exciting combination of music, energy and showmanship, and those of the audience "familiar with the group's earlier music" know them to be the epitome of hard rock, the masters of that idiom.

Your choice of a critic, in my opinion, was irresponsible journalism. I am not arguing with Miss Francis's opinions; liking or disliking a style of music is merely a matter of taste, as long as there is a knowledge of that music. When the New York Times started to review rock performances, they made use of critics who had a background in, and a feeling for, the music. I can only hope you will do the same in the future.

(Mrs.) ALICE C. EDMUNDS.
Jug End Road,
Great Barrington.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

AUG 15 1969

Rock Draws Record Crowd Of 22,000 to Tanglewood

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 13—Attendance records were shattered at Tanglewood last night when a rock concert drew an audience of 22,000 people. The program featured B. B. King, the blues singer, the Who, an English rock group, and the Jefferson Airplane with the Joshua Light Show.

This was the fifth and last rock concert offered here this summer in a Tuesday-night series entitled "Contemporary Trends." Official records show that attendances in the range of 16,000 have been reached by some events in the past. Average attendance for the Boston Symphony's regular summer concerts here now runs to about 8,000.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

SEP 1969

Tanglewood (Lenox, Massachusetts) the summer home of the Boston Symphony, had great success with its series of Tuesday evening concerts featuring "names" from rock, jazz, folk and gospel music. Billed as Contemporary Trends Concerts, the presentations included such artists as Mahalia Jackson, Janis Joplin, the Iron Butterfly, the Staple Singers, Joni Mitchell, Tim Hardin, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, Ornette Coleman, the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Jazz Orchestra, the Jefferson Airplane, The Who, B. B. King, the Johsua Light Show and Christopher Tree.

from Village Voice 8 Aug. 7, '69

5. Bill Graham, the sinewy impresario who shook the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tanglewood season with performers from his two rock concert halls, the Fillmores, East and West: The Who, B. B. King, The Jefferson Airplane, The Joshua Light Show. A man of potent anger, objective calm, Graham has opaque pale-brown eyes that see challenges clearly, a vast sensual mouth that seldom shuts up. A San Francisco rock singer said, "You always see Bill Graham with a broom in his hand; he's a real proprietor."

6. Charles Gordone, a playwright who uses ethnic in-jokes, stock characters, and hilarious stage business as Muzak to lull smiling audiences while he drills close to the nerve in his moralistic Black uncomedy, No Place To Be Somebody. Gordone is a flamboyant, limber body—partly Irish, French, Negro, and Indian—who plays himself, offstage, with great skill. Wary, snatching laughter out of grim life, he puts racial struggles in perspective: "All the links in the chain are not the same size."

ON THESE PAGES, PHOTOGRAPHS BY: JACK ROBINSON; THOM LAFFERTY; JULIAN LLOYD; O. VERNON MATISSE; HARRY BENSON

VOGUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
BI-MONTHLY 442,000

AUG 15 1969

Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 284,218 SUN. 429,830

AUG 15 1969

Tanglewood Tale '69

Move on, Mozart! Bug off, Beethoven! Rock has prevaded another hallowed musical shrine.

This time it's the Berkshire Musical Festival at Tanglewood. In the forest glen where Hawthorne set down his "Tanglewood Tales," the Boston Symphony Orchestra traditionally renders the classics. For a breather this week, the festival yielded to the driving beat of Jefferson Airplane, the Joshua Light Show from East Village, Who from London and a blues singer eclectically named B. B. King.

So what? Just that 22,000 patrons squeezed their way in. And that's the most that ever came to Tanglewood on a summer's evening.

152.

Tanglewood Concert Series Ends; B. B. King Among Best Summer Performers

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

AUG 14 1969

The final program in Tanglewood's series of five Contemporary Trends Concerts rates the marked distinction of being the best organized, best attended and longest of all the Tuesday night offerings. The last was not, however, the series' plum.

The Trends concerts have rainbowed a full musical spectrum, from folk to jazz and rock to gospel. Outstanding performances were turned in by Janis Joplin, Iron Butterfly, Joni Mitchell and the Thad-Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra. Other memorable sessions were provided by Orpheus, Tim Hardin, the Staple Singers, Mahalia Jackson, the Butterfield Blues Band and Ornette Coleman.

Predominantly young audiences, a bit of a show in themselves, have patronized the series, and last Tuesday's record crowd was no exception. Bell bottomed and bespecled, the under 30 set populated the 6,000 seat Music Shed and sprawled over its grassy front carpet to hear B. B. King, the Jefferson Airplane, and The Who. The Joshua Light Show was another featured attraction.

B. B. King was definitely the star of Tuesday night's show. Supported by a five piece band, including an accomplished bass guitarist, a professionally fast drummer, and a well-timed three-piece brass section, King showed how "the King of the Blues" entertains 22,000 persons. The 43-year-old Mississippi-born son of a preacher was known as the Beale Street Blues Boy on Memphis radio. Later, he became known simply as "B.B.".

King, dressed in grey double-breasted suit, came back for two encores amidst the thunderous applause and cries of "we want more." The most enjoyable number played was his answer to "Why I sing the Blues." He bowed slightly with his hands cupped at his chest, and left with his famous guitar named "Lucille."

Tuesday's show was presented and organized by Bill Graham, founder of New York's eighteen month-old Fillmore East. During all performances, background effects and between-acts entertainment was provided by the Joshua Light Show, resident artists at Fillmore East since its beginning. The Light Show can be currently seen in John Schlesinger's film, "Midnight Cowboy." The light show was varied from rythmic movement in a slow-boat song to a psychedelic attack. During the two short intermissions, jokelines, pictures of such greats as W.C. Fields and Doris Day, and the concluding act of the movie King Kong was flashed on the stage-length screen, located behind the band area on the stage.

A pre-concert show was given by "Spontaneous Sound" who offered spontaneous compositions using gongs, tympani, cymbals, bells, chimes, flutes, reeds and a Tibetan Temple horn.

The second performers, The Who, gave an appreciably exciting exhibition of their popular tunes and styles. Despite equipment troubles at the start, their professional interpretation of "Pinball Wizard" and their knowledge of "how to turn a crowd on," saved them. They became progressively better as the concert went on, especially during one long sequence of songs, with the lead singer, garbed in a tassled cowboy shirt, swinging his microphone dangerously near the rest of the instruments, and with the best performance given by the lead guitarist, Peter Townshend.

Though the crowd demanded for "More," The Who left with a "Thanks and see you next time," instead of an encore.

Tim Hardin

Joni Mitchell

The Jefferson Airplane gave the most dissapointing performance with the only real entertainment during their hit, "White Rabbit." The six member group from San Francisco offered a different arrangement of "Somebody to Love," than that heard on two of their albums, "Surrealist Pillow" and "Bless Its Pointed Little Head," and was not enjoyed by the author of this review.

One member of the audience was heard to say that "if it wasn't for the pictures on the screen, I'd be asleep." It seemed that this was the reaction of other persons also, when many began walking out before the show had concluded. Individually, the musicians were very accomplished, especially the bass guitarist, drummer, and lead singer, Grace Slick, but great individual musical talent does not necessarily make for a good group of musicians. The show lasted until about midnight, the longest time of any Contemporary Trends Concert this summer.

On Aug. 19 at 8 p.m., the Berkshire Festival will feature Tanglewood on Parade, involving all departments of the Berkshire Music Center and climaxed by an evening concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, traditionally closing with a brilliant display of fireworks.

B. B. King

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 15 1969

Inadequate Review

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I was very disappointed in your Aug. 13 review of the Fillmore concert at Tanglewood. Your reviewer, Pat Francis, does not seem to have a basic knowledge of rock music, and therefore should not be called upon to judge the musical portion of a performance. Indeed, Miss Francis never forms any musical judgment at all. Rather, she reports audience reaction, which in no way constitutes a review, but a continuation of your news story.

Calling the Who "a disappointment" is simply wrong. Their performance was an exciting combination of music, energy and showmanship, and those of the audience "familiar with the group's earlier music" know them to be the epitome of hard rock, the masters of that idiom.

Your choice of a critic, in my opinion, was irresponsible journalism. I am not arguing with Miss Francis's opinions; liking or disliking a style of music is merely a matter of taste, as long as there is a knowledge of that music. When the New York Times started to review rock performances, they made use of critics who had a background in, and a feeling for, the music. I can only hope you will do the same in the future.

(Mrs.) ALICE C. EDMUNDS.
Jug End Road,
Great Barrington.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

AUG 15 1969

Rock Draws Record Crowd Of 22,000 to Tanglewood

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 13—Attendance records were shattered at Tanglewood last night when a rock concert drew an audience of 22,000 people. The program featured B. B. King, the blues singer, the Who, an English rock group, and the Jefferson Airplane with the Joshua Light Show.

This was the fifth and last rock concert offered here this summer in a Tuesday-night series entitled "Contemporary Trends." Official records show that attendances in the range of 16,000 have been reached by some events in the past. Average attendance for the Boston Symphony's regular summer concerts here now runs to about 8,000.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

SEP 1969

Tanglewood (Lenox, Massachusetts) the summer home of the Boston Symphony, had great success with its series of Tuesday evening concerts featuring "names" from rock, jazz, folk and gospel music. Billed as Contemporary Trends Concerts, the presentations included such artists as Mahalia Jackson, Janis Joplin, the Iron Butterfly, the Staple Singers, Joni Mitchell, Tim Hardin, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, Ornette Coleman, the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Jazz Orchestra, the Jefferson Airplane, The Who, B. B. King, the Johsua Light Show and Christopher Tree.

from Village Voice on Aug. 7, '69

5. Bill Graham, the sinewy impresario who shook the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tanglewood season with performers from his two rock concert halls, the Fillmores, East and West: The Who. B. B. King, The Jefferson Airplane, The Joshua Light Show. A man of potent anger, objective calm, Graham has opaque pale-brown eyes that see challenges clearly, a vast sensual mouth that seldom shuts up. A San Francisco rock singer said, "You always see Bill Graham with a broom in his hand; he's a real proprietor."

6. Charles Gordone, a playwright who uses ethnic in-jokes, stock characters, and hilarious stage business as Muzak to lull smiling audiences while he drills close to the nerve in his moralistic Black uncomedy, No Place To Be Somebody. Gordone is a flamboyant, limber body—partly Irish, French, Negro, and Indian—who plays himself, offstage, with great skill. Wary, snatching laughter out of grim life, he puts racial struggles in perspective: "All the links in the chain are not the same size."

VOGUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
BI-MONTHLY 442,000

AUG 15 1969

ON THESE PAGES, PHOTOGRAPHS BY: JACK ROBINSON; THOM LAFFERTY; JULIAN LLOYD; O. VERNON MATISSE; HARRY BENSON

Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 284,218 SUN. 429,830

AUG 15 1969

Tanglewood Tale '69

Move on, Mozart! Bug off, Beethoven! Rock has prevaded another hallowed musical shrine.

This time it's the Berkshire Musical Festival at Tanglewood. In the forest glen where Hawthorne set down his "Tanglewood Tales," the Boston Symphony Orchestra traditionally renders the classics. For a breather this week, the festival yielded to the driving beat of Jefferson Airplane, the Joshua Light Show from East Village, Who from London and a blues singer eclectically named B. B. King.

So what? Just that 22,000 patrons squeezed their way in. And that's the most that ever came to Tanglewood on a summer's evening.

152

Tanglewood Concert Series Ends; B. B. King Among Best Summer Performers

The final program in Tanglewood's series of five Contemporary Trends Concerts rates the marked distinction of being the best organized, best attended and longest of all the Tuesday night offerings. The last was not, however, the series' plum.

The Trends concerts have rainbowed a full musical spectrum, from folk to jazz and rock to gospel. Outstanding performances were turned in by Janis Joplin, Iron Butterfly, Joni Mitchell and the Thad-Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra. Other memorable sessions were provided by Orpheus, Tim Hardin, the Staple Singers, Mahalia Jackson, the Butterfield Blues Band and Ornette Coleman.

Predominantly young audiences, a bit of a show in themselves, have patronized the series, and last Tuesday's record crowd was no exception. Bell bottomed and bespecled, the under 30 set populated the 6,000 seat Music Shed and sprawled over its grassy front carpet to hear B. B. King, the Jefferson Airplane, and The Who. The Joshua Light Show was another featured attraction.

B. B. King was definitely the star of Tuesday night's show. Supported by a five piece band, including an accomplished bass guitarist, a professionally fast drummer, and a well-timed three-piece brass section, King showed how "the King of the Blues" entertains 22,000 persons. The 43-year-old Mississippi-born son of a preacher was known as the Beale Street Blues Boy on Memphis radio. Later, he became known simply as "B.B.".

King, dressed in grey double-breasted suit, came back for two encores amidst the thunderous applause and cries of "we want more." The most enjoyable number played was his answer to "Why I sing the Blues." He bowed slightly with his hands cupped at his chest, and left with his famous guitar named "Lucille."

Tuesday's show was presented and organized by Bill Graham, founder of New York's eighteen month-old Fillmore East. During all performances, background effects and between-acts entertainment was provided by the Joshua Light Show, resident artists at Fillmore East since its beginning. The Light Show can be currently seen in John Schlesinger's film, "Midnight Cowboy." The light show was varied from rythmic movement in a slow-boat song to a psychedelic attack. During the two short intermissions, jokelines, pictures of such greats as W.C. Fields and Doris Day, and the concluding act of the movie King Kong was flashed on the stage-length screen, located behind the band area on the stage.

A pre-concert show was given by "Spontaneous Sound" who offered spontaneous compositions using gongs, tympani, cymbals, bells, chimes, flutes, reeds and a Tibetan Temple horn.

The second performers, The Who, gave an appreciably exciting exhibition of their popular tunes and styles. Despite equipment troubles at the start, their professional interpretation of "Pinball Wizard" and their knowledge of "how to turn a crowd on," saved them. They became progressively better as the concert went on, especially during one long sequence of songs, with the lead singer, garbed in a tassled cowboy shirt, swinging his microphone dangerously near the rest of the instruments, and with the best performance given by the lead guitarist, Peter Townshend.

Though the crowd demanded for "More," The Who left with a "Thanks and see you next time," instead of an encore.

Tim Hardin — Joni Mitchell

The Jefferson Airplane gave the most dissapointing performance with the only real entertainment during their hit, "White Rabbit." The six member group from San Francisco offered a different arrangement of "Somebody to Love," than that heard on two of their albums, "Surrealist Pillow" and "Bless Its Pointed Little Head," and was not enjoyed by the author of this review.

One member of the audience was heard to say that "if it wasn't for the pictures on the screen, I'd be asleep." It seemed that this was the reaction of other persons also, when many began walking out before the show had concluded. Individually, the musicians were very accomplished, especially the bass guitarist, drummer, and lead singer, Grace Slick, but great individual musical talent does not necessarily make for a good group of musicians. The show lasted until about midnight, the longest time of any Contemporary Trends Concert this summer.

On Aug. 19 at 8 p.m., the Berkshire Festival will feature "Tanglewood on Parade, involving all departments of the Berkshire Music Center and climaxed by an evening concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, traditionally closing with a brilliant display of fireworks.

B. B. King

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

AUG 14 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 15 1969

Inadequate Review

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I was very disappointed in your Aug. 13 review of the Fillmore concert at Tanglewood. Your reviewer, Pat Francis, does not seem to have a basic knowledge of rock music, and therefore should not be called upon to judge the musical portion of a performance. Indeed, Miss Francis never forms any musical judgment at all. Rather, she reports audience reaction, which in no way constitutes a review, but a continuation of your news story.

Calling the Who "a disappointment" is simply wrong. Their performance was an exciting combination of music, energy and showmanship, and those of the audience "familiar with the group's earlier music" know them to be the epitome of hard rock, the masters of that idiom.

Your choice of a critic, in my opinion, was irresponsible journalism. I am not arguing with Miss Francis's opinions; liking or disliking a style of music is merely a matter of taste, as long as there is a knowledge of that music. When the New York Times started to review rock performances, they made use of critics who had a background in, and a feeling for, the music. I can only hope you will do the same in the future.

(Mrs.) ALICE C. EDMUNDS.
Jug End Road,
Great Barrington.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

AUG 15 1969

Rock Draws Record Crowd Of 22,000 to Tanglewood

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 13—Attendance records were shattered at Tanglewood last night when a rock concert drew an audience of 22,000 people. The program featured B. B. King, the blues singer, the Who, an English rock group, and the Jefferson Airplane with the Joshua Light Show.

This was the fifth and last rock concert offered here this summer in a Tuesday-night series entitled "Contemporary Trends." Official records show that attendances in the range of 16,000 have been reached by some events in the past. Average attendance for the Boston Symphony's regular summer concerts here now runs to about 8,000.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

SEP 1969

Tanglewood (Lenox, Massachusetts) the summer home of the Boston Symphony, had great success with its series of Tuesday evening concerts featuring "names" from rock, jazz, folk and gospel music. Billed as Contemporary Trends Concerts, the presentations included such artists as Mahalia Jackson, Janis Joplin, the Iron Butterfly, the Staple Singers, Joni Mitchell, Tim Hardin, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, Ornette Coleman, the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Jazz Orchestra, the Jefferson Airplane, The Who, B. B. King, the Johsua Light Show and Christopher Tree.

from Village Voice on Aug. 7, '69

5. Bill Graham, the sinewy impresario who shook the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tanglewood season with performers from his two rock concert halls, the Fillmores, East and West: The Who, B. B. King, The Jefferson Airplane, The Joshua Light Show. A man of potent anger, objective calm, Graham has opaque pale-brown eyes that see challenges clearly, a vast sensual mouth that seldom shuts up. A San Francisco rock singer said, "You always see Bill Graham with a broom in his hand; he's a real proprietor."

6. Charles Gordone, a playwright who uses ethnic in-jokes, stock characters, and hilarious stage business as Muzak to lull smiling audiences while he drills close to the nerve in his moralistic Black uncomedy, No Place To Be Somebody. Gordone is a flamboyant, limber body—partly Irish, French, Negro, and Indian—who plays himself, offstage, with great skill. Wary, snatching laughter out of grim life, he puts racial struggles in perspective: "All the links in the chain are not the same size."

ON THESE PAGES, PHOTOGRAPHS BY: JACK ROBINSON; THOM LAFFERTY; JULIAN LLOYD; O. VERNON MATISSE; HARRY BENSON

VOGUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
BI-MONTHLY 442,000

AUG 15 1969

Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 284,218 SUN. 429,830

AUG 15 1969

Tanglewood Tale '69

Move on, Mozart! Bug off, Beethoven! Rock has prevaded another hallowed musical shrine.

This time it's the Berkshire Musical Festival at Tanglewood. In the forest glen where Hawthorne set down his "Tanglewood Tales," the Boston Symphony Orchestra traditionally renders the classics. For a breather this week, the festival yielded to the driving beat of Jefferson Airplane, the Joshua Light Show from East Village, Who from London and a blues singer eclectically named B. B. King.

So what? Just that 22,000 patrons squeezed their way in. And that's the most that ever came to Tanglewood on a summer's evening.

152

Tanglewood Concert Series Ends; B. B. King Among Best Summer Performers

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

AUG 14 1969

The final program in Tanglewood's series of five Contemporary Trends Concerts rates the marked distinction of being the best organized, best attended and longest of all the Tuesday night offerings. The last was not, however, the series' plum.

The Trends concerts have rainbowed a full musical spectrum, from folk to jazz and rock to gospel. Outstanding performances were turned in by Janis Joplin, Iron Butterfly, Joni Mitchell and the Thad-Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra. Other memorable sessions were provided by Orpheus, Tim Hardin, the Staple Singers, Mahalia Jackson, the Butterfield Blues Band and Ornette Coleman.

Predominantly young audiences, a bit of a show in themselves, have patronized the series, and last Tuesday's record crowd was no exception. Bell bottomed and bespecled, the under 30 set populated the 6,000 seat Music Shed and sprawled over its grassy front carpet to hear B. B. King, the Jefferson Airplane, and The Who. The Joshua Light Show was another featured attraction.

B. B. King was definitely the star of Tuesday night's show. Supported by a five piece band, including an accomplished bass guitarist, a professionally fast drummer, and a well-timed three-piece brass section, King showed how "the King of the Blues" entertains 22,000 persons. The 43-year-old Mississippi-born son of a preacher was known as the Beale Street Blues Boy on Memphis radio. Later, he became known simply as "B.B.".

King, dressed in grey double-breasted suit, came back for two encores amidst the thunderous applause and cries of "we want more." The most enjoyable number played was his answer to "Why I sing the Blues." He bowed slightly with his hands cupped at his chest, and left with his famous guitar named "Lucille."

Tuesday's show was presented and organized by Bill Graham, founder of New York's eighteen month-old Fillmore East. During all performances, background effects and between-acts entertainment was provided by the Joshua Light Show, resident artists at Fillmore East since its beginning. The Light Show can be currently seen in John Schlesinger's film, "Midnight Cowboy." The light show was varied from rythmic movement in a slow-boat song to a psychedelic attack. During the two short intermissions, jokelines, pictures of such greats as W.C. Fields and Doris Day, and the concluding act of the movie King Kong was flashed on the stage-length screen, located behind the band area on the stage.

A pre-concert show was given by "Spontaneous Sound" who offered spontaneous compositions using gongs, tympani, cymbals, bells, chimes, flutes, reeds and a Tibetan Temple horn.

The second performers, The Who, gave an appreciably exciting exhibition of their popular tunes and styles. Despite equipment troubles at the start, their professional interpretation of "Pinball Wizard" and their knowledge of "how to turn a crowd on," saved them. They became progressively better as the concert went on, especially during one long sequence of songs, with the lead singer, garbed in a tassled cowboy shirt, swinging his microphone dangerously near the rest of the instruments, and with the best performance given by the lead guitarist, Peter Townshend.

Though the crowd demanded for "More," The Who left with a "Thanks and see you next time," instead of an encore.

Tim Hardin — Joni Mitchell

The Jefferson Airplane gave the most dissapointing performance with the only real entertainment during their hit, "White Rabbit." The six member group from San Francisco offered a different arrangement of "Somebody to Love," than that heard on two of their albums, "Surrealist Pillow" and "Bless Its Pointed Little Head," and was not enjoyed by the author of this review.

One member of the audience was heard to say that "if it wasn't for the pictures on the screen, I'd be asleep." It seemed that this was the reaction of other persons also, when many began walking out before the show had concluded. Individually, the musicians were very accomplished, especially the bass guitarist, drummer, and lead singer, Grace Slick, but great individual musical talent does not necessarily make for a good group of musicians. The show lasted until about midnight, the longest time of any Contemporary Trends Concert this summer.

On Aug. 19 at 8 p.m., the Berkshire Festival will feature Tanglewood on Parade, involving all departments of the Berkshire Music Center and climaxed by an evening concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, traditionally closing with a brilliant display of fireworks.

B. B. King

Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 284,218 SUN. 429,830

AUG 15 1969

Tanglewood Tale '69

Move on, Mozart! Bug off, Beethoven! Rock has prevaded another hallowed musical shrine.

This time it's the Berkshire Musical Festival at Tanglewood. In the forest glen where Hawthorne set down his "Tanglewood Tales," the Boston Symphony Orchestra traditionally renders the classics. For a breather this week, the festival yielded to the driving beat of Jefferson Airplane, the Joshua Light Show from East Village, Who from London and a blues singer eclectically named B. B. King.

So what? Just that 22,000 patrons squeezed their way in. And that's the most that ever came to Tanglewood on a summer's evening.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 15 1969

Inadequate Review

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I was very disappointed in your Aug. 13 review of the Fillmore concert at Tanglewood. Your reviewer, Pat Francis, does not seem to have a basic knowledge of rock music, and therefore should not be called upon to judge the musical portion of a performance. Indeed, Miss Francis never forms any musical judgment at all. Rather, she reports audience reaction, which in no way constitutes a review, but a continuation of your news story.

Calling the Who "a disappointment" is simply wrong. Their performance was an exciting combination of music, energy and showmanship, and those of the audience "familiar with the group's earlier music" know them to be the epitome of hard rock, the masters of that idiom.

Your choice of a critic, in my opinion, was irresponsible journalism. I am not arguing with Miss Francis's opinions; liking or disliking a style of music is merely a matter of taste, as long as there is a knowledge of that music. When the New York Times started to review rock performances, they made use of critics who had a background in, and a feeling for, the music. I can only hope you will do the same in the future.

(Mrs.) ALICE C. EDMUNDS.
Jug End Road,
Great Barrington.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

AUG 15 1969

Rock Draws Record Crowd Of 22,000 to Tanglewood

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 13—Attendance records were shattered at Tanglewood last night when a rock concert drew an audience of 22,000 people. The program featured B. B. King, the blues singer, the Who, an English rock group, and the Jefferson Airplane with the Joshua Light Show.

This was the fifth and last rock concert offered here this summer in a Tuesday-night series entitled "Contemporary Trends." Official records show that attendances in the range of 16,000 have been reached by some events in the past. Average attendance for the Boston Symphony's regular summer concerts here now runs to about 8,000.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

SEP 1969

Tanglewood (Lenox, Massachusetts) the summer home of the Boston Symphony, had great success with its series of Tuesday evening concerts featuring "names" from rock, jazz, folk and gospel music. Billed as Contemporary Trends Concerts, the presentations included such artists as Mahalia Jackson, Janis Joplin, the Iron Butterfly, the Staple Singers, Joni Mitchell, Tim Hardin, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, Ornette Coleman, the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Jazz Orchestra, the Jefferson Airplane, The Who, B. B. King, the Johsua Light Show and Christopher Tree.

from Village Voice on Aug. 7, '69

5. Bill Graham, the sinewy impresario who shook the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tanglewood season with performers from his two rock concert halls, the Fillmores, East and West: The Who, B. B. King, The Jefferson Airplane, The Joshua Light Show. A man of potent anger, objective calm, Graham has opaque pale-brown eyes that see challenges clearly, a vast sensual mouth that seldom shuts up. A San Francisco rock singer said, "You always see Bill Graham with a broom in his hand; he's a real proprietor."

VOGUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
BI-MONTHLY 442,000

AUG 15 1969

6. Charles Gordone, a playwright who uses ethnic in-jokes, stock characters, and hilarious stage business as Muzak to lull smiling audiences while he drills close to the nerve in his moralistic Black uncomedy, No Place To Be Somebody. Gordone is a flamboyant, limber body—partly Irish, French, Negro, and Indian—who plays himself, offstage, with great skill. Wary, snatching laughter out of grim life, he puts racial struggles in perspective: "All the links in the chain are not the same size."

ON THESE PAGES, PHOTOGRAPHS BY: JACK ROBINSON; THOM LAFFERTY; JULIAN LLOYD; O. VERNON MATISSE; HARRY BENSON

153

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 18 1969

Notes and Footnotes

SMOKE SIGNALS: Speaking of mixed-up kids, here's a report on one from Harry Kraut, associate manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After last week's rock concert and bash at Tanglewood, he was driving south on Route 183 at 1:30 a.m. when he encountered a lad who looked like a rock fan, hitch-hiking almost at Larrywaug four corners. Harry gave him a lift, and learned the lad had lost his ride back to Pittsfield, and thought he was headed in the right direction, of all things. He'd never been to Tanglewood before, wasn't sure where it was, and had started walking south instead of north. Asked if he would come to Tanglewood again, he said yes, if they had rock bands like those he'd just heard. Incidentally, he said he was a PHS graduate. Hope Tanglewood doesn't wind up with such a disaster as happened at Bethel, N.Y., when 300,000 rock-maniacs swarmed all over the countryside . . . Just discovered in the Encyclopaedia Britannica that the first canal in the nation was built at South Hadley in 1792. Eventually it was followed by some 4,500 miles of canals, mostly in New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania. But 1911 railroad [illegible] caused [illegible]

Teen Beat

Tanglewood Rock Show Scores Big With Audience

By RUSS WINER

. . . Perhaps the biggest and most important rock show to ever take place in Western Massachusetts stunned and amazed the huge throng that turned out at Tanglewood in Lenox Tuesday night. The show featured, in order, famous bluesman B. B. King, the Who from England, and the fathers of the San Franciscan sound, the Jefferson Airplane.

Since it was reported that 15,000 attended for the Association last summer, the crowd Tuesday had to exceed that because I attended both, and there were many more people on the lawn for the more recent show. It was sponsored by the Fillmore East and West's owner, Bill Graham. The show was run exactly like the Fillmore, and included the Joshua Light Show. Of course, everything was run like clockwork, in the Fillmore tradition.

Beginning sharply at 8, B. B. King was introduced by Graham, and his name was flashed on the huge Light Show screen. B. B. proceeded to take the audience and wind it around his finger. His unique style of singing and guitar picking has been copied many times over by so-called white bluesmen. B. B.'s band had a trumpet, two saxes, bass, drums and Lucille, the name of his guitar. It is a shiny red, and he can really make it whine—often with only one hand. He came back for an encore, and everyone thoroughly enjoyed his show.

Strong Finish

What turned out to be the highlight of the evening followed B.B. The Who came thundering on with lead singer Roger Daltrey throwing his microphone around, and lead guitarist Pete Townshed grinding his guitar. Keith Moon, the drummer, put on a great show pounding his skins and twirling the sticks, and bass player John Entwhistle complemented everyone. They did some of their old stuff like "Can't Explain," and "My Generation," and much of their rock-opera double-album "Tommy." Their singles "I'm Free" and "Pinball Wizard" were performed among the "Tommy" cuts.

The Who started off a little slowly, but built it up until the end when they went wild with Townshend throwing his guitar up in the air and catching it. They left with everyone screaming for more, but the strict time schedule wouldn't oblige.

Following a tough act to come after, the Airplane were also a little slow at first. They seemed boring for a while, and they should have been placed second behind B.B. Starting with "White Rabbit," the Airplane put on a good show with "Somebody to Love," and Donovan's "Fat Angel." Warming up to their job, they finished with a wild instrumental, that left the crowd calling for an encore. Gracie Slick and all the others obliged with "3-5 of a Mile in 10 Seconds," a cut off their "Surrealistic Pillow" LP. My only complaint with them is that Grace didn't sing in enough songs. The Airplane were very tight while they performed, but took a little while between songs. I'm sure that the show will return next year, because the crowd just couldn't ask for a better one.

. . . Featured in tonight's discotheque at the Mountain Park Ballroom, Holyoke, are area artists, the Rave. Also featured is a space age light show . . . I heard another version of "Folk Salad Annis" but it's not as good as Jo Jo White's . . . The Illusion seem to have started off on the right foot with a number one single and a hit album . . . "Blind Faith" is selling well.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 19 1969

Hard-Seat Rock

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I'm writing in response to Robert Butterworth whose letter about Tanglewood appeared Aug. 14. I wouldn't know about what happened on the lawn Tuesday night because my boyfriend and I were sitting in the Shed.

When we heard about Tanglewood's program featuring The Who, the Jefferson Airplane, and B. B. King, we saved the money and bought our tickets for the Shed to be sure that we saw the best of the show. If Mr. Butterworth was so upset about what was going on out on the lawn, why is he knocking the people who were in the Shed?

I wonder how many of the people at Tanglewood Mr. Butterworth knew personally for him to be qualified to say what those people can afford to pay for their clothes It's obvious he wasn't sitting in the Shed because the seats were far from comfortable for four hours.

JOANNE WOITKOWSKI.
75 Caroline St.,
Pittsfield.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 20 1969

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

AUG 23 1969

Who, B. B. King, Airplane Soar

LENOX, Mass.—Bill Graham unloaded his heavy artillery at Berkshire Music Festival on Aug. 12 and the big guns: the Who, Jefferson Airplane and B. B. King, responded with exciting performances before more than 23,000 spectators, easily the largest turnout for Tanglewood's new Contemporary Trends series of concerts.

The Who provided the evening's high spot with heavy emphasis on material from their current gold record album on Decca: Peter Townshend's two-LP rock opera "Tommy." The excerpts whetted the appetite for the British quartet's unprecedented six-night stand at New York Fillmore East beginning on Sept. 29, when "Tommy" will be given complete each night.

Actually, the Who built excitement as they got into the "Tommy" selections. By the time they reached the single "Pinball Wizard," they were devastating in effect. Townshend's guitar playing, as usual, was topnotch and joined with Roger Daltry in the effective lyrics. Keith Moon, one of the finest pop drummers around, although he gets no solos, was his steady self as was bass guitarist John Entwhistle.

As a bonus for the appreciative audience, the Who closed with two hard rock numbers from their old repertoire: "Summertime Blues" and their first big hit, "My Generation." Their version of the latter with Daltry's strong vocals and Townshend's playing and leaping has justifiably become a rock classic.

The Who followed King, the most popular bluesman around with today's younger audiences. And, the veteran performer didn't disappoint. His first two numbers set the tone as he started with his usual uptempo opener: "Every Day I Have the Blues," followed by "How Blue Can You Get," a slower blues also long associated with the BluesWay artist.

King not only has one of the best of blues voices, but his interpretations really hit home. And, no one else can play those guitar riffs like King, playing his guitar "Lucille." He was capably backed by his usual group, Sonny Freeman and the Unusuals.

Jefferson Airplane hit some high peaks during their long closing set, although much of their material was familiar in content and performance. Unlike the Grateful Dead, another pioneer of the San Francisco sound, the Airplane apparently has found little reason to change with the times.

The RCA sextet opened with one of their biggest numbers: "White Rabbit." As soon as Grace Slick began the vocals, it was apparent that her voice, one of the most distinctive around, still is powerful and magnetic. Possibly the best of the new material was "Revolution," which had Miss Slick and Marty Balin, the group's other fine lead singer, singing with and opposite each other. They also came over effectively in "Together."

Guitarist Paul Kantner also had ample opportunity to display his voice, while lead guitarist Jorma Kaukonen, a first-rate musician, also had a shot at vocal lead. The Airplane's well-known rhythms were bolstered by drummer Spencer Dryden and bass and opposite each other. They also came over effectively in "Together."

Guitarist Paul Kantner also had ample opportunity to display his voice, while lead guitarist Jorma Kaukonen, a first-rate musician, also had a shot at vocal lead. The Airplane's well-known rhythms were bolstered by drummer Spencer Dryden and bass guitarist Jack Casady.

Balin, whose voice went well with Miss Slick's, had his strongest solo in "Plastic Fantastic Lover." The two vocalist belted out the hit "Somebody to Love." The long evening ended with an extended version of "3/5's of a Mile in 10 Seconds."

Graham, operator of Fillmore East, and San Francisco's Fillmore West, was introduced to the overflow throng by composer Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at Tanglewood. Before the concert some of the audience was entertained on lawn by Christopher Tree's Spontaneous Sound, an unusual program using gongs, tympani, cymbals, bells, chimes, flutes, reeds, and a Tibetan temple horn. FRED KIRBY

LENOX PERFORMER

On Tuesday of last week Jorma Kaukanen, lead guitarist with the Jefferson Airplane group playing at Tanglewood in Leonx entertained several of his local relatives. Guests for the evening performance were Vieno Leone, Anita Macia, Karen and Sharon Sainio, John Wilander and Paul Wilander, who held a family reunion backstage following the show. Mr. Kaukanen is a graduate of Santa Barbara College and resides in California.

NEWS-ADVERTISER
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,000

AUG 20 1969

By ADAH K. JENKINS

Twenty-three thousand filled The Shed and surrounding grounds at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the Rock Concert of the Contemporary Trend Series in the Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Attending were fifty music critics from newspapers and publications in this country and Canada.

The woods, once sacred only to the classic of the classic, rang to Jefferson Airplane, The Who, with B. B. King and Joshua Light Show.

Three weeks previously the Trends Concerts opened with Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, Thad Jones and Mel Lewis Orchestra.

Included in the series also were an Electronic Music Concert, works by Stravinsky and Schoenberg, played by the Boston Symphony, a contemporary vocal work by Westergaard and music be composers working at Tanglewood.

Truly a fresh wind is blowing in the musical atmosphere. Eric Lewinsdorf, conductor of the Symphony and Berkshire Center states, "to bring contemporary men and music together is a challenge worthy of our effort."

"So-called 'serious music' of our Western European culture represents but a small segment of the total spectrum of contemporary music . . . and we must offer the best creative efforts in Jazz, rock, folk, gospel and various cross currents," declares Gunther Schuller, head of the Festival and president of the New England Conservatory.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

AUG 20 1969

Pop Acts Rock Tanglewood Classical Tradition for Peak Gate & 70G Take

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 19.

The classical tradition of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was rocked last Tuesday (12) when concert promoter Bill Graham presented The Who, Jefferson Airplane, B.B. King and Christopher Tree as the closing summer event for both Tanglewood's contemporary trends series and Graham's Fillmore East, N.Y., sked. Setting an attendance record for the rustic retreat, the concert drew 20,950 buffs for a $70,050 gross.

A smattering of older devotees of the classics attended out of curiosity and watched agape as long-haired throngs in their early teens pushed and shoved to get a better view of the action. Gotham was responsible for a large portion of the crowd, but the bulk comprised local residents.

Despite the pushing, loud applause and cheering, the screaming that typified most rock concerts three years ago was absent. The youngsters were descendants of the Tanglewood listening tradition, and listen they did.

Bill Graham, who founded and runs both the Fillmore East and Fillmore West, San Francisco, gave the local teens a taste of bigtime rock procedures. Top soundman Bill Hanley prepared the voice system so that it cut through the highly amplified instruments and carried throughout Tanglewood's grassy acres. Better sound actually was available to those on the outer lawns than to patrons in the reserved seat section.

Fillmore East's Joshua Light Show projected its colored patterns on a massive screen set up behind the stage. A specially prepared slide superimposed the Tanglewood and Fillmore logos on screen between the sets.

Tree Warms Buffs

Christopher Tree warmed the crowd with a one-man show using his array of Oriental songs and percussive instruments, which were set up on the lawn near the gate. When it was dark enough for light show, the concert continued in the band shell with the electric blues of B.B. King.

Following King, a British quartet, The Who, did a special guest set that roused the crowd. Portions of leader guitarist Peter Townshend's rock opera, "Tommy," were mixed with such hits as "My Generation" while Townshend and singer Roger Daltry gyrated and flailed guitars and microphones.

The Jefferson Airplane followed with a long outing that bored many who were unused to the sextet's live sound. However, after the crowd tapered and those who were interested remained, the Airplane delivered what was considered their best set, with potent dynamics powering extended improvisation and highly inspired singing.

Continued demands for an Airplane encore caused officials to extend the already overdue curfew time for two more numbers. However, when a second encore was not permitted, crowd tension almost erupted into violence until Graham placated the audience with a promise of a similar event next year.

Rock Concert challenges 'serious music' dogma

BALTIMORE, MD.
AFRO-AMERICAN
TW. 33,500

AUG 30 1969

8:30-9:30 (13) NET FESTIVAL. "Jazz at Tanglewood: Judy Collins and Don Ellis." Most of you who are familiar with the famous Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, associate it with performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and/or student concerts and chamber music performances. However, tonight NET offers an hour-long concert that's definitely offbeat for Tanglewood, but not for its awareness of changing musical styles and developments. It's folksinger Judy Collins' turn at the festival, where she appeared in the summer of 1968, accompanied by the Don Ellis Orchestra, singing such songs as "Chelsea Morning," "Suzanne," "Bird," "Hard Loving Loser," and "In My Life." (Color).

NEW YORK DAILY COLUMN
AND KNICKERBOCKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 150,000

OCT 8 1969

153.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 18 1969

Notes and Footnotes

SMOKE SIGNALS: Speaking of mixed-up kids, here's a report on one from Harry Kraut, associate manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After last week's rock concert and bash at Tanglewood, he was driving south on Route 183 at 1:30 a.m. when he encountered a lad who looked like a rock fan, hitch-hiking almost at Larrywaug four corners. Harry gave him a lift, and learned the lad had lost his ride back to Pittsfield, and thought he was headed in the right direction, of all things. He'd never been to Tanglewood before, wasn't sure where it was, and had started walking south instead of north. Asked if he would come to Tanglewood again, he said yes, if they had rock bands like those he'd just heard. Incidentally, he said he was a PHS graduate. Hope Tanglewood doesn't wind up with such a disaster as happened at Bethel, N.Y., when 300,000 rock-maniacs swarmed all over the countryside . . . Just discovered in the Encyclopaedia Britannica that the first canal in the nation was built at South Hadley in 1792. Eventually it was followed by some 4,500 miles of canals, mostly in New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania. but 1911 railroad caused

Teen Beat

Tanglewood Rock Show Scores Big With Audience

By RUSS WINER

. . . Perhaps the biggest and most important rock show to ever take place in Western Massachusetts stunned and amazed the huge throng that turned out at Tanglewood in Lenox Tuesday night. The show featured, in order, famous bluesman B. B. King, the Who from England, and the fathers of the San Franciscan sound, the Jefferson Airplane.

Since it was reported that 15,000 attended for the Association last summer, the crowd Tuesday had to exceed that because I attended both, and there were many more people on the lawn for the more recent show. It was sponsored by the Fillmore East and West's owner, Bill Graham. The show was run exactly like the Fillmore, and included the Joshua Light Show. Of course, everything was run like clock work, in the Fillmore tradition.

Beginning sharply at 8, B. B. King was introduced by Graham, and his name was flashed on the huge Light Show screen. B. B. proceeded to take the audience and wind it around his finger. His unique style of singing and guitar picking has been copied many times over by so-called white bluesmen. B. B.'s band had a trumpet, two saxes, bass, drums and Lucille, the name of his guitar. It is a shiny red, and he can really make it whine—often with only one hand. He came back for an encore, and everyone thoroughly enjoyed his show.

Strong Finish

What turned out to be the highlight of the evening followed B.B. The Who came thundering on with lead singer Roger Daltrey throwing his microphone around, and lead guitarist Pete Townshed grinding his guitar. Keith Moon, the drummer, put on a great show pounding his skins and twirling the sticks, and bass player John Entwhistle complemented everyone. They did some of their old stuff like "Can't Explain," and "My Generation," and much of their rock-opera double-album "Tommy." Their singles "I'm Free" and "Pinball Wizard" were performed among the "Tommy" cuts.

The Who started off a little slowly, but built it up until the end when they went wild with Townshend throwing his guitar up in the air and catching it. They left with everyone screaming for more, but the strict time schedule wouldn't oblige.

Following a tough act to come after, the Airplane were also a little slow at first. They seemed boring for a while, and they should have been placed second behind B.B. Starting with "White Rabbit," the Airplane put on a good show with "Somebody to Love," and Donovan's "Fat Angel." Warming up to their job, they finished with a wild instrumental, that left the crowd calling for an encore. Gracie Slick and all the others obliged with "3-5 of a Mile in 10 Seconds," a cut off their "Surrealistic Pillow" LP. My only complaint with them is that Grace didn't sing in enough songs. The Airplane were very tight while they performed, but took a little while between songs. I'm sure that the show will return next year, because the crowd just couldn't ask for a better one.

. . . Featured in tonight's discotheque at the Mountain Park Ballroom, Holyoke, are area artists, the Rave. Also featured is a space age light show . . . I heard another version of "Folk Salad Annis" but it's not as good as Jo Jo White's . . . The Illusion seem to have started off on the right foot with a number one single and a hit album . . . "Blind Faith" is selling well.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 19 1969

Hard-Seat Rock

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I'm writing in response to Robert Butterworth whose letter about Tanglewood appeared Aug. 14. I wouldn't know about what happened on the lawn Tuesday night because my boyfriend and I were sitting in the Shed.

When we heard about Tanglewood's program featuring The Who, the Jefferson Airplane, and B. B. King, we saved the money and bought our tickets for the Shed to be sure that we saw the best of the show. If Mr. Butterworth was so upset about what was going on out on the lawn, why is he knocking the people who were in the Shed?

I wonder how many of the people at Tanglewood Mr. Butterworth knew personally for him to be qualified to say what those people can afford to pay for their clothes It's obvious he wasn't sitting in the Shed because the seats were far from comfortable for four hours.

JOANNE WOITKOWSKI.
75 Caroline St.,
Pittsfield.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 20 1969

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

AUG 23 1969

Who, B. B. King, Airplane Soar

LENOX, Mass.—Bill Graham unloaded his heavy artillery at Berkshire Music Festival on Aug. 12 and the big guns: the Who, Jefferson Airplane and B. B. King, responded with exciting performances before more than 23,000 spectators, easily the largest turnout for Tanglewood's new Contemporary Trends series of concerts.

The Who provided the evening's high spot with heavy emphasis on material from their current gold record album on Decca: Peter Townshend's two-LP rock opera "Tommy." The excerpts whetted the appetite for the British quartet's unprecedented six-night stand at New York Fillmore East beginning on Sept. 29, when "Tommy" will be given complete each night.

Actually, the Who built excitement as they got into the "Tommy" selections. By the time they reached the single "Pinball Wizard," they were devastating in effect. Townshend's guitar playing, as usual, was topnotch and joined with Roger Daltry in the effective lyrics. Keith Moon, one of the finest pop drummers around, although he gets no solos, was his steady self as was bass guitarist John Entwhistle.

As a bonus for the appreciative audience, the Who closed with two hard rock numbers from their old repertoire: "Summertime Blues" and their first big hit, "My Generation." Their version of the latter with Daltry's strong vocals and Townshend's playing and leaping has justifiably become a rock classic.

The Who followed King, the most popular bluesman around with today's younger audiences. And, the veteran performer didn't disappoint. His first two numbers set the tone as he started with his usual uptempo opener: "Every Day I Have the Blues," followed by "How Blue Can You Get," a slower blues also long associated with the BluesWay artist.

King not only has one of the best of blues voices, but his interpretations really hit home. And, no one else can play those guitar riffs like King, playing his guitar "Lucille." He was capably backed by his usual group, Sonny Freeman and the Unusuals.

Jefferson Airplane hit some high peaks during their long closing set, although much of their material was familiar in content and performance. Unlike the Grateful Dead, another pioneer of the San Francisco sound, the Airplane apparently has found little reason to change with the times.

The RCA sextet opened with one of their biggest numbers: "White Rabbit." As soon as Grace Slick began the vocals, it was apparent that her voice, one of the most distinctive around, still is powerful and magnetic. Possibly the best of the new material was "Revolution," which had Miss Slick and Marty Balin, the group's other fine lead singer, singing with and opposite each other. They also came over effectively in "Together."

Guitarist Paul Kantner also had ample opportunity to display his voice, while lead guitarist Jorma Kaukonen, a first-rate musician, also had a shot at vocal lead. The Airplane's well-known rhythms were bolstered by drummer Spencer Dryden and bass and opposite each other. They also came over effectively in "Together."

Guitarist Paul Kantner also had ample opportunity to display his voice, while lead guitarist Jorma Kaukonen, a first-rate musician, also had a shot at vocal lead. The Airplane's well-known rhythms were bolstered by drummer Spencer Dryden and bass guitarist Jack Casady.

Balin, whose voice went well with Miss Slick's, had his strongest solo in "Plastic Fantastic Lover." The two vocalist belted out the hit "Somebody to Love." The long evening ended with an extended version of "3/5's of a Mile in 10 Seconds."

Graham, operator of Fillmore East, and San Francisco's Fillmore West, was introduced to the overflow throng by composer Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at Tanglewood. Before the concert some of the audience was entertained on lawn by Christopher Tree's Spontaneous Sound, an unusual program using gongs, tympani, cymbals, bells, chimes, flutes, reeds, and a Tibetan temple horn.

FRED KIRBY

LENOX PERFORMER

On Tuesday of last week Jorma Kaukanen, lead guitarist with the Jefferson Airplane group playing at Tanglewood in Leonx entertained several of his local relatives. Guests for the evening performance were Vieno Leone, Anita Macia, Karen and Sharon Sainio, John Wilander and Paul Wilander, who held a family reunion backstage following the show. Mr. Kaukanen is a graduate of Santa Barbara College and resides in California.

NEWS-ADVERTISER
WESTFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,000

AUG 20 1969

Rock Concert challenges 'serious music' dogma

By ADAH K. JENKINS

Twenty-three thousand filled The Shed and surrounding grounds at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the Rock Concert of the Contemporary Trend Series in the Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Attending were fifty music critics from newspapers and publications in this country and Canada.

The woods, once sacred only to the classic of the classic, rang to Jefferson Airplane, The Who, with B. B. King and Joshua Light Show.

Three weeks previously the Trends Concerts opened with Mahalia Jackson, Ornette Coleman, Thad Jones and Mel Lewis Orchestra.

Included in the series also were an Electronic Music Concert, works by Stravinsky and Schoenberg, played by the Boston Symphony, a contemporary vocal work by Westergaard and music be composers working at Tanglewood.

Truly a fresh wind is blowing in the musical atmosphere. Eric Lewinsdorf, conductor of the Symphony and Berkshire Center states, "to bring contemporary men and music together is a challenge worthy of our effort."

"So-called 'serious music' of our Western European culture represents but a small segment of the total spectrum of contemporary music . . . and we must offer the best creative efforts in Jazz, rock, folk, gospel and various cross currents," declares Gunther Schuller, head of the Festival and president of the New England Conservatory.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

AUG 20 1969

Pop Acts Rock Tanglewood Classical Tradition for Peak Gate & 70G Take

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 19.

The classical tradition of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood was rocked last Tuesday (12) when concert promoter Bill Graham presented The Who, Jefferson Airplane, B.B. King and Christopher Tree as the closing summer event for both Tanglewood's contemporary trends series and Graham's Fillmore East, N.Y., sked. Setting an attendance record for the rustic retreat, the concert drew 20,950 buffs for a $70,050 gross.

A smattering of older devotees of the classics attended out of curiosity and watched agape as long-haired throngs in their early teens pushed and shoved to get a better view of the action. Gotham was responsible for a large portion of the crowd, but the bulk comprised local residents.

Despite the pushing, loud applause and cheering, the screaming that typified most rock concerts three years ago was absent. The youngsters were descendants of the Tanglewood listening tradition, and listen they did.

Bill Graham, who founded and runs both the Fillmore East and Fillmore West, San Francisco, gave the local teens a taste of bigtime rock procedures. Top soundman Bill Hanley prepared the voice system so that it cut through the highly amplified instruments and carried throughout Tanglewood's grassy acres. Better sound actually was available to those on the outer lawns than to patrons in the reserved seat section.

Fillmore East's Joshua Light Show projected its colored patterns on a massive screen set up behind the stage. A specially prepared slide superimposed the Tanglewood and Fillmore logos on screen between the sets.

Tree Warms Buffs

Christopher Tree warmed the crowd with a one-man show using his array of Oriental gongs and percussive instruments, which were set up on the lawn near the gate. When it was dark enough for light show, the concert continued in the band shell with the electric blues of B.B. King.

Following King, a British quartet, The Who, did a special guest set that roused the crowd. Portions of leader guitarist Peter Townshend's rock opera, "Tommy," were mixed with such hits as "My Generation" while Townshend and singer Roger Daltry gyrated and flailed guitars and microphones.

The Jefferson Airplane followed with a long outing that bored many who were unused to the sextet's live sound. However, after the crowd tapered and those who were interested remained, the Airplane delivered what was considered their best set, with potent dynamics powering extended improvisation and highly inspired singing.

Continued demands for an Airplane encore caused officials to extend the already overdue curfew time for two more numbers. However, when a second encore was not permitted, crowd tension almost erupted into violence until Graham placated the audience with a promise of a similar event next year.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AFRO-AMERICAN
TW. 33,500

AUG 30 1969

NEW YORK DAILY COLUMN
AND KNICKERBOCKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 150,000

OCT 8 1969

8:30-9:30 (13) NET FESTIVAL. "Jazz at Tanglewood: Judy Collins and Don Ellis." Most of you who are familiar with the famous Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, associate it with performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and/or student concerts and chamber music performances. However, tonight NET offers an hour-long concert that's definitely offbeat for Tanglewood, but not for its awareness of changing musical styles and developments. It's folksinger Judy Collins' turn at the festival, where she appeared in the summer of 1968, accompanied by the Don Ellis Orchestra, singing such songs as "Chelsea Morning," "Suzanne," "Bird," "Hard Loving Loser," and "In My Life." (Color).

154.

SUMMER NEWS ROUNDUP

PART 2

Bethel, N.Y., Wide World

MUD, HUNGER, AND BEAUTY

Rock Festival's "Instant City"

Boston Symphony

THE EVENT

The dying days of summer gave birth to a new life style for many of the young: the rock festival community. It burst upon the scene full-grown at the Woodstock Music and Art Fair held in Bethel, N.Y. [see photo above], and at other rock festivals as far apart as Lewisville, Texas, and the Isle of Wight, off England.

WHAT'S BEHIND IT

The Woodstock festival's organizers expected about 150,000 persons, but almost three times as many showed up. Huge traffic jams forced many participants to walk as far as 10 miles to get to the festival site and prevented others from reaching the festival at all. The 20-acre site at Bethel was a sea of young people squeezed together body to body. And when the rains came the ground turned into a sea of mud.

For the weekend of Aug. 15 farmer Max Yasgur's fields grew into one of the largest cities in the entire U.S. Three persons died, and some 5,000 were treated for injuries, including about 400 bad drug trips. Two babies were born, and four miscarriages reported. Food and water ran short, and toilet facilities broke down.

The youthful community endured it all. Its citizens pitched tens of thousands of tents and makeshift lean-tos. They shared whatever food they had. Many adults in nearby towns helped by organizing clinics and distributing sandwiches.

Most adults at Bethel had only praise for the behavior of the young. The festival's chief medical officer said: "There has been no violence whatsoever, which is remarkable for a crowd this size. These people are really beautiful." A local police chief agreed, calling participants "the most courteous, considerate, and well-behaved group of kids" he had ever seen.

The use of drugs, especially marijuana, was so widespread that police generally ignored it. They made only about 100 arrests, mostly for selling drugs. Some townspeople were appalled at this lack of law enforcement. "I saw dope being sold right on the corner," a Bethel storeowner said. "It was awful for children to be exposed to this." Others replied that peaceful drug users were better than rowdy beer drinkers.

The over-30 generation at home seemed to view Woodstock with decidedly mixed feelings. The editorial pages of the New York Times, for instance, called the festival "a nightmare of mud and stagnation" one day, and "a phenomenon of innocence" the next. A Time magazine essay said: "It may well rank as one of the significant political and sociological events of the age." Reporter Bruce Cook of the National Observer saw Woodstock as a historic occasion "but one in the nature of a mass dropout, a new game for those with time and money to play it."

Woodstock, whatever it was, may return next summer. Although they reportedly lost more than $1 million, the festival's organizers talked about plans for an even bigger happening. However, farmer Yasgur, a new folk hero for many of the young, said: "As far as I know, I'm going back to running a dairy farm."

Woodstock was unique, but it did not stand alone. The rock festival at the Isle of Wight drew 200,000 young people. Its main attraction, Bob Dylan, famous for his whining sound of protest, sang a more buoyant, peaceful song. Lewisville, Texas, drew 40,000, a large crowd by pre-1969 standards.

The young at all the rock festivals felt a strong sense of community. Janis Joplin, one of the dozens of performers at Woodstock, summed it up this way: "There's lots and lots and lots of us, more than anybody ever thought before. We used to think of ourselves as little clumps of weirdos. But now we're a whole new minority group."

ON-THE-SPOT REPORT: Bethel—The Morning After

BY ERIC BERGER
Editor-in-Chief, Scholastic Magazines

The hillside slope at Bethel was a sea of mud, stinking garbage, and bonfires. Some of the fires were wood fires that had been kindled for warmth during the night. Other fires were piles of smouldering refuse. Everywhere kids were at work cleaning up the garbage that littered not only the hillside, but also every road and ditch and lawn in all directions for miles. Some used rakes, others clawed the garbage into huge paper bags with their bare hands. These kids were not being paid. Their labor was voluntary.

Behavior among the kids was extraordinary. From conversation with them I felt that I was undergoing a religious experience. And this was not because the name Bethel means "House of God." Behavior of the police, too, was extraordinary. Could be the police were simply reacting. I saw police cars that were stuck in the mud along the roads being heaved back onto the concrete by teams of kids. Along all the roads police responded to peace greetings. Said one kid: "This is what the provos [Dutch hippies] have said, 'The police should be there to provide maps for the lost, and food for the hungry.' "

News reports on radio and TV made much of the assertion that there had been no acts of violence. In fact, there were—but they were few and went unreported. When some of the concessionaries began to charge a buck for a sandwich and two bits for a glass of water, a group of black youths burned them out. The group was taken aside and indoctrinated by the kids. One does not coerce by violence, was the lesson.

Grass, hash, and acid could be had everywhere. I was reminded of parties in the '20's that were incomplete without bootleg gin and retching kids. This is not an attempt to condone the prevalence and use of drugs at the scene, simply an observation about a problem that certainly deserves intense sociological study. The generation of the '20's was "lost," however. The kids at Bethel were possessed of something that thrilled the heart—although they had come to worship at the feet of Rock gods made mighty by the missionaries of the recording industry. Here was the generation that would vote tomorrow, and everywhere at his elbow one touched a spirit of brotherhood and peace.

One brother from the Hog Farm told me that the crowd at Bethel constituted the fourth largest city in New York State. Another estimate made it the tenth largest in the nation. Yet here is the extraordinary fact—a fact that possibly overrides the drugs, the nakedness, the flouting of the Establishment: in this metropolis, made up of tired, muddy, famished, and sleep-hungry citizens, the kid at your elbow was your brother. You cared for him, as he cared for you, and you recognized him with a peace sign.

MEANWHILE, BACK AT THE ESTABLISHMENT . . .

. . . the nation's oldest music festival at Tanglewood, Mass., also broke records. The largest single-night audience in Tanglewood history—21,500—turned out for a "contemporary trends" concert featuring such rock performers as the Jefferson Airplane and the Who. And Erich Leinsdorf's last concert with the Boston Symphony tallied the highest box office take" ever for a symphony concert at Tanglewood—and reportedly in the whole U.S.

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD WEEK EDITION
W. 231,000

SEP 22 1969

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000

SEP 19 1969

Tanglewood

MUSIC

IMPRESARIOS

The Capitalist of Rock

Bill Graham is a solid, no-nonsense name for a dynamic businessman who in the past four years has made himself a millionaire, acquired a Mercedes, a 29-year-old wife, a baby boy, and offices in both San Francisco and Manhattan. Wolfgang Grajonca, on the other hand, seems a more appropriate title for a temperamental typhoon of promotional creativity, whose obscenity-flavored conversation often builds to a scream, whose business conferences are likely to explode into happenings, and whose office costume usually consists of dirty corduroys and a short-sleeved sweatshirt. That both Bill and Wolfgang inhabit the same skin is one of the more important facts of life on the popular-music scene today. For Graham, né Grajonca, is, at age 38, the No. 1 producer and promoter of the Now Sound —which emanates from his two culture centers, the Fillmore West on San Francisco's Market Street and the Fillmore East on Manhattan's Second Avenue. He also runs a record company (called Fillmore) and a booking agency (called Millard, naturally).

In a world where indolence, inefficiency and fiscal fecklessness are the rule, Graham is a nonpareil. He has grown rich by knowing what is good, and hiring the best talent he can get. He provides his performers with the best equipment and facilities, and expects them to be good. If they are not —even though most of the audience may not know the difference—Graham simply stops booking them, regardless of how well they draw. The result is that Graham's two Fillmores are the places where the top talent wants to be heard—and the rock world grudgingly knows that it needs him.

I'm Not Yelling! The telephone is his fortress, his launching pad, his shepherd's crook. TIME Correspondent Stanley Cloud sat in Graham's San Francisco office one recent morning while Impresario Graham stabbed at the multiple buttons that were perpetually lighting up with incoming calls. "WHAT DID YOU SAY?" he yells, his craggy face contorted, his back hunched. "They want to borrow another $12,000 for musical equipment! Did we supply them with one set already? Yes! Did they insure like I told them to? No! Did they get it stolen? Yes! They've gotta be crazy. You've gotta be crazy! Absolutely not! I'm not yelling, goddammit. I want nothing to do with those psychedelic parasites."

Without hanging up, he punches another button and listens: an associate wants instructions on whether to bid on an auditorium to replace the Fillmore West, which will be torn down next year to make way for a new Howard Johnson motel. "Yeah—put in a bid. Go low at first and see what they come back with. I want that place if we can get it."

Well he might. Each of his Fillmores is worth $3,000-$5,000 net profit to him on a good weekend—a fact that stirs articulate contempt from the unworldly dreamers of the rock scene. "Moneygrubber" is one of the milder epithets they lay on Bill Graham.

Critics, though, tend to forget the many benefits he has staged for various causes, ranging from the People's Park Bail Fund to the Episcopal Church. He has also made numerous interest-free loans to musicians and he gives intense loyalty to those who work for him. "If I have an act I think is good but that hasn't made it yet," he says, "I put it on a bill with the Who or the Jefferson Airplane.

ANNE BIESANZ

GRAHAM (CENTER) AT THE FAMILY DOG, WAITING TO ADDRESS A STRIKE MEETING
Moneygrubber is one of the milder epithets.

This approach to my business has gotten me a good reputation nationwide, but here in San Francisco the kids say: 'We love the music and we love the Fillmore, but we hate Graham because he's a f—ing capitalist.' "

Beautiful Evening. Capitalist Bill Graham was born in 1931 to Russian parents who had moved to Berlin only a few years before. Two days after his birth, his father was killed in an accident. In order to be free to work, his mother eventually placed Wolfgang and his younger sister in an orphanage. The two were transferred to France on a student-exchange program and then stranded there when World War II broke out. After the Germans invaded, the Grajonca children were rounded up by a Red Cross worker for a march to Marseilles; the girl died of malnutrition on the way, but Wolfgang survived the ordeal and subsequently made it to New York. Raised in a Jewish foster home in The Bronx, Wolfgang Grajonca officially became Bill Graham in 1949. "I wish I'd never changed it," he now says. "Bill Graham is a nothing name."

He was drafted into the Army during the Korean War, court-martialed twice for minor offenses (once for refusing to put on his field pack). He spent eight months at the front and won the Bronze Star. In 1955, after a stint as a New York cab driver, and now with a degree in business administration from the College of the City of New York, he went to work in Southern California as a statistician for the Southern Pacific Company.

This was the first of a series of jobs in industry that he periodically quit to study acting or travel in Europe or try to break into show business. In November 1965, just before he resigned as producer and business manager of the San Francisco Mime Troupe, he staged a benefit party that brought together poets, actors, and some of the pioneers of the big new sound called rock. It was a huge success and showed him what he could do. "It was the first time all those people met," says Graham. "Ferlinghetti, the Fugs, the Jefferson Airplane, Peter Orlovsky. It was the most beautiful evening of theater, the most beautiful party, the most joyful evening ever. Everyone was stoned —some on grass, yeah, but others on nothing at all but the scene, man. The musicians played, and the people kissed and hugged, and it was unforgettable."

It was so unforgettable, in fact, that Graham organized two more benefits like it. He chose an old auditorium in the heart of San Francisco's black ghetto. It was called the Fillmore. Then he switched to another site, the present Fillmore West, set up the Fillmore East as the second axis of the rock world, and proved that rock was a business worth administering well.

Graham's success seems remarkably secure. He has even branched out into 154.

SUMMER NEWS ROUNDUP

PART 2

Bethel, N.Y., Wide World

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD WEEK EDITION
W. 231,000
SEP 22 1969

MUD, HUNGER, AND BEAUTY

Rock Festival's "Instant City"

Boston Symphony

THE EVENT

The dying days of summer gave birth to a new life style for many of the young: the rock festival community. It burst upon the scene full-grown at the Woodstock Music and Art Fair held in Bethel, N.Y. [see photo above], and at other rock festivals as far apart as Lewisville, Texas, and the Isle of Wight, off England.

WHAT'S BEHIND IT

The Woodstock festival's organizers expected about 150,000 persons, but almost three times as many showed up. Huge traffic jams forced many participants to walk as far as 10 miles to get to the festival site and prevented others from reaching the festival at all. The 20-acre site at Bethel was a sea of young people squeezed together body to body. And when the rains came the ground turned into a sea of mud.

For the weekend of Aug. 15 farmer Max Yasgur's fields grew into one of the largest cities in the entire U.S. Three persons died, and some 5,000 were treated for injuries, including about 400 bad drug trips. Two babies were born, and four miscarriages reported. Food and water ran short, and toilet facilities broke down.

The youthful community endured it all. Its citizens pitched tens of thousands of tents and makeshift lean-tos. They shared whatever food they had. Many adults in nearby towns helped by organizing clinics and distributing sandwiches.

Most adults at Bethel had only praise for the behavior of the young. The festival's chief medical officer said: "There has been no violence whatsoever, which is remarkable for a crowd this size. These people are really beautiful." A local police chief agreed, calling participants "the most courteous, considerate, and well-behaved group of kids" he had ever seen.

The use of drugs, especially marijuana, was so widespread that police generally ignored it. They made only about 100 arrests, mostly for selling drugs. Some townspeople were appalled at this lack of law enforcement. "I saw dope being sold right on the corner," a Bethel storeowner said. "It was awful for children to be exposed to this." Others replied that peaceful drug users were better than rowdy beer drinkers.

The over-30 generation at home seemed to view Woodstock with decidedly mixed feelings. The editorial pages of the New York Times, for instance, called the festival "a nightmare of mud and stagnation" one day, and "a phenomenon of innocence" the next. A Time magazine essay said: "It may well rank as one of the significant political and sociological events of the age." Reporter Bruce Cook of the National Observer saw Woodstock as a historic occasion "but one in the nature of a mass dropout, a new game for those with time and money to play it."

Woodstock, whatever it was, may return next summer. Although they reportedly lost more than $1 million, the festival's organizers talked about plans for an even bigger happening. However, farmer Yasgur, a new folk hero for many of the young, said: "As far as I know, I'm going back to running a dairy farm."

Woodstock was unique, but it did not stand alone. The rock festival at the Isle of Wight drew 200,000 young people. Its main attraction, Bob Dylan, famous for his whining sound of protest, sang a more buoyant, peaceful song. Lewisville, Texas, drew 40,000, a large crowd by pre-1969 standards.

The young at all the rock festivals felt a strong sense of community. Janis Joplin, one of the dozens of performers at Woodstock, summed it up this way: "There's lots and lots and lots of us, more than anybody ever thought before. We used to think of ourselves as little clumps of weirdos. But now we're a whole new minority group."

ON-THE-SPOT REPORT: Bethel—The Morning After

BY ERIC BERGER
Editor-in-Chief, Scholastic Magazines

The hillside slope at Bethel was a sea of mud, stinking garbage, and bonfires. Some of the fires were wood fires that had been kindled for warmth during the night. Other fires were piles of smouldering refuse. Everywhere kids were at work cleaning up the garbage that littered not only the hillside, but also every road and ditch and lawn in all directions for miles. Some used rakes, others clawed the garbage into huge paper bags with their bare hands. These kids were not being paid. Their labor was voluntary.

Behavior among the kids was extraordinary. From conversation with them I felt that I was undergoing a religious experience. And this was not because the name Bethel means "House of God." Behavior of the police, too, was extraordinary. Could be the police were simply reacting. I saw police cars that were stuck in the mud along the roads being heaved back onto the concrete by teams of kids. Along all the roads police responded to peace greetings. Said one kid: "This is what the provos [Dutch hippies] have said, 'The police should be there to provide maps for the lost, and food for the hungry.'"

News reports on radio and TV made much of the assertion that there had been no acts of violence. In fact, there were—but they were few and went unreported. When some of the concessionaries began to charge a buck for a sandwich and two bits for a glass of water, a group of black youths burned them out. The group was taken aside and indoctrinated by the kids. One does not coerce by violence, was the lesson.

Grass, hash, and acid could be had everywhere. I was reminded of parties in the '20's that were incomplete without bootleg gin and retching kids. This is not an attempt to condone the prevalence and use of drugs at the scene, simply an observation about a problem that certainly deserves intense sociological study. The generation of the '20's was "lost," however. The kids at Bethel were possessed of something that thrilled the heart—although they had come to worship at the feet of Rock gods made mighty by the missionaries of the recording industry. Here was the generation that would vote tomorrow, and everywhere at his elbow one touched a spirit of brotherhood and peace.

One brother from the Hog Farm told me that the crowd at Bethel constituted the fourth largest city in New York State. Another estimate made it the tenth largest in the nation. Yet here is the extraordinary fact—a fact that possibly overrides the drugs, the nakedness, the flouting of the Establishment: in this metropolis, made up of tired, muddy, famished, and sleep-hungry citizens, the kid at your elbow was your brother. You cared for him, as he cared for you, and you recognized him with a peace sign.

MEANWHILE, BACK AT THE ESTABLISHMENT . . .

. . . the nation's oldest music festival at Tanglewood, Mass., also broke records. The largest single-night audience in Tanglewood history—21,500—turned out for a "contemporary trends" concert featuring such rock performers as the Jefferson Airplane and the Who. And Erich Leinsdorf's last concert with the Boston Symphony tallied the highest box office take" ever for a symphony concert at Tanglewood—and reportedly in the whole U.S.

MUSIC

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 2,173,000
SEP 19 1969

IMPRESARIOS

The Capitalist of Rock

Bill Graham is a solid, no-nonsense name for a dynamic businessman who in the past four years has made himself a millionaire, acquired a Mercedes, a 29-year-old wife, a baby boy, and offices in both San Francisco and Manhattan. Wolfgang Grajonca, on the other hand, seems a more appropriate title for a temperamental typhoon of promotional creativity, whose obscenity-flavored conversation often builds to a scream, whose business conferences are likely to explode into happenings, and whose office costume usually consists of dirty corduroys and a short-sleeved sweatshirt. That both Bill and Wolfgang inhabit the same skin is one of the more important facts of life on the popular-music scene today. For Graham, né Grajonca, is, at age 38, the No. 1 producer and promoter of the Now Sound—which emanates from his two culture centers, the Fillmore West on San Francisco's Market Street and the Fillmore East on Manhattan's Second Avenue. He also runs a record company (called Fillmore) and a booking agency (called Millard, naturally).

In a world where indolence, inefficiency and fiscal fecklessness are the rule, Graham is a nonpareil. He has grown rich by knowing what is good, and hiring the best talent he can get. He provides his performers with the best equipment and facilities, and expects them to be good. If they are not—even though most of the audience may not know the difference—Graham simply stops booking them, regardless of how well they draw. The result is that Graham's two Fillmores are the places where the top talent wants to be heard—and the rock world grudgingly knows that it needs him.

I'm Not Yelling! The telephone is his fortress, his launching pad, his shepherd's crook. TIME Correspondent Stanley Cloud sat in Graham's San Francisco office one recent morning while Impresario Graham stabbed at the multiple buttons that were perpetually lighting up with incoming calls. "WHAT DID YOU SAY?" he yells, his craggy face contorted, his back hunched. "They want to borrow another $12,000 for musical equipment! Did we supply them with one set already? Yes! Did they insure like I told them to? No! Did they get it stolen? Yes! They've gotta be crazy. You've gotta be crazy! Absolutely not! I'm not yelling, goddammit. I want nothing to do with those psychedelic parasites."

Without hanging up, he punches another button and listens: an associate wants instructions on whether to bid on an auditorium to replace the Fillmore West, which will be torn down next year to make way for a new Howard Johnson motel. "Yeah—put in a bid. Go low at first and see what they come back with. I want that place if we can get it."

Well he might. Each of his Fillmores is worth $3,000-$5,000 net profit to him on a good weekend—a fact that stirs articulate contempt from the unworldly dreamers of the rock scene. "Moneygrubber" is one of the milder epithets they lay on Bill Graham.

Critics, though, tend to forget the many benefits he has staged for various causes, ranging from the People's Park Bail Fund to the Episcopal Church. He has also made numerous interest-free loans to musicians and he gives intense loyalty to those who work for him. "If I have an act I think is good but that hasn't made it yet," he says, "I put it on a bill with the Who or the Jefferson Airplane. This approach to my business has gotten me a good reputation nationwide, but here in San Francisco the kids say: 'We love the music and we love the Fillmore, but we hate Graham because he's a f---ing capitalist.'"

ANNE DIESANZ

GRAHAM (CENTER) AT THE FAMILY DOG, WAITING TO ADDRESS A STRIKE MEETING
Moneygrubber is one of the milder epithets.

Beautiful Evening. Capitalist Bill Graham was born in 1931 to Russian parents who had moved to Berlin only a few years before. Two days after his birth, his father was killed in an accident. In order to be free to work, his mother eventually placed Wolfgang and his younger sister in an orphanage. The two were transferred to France on a student-exchange program and then stranded there when World War II broke out. After the Germans invaded, the Grajonca children were rounded up by a Red Cross worker for a march to Marseilles; the girl died of malnutrition on the way, but Wolfgang survived the ordeal and subsequently made it to New York. Raised in a Jewish foster home in The Bronx, Wolfgang Grajonca officially became Bill Graham in 1949. "I wish I'd never changed it," he now says. "Bill Graham is a nothing name."

He was drafted into the Army during the Korean War, court-martialed twice for minor offenses (once for refusing to put on his field pack). He spent eight months at the front and won the Bronze Star. In 1955, after a stint as a New York cab driver, and now with a degree in business administration from the College of the City of New York, he went to work in Southern California as a statistician for the Southern Pacific Company.

This was the first of a series of jobs in industry that he periodically quit to study acting or travel in Europe or try to break into show business. In November 1965, just before he resigned as producer and business manager of the San Francisco Mime Troupe, he staged a benefit party that brought together poets, actors, and some of the pioneers of the big new sound called rock. It was a huge success and showed him what he could do. "It was the first time all those people met," says Graham. "Ferlinghetti, the Fugs, the Jefferson Airplane, Peter Orlovsky. It was the most beautiful evening of theater, the most beautiful party, the most joyful evening ever. Everyone was stoned—some on grass, yeah, but others on nothing at all but the scene, man. The musicians played, and the people kissed and hugged, and it was unforgettable."

It was so unforgettable, in fact, that Graham organized two more benefits like it. He chose an old auditorium in the heart of San Francisco's black ghetto. It was called the Fillmore. Then he switched to another site, the present Fillmore West, set up the Fillmore East as the second axis of the rock world, and proved that rock was a business worth administering well.

Graham's success seems remarkably secure. He has even branched out into 154.

SUMMER NEWS ROUNDUP

PART 2

Bethel, N.Y., Wide World

3

MUD, HUNGER, AND BEAUTY

Rock Festival's "Instant City"

Boston Symphony

THE EVENT

The dying days of summer gave birth to a new life style for many of the young: the rock festival community. It burst upon the scene full-grown at the Woodstock Music and Art Fair held in Bethel, N.Y. [see photo above], and at other rock festivals as far apart as Lewisville, Texas, and the Isle of Wight, off England.

WHAT'S BEHIND IT

The Woodstock festival's organizers expected about 150,000 persons, but almost three times as many showed up. Huge traffic jams forced many participants to walk as far as 10 miles to get to the festival site and prevented others from reaching the festival at all. The 20-acre site at Bethel was a sea of young people squeezed together body to body. And when the rains came the ground turned into a sea of mud.

For the weekend of Aug. 15 farmer Max Yasgur's fields grew into one of the largest cities in the entire U.S. Three persons died, and some 5,000 were treated for injuries, including about 400 bad drug trips. Two babies were born, and four miscarriages reported. Food and water ran short, and toilet facilities broke down.

The youthful community endured it all. Its citizens pitched tens of thousands of tents and makeshift lean-tos. They shared whatever food they had. Many adults in nearby towns helped by organizing clinics and distributing sandwiches.

Most adults at Bethel had only praise for the behavior of the young. The festival's chief medical officer said: "There has been no violence whatsoever, which is remarkable for a crowd this size. These people are really beautiful." A local police chief agreed, calling participants "the most courteous, considerate, and well-behaved group of kids" he had ever seen.

The use of drugs, especially marijuana, was so widespread that police generally ignored it. They made only about 100 arrests, mostly for selling drugs. Some townspeople were appalled at this lack of law enforcement. "I saw dope being sold right on the corner," a Bethel storeowner said. "It was awful for children to be exposed to this." Others replied that peaceful drug users were better than rowdy beer drinkers.

The over-30 generation at home seemed to view Woodstock with decidedly mixed feelings. The editorial pages of the New York Times, for instance, called the festival "a nightmare of mud and stagnation" one day, and "a phenomenon of innocence" the next. A Time magazine essay said: "It may well rank as one of the significant political and sociological events of the age." Reporter Bruce Cook of the National Observer saw Woodstock as a historic occasion "but one in the nature of a mass dropout, a new game for those with time and money to play it."

Woodstock, whatever it was, may return next summer. Although they reportedly lost more than $1 million, the festival's organizers talked about plans for an even bigger happening. However, farmer Yasgur, a new folk hero for many of the young, said: "As far as I know, I'm going back to running a dairy farm."

Woodstock was unique, but it did not stand alone. The rock festival at the Isle of Wight drew 200,000 young people. Its main attraction, Bob Dylan, famous for his whining sound of protest, sang a more buoyant, peaceful song. Lewisville, Texas, drew 40,000, a large crowd by pre-1969 standards.

The young at all the rock festivals felt a strong sense of community. Janis Joplin, one of the dozens of performers at Woodstock, summed it up this way: "There's lots and lots and lots of us, more than anybody ever thought before. We used to think of ourselves as little clumps of weirdos. But now we're a whole new minority group."

ON-THE-SPOT REPORT: Bethel—The Morning After

BY ERIC BERGER
Editor-in-Chief, Scholastic Magazines

The hillside slope at Bethel was a sea of mud, stinking garbage, and bonfires. Some of the fires were wood fires that had been kindled for warmth during the night. Other fires were piles of smouldering refuse. Everywhere kids were at work cleaning up the garbage that littered not only the hillside, but also every road and ditch and lawn in all directions for miles. Some used rakes, others clawed the garbage into huge paper bags with their bare hands. These kids were not being paid. Their labor was voluntary.

Behavior among the kids was extraordinary. From conversation with them I felt that I was undergoing a religious experience. And this was not because the name Bethel means "House of God." Behavior of the police, too, was extraordinary. Could be the police were simply reacting. I saw police cars that were stuck in the mud along the roads being heaved back onto the concrete by teams of kids. Along all the roads police responded to peace greetings. Said one kid: "This is what the provos [Dutch hippies] have said, 'The police should be there to provide maps for the lost, and food for the hungry.'"

News reports on radio and TV made much of the assertion that there had been no acts of violence. In fact, there were—but they were few and went unreported. When some of the concessionaries began to charge a buck for a sandwich and two bits for a glass of water, a group of black youths burned them out. The group was taken aside and indoctrinated by the kids. One does not coerce by violence, was the lesson.

Grass, hash, and acid could be had everywhere. I was reminded of parties in the '20's that were incomplete without bootleg gin and retching kids. This is not an attempt to condone the prevalence and use of drugs at the scene, simply an observation about a problem that certainly deserves intense sociological study. The generation of the '20's was "lost," however. The kids at Bethel were possessed of something that thrilled the heart—although they had come to worship at the feet of Rock gods made mighty by the missionaries of the recording industry. Here was the generation that would vote tomorrow, and everywhere at his elbow one touched a spirit of brotherhood and peace.

One brother from the Hog Farm told me that the crowd at Bethel constituted the fourth largest city in New York State. Another estimate made it the tenth largest in the nation. Yet here is the extraordinary fact—a fact that possibly overrides the drugs, the nakedness, the flouting of the Establishment: in this metropolis, made up of tired, muddy, famished, and sleep-hungry citizens, the kid at your elbow was your brother. You cared for him, as he cared for you, and you recognized him with a peace sign.

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD WEEK EDITION
W. 231,000

SEP 22 1969

MEANWHILE, BACK AT THE ESTABLISHMENT . . .

. . . the nation's oldest music festival at Tanglewood, Mass., also broke records. The largest single-night audience in Tanglewood history—21,500—turned out for a "contemporary trends" concert featuring such rock performers as the Jefferson Airplane and the Who. And Erich Leinsdorf's last concert with the Boston Symphony tallied the highest box office "take" ever for a symphony concert at Tanglewood—and reportedly in the whole U.S.

TIME
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 3,473,000

SEP 19 1969

MU

IMPRESARIOS

The Capitalist of Rock

Bill Graham is a solid, no-nonsense name for a dynamic businessman who in the past four years has made himself a millionaire, acquired a Mercedes, a 29-year-old wife, a baby boy, and offices in both San Francisco and Manhattan. Wolfgang Grajonca, on the other hand, seems a more appropriate title for a temperamental typhoon of promotional creativity, whose obscenity-flavored conversation often builds to a scream, whose business conferences are likely to explode into happenings, and whose office costume usually consists of dirty corduroys and a short-sleeved sweatshirt. That both Bill and Wolfgang inhabit the same skin is one of the more important facts of life on the popular-music scene today. For Graham né Grajonca, is, at age 38, the No. 1 producer and promoter of the New Sound—which emanates from his two cultural centers, the Fillmore West on San Francisco's Market Street and the Fillmore East on Manhattan's Second Avenue. He also runs a record company (Fillmore) and a booking agency (Millard, naturally).

In a world where indolence, inefficiency and fiscal fecklessness are the rule, Graham is a nonpareil. He has grown rich by knowing what is good and hiring the best talent he can. He provides his performers with the best equipment and facilities, and expects them to be good. If they are not—even though most of the audience may not know the difference—Graham simply stops booking them, regardless of how well they draw. The result is that Graham's two Fillmores are the places where the top talent wants to be heard—and the rock world grudgingly knows that it needs him.

I'm Not Yelling! The telephone is his fortress, his launching pad, his shepherd's crook. TIME Correspondent Stanley Cloud sat in Graham's San Francisco office one recent morning while Impresario Graham stabbed at the multiple buttons that were perpetually lighting up with incoming calls. "WHAT DID YOU SAY?" he yells, his crinkled face contorted, his back hunched. "They want to borrow another $12,000 for musical equipment! Did we supply them with one set already? Yes! Did they use it like I told them to? No! Did they get it stolen? Yes! They've got to be crazy. You've gotta be crazy! Absolutely not! I'm not yelling, goddamn it! I want nothing to do with those psychedelic parasites."

Without hanging up, he punches another button and listens: an assistant wants instructions on whether to bid on an auditorium to replace the Fillmore West, which will be torn down next year to make way for a new Howard Johnson motel. "Yeah—put in a bid. Go low at first and see what the world where the word hip is often synonymous with middle-age spread. At Tanglewood's well-groomed Berkshire Festival this summer, Graham staged a rock program that broke all cash and attendance records. Yet the base of his enterprises is precarious and emotional. That fact was recently demonstrated in a raging confrontation that called into question the whole future of the Fillmore West, displayed Graham's pyrotechnical style, and sent shockwaves through the realm of rock.

The occasion was a threatened strike. A meeting had been called at San Francisco's other rock palace, Chet Helms' Family Dog Ballroom, by a group of psychedelic-light-show operators who were demanding more money and saying they would throw picket lines around the Fillmore that night. About 150 people were ready and waiting for Graham when he entered. First to speak was Helms, a gentle, aesthetic-looking man in his late 20s. He delivered a long speech calling for "brotherhood," accusing Graham of having a monopoly in town, and suggesting that those involved in the San Francisco rock business divide all income equally for the greater good of the "community."

Bill's Bombshell. When Graham spoke at last, he began calmly, listing his reasons for refusing the light-show people's demands, but as he turned to the real subject of the meeting—himself—the decibel level began to rise. "For four years I've been attacked and accused of being a moneygrubbing capitalist by the people in this so-called community," he said. "I'm an American businessman, mister, and I've made a lot of money. And, man, I've earned it. But I think we've also given something to this city in return. You people talk about community. Where is this community you're always talking about? Where are the pottery shops in the Haight? Where are the music groups that are giving lessons to kids?" Graham ranted on and on, to a screaming climax. Then quietly he announced that he would close up the Fillmore West for good in December, when his lease on the present site expires. The announcement tore the meeting to shreds. There would be no pickets then or later at the Fillmore West. Last week it was announced that Graham's lease on the Fillmore West had been extended to August 1970, and anyone who thinks Bill Graham will fold it then doesn't know Wolfgang Grajonca.

Graham works 16 to 18 hours a day at mind-blowing intensity, sometimes not getting his first meal of the day until the wee hours after a concert. He has been known to refer to the business he's in as "Ugly! Ugly! Ugly!" Yet one day recently he slammed down his phone, rubbed his eyes and shook his head at TIME Correspondent Cloud. "You know," said Bill Graham. "You hate these groups one minute. They have no sense of reality. But then they play their music and you love 'em again."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

FEB 19 1969

FEB 19 1969

Tanglewood to swing with Ozawa, Schuller & Bernstein

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's Summer operation, will be run by three professional swingers, beginning 1970. At a brief press conference held in New York yesterday afternoon, Talcott M. Banks, president of the orchestra's trustees, announced that the new artistic directors for Tanglewood would be Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, with Leonard Bernstein completing the triumvirate as adviser to Tanglewood.

Ozawa is the Manchurian-born, Beatle-coiffed, 33-year-old music director-elect of the San Francisco Symphony. He is a Tanglewood alumnus, having been a conducting student there in 1960. He will be principal conductor of the Boston Symphony's Summer concerts. He has conducted the orchestra in Boston and at Tanglewood, and he will be a guest conductor in Boston for two weeks in November 1969.

Schuller, 43, composer, conductor, jazzman, author, horn virtuoso, and since 1967, president of the New England Conservatory of Music, has served on the Tanglewood faculty and as head of Contemporary Music

Bernstein

In 1943 a relatively unknown young man replaced an ailing conductor for the Sunday coast-to-coast broadcast of the New York Philharmonic. The following morning he found himself front-page news in the New York Times, and one of the most meteoric careers in modern American music had been launched. Today, a quarter-century later, Leonard Bernstein still retains a remarkable capacity to create wonder and excitement.

He became musical director of the New York Philharmonic in 1957 and will be leaving at the end of the current season. His decision to quit is considered to be the most important one affecting N.Y. orchestral life since Toscanini retired in 1954. He hopes now to concentrate on composing, with occasional operatic conducting stints.

A native of Lawrence, Mass., and a graduate of Boston Latin School and Harvard — "cum laude in musica," 1939 — Bernstein has been described as an artistic polygamist: in addition to conducting, he is the composer of symphonies, ballets, musicals and films, as well as a pianist, teacher and writer on music. "I don't want to give in and settle for some specialty," he once said.

The ARTS

Activites at the Berkshire Music Center. Schuller's principal responsibility will be Tanglewood's educational activities.

Bernstein, about to retire at 50 from the conductorship of the New York Philharmonic, composer for Broadway and the concert hall, Public Figure writ large, was a student of Serge Koussevitzky's at the first session of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940. He, too, has taught at Tanglewood. As adviser he will not be in residence, and there has been no announcement of his conducting any Boston Symphony concerts.

Asked if Ozawa and Schuller would swap functions at all, Banks said that he "would not be surprised." Both men are expected to begin at once with plans for 1970. It is expected that Erich Leinsdorf, whose resignation as music director of the Boston Symphony and of the Berkshire Music Center is effective at the end of Summer 1969, and William Steinberg, who succeeds him at the Boston Symhony this Fall, will be among the conductors in Summer 1970.

The appointment of the Ozawa - Schuller - plus-Bernstein group is in striking contrast to the choice of tradition-oriented 70-year-old William Steinberg to the Boston post. Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of Tanglewood's founder, expressed special pleasure that the Summer operation would now be in the hands of "young alumni, exactly as Dr. Koussevitzky would have wanted."

More detailed announcements about programs and activities would, according to a spokesman for the orchestra, "be made at appropriate times."

Ozawa

The musical world owes one of its most brilliant young conducting talents to the circumstance of a sports accident; no one knows what it may have lost in the way of a concert pianist.

Seiji Ozawa, born in 1935, in Hoten, Manchuria, began his formal musical training at the famous Toho School of Music in Tokyo, where the piano was his major interest. At 19, after breaking an index finger in a rugger game, he shifted his attention to composition and conducting, and upon graduation took first prizes in both.

Ozawa then worked his way to Europe where at 24 he won first prize at the International Competition of conductors at Besancon, France. Charles Munch, one of the judges, invited him to Tanglewood, and the following Summer he received the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center.

Ozawa is currently Music Director of the Toronto Symphony, a position he is resigning at the end of the current season. His plans for 1969-70 include a cross-country tour with the New York Philharmonic, and in the Fall of 1970 he will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

Schuller

Composer, conductor, author, educator, instrumentalist, administrator, jazz authority — these are some of the labels that identify one of the most versatile of contemporary U.S. musicians, Gunther Schuller, President of the New England Conservatory of Music.

Schuller's professional career began at age 16 as French Horn player with the Ballet Theatre Orchestra. At 19 he joined the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra.

In 1959 he resigned to devote more time to composition, and has since been the recipient of numerous important commissions. One of the most recent of these was that of the Hamburg State Opera in 1966 for the jazz-oriented opera, "The Visitation."

Schuller's interest in jazz has led to the composition of many "third stream" works and to the authorship of "Early Jazz; its Roots and Musical Development," a musico-analytical study of jazz published in 1968.

His association with the Berkshire Music Center began in 1963 when he was appointed acting head of the Composition Dept. In 1968 he was made head of Contemporary Music Activities at Tanglewood.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

FEB 19 1969

NEWHOUSE NEWSPAPERS 19 February 1969

IN 1970

Tanglewood Names Ozawa and Schuller Artistic Directors

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller will share the artistic directorship of the Tanglewood musical organization beginning in 1970, the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced yesterday.

Mr. Ozawa will be in charge of the orchestra's summer concert season as well as the other concerts making up the Berkshire Festival. He may also teach.

Mr. Schuller will concentrate on the educational activities at Tanglewood, including the Berkshire Music Center. He will conduct occasionally.

Leonard Bernstein will serve as adviser to Tanglewood, but will not be in residence. Mr. Bernstein's position represents an official return to the Berkshire Music Center, to which he came as a student of Serge Koussevitzky in the center's first session in 1940. Though he later taught on the faculty, he has not held an official post there since 1955.

The artistic directorship of Tanglewood has, in the past, been in the hands of a single person—most recently, Erich Leinsdorf.

The appointments of Mr. Ozawa, a conductor with a strong interest in the musical avant-garde, and Mr. Schuller, a composer-conductor whose primary interest in educational, are believed to be an indication that future musical policy may emphasize the avant-garde, or at least the contemporary, while the educational departments could undergo considerable expansion.

Though no definate planning has begun for 1970, it is expected that William Steinberg and Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct at Tanglewood.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

FEB 18 1969

* * *

MUSIC NOTE: Leonard Bernstein took time out yesterday from a recording session with the New York Philhormonic to announce a major new affiliation. Starting the summer of 1970, the retiring New York maestro will serve as advisor to the Tanglewood Festival season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Since it was also announced that Seiji Ozawa, currently guesting with the Philharmonic, would be co-artistic director for Tanglewood along with composer Gunther Schuller, it is presently quite clear who will be doing what.

Boston's present music director, Erich Leinsdorf, concludes his tenure at the end of this summer's season, but both he and the Symphony's new music director, William Steinberg, will conduct during the 1970 Tanglewood season. The trend toward multi-musical directions is getting complicated indeed!

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

FEB 19 1969

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

FEB 19 1969

Bernstein, Ozawa Join Schuller at Tanglewood

Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Toronto Symphony, and Gunther Schuller, composer, and president of the New England Conservatory of Music, have been appointed Artistic Directors at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony in the Berkshire Hills, beginning the summer of 1970. Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser which means that he will spend time there and presumably conduct some concerts.

While the various areas of responsibility haven't been fully clarified, the present plan is that Ozawa will be chiefly identified with the orchestral concerts at the Festival and Schuller with the school, the Berkshire Music Center.

POST (E.)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 380,764

FEB 19 1969

3 Get Tanglewood Posts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday announced the appointment of Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller as artistic directors at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in Lenox. In addition, Leonard Bernstein will serve as adviser to Tanglewood.

All three appointments will become effective with the 1970 summer season. Ozawa and Schuller will fill the dual position being vacated by current Symphony music director Erich Leinsdorf, who departs in August of this year.

Ozawa, who was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 under Charles Munch, is music director of the Toronto Symphony, and in the fall of 1970 will move to the same position in San Francisco. He also serves as director of Chicago's Ravinia Festival. His primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony's summer concert season, of which he will be principal conductor, and other Berkshire Festival concerts.

Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory and noted composer and conductor, has headed contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center during Leinsdorf's tenure. His principal concern will be the Music Center's educational activities and the Tanglewood programs of the New England Conservatory and Boston University. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Symphony, will continue as chairman of the Music Center faculty.

Bernstein, who vacates the post of music director of the New York Philharmonic at this season's conclusion, was first associated with the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 under Serge Koussevitzky and taught on the faculty there during subsequent summers. His position as adviser will have a mainly consultative function, and he will not be resident in Lenox.

According to the announcement, planning for the 1970 Tanglewood season will begin very soon. It is expected that William Steinberg, who becomes the Boston Symphony's music director in September, and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct in the Berkshire Festival

"It is a most happy occasion for me to announce that Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have agreed to undertake the artistic leadership of the orchestra's affairs at Tanglewood," said Talcott M. Banks, president of the Symphony trustees. "The trustees look forward with eagerness to the new directions they will plan for us, beginning in 1970.

"The traditions of the Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center are well served by the contemporary outlook and varied activities of these great young artists who honor us by their interest."

"As the future music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," said Steinberg, "I am very happy to know that the Tanglewood enterprise will be in such eminent hands."

Ozawa to Direct BSO Tanglewood Concert

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

NEW YORK, N. Y.—Seiji Ozawa, 34-year-old newly named conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, will assume direction of Boston Symphony concert at Tanglewood, summer home of the orchestra starting in 1970, it was announced yesterday afternoon by officials of the orchestra at the Union Club here.

In charge of academic affairs at the Berkshire Festival, including the Berkshire Music Center and affiliated institutes, will be Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory.

At the same time, it was announced that starting next summer, Leonard Bernstein, at present conductor of the New York Philharmonic, will be adviser to the festival.

It is not expected that Bernstein will be in residence, but as Talcott Banks, president of the BSO trustees, stressed in announcing the news, he will always be welcome.

These appointments were occasioned by the retirement of Erich Leinsdorf as conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Though Leinsdorf bore most of the burden for both the summer and winter seasons of the orchestra, William Steinberg, his replacement who has been signed to a three-year contract effective this coming fall, will be responsible only for the winter seasons of the orchestra. Both he and Leinsdorf are expected to guest conduct at Tanglewood during the summer of 1970.

New Engla

Tanglewood Troika Named

Bernstein, Ozawa, Schuller Get Key 1970 Roles

The return of Leonard Bernstein to Tanglewood in a key advisory position and the appointment of Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller as artistic directors for the 1970 season were announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra management at a New York press conference today.

Management also strongly indicated the probability that the Tanglewood season would be extended to 10 weeks, with perhaps a Boston Pops approach for the extra two weeks.

* * *

In making the announcement, Talcott M. Banks, president of the BSO trustees, said that William Steinberg, who will become music director of the BSO this fall, was delighted with the arrangement.

Bernstein, who was a student of Serge Koussevitzky at the original session of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and was on the faculty there in many subsequent summers, will hold the title of adviser. Although Bernstein will not return to residence at Tanglewood, his long-term connection with Tanglewood will be formalized in the principally consultative functions of the post.

AP

Leonard Bernstein
Coming back

* * *

Ozawa, who was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, is music director of the Toronto Symphony, has served as director of the Ravinia Festival and Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the BSO's summer concert season, of which he will be principal conductor, and the other concerts making up the Berkshire Festival.

Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music and noted American composer, was a teacher and then head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center during the tenure of Erich Leinsdorf, who has resigned as director, effective at the end of the 1969 session. Schuller's principal concern will be the educational activities at Tanglewood, including the Music Center.

* * *

Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music also operate programs at Tanglewood in cooperation with the Berkshire Music Center. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the BSO, will continue as chairman of the faculty.

Schuller and Ozawa, with the advice of Bernstein, will begin planning for 1970 and ensuing seasons in the near future. It is expected that both Steinberg and Leinsdorf will conduct at Tanglewood. The announcement of more detailed programs and activities will be made later.

156

Tanglewood Names 2 Directors With Bernstein as Adviser

NEW YORK, N.Y. — Tanglewood will be run under a new policy beginning with the summer festival of 1970.

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors, with Leonard Bernstein serving as their adviser.

The announcement was made by Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony at a press conference yesterday afternoon at the Union Club, Park Avenue.

This means that Ozawa will be principal conductor of the Boston Symphony for the regular 24 concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox, and other concerts that round out the schedule.

Heads Education

Schuler will head the Berkshire Music Center, educational project of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

Although Bernstein will not be required to establish residence at Tanglewood, his long-term association with the festival and center will be formalized in the principally consultative funcions of the post.

This is a complete change of policy.

Since the Berkshire Music Center was founded by Serge Koussevitzky in 1940, the conductor of the Boston Symphony was not only principal conductor of the Berkshire Festival concerts but automatically served as director of the center.

Such positions were held by Koussevitzky from 1940 through 1948; Charles Munch, 1949-1962, and Erich Leinsdorf, through the forthcoming season, July 4-Aug. 24.

Leinsdorf Quits

Leinsdorf resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony in December, 1967, following the Berkshire Festival concert next Aug. 24.

His reason was overwork.

William Steinberg will succeed Leinsdorf next October, and will continue also as regular conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

Ozawa is currently conductor of the Toronto Symphony, and will assume a similar post as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970.

He was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at Munch's invitation, and has also served as director of the Ravinia Festival

Seiji Ozawa

Leonard Bernstein

Gunther Schuller

in Chicago and Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

Now president of the New England Conservatory of Music, Schuller has been a teacher and head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Center during the Leinsdorf tenure.

It was announced that Boston University and the New England Conservatory will continue to operate programs at the Berkshire Center.

Joseph Silverstein, co-concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will continue as chairman of the center faculty.

Bernstein was a student of Koussevitzky at the original session of the Berkshire Center in 1940, and taught on its faculty for many subsequent summers.

There was warm response to the announced shift of responsibilities.

Delighted

"As the future conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I am very happy to know that the Tanglewood enterprise will be in such eminent hands," said Steinberg.

Bernstein said, "I am delighted to renew my warm and sentimental connection with Tanglewood, and to participate, if only in this honorary capacity, in the fulfillment of Serge Koussevitzky's dream."

"My first months in America were spent on the beautiful Tanglewood grounds," said Ozawa. "The honor I feel at becoming artistic director adds to my happiness in rejoining Lenny and my friends of the Boston Symphony. My only sadness is that Charles Munch is not still here to share our joy."

(Munch died in Richmond, Va., Nov. 5, 1968, while on tour with his new Orchestre de Paris. He was 77.)

Schuller's said "I am honored to join my distinguished colleagues as artistic director at Tanglewood and look forward with enthusiasm to the opportunity of continuing the work of Koussevitzy, Aaron Copland, Munch and Leinsdorf at the Berkshire Music Center."

Guest Appearances

A large part of this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts will be conducted by Leinsdorf. It is expected that he and Steinberg will appear as guest conductors during the summer festival of 1970.

Leinsdorf continues his duties this summer as director of the Berkshire Center.

Raymond Morin

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,682

FEB 19 1969

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

FEB 20 1969

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 516,640 SUN. 926,135

FEB 19 1969

2 to Direct Music Festival in 1970

Tanglewood Names Ozawa, Schuller

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been named artistic directors of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood They will take over direction of the Lenox, Mass., festival in 1970

Announcement of the appointments was made Tuesday in New York at a press conference called by trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose concerts are the central public events at Tanglewood.

PRINCIPAL CONDUCTOR

Ozawa, 32-year-old Japanese conductor of the Toronto Symphony, will be principal conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood and will be concerned largely with those concerts.

Schuller, composer and president of the New England Conservatory, will guide the educational activities of the Berkshire Music Center.

In addition, Leonard Bernstein, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, was named adviser to Tanglewood, a consultative position which will not require him to be in residence at the festival.

A NEW DIRECTION

The appointments mark a new direction for the Boston Symphony, since it will be the first time that someone other than the music director of the orchestra will direct the summer festival and school.

Erich Leinsdorf, retiring music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tanglewood, will leave his posts at the end of the current season. He is being succeeded in September by William Steinberg.

Steinberg, however, will retain his position as music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, sharing his time about equally between the two.

'IN EMINENT HANDS'

Steinberg told the press "As future music director of the Boston Symphony, I am happy to note that Tanglewood is in such eminent hands."

Ozawa, commenting on his appointment, said "My first months in America were spent on the grounds at Tanglewood and the honor I feel adds to my happiness at rejoining Lenny and my friends at the Boston Symphony. My only sadness is that Charles Munch is not here to share it."

Mr. Munch, while music director in Boston, had sponsored Ozawa's studies at Tanglewood after meeting the young conductor in Paris.

SERVED UNDER BERNSTEIN

Ozawa went on to become assistant director of the New York Philharmonic under Bernstein and from there to Toronto. He will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970.

He headed the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's summer series at Ravinia until he resigned last summer to conduct at the Salzburg Festival this summer his first essay into opera.

Ozawa has conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra for three consecutive seasons and appeared at the 1968 Academy of Music Anniversary Concert.

BOTH WILL CONDUCT

Ozawa said both Steinberg and Leinsdorf will conduct at the 1970 Tanglewood concerts.

Schuller joined the faculty at Tanglewood in 1963 and became head of contemporary music activities.

He said Boston University and New England Conservatory will continue their association with Tanglewood. Joseph Silverstein will continue as chairman of the faculty, Schuller said.

'Contemporary outlook' for Tanglewod

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced several Tanglewood appointments. Beginning in 1970 Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller will become artistic directors. At the same time Leonard Bernstein will begin serving as adviser to Tanglewood. Meanwhile, this fall, William Steinberg will have become music director of the symphony in its Boston home.

In making the announcements Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the BSO remarked: "The traditions of the Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center are well served by the contemporary outlook and varied activities of these great young artists who honor us by their interest."

Mr. Banks made the announcement in New York this week and added that both Mr. Steinberg and the symphony's present conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, are expected to conduct at Tanglewood in 1970.

Mr. Ozawa is now music director of the Toronto Symphony and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. For the Tanglewood summer season in the Berkshire hills he will be principal conductor for the Berkshire Festival. Mr. Schuller, president of New England Conservatory of Music, and a composer, will be chiefly concerned with educational activities at Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center. Joseph Silverstein remains as chairman of the faculty of the center.

Mr. Bernstein was a student of Serge Koussevitzky at the first sesion of the center in 1940 and taught on the faculty subsequently. His new assignment in 1970 will be chiefly consultative and he will not be in residence.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

FEB 19 1969

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

FEB 20 1969

Two Appointed at Tanglewood

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors of Tanglewood, with Leonard Bernstein serving as adviser.

Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, announced the appointments at a press conference yesterday in New York City.

Ozawa will be principal conductor of the Boston Symphony for the regular 24 concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox, and other concerts which round out the schedule.

Schuller will head the Berkshire Music Center, educational project of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

Since the founding of the Berkshire Music Center by Serge Koussevitzky in 1940, both posts have been held by the conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Ozawa is currently conductor of the Toronto Symphony, and will become conductor of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. He was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 and has also served as director of the Ravinia Festival in Chicago and of the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

Schuller is now president of the New England Conservatory of Music and has been a teacher and head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Center since 1962.

Bernstein was a student of Koussevitzky at the original session of the Berkshire Center in 1940, and taught on its faculty for many summers.

Boston University and the New England Conservatory will continue to operate programs at the center.

A large part of this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, who resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony in December, 1967, effective after the festival next Aug. 24.

It is expected that he and William Steinberg, who succeeds Leinsdorf next October, will appear as guest conductors during the summer festival of 1970.

Leinsdorf continues his duties this summer as director of the Berkshire Center.

Tangle-less Wood?

By Peter M. Knapp

The naming of a triumvirate to oversee the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood temporarily solves two problems:

The first is to fill the vacancy at Tanglewood beginning in the 1970 season as Erich Leinsdorf leaves the Boston Symphony at the end of this summer's season.

The second is to reduce the work load of the Symphony's music director. Erich Leinsdorf may have been the last music director of the BSO to wear the three-cornered hat of music director of the Boston Symphony's winter season in Symphony Hall, artistic director and principal conductor of the Berkshire Music Festival's Tanglewood concerts, and head of the Berkshire Music Center's educational activities, the summer music school for talented young musicians which is such an important function of the Tanglewood operation.

Indeed, it was precisely this enormous burden of year-round responsibility that Leinsdorf cited as the reason for his resignation. Along with a conducting load of a hundred concerts a year, Leinsdorf had to plan programs for both the winter and summer seasons, select guest soloists, and oversee the music school at Tanglewood as well. It was a crushing burden.

The new Tanglewood setup, however, further divides the Boston Symphony's direction. William Steinberg, Leinsdorf's successor, will be a part-time leader in Boston, sharing his abilities and time with the Pittsburgh orchestra. There will be a parade of guest conductors in Boston the next few years, who will be contenders for the permanent appointment as BSO music director. Steinberg's appointment is understood to be a temporary one.

The Big Two

At Tanglewood, the Symphony trustees have chosen Seiji Ozawa, 33, and Gunther Schuller, 43, as artistic directors. Ozawa will be the principal conductor of the Boston Symphony's summer concerts; Schuller will oversee the Berkshire Music Center's educational activites.

Ozawa is a Tanglewood alumnus, winner of the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Festival, current music director of the Toronto Symphony and future director of the San Francisco Symphony. He was born in Manchuria and began his musical training in Tokyo, and is regarded as one of the finest of the younger generation of jet-age conductors.

Schuller is a modern musical renaissance man, apparently capable of anything — composing, conducting, teaching, writing, you name it. Schuller, onetime horn player in the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, moves with equal facility between jazz and so-called "classical" music, as well as in that musical in-between-land he terms "third-stream." Schuller is president of the New England Conservatory of Music, and head of Contemporary Music Activities at Tanglewood.

The third man in the Tanglewood triumvirate is the redoubtable figure of Leonard Bernstein, who will be an adviser. Bernstein has long Tanglewood associations going back to his student days as Koussevitzky's protege.

GUNTHER SCHULLER

. . . co-director

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

. . . adviser

So while the fatherly figure of William Steinberg, 70, presides over Symphony Hall, the younger generation takes over at Tanglewood. Some interesting summers lie ahead.

156

Tanglewood Names 2 Directors With Bernstein as Adviser

NEW YORK, N.Y. — Tanglewood will be run under a new policy beginning with the summer festival of 1970.

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors, with Leonard Bernstein serving as their adviser.

The announcement was made by Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony at a press conference yesterday afternoon at the Union Club, Park Avenue.

This means that Ozawa will be principal conductor of the Boston Symphony for the regular 24 concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox, and other concerts that round out the schedule.

Heads Education

Schuler will head the Berkshire Music Center, educational project of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

Although Bernstein will not be required to establish residence at Tanglewood, his long-term association with the festival and center will be formalized in the principally consultative functions of the post.

This is a complete change of policy.

Since the Berkshire Music Center was founded by Serge Koussevitzky in 1940, the conductor of the Boston Symphony was not only principal conductor of the Berkshire Festival concerts but automatically served as director of the center.

Such positions were held by Koussevitzky from 1940 through 1948; Charles Munch, 1949-1962, and Erich Leinsdorf, through the forthcoming season, July 4-Aug. 24.

Leinsdorf Quits

Leinsdorf resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony in December, 1967, following the Berkshire Festival concert next Aug. 24.

His reason was overwork.

William Steinberg will succeed Leinsdorf next October, and will continue also as regular conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

Ozawa is currently conductor of the Toronto Symphony, and will assume a similar post as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970.

He was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at Munch's invitation, and has also served as director of the Ravinia Festival

Seiji Ozawa

Leonard Bernstein

Gunther Schuller

in Chicago and Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

Now president of the New England Conservatory of Music, Schuller has been a teacher and head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Center during the Leinsdorf tenure.

It was announced that Boston University and the New England Conservatory will continue to operate programs at the Berkshire Center.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will continue as chairman of the center faculty.

Bernstein was a student of Koussevitzky at the original session of the Berkshire Center in 1940, and taught on its faculty for many subsequent summers.

There was warm response to the announced shift of responsibilities.

Delighted

"As the future conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I am very happy to know that the Tanglewood enterprise will be in such eminent hands," said Steinberg.

Bernstein said, "I am delighted to renew my warm and sentimental connection with Tanglewood, and to participate, if only in this honorary capacity, in the fulfillment of Serge Koussevitzky's dream."

"My first months in America were spent on the beautiful Tanglewood grounds," said Ozawa. "The honor I feel at becoming artistic director adds to my happiness in rejoining Lenny and my friends of the Boston Symphony. My only sadness is that Charles Munch is not still here to share our joy."

(Munch died in Richmond, Va., Nov. 5, 1968, while on tour with his new Orchestre de Paris. He was 77.)

Schuller's said "I am honored to join my distinguished colleagues as artistic director at Tanglewood and look forward with enthusiasm to the opportunity of continuing the work of Koussevitzy, Aaron Copland, Munch and Leinsdorf at the Berkshire Music Center."

Guest Appearances

A large part of this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts will be conducted by Leinsdorf. It is expected that he and Steinberg will appear as guest conductors during the summer festival of 1970.

Leinsdorf continues his duties this summer as director of the Berkshire Center.

Raymond Morin

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,682

FEB 19 1969

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

FEB 20 1969

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 519,010 SUN. 556,122

FEB 19 1969

2 to Direct Music Festival in 1970

Tanglewood Names Ozawa, Schuller

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been named artistic directors of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood They will take over direction of the Lenox, Mass., festival in 1970

Announcement of the appointments was made Tuesday in New York at a press conference called by trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose concerts are the central public events at Tanglewood.

PRINCIPAL CONDUCTOR

Ozawa, 32-year-old Japanese conductor of the Toronto Symphony will be principal conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood and will be concerned largely with those concerts.

Schuller, composer and president of the New England Conservatory, will guide the educational activities of the Berkshire Music Center.

In addition, Leonard Bernstein, conductor of the New York Philharmonic, was named adviser to Tanglewood, a consultative position which will not require him to be in residence at the festival.

A NEW DIRECTION

The appointments mark a new direction for the Boston Symphony since it will be the first time that someone other than the music director of the orchestra will direct the summer festival and school.

Erich Leinsdorf, retiring music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tanglewood, will leave his posts at the end of the current season. He is being succeeded in September by William Steinberg.

Steinberg, however, will retain his position as music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, sharing his time about equally between the two.

'IN EMINENT HANDS'

Steinberg told the press "As future music director of the Boston Symphony, I am happy to note that Tanglewood is in such eminent hands."

Ozawa, commenting on his appointment, said "My first months in America were spent on the grounds at Tanglewood and the honor I feel adds to my happiness at rejoining Lenny and my friends at the Boston Symphony. My only sadness is that Charles Munch is not here to share it."

Mr. Munch, while music director in Boston, had sponsored Ozawa's studies at Tanglewood after meeting the young conductor in Paris.

SERVED UNDER BERNSTEIN

Ozawa went on to become assistant director of the New York Philharmonic under Bernstein and from there to Toronto. He will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970.

He headed the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's summer series at Ravinia until he resigned last summer to conduct at the Salzburg Festival this summer, his first essay into opera.

Ozawa has conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra for three consecutive seasons and appeared at the 1968 Academy of Music Anniversary Concert.

BOTH WILL CONDUCT

Ozawa said both Steinberg and Leinsdorf will conduct at the 1970 Tanglewood concerts.

Schuller joined the faculty at Tanglewood in 1963 and became head of contemporary music activities.

He said Boston University and New England Conservatory will continue their association with Tanglewood. Joseph Silverstein will continue as chairman of the faculty, Schuller said.

'Contemporary outlook' for Tanglewod

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced several Tanglewood appointments. Beginning in 1970 Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller will become artistic directors. At the same time Leonard Bernstein will begin serving as adviser to Tanglewood. Meanwhile, this fall, William Steinberg will have become music director of the symphony in its Boston home.

In making the announcements Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the BSO remarked: "The traditions of the Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center are well served by the contemporary outlook and varied activities of these great young artists who honor us by their interest."

Mr. Banks made the announcement in New York this week and added that both Mr. Steinberg and the symphony's present conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, are expected to conduct at Tanglewood in 1970.

Mr. Ozawa is now music director of the Toronto Symphony and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. For the Tanglewood summer season in the Berkshire hills he will be principal conductor for the Berkshire Festival. Mr. Schuller, president of New England Conservatory of Music, and a composer, will be chiefly concerned with educational activities at Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center. Joseph Silverstein remains as chairman of the faculty of the center.

Mr. Bernstein was a student of Serge Koussevitzky at the first sesion of the center in 1940 and taught on the faculty subsequently. His new assignment in 1970 will be chiefly consultative and he will not be in residence.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

FEB 19 1969

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

FEB 20 1969

Two Appointed at Tanglewood

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors of Tanglewood, with Leonard Bernstein serving as adviser.

Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, announced the appointments at a press conference yesterday in New York City.

Ozawa will be principal conductor of the Boston Symphony for the regular 24 concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox, and other concerts which round out the schedule.

Schuller will head the Berkshire Music Center, educational project of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

Since the founding of the Berkshire Music Center by Serge Koussevitzky in 1940, both posts have been held by the conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Ozawa is currently conductor of the Toronto Symphony, and will become conductor of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. He was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 and has also served as director of the Ravinia Festival in Chicago and of the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

Schuller is now president of the New England Conservatory of Music and has been a teacher and head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Center since 1962.

Bernstein was a student of Koussevitzky at the original session of the Berkshire Center in 1940, and taught on its faculty for many summers.

Boston University and the New England Conservatory will continue to operate programs at the center.

A large part of this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, who resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony in December, 1967, effective after the festival next Aug. 24.

It is expected that he and William Steinberg, who succeeds Leinsdorf next October, will appear as guest conductors during the summer festival of 1970.

Leinsdorf continues his duties this summer as director of the Berkshire Center.

E

Tangle-less Wood?

By Peter M. Knapp

The naming of a triumvirate to oversee the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood temporarily solves two problems:

The first is to fill the vacancy at Tanglewood beginning in the 1970 season as Erich Leinsdorf leaves the Boston Symphony at the end of this summer's season.

The second is to reduce the work load of the Symphony's music director. Erich Leinsdorf may have been the last music director of the BSO to wear the three-cornered hat of music director of the Boston Symphony's winter season in Symphony Hall, artistic director and principal conductor of the Berkshire Music Festival's Tanglewood concerts, and head of the Berkshire Music Center's educational activities, the summer music school for talented young musicians which is such an important function of the Tanglewood operation.

Indeed, it was precisely this enormous burden of year-round responsibility that Leinsdorf cited as the reason for his resignation. Along with a conducting load of a hundred concerts a year, Leinsdorf had to plan programs for both the winter and summer seasons, select guest soloists, and oversee the music school at Tanglewood as well. It was a crushing burden.

The new Tanglewood setup, however, further divides the Boston Symphony's direction. William Steinberg, Leinsdorf's successor, will be a part-time leader in Boston, sharing his abilities and time with the Pittsburgh orchestra. There will be a parade of guest conductors in Boston the next few years, who will be contenders for the permanent appointment as BSO music director. Steinberg's appointment is understood to be a temporary one.

The Big Two

At Tanglewood, the Symphony trustees have chosen Seiji Ozawa, 33, and Gunther Schuller, 43, as artistic directors. Ozawa will be the principal conductor of the Boston Symphony's summer concerts; Schuller will oversee the Berkshire Music Center's educational activites.

Ozawa is a Tanglewood alumnus, winner of the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Festival, current music director of the Toronto Symphony and future director of the San Francisco Symphony. He was born in Manchuria and began his musical training in Tokyo, and is regarded as one of the finest of the younger generation of jet-age conductors.

Schuller is a modern musical renaissance man, apparently capable of anything — composing, conducting, teaching, writing, you name it. Schuller, onetime horn player in the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, moves with equal facility between jazz and so-called "classical" music, as well as in that musical in-between-land he terms "third-stream." Schuller is president of the New England Conservatory of Music, and head of Contemporary Music Activities at Tanglewood.

The third man in the Tanglewood triumvirate is the redoubtable figure of Leonard Bernstein, who will be an adviser. Bernstein has long Tanglewood associations going back to his student days as Koussevitzky's protege.

GUNTHER SCHULLER

. . . co-director

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

. . . adviser

So while the fatherly figure of William Steinberg, 70, presides over Symphony Hall, the younger generation takes over at Tanglewood. Some interesting summers lie ahead.

The Detroit News
D. 700,321 SUN. 947,155

FEB 19 1969

Ozawa named for Tanglewood

Seiji Ozawa, 33-year-old Japanese conductor, will assume command at Tanglewood in 1970 and his mentor, Leonard Bernstein, will become artistic advisor there.

Tanglewood, located in Lenox, Mass., is the summer home of the Boston Symphony and the most prestigious summer music festival in the U.S. The post became vacant when Erich Leinsdorf recently resigned as Boston Symphony music director.

Ozawa recently signed a contract to succeed Josef Krips as maestro of the San Francisco Symphony. Boston has not yet named a permanent conductor. William Steinberg will do double duty between Pittsburgh and Boston until a successor to Leinsdorf has been named.

Ozawa will guest conduct the Detroit Symphony at Ford Auditorium March 13 and 14 and will lead the N.Y. Philharmonic at Meadow Brook.

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 8,251

FEB 22 1969

Tanglewood Appoints Ozawa And Schuller

Seiji Ozawa and Guther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood beginning in 1970, it was announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Wililam Steinberg will become Music Director this fall.

Ozawa, who was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, is music director of the Toronto Symphony, has served as director of the Ravinia Festival and Japan Phmilharmonic Symphony Orchestra, and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer concert season of which he will be principal conductor, and the other concerts comprising the Berkshire Festival.

Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music and noted American composer, has been a teacher and then head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center during the tenure of Erich Leinsdorf, who has resigned from his present position as director of the Berkshire Muisc Center at the end of the 1969 session.

Schuller's principal concern will be the educational activities at Tanglewood including the Berkshire Music Center. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will continue as chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

Bernstein, who was a student of Serge Koussevitzky at the original session of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and taught on the faculty there in many subsequent summers, will hold the title of adviser to Tanglewood. Although Bernstein will not return to residence at Tanglewood, his long-term connection with Tanglewood will be consultative functions of the post.

Schuller and Ozawa, with the advice of Bernstein, will begin definite planning for 1970 and ensuing seasons in the near future. It is expected that both William Steinberg and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct at Tanglewood. The announcement of more detailed programs and activities will be made at appropriate times.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,[illegible] SUN. 122,607

FEB 20 1969

* * *

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been named as the directors for Tanglewood beginning with the 1970 summer season. The announcement was made Tuesday in New York when the two men were publicly introduced.

Leonard Bernstein has also been appointed as an active advisor to Tanglewood but he will not be in residence.

While there are no distinct lines separating the joint directorship, Ozawa will take general charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and be its principal conductor while Schuller will di- ronto and San Francisco Sym- rect the Berkshire Music School and its concerts.

Ozawa is conductor of the Tophonies. Schuller is currently head of the New England Conservatory of Music and head of contemporary music activities at Tanglewood.

The new directors will succeed Erich Leinsdorf who is retiring as director of Tanglewood and the Boston Symphony at the close of the 1969 summer season. William Steinberg has already been appointed as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its regular season. Both he and Leinsdorf will be present at Tanglewood in 1970 as guest conductors.

The new appointments are part of a move to establish a separate Tanglewood identity. Beyond these appointments no definite plans have been made for the 1970 season.

* * *

San Francisco Examiner
D. 220,372

FEB 24 1969

Ozawa Teams With Schuller At Tanglewood

Seiji Ozawa, who in late 1970 will become regular conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, has been engaged for another big job to start earlier that year.

In the summer of 1970 he and composer-conductor Gunther Schuller will become artistic directors at Tanglewood, Mass., it was announced by the Boston Symphony. Both the famous Berkshire Festival, in which Ozawa will conduct many concerts, and the Berkshire Music Center, in which Schuller (known to San Francisco Opera fans) will be educational director, are part of Tanglewood, a Boston Symphony summer activity.

Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Boston Symphony winter conductor, starting this fall, will be William Steinberg, succeeding Erich Leinsdorf.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

FEB 22 1969 N. Eng

* * *

The appointments of Leonard Bernstein as adviser to the Berkshire Music Center and of conductor Seiji Ozawa and New England Conservatory President Gunther Schuller as artistic directors has been announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was also indicated that the Tanglewood season will probably be expanded to 10 weeks this year, with a pops accent on the extra two weeks.

DAILY TOWN CRIER
WESTPORT, CONN.
CIRC. 11,050

FEB 25 1969 N. Eng.

AT TANGLEWOOD

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood beginning in 1970, it was announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which William Steinberg will become music director this fall.

Ozawa To Direct Tanglewood

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. [illegible] SUN. [illegible]

FEB 24 1969

Boston

Seiji Ozawa has been named co-Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass., along with composer-conductor Gunther Schuller.

The Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony made the announcement, naming Ozawa summer conductor of that orchestra effective from 1970. The year Ozawa assumes directorship of the San Francisco Symphony.

Ozawa, who first conducted at Tanglewood in 1960, has served as director of the Chicago Symphony's Ravinia Festival since 1964. He is at present director of the Japan Philharmonic and Toronto Symphony and associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic and Chief Guest Conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra. He resigned Ravinia last summer and will give up Toronto in 1970.

Our Correspondent

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 856,621 SUN. 1,115,695

FEB 21 1969

MUSICAL CHAIRS: Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed joint artistic directors of the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony. Leonard Bernstein will serve as advisor in absentia, whatever that means. Both Erich Leinsdorf and William Steinberg, the orchestra's immediate past and present conductor's, are expected to wield batons but no administrative responsibilities . . .

Georg Solti will not be free to take over Charles Munch's Orchestre de Paris after all. Instead, the orphaned ensemble has proposed Herbert von Karajan as "permanent music councillor and part-time conductor," and Serge Baudo as unofficial full-time guardian of the standard . . . The ubiquitous von Karajan has agreed to end his five-year self-exile from Vienna in June, 1970. The maestro will return to the scene of his greatest operatic triumphs and tribulations as a guest—leading the Berlin Philharmonic in a special Beethoven series. . .

In one of the most optimistic (and, probably most futile) gestures of the century, the city of San Diego has invited every major—and minor—conductor in America to attend its 200th-anniversary "symphony week," May 3-10. According to a recent release, this means that Leonard Bernstein, Eugene Ormandy, Erich Leinsdorg (sic), George Szell, et al., have been asked to give up their own careers long enough to attend a concert by the San Diego Symphony, be entertained at "civic and private functions," dance at the 20th annual Symphony Ball, and witness the introduction of San Diego's 1969 debutantes. At time of writing, none of the musical celebrities have accepted the invitation.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

FEB 25 1969 E

Directors Named At Tanglewood

NEW YORK, New York — Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood beginning in 1970, it was announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Ozawa, who was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, is music director of the Toronto Symphony and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer concert season of which he will be principal conductor, and the other concerts comprising the Berkshire Festival.

Encore for the Conductors' Waltz

By McLAREN HARRIS

Suddenly the subject is symphony orchestras and conductors again. Like no other week within recent months it blossomed out in several newspapers and in at least two national magazines.

In the March issue of McCall's Abram Chasins embarks on an analysis of "The Rise and Decline of the Boston Symphony," or What Serge Koussevitzky Had That Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf Didn't or Don't, and Does William Steinberg Have It?

IN LAST SUNDAY'S New York Times Donal Henahan interviewed Leinsdorf about the hardships of a conductor on tenure and the coming crises for both orchestras and contemporary music. And yesterday's issue of Life studies prospects for the passing of the baton at the New York Philharmonic and prints Leonard Bernstein's views about the end of the symphonic era.

Finally, the Boston Symphony chose last week to announce new leadership for Tanglewood in the form of a two-plus-one triumvirate of Seiji Ozawa, Gunther Schuller and Bernstein.

There is not sufficient space to cover each angle in depth and the materials are available to the reader in the originals anyway. Briefly, Chasins' essential thesis is that the Boston Symphony's fortunes have been tied closely to properties of leadership, not so much differences in musical ability, whose excellence he concedes for all three of Koussevitzky, Munch and Leinsdorf, but that elusive element of personal chemistry called charisma. In short, a conductor may be the world's finest musician, but without the ability to inspire respect along with hatred he may lose rapport with his orchestra, and when it shows in their playing he loses the audience as well. Koussevitzky had it, says Chasins, while Munch did not and neither does Leinsdorf; we must wait and see about Steinberg.

Koussevitzky did indeed have it, and it seems to have held his orchestra spellbound. After his departure Laning Humphrey approached one of the players and inquired about the orchestra's opinion of Koussevitzky, hinting that some of the men seemed to regard him as an s.o.b. "Of course! Of course!" came the reply. "But he was a fine conductor!"

VAN CLIBURN, internationally-known pianist, will return to Symphony Hall for his annual concert next Sunday at 3 p.m., as an event in the Boston University Celebrity Series. The program will be announced.

WITH MUNCH and Leinsdorf the reaction would probably go to neither extreme. But Chasins also ignores changes in the conductor's position since the old days. If Koussevitzky were starting out today he would not have the absolute hire-or-fire power of old, that having become a matter for negotiation with players' committees, and part of the basis for an orchestra's fear of him would be gone. Then, too, as a full-time conductor he would have to lead over 100 concerts each year, far more than he conducted in any of his 25 seasons here; a few years of that would probably cut deeply into his enthusiasm for more. In a phrase, he would likely not be the Koussevitzky we recall.

Leinsdorf and Bernstein, the latter whom Chasins regards as a great success, have similar views about orchestras and conductors. Leinsdorf decries the work load placed upon conductors these days and the lack of adequate rehearsal time for decent preparation of new works. He sees a widening gulf between composers and public (with the symphony orchestra languishing in the middle), one which may precipitate a musical revolution in coming years. A statement of Bernstein echoes this: "The music director of a symphonic organization has nothing to do but guard the past."

Meanwhile, Life goes on — the magazine, that is — to appraise the prospects for the Philharmonic's podium, mentioning Seiji Ozawa, Zubin Mehta, Colin Davis, Thomas Schippers, Claudio Abbado, Lorin Maazel and Istvan Kertesz as most promising.

With the greatest respect for William Steinberg but with awareness of his age and commitments, we may note that the Boston Symphony's quest is not ended, and that the same list of names, give or take a couple, also applies here. From that I would be tempted to exclude Schippers, no favorite with the orchestra, and Mehta, also known as "Zubi Baby," whose penchant for travel casts him in an unfavorable light with the trustees.

ALTHOUGH DAVIS moves to directorship of Covent Garden in the fall, I'm certain the Symphony hasn't closed its file on him. But look at Ozawa. You can wager that his appointment as a director and principal conductor at Tanglewood was no lightly-considered matter, for the educational and professional activities in Lenox represent a heavy investment. Ozawa's youth, talent and enthusiasm are well known, and the 24 Symphony concerts of the Berkshire Festival over which he will have control would make an excellent proving ground. Further, his contract with the San Francisco Symphony should come up for renewal in 1973, just one year beyond the conclusion of Steinberg's initial term.

If shares in Seiji Ozawa were being traded on the stock exchange, I think I'd buy.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

FEB 23 1969 New Engla

The Detroit News
D. 700,371 SUN. 947,155
FEB 19 1969

Ozawa named for Tanglewood

Seiji Ozawa, 33-year-old Japanese conductor, will assume command at Tanglewood in 1970 and his mentor, Leonard Bernstein, will become artistic advisor there.

Tanglewood, located in Lenox, Mass., is the summer home of the Boston Symphony and the most prestigious summer music festival in the U.S. The post became vacant when Erich Leinsdorf recently resigned as Boston Symphony music director.

Ozawa recently signed a contract to succeed Josef Krips as maestro of the San Francisco Symphony. Boston has not yet named a permanent conductor. William Steinberg will do double duty between Pittsburgh and Boston until a successor to Leinsdorf has been named.

Ozawa will guest conduct the Detroit Symphony at Ford Auditorium March 13 and 14 and will lead the N.Y. Philharmonic at Meadow Brook.

THE TROY RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 8,251
FEB 22 1969

Tanglewood Appoints Ozawa And Schuller

Seiji Ozawa and Guther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood beginning in 1970, it was announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which William Steinberg will become Music Director this fall.

Ozawa, who was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, is music director of the Toronto Symphony, has served as director of the Ravinia Festival and Japan Phmilharmonic Symphony Orchestra, and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer concert season of which he will be principal conductor, and the other concerts comprising the Berkshire Festival.

Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music and noted American composer, has been a teacher and then head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center during the tenure of Erich Leinsdorf, who has resigned from his present position as director of the Berkshire Muisc Center at the end of the 1969 session.

Schuller's principal concern will be the educational activities at Tanglewood including the Berkshire Music Center. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will continue as chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

Bernstein, who was a student of Serge Koussevitzky at the original session of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and taught on the faculty there in many subsequent summers, will hold the title of adviser to Tanglewood. Although Bernstein will not return to residence at Tanglewood, his long-term connection with Tanglewood will be consultative functions of the post.

Schuller and Ozawa, with the advice of Bernstein, will begin definite planning for 1970 and ensuing seasons in the near future. It is expected that both William Steinberg and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct at Tanglewood. The announcement of more detailed programs and activities will be made at appropriate times.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. [illegible] SUN. 122,607
FEB 20 1969

* * *

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been named as the directors for Tanglewood beginning with the 1970 summer season. The announcement was made Tuesday in New York when the two men were publicly introduced.

Leonard Bernstein has also been appointed as an active advisor to Tanglewood but he will not be in residence.

While there are no distinct lines separating the joint directorship, Ozawa will take general charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and be its principal conductor while Schuller will di- ronto and San Francisco Symrect the Berkshire Music School and its concerts.

Ozawa is conductor of the Tophonies. Schuller is currently head of the New England Conservatory of Music and head of contemporary music activities at Tanglewood.

The new directors will succeed Erich Leinsdorf who is retiring as director of Tanglewood and the Boston Symphony at the close of the 1969 summer season. William Steinberg has already been appointed as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its regular season. Both he and Leinsdorf will be present at Tanglewood in 1970 as guest conductors.

The new appointments are part of a move to establish a separate Tanglewood identity. Beyond these appointments no definite plans have been made for the 1970 season.

* * *

San Francisco Examiner
D. 220,372
FEB 24 1969

Ozawa Teams With Schuller At Tanglewood

Seiji Ozawa, who in late 1970 will become regular conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, has been engaged for another big job to start earlier that year.

In the summer of 1970 he and composer-conductor Gunther Schuller will become artistic directors at Tanglewood, Mass., it was announced by the Boston Symphony. Both the famous Berkshire Festival, in which Ozawa will conduct many concerts, and the Berkshire Music Center, in which Schuller (known to San Francisco Opera fans) will be educational director, are part of Tanglewood, a Boston Symphony summer activity.

Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Boston Symphony winter conductor, starting this fall, will be William Steinberg, succeeding Erich Leinsdorf.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 25,800
FEB 22 1969

* * *

The appointments of Leonard Bernstein as adviser to the Berkshire Music Center and of conductor Seiji Ozawa and New England Conservatory President Gunther Schuller as artistic directors has been announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was also indicated that the Tanglewood season will probably be expanded to 10 weeks this year, with a pops accent on the extra two weeks.

DAILY TOWN CRIER
WESTPORT, CONN.
CIRC. 11,050
FEB 25 1969

AT TANGLEWOOD

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood beginning in 1970, it was announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which William Steinberg will become music director this fall.

Ozawa To Direct Tanglewood

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
FEB 24 1969

Boston

Seiji Ozawa has been named co-Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass., along with composer-conductor Gunther Schuller.

The Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony made the announcement, naming Ozawa summer conductor of that orchestra effective from 1970. The year Ozawa assumes directorship of the San Francisco Symphony.

Ozawa, who first conducted at Tanglewood in 1960, has served as director of the Chicago Symphony's Ravinia Festival since 1964. He is at present director of the Japan Philharmonic and Toronto Symphony [illegible] New York Philharmonic. Chief Guest Conductor [illegible] Philadelphia Orchestra [illegible] Ravinia [illegible] and will [illegible] Toronto in 1970.

Our Correspondent

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 256,671 SUN. 1,116,295
FEB 21 1969

MUSICAL CHAIRS: Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed joint artistic directors of the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony. Leonard Bernstein will serve as advisor in absentia, whatever that means. Both Erich Leinsdorf and William Steinberg, the orchestra's immediate past and present conductor's, are expected to wield batons but no administrative responsibilities . . .

Georg Solti will not be free to take over Charles Munch's Orchestre de Paris after all. Instead, the orphaned ensemble has proposed Herbert von Karajan as "permanent music councillor and part-time conductor," and Serge Baudo as unofficial full-time guardian of the standard . . . The ubiquitous von Karajan has agreed to end his five-year self-exile from Vienna in June, 1970. The maestro will return to the scene of his greatest operatic triumphs and tribulations as a guest—leading the Berlin Philharmonic in a special Beethoven series. . .

In one of the most optimistic (and, probably most futile) gestures of the century, the city of San Diego has invited every major—and minor—conductor in America to attend its 200th-anniversary "symphony week," May 3-10. According to a recent release, this means that Leonard Bernstein, Eugene Ormandy, Erich Leinsdorg (sic), George Szell, et al., have been asked to give up their own careers long enough to attend a concert by the San Diego Symphony, be entertained at "civic and private functions," dance at the 20th annual Symphony Ball, and witness the introduction of San Diego's 1969 debutantes. At time of writing, none of the musical celebrities have accepted the invitation.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
FEB 25 1969

Directors Named At Tanglewood

NEW YORK, New York — Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood beginning in 1970, it was announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Ozawa, who was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, is music director of the Toronto Symphony and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer concert season of which he will be principal conductor, and the other concerts comprising the Berkshire Festival.

Encore for the Conductors' Waltz

By McLAREN HARRIS

Suddenly the subject is symphony orchestras and conductors again. Like no other week within recent months it blossomed out in several newspapers and in at least two national magazines.

In the March issue of McCall's Abram Chasins embarks on an analysis of "The Rise and Decline of the Boston Symphony," or What Serge Koussevitzky Had That Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf Didn't or Don't, and Does William Steinberg Have It?

IN LAST SUNDAY'S New York Times Donal Henahan interviewed Leinsdorf about the hardships of a conductor on tenure and the coming crises for both orchestras and contemporary music. And yesterday's issue of Life studies prospects for the passing of the baton at the New York Philharmonic and prints Leonard Bernstein's views about the end of the symphonic era.

Finally, the Boston Symphony chose last week to announce new leadership for Tanglewood in the form of a two-plus-one triumvirate of Seiji Ozawa, Gunther Schuller and Bernstein.

There is not sufficient space to cover each angle in depth and the materials are available to the reader in the originals anyway. Briefly, Chasins' essential thesis is that the Boston Symphony's fortunes have been tied closely to properties of leadership, not so much differences in musical ability, whose excellence he concedes for all three of Koussevitzky, Munch and Leinsdorf, but that elusive element of personal chemistry called charisma. In short, a conductor may be the world's finest musician, but without the ability to inspire respect along with hatred he may lose rapport with his orchestra, and when it shows in their playing he loses the audience as well. Koussevitzky had it, says Chasins, while Munch did not and neither does Leinsdorf; we must wait and see about Steinberg.

Koussevitzky did indeed have it, and it seems to have held his orchestra spellbound. After his departure Laning Humphrey approached one of the players and inquired about the orchestra's opinion of Koussevitzky, hinting that some of the men seemed to regard him as an s.o.b. "Of course! Of course!" came the reply. "But he was a fine conductor!"

VAN CLIBURN, internationally-known pianist, will return to Symphony Hall for his annual concert next Sunday at 3 p.m., as an event in the Boston University Celebrity Series. The program will be announced.

WITH MUNCH and Leinsdorf the reaction would probably go to neither extreme. But Chasins also ignores changes in the conductor's position since the old days. If Koussevitzky were starting out today he would not have the absolute hire-or-fire power of old, that having become a matter for negotiation with players' committees, and part of the basis for an orchestra's fear of him would be gone. Then, too, as a full-time conductor he would have to lead over 100 concerts each year, far more than he conducted in any of his 25 seasons here; a few years of that would probably cut deeply into his enthusiasm for more. In a phrase, he would likely not be the Koussevitzky we recall.

Leinsdorf and Bernstein, the latter whom Chasins regards as a great success, have similar views about orchestras and conductors. Leinsdorf decries the work load placed upon conductors these days and the lack of adequate rehearsal time for decent preparation of new works. He sees a widening gulf between composers and public (with the symphony orchestra languishing in the middle), one which may precipitate a musical revolution in coming years. A statement of Bernstein echoes this: "The music director of a symphonic organization has nothing to do but guard the past."

Meanwhile, Life goes on — the magazine, that is — to appraise the prospects for the Philharmonic's podium, mentioning Seiji Ozawa, Zubin Mehta, Colin Davis, Thomas Schippers, Claudio Abbado, Lorin Maazel and Istvan Kertesz as most promising.

With the greatest respect for William Steinberg but with awareness of his age and commitments, we may note that the Boston Symphony's quest is not ended, and that the same list of names, give or take a couple, also applies here. From that I would be tempted to exclude Schippers, no favorite with the orchestra, and Mehta, also known as "Zubi Baby," whose penchant for travel casts him in an unfavorable light with the trustees.

ALTHOUGH DAVIS moves to directorship of Covent Garden in the fall, I'm certain the Symphony hasn't closed its file on him. But look at Ozawa. You can wager that his appointment as a director and principal conductor at Tanglewood was no lightly-considered matter, for the educational and professional activities in Lenox represent a heavy investment. Ozawa's youth, talent and enthusiasm are well known, and the 24 Symphony concerts of the Berkshire Festival over which he will have control would make an excellent proving ground. Further, his contract with the San Francisco Symphony should come up for renewal in 1973, just one year beyond the conclusion of Steinberg's initial term.

If shares in Seiji Ozawa were being traded on the stock exchange, I think I'd buy.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
FEB 23 1969

158

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357

FEB 25 1969

Music Notes

Cleveland, Boston Hire 3 Conductors

By Paul Hume

Conductors keep right on making music news: Pierre Boulez has just been named Principal Guest Conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, beginning this summer at the Blossom Music Festival. Composer-conductor Boulez, who by no means specializes in contemporary music in his very popular conducting of the orchestra George Szell has made great, also recently accepted the post of music director of the BBC Symphony in London.

The Boston Symphony has just named Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller as Artistic Directors of its summer music center at Tanglewood in Massachusetts. This puts a formidable array of men in charge of the multitude of responsibilities centering around that orchestra.

Next fall William Steinberg becomes the Boston's Music Director, retaining the same title over the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Schuller, now president of the New England Conservatory, will be in specific charge of the Boston's education program at Tanglewood. Ozawa will be Principal Conductor of the orchestra's summer concerts at the Berkshire Festival.

Ozawa, who is now conductor of the Toronto Symphony and Music Director of the Chicago Symphony's summer music at Ravinia, becomes Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony in the fall of 1970. At that time he will be wintering in San Francisco and summering in Massachusetts, having left Toronto and Ravinia.

THE MINNEAPOLIS STAR
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
D. 282,219

FEB 26 1969.

Joint Directors for Tanglewood Festival Picked

Special to The Minneapolis Star

TANGLEWOOD, Mass.—Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed joint directors of the Tanglewood Music Festival, effective in the summer of 1970. Leonard Bernstein has been appointed advisor to Tanglewood.

Ozawa is music director of the Toronto Symphony and conductor-designate of the San Francisco Symphony. Schuller, famed for his experiments linking jazz and classical music, is director of the New England Conservatory.

Ozawa and Schuller will be responsible for planning of the annual summer series at Tanglewood, including Boston Symphony concerts and other presentations. Ozawa also will serve as principal conductor of the orchestra during the summer.

One of the reasons Eric Leinsdorf retired as Boston Symphony music director was the requirement that he conduct in the summer, and Leinsdorf's successor, William Steinberg, has also shunned full responsibility for Tanglewood.

Tanglewood Has Ozawa, Schuller & Bernstein

NEW YORK, N. Y. — Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood beginning in 1970, it was announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which William Steinberg will become music director this fall.

Ozawa, who was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, is music director of the Toronto Symphony, has served as director of the Ravinia Festival and Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer concert season, of which he will be principal conductor, and the other concerts comprising the Berkshire Festival.

Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music and noted American composer, has been a teacher and then head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center during the tenure of Erich Leinsdorf, who has resigned from his present position as director of the Berkshire Music Center at the end of the 1969 session. Schuller's principal concern will be the educational activities at Tanglewood including the Berkshire Music Center. Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music also operate programs at Tanglewood in cooperation with the Berkshire Music Center. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will continue as chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

Bernstein, who was a student of Serge Koussevitzky at the original session of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and taught on the faculty there in many subsequent summers, will hold the title of adviser to Tanglewood. Although, Bernstein will not return to residence at Tanglewood, his long-term connection with Tanglewood will be formalized in the principally consultative functions of the post.

Schuller and Ozawa, with the advice of Bernstein, will begin definite planning for 1970 and ensuing seasons in the near future. It is expected that both William Steinberg and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct at Tanglewood. The announcement of more detailed programs and activities will be made at appropriate times.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,600

FEB 28 1969

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 9,017

FEB 27 1969

Ozawa and Schuller Given Tanglewood Artistic Posts

NEW YORK—Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors for Tanglewood's Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center beginning next year. Leonard Bernstein will serve as non-resident advisor.

Ozawa, music director of the Toronto Symphony, will be involved primarily with the Boston Symphony's summer concert season of which he will be principal conductor, and other concerts of the festival. He also will record his first albums with the Boston: a Stravinsky LP and Orff's "Carmina Burana," both for RCA. Ozawa, an RCA artist, has recording sessions with the Chicago Symphony set for this summer. He will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970.

Schuller, a composer and president of the New England Conservatory of Music, has been a teacher and then head of Contemporary Music Activities during the tenure of Erich Leinsdorf, who has resigned as director of the Center effective after this summer. Schuller's principal responsibilities at Tanglewood will be in the educational sphere.

Joseph Silberstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will continue as chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Leinsdorf and William Steinberg, who succeeds him as the Boston's music director this fall, will be among the guest conductors in 1970.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

MAR 1 1969

Artistic Directors Named for Tanglewood '70 Season

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

SEIJI OZAWA

GUNTHER SCHULLER

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood beginning in 1970, it was announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which William Steinberg will become music director this fall.

Mr. Ozawa, who was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, is music director of the Toronto Symphony, has served as director of the Ravinia Festival and Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer concert season of which he will be principal conductor and the other concerts comprising the Berkshire Festival.

Mr. Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music and noted American composer, has been a teacher and then head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center during the tenure of Erich Leinsdorf, who has resigned from his present position as director of the Berkshire Music Center at the end of the 1969 session. Mr. Schuller's principal concern will be the educational activities at Tanglewood including the Berkshire Music Center. Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music also operate programs at Tanglewood in cooperation with the Berkshire Music Center. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will continue as chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

Mr. Bernstein, who was a student of Serge Koussevitzky at the original session of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and taught on the faculty there in many subsequent summers, will hold the title of adviser to Tanglewood. Although Mr. Bernstein will not return to residence at Tanglewood, his long-term connection with Tanglewood will be formalized in the principally consultative functions of the post.

Messrs. Schuller and Ozawa, with the advice of Mr. Bernstein, will begin definite planning for 1970 and ensuing seasons in the near future. It is expected that both William Steinberg and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct at Tanglewood. The announcement of more detailed programs and activities will be made at appropriate times.

RECORD
Hackensack, N.J.
E-137,868

MAR 3 1969

Tanglewood Gets Ozawa, Schuller

NEW YORK — Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors of Tanglewood beginning in 1970.

Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said that in addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as advisor to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which William Steinberg will become music director this fall.

Ozawa, a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, is music director of the Toronto Symphony, has served as director of the Ravinia Festival and Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970.

Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music and noted American composer, has been a teacher and head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center during the tenure of Erich Leinsdorf.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,900

FEB 28 1969

Ozawa & Schuller 1970 Tanglewood Directors

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood beginning in 1970, it was announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which William Steinberg will become Music Director this fall.

Messrs Schuller and Ozawa, with the advice of Mr Bernstein, will begin definite planning for 1970 and ensuing seasons in the near future. It is expected that both William Steinberg and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct at Tanglewood. The announcement of more detailed programs and activities will be made at appropriate times.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

MAR 6 1969

MAJORS AND MINORS

A SALAZAR COMEBACK? The release of invalid Antonio Salazar from a Lisbon hospital in February has posed new problems for Portugal. Until a massive brain hemorrhage crippled the 79-year-old Portuguese Premier last September, Salazar had held dictatorial sway over the country for 40 years. After his near-fatal hemorrhage, Portuguese officials named Marcello Caetano to replace Salazar as Premier [see news review, Oct. 11, 1968, issue].

Dr. Salazar's condition has been termed stationary. Doctors say his left side is paralyzed and his comprehension and conversation are very limited. Most medical authorities believe he will never recover his full mental capacities.

However, Salazar remains head of the National Union party, the only political party legally allowed in Portugal. Ultra-conservatives within the party have cited Salazar's possible recovery as a reason for continuing the strict policies that Salazar imposed. Premier Caetano, however, has begun to liberalize some of those policies.

NEW BEATS FOR TANGLEWOOD. Ever since he announced his resignation as director of the New York Philharmonic (effective this May), many have wondered where Leonard Bernstein would go next. Part of the answer has been revealed—for his summers, anyway. Bernstein has been named music adviser to the Boston Symphony's summer music school and festival at Tanglewood, Mass., starting in 1970.

At the same time Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller were named to even more significant Tanglewood posts. Ozawa, 33, the Manchuria-born conductor who has had a meteoric rise to fame in the U.S. and Canada, was named principal conductor for Tanglewood concerts—the youngest ever to hold this major U.S. music post. Schuller, 42, will head Tanglewood's educational activities.

Bernstein . . . new post

Ozawa . . . upbeat for youth

Both Ozawa and Bernstein are former Tanglewood students. Schuller, who has long divided his time between jazz and classics, was the first to present a jazz concert at Tanglewood (in 1963), and succeeded composer Aaron Copland as head of Tanglewood's composition department in 1965.

All three men are internationally renowned for their championship of new music, as well as for their work with young people. Thus Tanglewood, the "granddaddy" of U.S. music festivals, appears to be "thinking young" and not just resting on past laurels for the 1970's.

SAN DIEGO'S 200TH. This year—all 365 days of it—is the year San Diego, Cal., does itself proud. The southern California city is now into the third month of festivities to mark the 200th year of its founding by Spanish monks in 1769.

To people who remember that the California Gold Rush didn't begin until 1848 and that the state only joined the Union in 1850, San Diego's 200th anniversary celebrations might come as a surprise. But the city's original site was the Mission of San Diego (Spanish for St. James) de Alcala, founded by Franciscan monk Junipero Serra in 1769. Today the San Diego area has 1.3 million inhabitants—a far cry from the seven monks who kept the original mission going.

Ironically, the mission (restored in 1931) is now threatened with demolition to make way for a projected freeway. But San Diego's going ahead with its celebrations—and may be the first city ever to throw a year-long birthday party.

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,293,800

MAR 7 1969

SCHOLASTIC TEACHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD WEEK EDITION
W. 231,000

MAR 7 1969

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357

FEB 25 1969

Music Notes

Cleveland, Boston Hire 3 Conductors

By Paul Hume

Conductors keep right on making music news: Pierre Boulez has just been named Principal Guest Conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, beginning this summer at the Blossom Music Festival. Composer-conductor Boulez, who by no means specializes in contemporary music in his very popular conducting of the orchestra George Szell has made great, also recently accepted the post of music director of the BBC Symphony in London.

The Boston Symphony has just named Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller as Artistic Directors of its summer music center at Tanglewood in Massachusetts. This puts a formidable array of men in charge of the multitude of responsibilities centering around that orchestra.

Next fall William Steinberg becomes the Boston's Music Director, retaining the same title over the Pittsburgh Symphony.

Schuller, now president of the New England Conservatory, will be in specific charge of the Boston's education program at Tanglewood. Ozawa will be Principal Conductor of the orchestra's summer concerts at the Berkshire Festival.

Ozawa, who is now conductor of the Toronto Symphony and Music Director of the Chicago Symphony's summer music at Ravinia, becomes Music Director of the, San Francisco Symphony in the fall of 1970. At that time he will be wintering in San Francisco and summering in Massachusetts, having left Toronto and Ravinia.

THE MINNEAPOLIS STAR
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

FEB 26 1969.

Joint Directors for Tanglewood Festival Picked

Special to The Minneapolis Star

TANGLEWOOD, Mass.—Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed joint directors of the Tanglewood Music Festival, effective in the summer of 1970. Leonard Bernstein has been appointed advisor to Tanglewood.

Ozawa is music director of the Toronto Symphony and conductor-designate of the San Francisco Symphony. Schuller, famed for his experiments linking jazz and classical music, is director of the New England Conservatory.

Ozawa and Schuller will be responsible for planning of the annual summer series at Tanglewood, including Boston Symphony concerts and other presentations. Ozawa also will serve as principal conductor of the orchestra during the summer.

One of the reasons Eric Leinsdorf retired as Boston Symphony music director was the requirement that he conduct in the summer, and Leinsdorf's successor, William Steinberg, has also shunned full responsibility for Tanglewood.

Tanglewood Has Ozawa, Schuller & Bernstein

NEW YORK, N. Y. — Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood beginning in 1970, it was announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which William Steinberg will become music director this fall.

Ozawa, who was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, is music director of the Toronto Symphony, has served as director of the Ravinia Festival and Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer concert season, of which he will be principal conductor, and the other concerts comprising the Berkshire Festival.

Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music and noted American composer, has been a teacher and then head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center during the tenure of Erich Leinsdorf, who has resigned from his present position as director of the Berkshire Music Center at the end of the 1969 session. Schuller's principal concern will be the educational activities at Tanglewood including the Berkshire Music Center. Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music also operate programs at Tanglewood in cooperation with the Berkshire Music Center. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will continue as chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

Bernstein, who was a student of Serge Koussevitzky at the original session of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and taught on the faculty there in many subsequent summers, will hold the title of adviser to Tanglewood. Although, Bernstein will not return to residence at Tanglewood, his long-term connection with Tanglewood will be formalized in the principally consultative functions of the post.

Schuller and Ozawa, with the advice of Bernstein, will begin definite planning for 1970 and ensuing seasons in the near future. It is expected that both William Steinberg and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct at Tanglewood. The announcement of more detailed programs and activities will be made at appropriate times.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,600

FEB 28 1969

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 9,017

FEB 27 1969

Ozawa and Schuller Given Tanglewood Artistic Posts

NEW YORK—Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors for Tanglewood's Berkshire Festival and Berkshire Music Center beginning next year. Leonard Bernstein will serve as non-resident advisor.

Ozawa, music director of the Toronto Symphony, will be involved primarily with the Boston Symphony's summer concert season of which he will be principal conductor, and other concerts of the festival. He also will record his first albums with the Boston: a Stravinsky LP and Orff's "Carmina Burana," both for RCA. Ozawa, an RCA artist, has recording sessions with the Chicago Symphony set for this summer. He will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970.

Schuller, a composer and president of the New England Conservatory of Music, has been a teacher and then head of Contemporary Music Activities during the tenure of Erich Leinsdorf, who has resigned as director of the Center effective after this summer. Schuller's principal responsibilities at Tanglewood will be in the educational sphere.

Joseph Silberstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, will continue as chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Leinsdorf and William Steinberg, who succeeds him as the Boston's music director this fall, will be among the guest conductors in 1970.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

MAR 1 1969

RECORD
Hackensack, N.J.
E-137,868

Artistic Directors Named for Tanglewood '70 Season

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

SEIJI OZAWA

GUNTHER SCHULLER

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood beginning in 1970, it was announced by Talcott M Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which William Steinberg will become music director this fall.

Mr. Ozawa, who was a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, is music director of the Toronto Symphony, has served as director of the Ravinia Festival and Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. His primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer concert season, of which he will be principal conductor and the other concerts comprising the Berkshire Festival.

Mr Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music and noted American composer, has been a teacher and then head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center during the tenure of Erich Leinsdorf, who has resigned from his present position as director of the Berkshire Music Center at the end of the 1969 session. Mr. Schuller's principal concern will be the educational activities at Tanglewood including the Berkshire Music Center. Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music also operate programs at Tanglewood in cooperation with the Berkshire Music Center. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will continue as chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

Mr. Bernstein, who was a student of Serge Koussevitzky at the original session of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 and taught on the faculty there in many subsequent summers, will hold the title of adviser to Tanglewood. Although Mr. Bernstein will not return to residence at Tanglewood, his long-term connection with Tanglewood will be formalized in the principally consultative functions of the post.

Messrs. Schuller and Ozawa, with the advice of Mr. Bernstein, will begin definite planning for 1970 and ensuing seasons in the near future. It is expected that both William Steinberg and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct at Tanglewood. The announcement of more detailed programs and activities will be made at appropriate times.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,900

FEB 28 1969

Ozawa & Schuller 1970 Tanglewood Directors

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood beginning in 1970, it was announced by Talcott M. Banks, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as adviser to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which William Steinberg will become Music Director this fall.

Messrs Schuller and Ozawa, with the advice of Mr Bernstein, will begin definite planning for 1970 and ensuing seasons in the near future. It is expected that both William Steinberg and Erich Leinsdorf will conduct at Tanglewood. The announcement of more detailed programs and activities will be made at appropriate times.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

MAR 6 1969

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINES
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,295,000

MAR 7 1969

Tanglewood Gets Ozawa, Schuller

NEW YORK — Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors of Tanglewood beginning in 1970.

Talcott M. Banks, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said that in addition, Leonard Bernstein has agreed to serve as advisor to Tanglewood. Both the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center are part of Tanglewood, an activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which William Steinberg will become music director this fall.

Ozawa, a student at Tanglewood in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, is music director of the Toronto Symphony, has served as director of the Ravinia Festival and Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra, and will become music director of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970.

Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music and noted American composer, has been a teacher and head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center during the tenure of Erich Leinsdorf.

MAJORS AND MINORS

A SALAZAR COMEBACK? The release of invalid Antonio Salazar from a Lisbon hospital in February has posed new problems for Portugal. Until a massive brain hemorrhage crippled the 79-year-old Portuguese Premier last September, Salazar had held dictatorial sway over the country for 40 years. After his near-fatal hemorrhage, Portuguese officials named Marcello Caetano to replace Salazar as Premier [see news review, Oct. 11, 1968, issue].

Dr. Salazar's condition has been termed stationary. Doctors say his left side is paralyzed and his comprehension and conversation are very limited. Most medical authorities believe he will never recover his full mental capacities.

However, Salazar remains head of the National Union party, the only political party legally allowed in Portugal. Ultra-conservatives within the party have cited Salazar's possible recovery as a reason for continuing the strict policies that Salazar imposed. Premier Caetano, however, has begun to liberalize some of those policies.

NEW BEATS FOR TANGLEWOOD. Ever since he announced his resignation as director of the New York Philharmonic (effective this May), many have wondered where Leonard Bernstein would go next. Part of the answer has been revealed—for his summers, anyway. Bernstein has been named music adviser to the Boston Symphony's summer music school and festival at Tanglewood, Mass., starting in 1970.

At the same time Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller were named to even more significant Tanglewood posts. Ozawa, 33, the Manchuria-born conductor who has had a meteoric rise to fame in the U.S. and Canada, was named principal conductor for Tanglewood concerts—the youngest ever to hold this major U.S. music post. Schuller, 42, will head Tanglewood's educational activities.

Bernstein . . . new post

Ozawa . . . upbeat for youth

Both Ozawa and Bernstein are former Tanglewood students. Schuller, who has long divided his time between jazz and classics, was the first to present a jazz concert at Tanglewood (in 1963), and succeeded composer Aaron Copland as head of Tanglewood's composition department in 1965.

All three men are internationally renowned for their championship of new music, as well as for their work with young people. Thus Tanglewood, the "granddaddy" of U.S. music festivals, appears to be "thinking young" and not just resting on past laurels for the 1970's.

SAN DIEGO'S 200TH. This year—all 365 days of it—is the year San Diego, Cal., does itself proud. The southern California city is now into the third month of festivities to mark the 200th year of its founding by Spanish monks in 1769.

To people who remember that the California Gold Rush didn't begin until 1848 and that the state only joined the Union in 1850, San Diego's 200th anniversary celebrations might come as a surprise. But the city's original site was the Mission of San Diego (Spanish for St. James) de Alcala, founded by Franciscan monk Junipero Serra in 1769. Today the San Diego area has 1.3 million inhabitants—a far cry from the seven monks who kept the original mission going.

Ironically, the mission (restored in 1931) is now threatened with demolition to make way for a projected freeway. But San Diego's going ahead with its celebrations—and may be the first city ever to throw a year-long birthday party.

MAR 7 1969

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 421,356
MAR 25 1969

Music and Dance Notes. Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood, home of the Berkshire Music Festival and Music Center, beginning next year. In addition, Leonard Bernstein will serve as artistic adviser . . . Jerome Robbins will choreograph a new ballet for the May 8 spring gala benefit of the New York City Ballet. Also on the special program will be new ballets by George Balanchine and youthful dancer-choreographer John Clifford.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100
APR 1969

APPOINTMENTS . . . Howard Mitchell who retires to the status of Principal Guest Conductor of the Washington National Symphony at the end of the 1970-71 season, has been appointed Music Director and Chief Conductor of the S.O.D.R.E. Orchestra (Servicio Oficial de Redifusión Eléctrico), which is the prevailing musical body in the national life of Uruguay, starting this May. Dr. Mitchell will be succeeded in Washington by Antal Dorati. Until that time he will serve as Music Director of both the Washington and Montevideo orchestras . . . Norman Leyden, Conductor of the Westchester (New York) Youth Symphony and the Chappaqua Chamber Orchestra, is serving as Conductor of the Portland (Oregon) Junior Symphony while Jacob Avshalomov is on sabbatical leave . . . Phillip C. Spurgeon has been offered the post of Resident Conductor of the Phoenix Symphony Orchestra beginning next season. In this capacity, Mr. Spurgeon will conduct two of twelve subscription concert pairs and coordinate all music programing, including programs submitted by guest conductors and artists. In addition he will conduct all children's, family and special concerts, and all out-of-town performances. Keenly interested in young people, he will serve as advisor to the Phoenix Symphony Guild's youth performance groups, including the Phoenix Youth Orchestra, Symphonette and String Symphony . . . Seiji Ozawa, Music Director and Conductor of the Toronto Symphony, has been appointed Artistic Director of Tanglewood's Berkshire Festival starting in 1970. He will share the honor with Gunther Schuller, noted American composer and President of the New England Conservatory of Music. Mr. Ozawa's primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer concert season and other concerts comprising the Berkshire Festival while Mr. Schuller's principal concern will be educational activities at Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center. Leonard Bernstein will serve as Advisor to Tanglewood.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144
APR 28 1969

HOWARD MITCHELL who'll be conducting the National Symphony when it performs at the Troy Music Hall in the upcoming Troy Chromatic Society season, will retire to the status of principal guest conductor at the end of 1970-71 season. He has been appointed music director and chief conductor of the S.O.D.R.E. orchestra, the major music body in Uruguay. Until '70-71 he will conduct both orchestras. Antal Dorati will succeed him.

Seiji Ozawa, who makes an annual appearance guest conducting at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center each summer when the Philadelphia Orchestra is performing in August, will be artistic director of Tangelwoods' Berkshire Festival at Lenox, Mass. starting in 1970. Co-director will be Gunther Schuller. Ozawa will have charge of the summer concert season and schuller, now head of the New England Conservatory and a "graduate" of Tanglewood will be taking care of the educational end of things. Leonard Bernstein, incidentally, will be serving as an advisor.

The organ recital by Hugh Allen Wilson, scheduled for next Monday in the Union College Chapel, has been cancelled.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
MAY 1969

. . Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors and Leonard Bernstein adviser at Tanglewood Festival, beginning in 1970. . . . New conductor of the Phoenix Symphony is Phillip C. Spurgeon. . . . Conrad Susa, a regular contributor to this magazine, has been appointed music director for the Stratford (Conn.) Shakespeare Festival, and will compose the music for Hamlet, Much Ado About Nothing, and Chekhov's Three Sisters. . . . Edward Warner has resigned as executive director and president of Affiliate Artists, and baritone Sherrill Milnes will serve as interim president. . . . Ernest Fleischmann, former general manager of the London Symphony, has been appointed executive director of the Southern California-Hollywood Bowl Association.

Stefan Bauer-Mengelberg has been named visiting professor of music at the School of Performing Arts, University of Southern California, for the academic year 1969–70. . . . Three music critics have been appointed to administer the Music Critics Internship Program at Tanglewood's Berkshire Music School: Charles Fowler, Raymond Morin, and Elliott W. Galkin.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,635 SUN. 122,607
MAR 30 1969

Tanglewood's Triumvirate

New Era for Music?

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

The formation of a new triumvirate to run the Berkshire Music Festival, made public about a month ago by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, quite possibly augurs a new era in symphony concerts and particularly in summer music festivals.

The appointment of Seiji Ozawa as director in charge of the Boston Symphony and Gunther Schuller as director of the Berkshire Music School, both under the advisorship of Leonard Bernstein, immediately indicates the injection of new blood into the organization and into one of the oldest summer festivals in the United States.

It also, most likely, indicates the injection of new ideas into one of the firmly entrenched "establishment" orchestras and into the summer circuit, which in recent seasons has become the bulwark of conservative programming.

General Complaint . . .

A year ago there was a general complaint that area summer music festivals, most particularly, the Saratoga Performing Arts Center and Tanglewood, were monumental examples of the lack of imagination and sense of adventure which were making symphony concerts stuffy, generally uninteresting and possibly anachronistic.

The complaint seems to have indicated the development of a new taste and sophistication in summer audiences. The reliance on Beethoven, Tchaikowsky and Rachmaninoff which marked the seasons at Saratoga and Tanglewood last summer was a reflection of management tendencies at festivals throughout the country.

But local directors were evidently in tune with the growing sentiment for variety. The appointment of the new triumvirate is one indication of management sympathy with this point of view.

The program for the Philadelphia Orchestra as announced by the Saratoga Performing Arts Center a few months ago is a second indication of new thinking in summer programming.

The SPAC program does include the inevitable Van Cliburn appearances (as will the Tanglewood schedule) and a few other traditional bulwarks. But it also moves solidly away from the old type of three "B" formula which was so useful in the first formative years of the Festival because of the need to attract and build new audiences.

But summer music festivals are coming of age.

Ozawa will take over the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood in 1970, a year from now. Erich Leinsdorf still has one more summer remaining in his tenure with the orchestra which ends at the close of the coming season in August. Leinsdorf's residency in Boston has often been regarded as one of the least imaginative and least colorful in the orchestra's history.

No Lack of Involvement . . .

Ozawa, on the other hand, is a young and vibrant conductor who almost seems to have first made a splash on the concert circuit and then settled down to becoming an accomplished and serious conductor of stature. At any rate there is no lack of involvement in an Ozawa performance.

OZAWA-SCHULLER-BERNSTEIN
An injection of new ideas into the summer circuit . . .

Schuller, as a modern composer and director of the New England Conservatory of Music, is moving to his new position from his current one as director of contemporary activities at the Berkshire Center.

Bernstein's reputation hardly needs amplification. He will not actually be in residence at Tanglewood but will direct and advise and hopefully make a number of personal appearances.

The appointment of Ozawa particularly has ramifications beyond the summer circuit,

Continued on Page 5

Music: New Era for Festivals?

Continued from Page 1

however. In effect, this will mean two permanent conductors for the Boston Symphony Orchestra since William Steinberg succeeds Leinsdorf as music director of the orchestra in the fall.

This phenomenon of a two-conductor orchestra was necessitated by the development of the two-orchestra conductor. Faced with a conductor vacancy and nobody to fill it (an almost universal orchestral problem these days) the Boston Symphony turned to Steinberg who is already conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony and will continue in that capacity.

Steinberg's split duties have necessitated a kind of split season for the orchestra. He will be in Boston for the first twelve weeks of the winter season and make occasional appearances throughout the year including the summer.

But something stronger than a string of guest conductors was needed to hold the orchestra together during the remainder of the year and most particularly during the summer. The answer appears to be Ozawa.

And Ozawa is already conductor of the Toronto Symphony and will become conductor of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. A very frequent guest conductor with other orchestras, particularly the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York, Philadelphia and at Saratoga, Ozawa may have to stay closer to home in future seasons.

Personality Struggle . . .

In the past orchestras have tended to have very distinct personalities molded by a single conductor and these tended to be as exciting or unimaginative as the conductor himself. Faced with two conductors of widely varying age (Ozawa is barely half the age of Steinberg), experience and dramatic ideas, the Boston Symphony may be faced with a personality struggle, but a struggle that very well may end in a less pat, more exciting orchestra, both less predictable and more vital.

At any rate a few innovations and interesting developments can be expected at Tanglewood in the next few seasons if the talents and personalities of the new directors are any indication.

MAESTRO WILLIAM STEINBERG
Two-orchestra conductor . . .

As a postscript it should be noted that these appointments also indicate a move on the part of the Boston management to unify Tanglewood. In the past there has been a technical distinction between the Berkshire Music Center, the educational facility, and Tanglewood, the summer division of the Boston Symphony Orchestra operation. In the future it will all be Tanglewood officially. It already is in the minds of most of the public.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 47,948
APR 26 1969

. . . Philip Beaudry) September 3, Douglas Rafter, and on September 10, Rev. David Gallagher.

Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music, has announced that the Conservatory will again sponsor in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center, a summer "Institute at Tanglewood" offering courses in jazz and music education. There will be three-week sessions taught by reknowned jazz musicians David Baker and Jerry Coker. Each seminar will include jazz performance techniques, jazz improvisions, and fundamentals of theory pertaining to jazz. Jazz ensembles will be formed and performances given.

The music education program, under the direction of Herbert Alper, chairman of the music education department at the Conservatory, consists of two courses: "Contemporary Composition" and "Mid-Twentieth Century Trends in Music Education".

And turning further to Tanglewood a most pleasant announcement by president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Talcott M. Banks, was to the effect that beginning next season the summer program would be operated under the auspices of Gunther Schuller, Seiji Ozawa and Leonard Bernstein.

This will be another phase in the career of the Conservatory's president. Aside from the educational field where he gained high standing while serving an associate professorship on the Yale University faculty, Schuller has established himself among the leaders in today's modern world of music. His book which was published a year ago, "Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development" has been called "the definitive work . . . unparalled in the literature of jazz."

As a composer he has entered the world of opera nothing short of brilliantly. Among his works in this field are, a jazz-oriented opera "The Visitation, commissioned by the Hamburg State Opera, and in the very early creative state, a children's opera "The Fisherman and His Wife" for which John Updike will provide the libretto. This latter work has been commissioned by the Junior League of Boston.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 421,356

MAR 25 1969

* * *

Music and Dance Notes. Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors at Tanglewood, home of the Berkshire Music Festival and Music Center, beginning next year. In addition, Leonard Bernstein will serve as artistic adviser . . . Jerome Robbins will choreograph a new ballet for the May 8 spring gala benefit of the New York City Ballet. Also on the special program will be new ballets by George Balanchine and youthful dancer-choreographer John Clifford.

SYMPHONIC HIGHLIGHTS

APPOINTMENTS Howard Mitchell, who retires to the status of Principal Guest Conductor of the Washington National Symphony at the end of the 1970-71 season, has been appointed Music Director and Chief Conductor of the S.O.D.R.E. Orchestra (Servicio Oficial de Redifusión Eléctrico), which is the prevailing musical body in the national life of Uruguay, starting this May. Dr. Mitchell will be succeeded in Washington by Antal Dorati. Until that time he will serve as Music Director of both the Washington and Montevideo orchestras . . . Norman Leyden, Conductor of the Westchester (New York) Youth Symphony and the Chappaqua Chamber Orchestra, is serving as Conductor of the Portland (Oregon) Junior Symphony while Jacob Avshalomov is on sabbatical leave . . . Phillip C. Spurgeon has been offered the post of Resident Conductor of the Phoenix Symphony Orchestra beginning next season. In this capacity, Mr. Spurgeon will conduct two of twelve subscription concert pairs and coordinate all music programing, including programs submitted by guest conductors and artists. In addition he will conduct all children's, family and special concerts, and all out-of-town performances. Keenly interested in young people, he will serve as advisor to the Phoenix Symphony Guild's youth performance groups, including the Phoenix Youth Orchestra, Symphonette and String Symphony . . . Seiji Ozawa, Music Director and Conductor of the Toronto Symphony, has been appointed Artistic Director of Tanglewood's Berkshire Festival starting in 1970. He will share the honor with Gunther Schuller, noted American composer and President of the New England Conservatory of Music. Mr. Ozawa's primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer concert season and other concerts comprising the Berkshire Festival while Mr. Schuller's principal concern will be educational activities at Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center. Leonard Bernstein will serve as Advisor to Tanglewood.

INTERNATIONAL
NEWARK N. J.
MONTHLY 245,159

APR 1969

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144

APR 28 1969

* * *

HOWARD MITCHELL who'll be conducting the National Symphony when it performs at the Troy Music Hall in the upcoming Troy Chromatic Society season, will retire to the status of principal guest conductor at the end of 1970-71 season. He has been appointed music director and chief conductor of the S.O.D.R.E. orchestra, the major music body in Uruguay. Until '70-71 he will conduct both orchestras. Antal Dorati will succeed him.

Seiji Ozawa, who makes an annual appearance guest conducting at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center each summer when the Philadelphia Orchestra is performing in August, will be artistic director of Tangelwoods' Berkshire Festival at Lenox, Mass. starting in 1970. Co-director will be Gunther Schuller. Ozawa will have charge of the summer concert season and schuller, now head of the New England Conservatory and a "graduate" of Tanglewood will be taking care of the educational end of things. Leonard Bernstein, incidentally, will be serving as an advisor.

The organ recital by Hugh Allen Wilson, scheduled for next Monday in the Union College Chapel, has been cancelled.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 82,021

MAY 1969

. . Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors and Leonard Bernstein adviser at Tanglewood Festival, beginning in 1970. . . . New conductor of the Phoenix Symphony is Phillip C. Spurgeon. . . . Conrad Susa, a regular contributor to this magazine, has been appointed music director for the Stratford (Conn.) Shakespeare Festival, and will compose the music for Hamlet, Much Ado About Nothing, and Chekhov's Three Sisters. . . . Edward Warner has resigned as executive director and president of Affiliate Artists, and baritone Sherrill Milnes will serve as interim president. . . . Ernest Fleischmann, former general manager of the London Symphony, has been appointed executive director of the Southern California-Hollywood Bowl Association.

Stefan Bauer-Mengelberg has been named visiting professor of music at the School of Performing Arts, University of Southern California, for the academic year 1969–70. . . . Three music critics have been appointed to administer the Music Critics Internship Program at Tanglewood's Berkshire Music School: Charles Fowler, Raymond Morin, and Elliott W. Galkin.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,671; SUN. 122,007

MAR 30 1969

Tanglewood's Triumvirate

New Era for Music?

By JOAN SIMMONS

Times-Union Music Critic

The formation of a new triumvirate to run the Berkshire Music Festival, made public about a month ago by the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, quite possibly augurs a new era in symphony concerts and particularly in summer music festivals.

The appointment of Seiji Ozawa as director in charge of the Boston Symphony and Gunther Schuller as director of the Berkshire Music School, both under the advisorship of Leonard Bernstein, immediately indicates the injection of new blood into the organization and into one of the oldest summer festivals in the United States.

It also, most likely, indicates the injection of new ideas into one of the firmly entrenched "establishment" orchestras and into the summer circuit, which in recent seasons has become the bulwark of conservative programming.

General Complaint . . .

A year ago there was a general complaint that area summer music festivals, most particularly, the Saratoga Performing Arts Center and Tanglewood, were monumental examples of the lack of imagination and sense of adventure which were making symphony concerts stuffy, generally uninteresting and possibly anachronistic.

The complaint seems to have indicated the development of a new taste and sophistication in summer audiences. The reliance on Beethoven, Tchaikowsky and Rachmaninoff which marked the seasons at Saratoga and Tanglewood last summer was a reflection of management tendencies at festivals throughout the country.

But local directors were evidently in tune with the growing sentiment for variety. The appointment of the new triumvirate is one indication of management sympathy with this point of view.

The program for the Philadelphia Orchestra as announced by the Saratoga Performing Arts Center a few months ago is a second indication of new thinking in summer programming.

The SPAC program does include the inevitable Van Cliburn appearances (as will the Tanglewood schedule) and a few other traditional bulwarks. But it also moves solidly away from the old type of three "B" formula which was so useful in the first formative years of the Festival because of the need to attract and build new audiences.

But summer music festivals are coming of age.

Ozawa will take over the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood in 1970, a year from now. Erich Leinsdorf still has one more summer remaining in his tenure with the orchestra which ends at the close of the coming season in August. Leinsdorf's residency in Boston has often been regarded as one of the least imaginative and least colorful in the orchestra's history.

No Lack of Involvement . . .

Ozawa, on the other hand, is a young and vibrant conductor who almost seems to have first made a splash on the concert circuit and then settled down to becoming an accomplished and serious conductor of stature. At any rate there is no lack of involvement in an Ozawa performance.

OZAWA-SCHULLER-BERNSTEIN
An injection of new ideas into the summer circuit . . .

Schuller, as a modern composer and director of the New England Conservatory of Music, is moving to his new position from his current one as director of contemporary activities at the Berkshire Center.

Bernstein's reputation hardly needs amplification. He will not actually be in residence at Tanglewood but will direct and advise and hopefully make a number of personal appearances.

The appointment of Ozawa particularly has ramifications beyond the summer circuit,

Continued on Page 5

Music: New Era for Festivals?

Continued from Page 1

however. In effect, this will mean two permanent conductors for the Boston Symphony Orchestra since William Steinberg succeeds Leinsdorf as music director of the orchestra in the fall.

This phenomenon of a two-conductor orchestra was necessitated by the development of the two-orchestra conductor. Faced with a conductor vacancy and nobody to fill it (an almost universal orchestral problem these days) the Boston Symphony turned to Steinberg who is already conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony and will continue in that capacity.

Steinberg's split duties have necessitated a kind of split season for the orchestra. He will be in Boston for the first twelve weeks of the winter season and make occasional appearances throughout the year including the summer.

But something stronger than a string of guest conductors was needed to hold the orchestra together during the remainder of the year and most particularly during the summer. The answer appears to be Ozawa.

And Ozawa is already conductor of the Toronto Symphony and will become conductor of the San Francisco Symphony in 1970. A very frequent guest conductor with other orchestras, particularly the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York, Philadelphia and at Saratoga, Ozawa may have to stay closer to home in future seasons.

Personality Struggle . . .

In the past orchestras have tended to have very distinct personalities molded by a single conductor and these tended to be as exciting or unimaginative as the conductor himself. Faced with two conductors of widely varying age (Ozawa is barely half the age of Steinberg), experience and dramatic ideas, the Boston Symphony may be faced with a personality struggle, but a struggle that very well may end in a less pat, more exciting orchestra, both less predictable and more vital.

At any rate a few innovations and interesting developments can be expected at Tanglewood in the next few seasons if the talents and personalities of the new directors are any indication.

MAESTRO WILLIAM STEINBERG
Two-orchestra conductor . . .

As a postscript it should be noted that these appointments also indicate a move on the part of the Boston management to unify Tanglewood. In the past there has been a technical distinction between the Berkshire Music Center, the educational facility, and Tanglewood, the summer division of the Boston Symphony Orchestra operation. In the future it will all be Tanglewood officially. It already is in the minds of most of the public.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 47,948

APR 26 1969

. . . Philip Beaudry) September 3, Douglas Rafter, and on September 10, Rev. David Gallagher.

Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music, has announced that the Conservatory will again sponsor in conjunction with the Berkshire Music Center, a summer "Institute at Tanglewood" offering courses in jazz and music education. There will be three-week sessions taught by reknowned jazz musicians David Baker and Jerry Coker. Each seminar will include jazz performance techniques, jazz improvisions, and fundamentals of theory pertaining to jazz. Jazz ensembles will be formed and performances given.

The music education program, under the direction of Herbert Alper, chairman of the music education department at the Conservatory, consists of two courses: "Contemporary Composition" and "Mid-Twentieth Century Trends in Music Education".

And turning further to Tanglewood a most pleasant announcement by president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Talcott M. Banks, was to the effect that beginning next season the summer program would be operated under the auspices of Gunther Schuller, Seiji Ozawa and Leonard Bernstein.

This will be another phase in the career of the Conservatory's president. Aside from the educational field where he gained high standing while serving an associate professorship on the Yale University faculty, Schuller has established himself among the leaders in today's modern world of music. His book which was published a year ago, "Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development" has been called "the definitive work . . . unparalled in the literature of jazz."

As a composer he has entered the world of opera nothing short of brilliantly. Among his works in this field are, a jazz-oriented opera "The Visitation, commissioned by the Hamburg State Opera, and in the very early creative state, a children's opera "The Fisherman and His Wife" for which John Updike will provide the libretto. This latter work has been commissioned by the Junior League of Boston.

160.

San Francisco Post Was No Surprise to Ozawa

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Demi-sized Japanese conductor Seiji Ozawa has known since last summer when he was at Tanglewood that he had been named director of the San Francisco Symphony, beginning the 1970-71 season.

When it was recently announced, it must have been quite a jolt to seers chronicling the "Who's - Going - to - Be - Conductor - of - What" race.

The three main plums under consideration were the orchestras of New York, Boston and Chicago.

Youthful candidates were Ozawa, Zubin Mehta, Colin Davis, Lirin Maazel, Thomas Schippers, Stanislaw Skrowaczewski and Istvan Kertesz.

It was also announced recently that Ozawa will be principel conductor of the Boston Symphony for the Tanglewood concerts during the summer of 1970.

That doesn't come as a surprise because the late Charles Munch brought Ozawa to Tanglewood as an apprentice in 1960.

It is quite understandable that Ozawa chose San Francisco, a fine orchestra but not one of the "big three."

Incidentally, the San Francisco Sympohny was heard here but once. It was in April, 1947, when the late Pierre Monteux conducted at the Auditorium at a Civic Music concert.

Searches for Words

Ozawa's American career began officially in 1961 when he became one of Leonard Bernstein's three assistant conductors at the New York Philharmonic.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Although his English is fluent, there is still a searching for the right word. But he is lucid enough in stating candidly that he's not on the plane of a Szell, Karajan, or Bernstein.

Why San Francisco?

"I have to try all the time to getting better and better myself," he says. "Since I'm still at the beginning of my career, I want to grow up, and I ask orchestra to grow up with me, too. Instead of just talking about up in the cloud things, then we did it in heart. I hope that will happen in San Francisco."

Ozawa ends his brief tenure in June, 1969, as conductor of the Toronto Symphony. He will have a year of guest stints (aside from his post as conductor of the Ravinia summer festival in Chicago) until he takes over at Tanglewood in July, 1970, and San Francisco, the following September.

Meanwhile, it is expected that Josef Krips will continue as San Francisco's conductor until Ozawa arrives.

NOT MUCH is to be construed from the fact that George Szell has invited Pierre Boulez to become principal guest conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra through the 1971-72 season.

In announcing the appointment, Szell said, "I am delighted with Boulez's acceptance of my invitation and look forward to many years of fruitful collaboration."

Szell is 72.

As a composer and teacher, Boulez has been a major influence on avant-garde developments in this country and Europe. He has promulgated his beliefs conducting such European orchestras as the Berlin Vienna, Concertgebouw of Amsterdam and BBC Symphony.

Boulez made his debut with the Cleveland Orchestra four years ago, and has been a frequent guest conductor ever since.

THREE 60-FOOT VANS recently transported 41,000 pounds of music-making cargo from Boston's Copley Square to a hillside in Englewood, N.J.

The historic, 4,500-pipe organ of the Old South Church became the property of concert organist Virgil Fox, who will add it in the near future to what is already the largest home pipe organ in the world.

Old South Church organ, installed in 1875, when the 300-year-old church moved to its present location opposite the Boston Public Library, is said to be the outstanding example of the craft of Ernest M. Skinner.

SARAH CALDWELL has announced two more debuts for the Opera Company of Boston's forthcoming productions of Verdi's "Macbeth" on March 31, April 2 and 4, and Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," April 9, 11 and 14. These are in addition to Hanne-Lore Kuhse as Lady Macbeth.

Simon Estes will sing the role of Banquo in the Verdi, and Gitaro in the Mozart opera. He was a Silver Medal winner at the first Tchaikovsky Vocal Competition in Moscow, in 1966, and has appeared with several major opera companies in this country and Europe.

The role of Susanna in Mozart's "Figaro" will be sung by Lauretta Young, 24-year-old lyric soprano, and a graduate of the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore and the Juillard School in New York City.

MUSIC ARTISTS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
6 TI. A YR. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

APR MAY 1969

Seiji Ozawa has been appointed Artistic Director of the Tanglewood Festival beginning in 1970. Ozawa's primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer concert season and the other concerts comprising the Festival. Gunther Schuller heads the educational activities at Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center. In the fall of 1970 Ozawa also takes over as Music Director and Conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,892

MAR 9 1969

Music in Mid-America

Joseph Kaye remembers Leonard Bernstein ...see below
Donal Henahan discusses mergers of orchestras ...see Henahan column

By Joseph Kaye
(The Star's New York Correspondent)

New York — The cheers, and the farewell huggings and the fond speeches are over now, and Leonard Bernstein is in Europe taking a turn with the Vienna Philharmonic while wearing his accolade as laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic, which he led for 10 years. He gave his last concert, the 939th, eight days ago in Philharmonic hall. Now the orchestra is on the hunt for a successor, but that is another—and it will be a continuing—story.

The 10 years Bernstein (he was Lenny to all his friends) directed the Philharmonic were probably the most showy and successful in the history of the orchestra, because he is that rarity, a magnetic showman and an excellent musician. He is also a fine pianist and lecturer, with an ability to explain complex musical ideas to the layman, especially youngsters. His concerts for children included explanatory talks that were models of practical musical pedagogy.

Bernstein the conductor, pianist, and lecturer, was also a composer of merit in concert music and Broadway musical comedy. This kind of paradox might have been fatal to another chef d'orchestre, but with the Bernstein personality it was taken as just another proof of his versatility; he is one of our universal men in music—an individual of many parts and for various seasons.

All these activities seem to have taken it out of him. I remember a year ago having a chat with him in his dressing room at Philharmonic hall after a rehearsal. As we were going up in the elevator, he leaned against the wall of the car with a sigh. "I am so tired," he said, "so tired!" and he looked it. In the dressing room he shed his coat, opened his shirt, sank wearily into a chair and accepted a drink his valet had brought him. It was quite still in the room, and his speech was pianissimo; it was a little while before he roused himself to normal conversational tone.

It had been announced that he would be leaving after the season just finishing. What was he planning to do? He said he didn't quite know, but added, "I want to do some writing." For the stage? The answer was yes, that he wanted to do some theater works. Rumors were around at the time that he was writing the score for a Broadway adaptation of Thornton Wilder's play, "The Skin of Our Teeth," and there were others mentioned, but he intimated that he just wanted to have some rest, look around, and adjust himself to new developments.

A couple of weeks ago Bernstein was given a special Tony award for his work in the theater. The awards were made in the Hellinger theater, and a restaurant nearby was used as a big Green Room from which awardees left for the presentations and returned to be photographed and interviewed by the press.

Bernstein came in, wearing an opera cape, and looking like an impresario. His greying hair was touseled, and he looked—again—very tired. His teenage daughter was with him, and they sat at a little table, where drinks were brought to them. As Berstein made a weary gesture with one arm, he bumped his daughter's glass, and some of the liquid spilled on her dress. He quickly began to brush it off, making soothing paternal noises. "No one will know," he said to her. She registered annoyance, and replied sharply, "But I will know!" It was a sight unfamiliar to most admiring Bernstein fans; the image was changed suddenly, and at the table was an average father and an average daughter involved in an average family accident. It was all very touching.

Those who made the pilgrimage to Tanglewood, Massachusetts, in the early days of the Berkshire Festival and Music Center, will remember the younger Bernstein there. He was one of Serge Koussevitzky's bright young men, a spectacular figure on the podium before the Boston Symphony, full of dramatic gymnastics to the point of flamboyancy. He probably set the style for beginning conductors who came to Tanglewood for study and experience; soon every young orchestral director there was a gyrating dynamo on the podium.

Bernstein revealed his ability as a lecturer at Tanglewood. There was one memorable occasion when a group of students gathered in the small chamber music shed for a talk by him. He sat in the center of the floor and around him were some 20 students. His subject was movie music, and his lecture turned out to be a blistering but very witty attack on one of the famous film directors. He turned him inside out —even the name which the movie man adopted to replace his native moniker was twisted and turned. It was a spectacular performance, a brutal surgical job done with the utmost urbanity, a vocal pamphlet in the best tradition of the historic unrelenting wits.

It was at Tanglewood that Bernstein met his wife, Felicia Montealegre, a pretty girl from South America who was also studying there. They made a handsome couple, Bernstein lithe and slender and handsome, his every movement informed with enormous self-confidence. He was Koussevitzky's favorite among his half-dozen assistant conductors.

There was talk at Tanglewood then that Bernstein was becoming too big for Koussevitzky and Tanglewood, and there were some mutterings about ingratitude on the part of the young conductor. Sure enough, it was not long after that Bernstein happened to be on hand when Bruno Walter became indisposed and the New York Philharmonic needed a last-minute replacement. His success on that occasion had much to do with his appointment to the Philharmonic's podium, where he remained for a notable decade.

A very interesting episode in Bernstein's career was the time he gave a lecture on Hebrew music in a New York temple. Wearing the traditional skull-cap, he gave an astonishingly erudite and clear exposition of the subject. This handsome and highly sophisticated man of the world made an affecting figure as he stood before the congregation, blending the heritage of his people with the high technical knowledge that was his. Perhaps a sequel to this incident would be the present made to the conductor by the players of the Philharmonic before the farewell concert. It was a mezuzah, a little scroll containing the Ten Commandments, enclosed in a container of varying decoration, that is nailed to the door of the Devout Jewish home, or worn as an ornament.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 325,251 SUN. 396,682

MAY 25 1969

160.

San Francisco Post Was No Surprise to Ozawa

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Demi-sized Japanese conductor Seiji Ozawa has known since last summer when he was at Tanglewood that he had been named director of the San Francisco Symphony, beginning the 1970-71 season.

When it was recently announced, it must have been quite a jolt to seers chronicling the "Who's - Going - to - Be - Conductor - of - What" race.

The three main plums under consideration were the orchestras of New York, Boston and Chicago.

Youthful candidates were Ozawa, Zubin Mehta, Colin Davis, Lirin Maazel, Thomas Schippers, Stanislaw Skrowaczewski and Istvan Kertesz.

It was also announced recently that Ozawa will be principel conductor of the Boston Symphony for the Tanglewood concerts during the summer of 1970.

That doesn't come as a surprise because the late Charles Munch brought Ozawa to Tanglewood as an apprentice in 1960.

It is quite understandable that Ozawa chose San Francisco, a fine orchestra but not one of the "big three."

Incidentally, the San Francisco Sympohny was heard here but once. It was in April, 1947, when the late Pierre Monteux conducted at the Auditorium at a Civic Music concert.

Searches for Words

Ozawa's American career began officially in 1961 when he became one of Leonard Bernstein's three assistant conductors at the New York Philharmonic.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Although his English is fluent, there is still a searching for the right word. But he is lucid enough in stating candidly that he's not on the plane of a Szell, Karajan, or Bernstein.

Why San Francisco?

"I have to try all the time to getting better and better myself," he says. "Since I'm still at the beginning of my career, I want to grow up, and I ask orchestra to grow up with me, too. Instead of just talking about up in the cloud things, then we did it in heart. I hope that will happen in San Francisco."

Ozawa ends his brief tenure in June, 1969, as conductor of the Toronto Symphony. He will have a year of guest stints (aside from his post as conductor of the Ravinia summer festival in Chicago) until he takes over at Tanglewood in July, 1970, and San Francisco, the following September.

Meanwhile, it is expected that Josef Krips will continue as San Francisco's conductor until Ozawa arrives.

NOT MUCH is to be construed from the fact that George Szell has invited Pierre Boulez to become principal guest conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra through the 1971-72 season.

In announcing the appointment, Szell said, "I am delighted with Boulez's acceptance of my invitation and look forward to many years of fruitful collaboration."

Szell is 72.

As a composer and teacher, Boulez has been a major influence on avant-garde developments in this country and Europe. He has promulgated his beliefs conducting such European orchestras as the Berlin Vienna, Concertgebouw of Amsterdam and BBC Symphony.

Boulez made his debut with the Cleveland Orchestra four years ago, and has been a frequent guest conductor ever since.

THREE 60-FOOT VANS recently transported 41,000 pounds of music-making cargo from Boston's Copley Square to a hillside in Englewood, N.J.

The historic, 4,500-pipe organ of the Old South Church became the property of concert organist Virgil Fox, who will add it in the near future to what is already the largest home pipe organ in the world.

Old South Church organ, installed in 1875, when the 300-year-old church moved to its present location opposite the Boston Public Library, is said to be the outstanding example of the craft of Ernest M. Skinner.

SARAH CALDWELL has announced two more debuts for the Opera Company of Boston's forthcoming productions of Verdi's "Macbeth" on March 31, April 2 and 4, and Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," April 9, 11 and 14. These are in addition to Hanne-Lore Kuhse as Lady Macbeth.

Simon Estes will sing the role of Banquo in the Verdi, and Gitaro in the Mozart opera. He was a Silver Medal winner at the first Tchaikovsky Vocal Competition in Moscow, in 1966, and has appeared with several major opera companies in this country and Europe.

The role of Susanna in Mozart's "Figaro" will be sung by Lauretta Young, 24-year-old lyric soprano, and a graduate of the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore and the Juillard School in New York City.

MUSIC ARTISTS
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR MAY 1969

Seiji Ozawa has been appointed Artistic Director of the Tanglewood Festival beginning in 1970. Ozawa's primary responsibility at Tanglewood will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer concert season and the other concerts comprising the Festival. Gunther Schuller heads the educational activities at Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center. In the fall of 1970 Ozawa also takes over as Music Director and Conductor of the San Francisco Symphony.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,892

MAR 9 1969

Music in Mid-America

Joseph Kaye remembers Leonard Bernstein
... see below
Donal Henahan discusses mergers of orchestras
... see Henahan column

By Joseph Kaye
(The Star's New York Correspondent)

New York — The cheers, and the farewell huggings and the fond speeches are over now, and Leonard Bernstein is in Europe taking a turn with the Vienna Philharmonic while wearing his accolade as laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic, which he led for 10 years. He gave his last concert, the 939th, eight days ago in Philharmonic hall. Now the orchestra is on the hunt for a successor, but that is another—and it will be a continuing—story.

The 10 years Bernstein (he was Lenny to all his friends) directed the Philharmonic were probably the most showy and successful in the history of the orchestra, because he is that rarity, a magnetic showman and an excellent musician. He is also a fine pianist and lecturer, with an ability to explain complex musical ideas to the layman, especially youngsters. His concerts for children included explanatory talks that were models of practical musical pedagogy.

Bernstein the conductor, pianist, and lecturer, was also a composer of merit in concert music and Broadway musical comedy. This kind of paradox might have been fatal to another chef d'orchestre, but with the Bernstein personality it was taken as just another proof of his versatility; he is one of our universal men in music—an individual of many parts and for various seasons.

All these activities seem to have taken it out of him. I remember a year ago having a chat with him in his dressing room at Philharmonic hall after a rehearsal. As we were going up in the elevator, he leaned against the wall of the car with a sigh. "I am so tired," he said, "so tired!" and he looked it. In the dressing room he shed his coat, opened his shirt, sank wearily into a chair and accepted a drink his valet had brought him. It was quite still in the room, and his speech was pianissimo; it was a little while before he roused himself to normal conversational tone.

It had been announced that he would be leaving after the season just finishing. What was he planning to do? He said he didn't quite know, but added, "I want to do some writing." For the stage? The answer was yes, that he wanted to do some theater works. Rumors were around at the time that he was writing the score for a Broadway adaptation of Thornton Wilder's play, "The Skin of Our Teeth," and there were others mentioned, but he intimated that he just wanted to have some rest, look around, and adjust himself to new developments.

A couple of weeks ago Bernstein was given a special Tony award for his work in the theater. The awards were made in the Hellinger theater, and a restaurant nearby was used as a big Green Room from which awardees left for the presentations and returned to be photographed and interviewed by the press.

Bernstein came in, wearing an opera cape, and looking like an impresario. His greying hair was touseled, and he looked—again—very tired. His teenage daughter was with him, and they sat at a little table, where drinks were brought to them. As Berstein made a weary gesture with one arm, he bumped his daughter's glass, and some of the liquid spilled on her dress. He quickly began to brush it off, making soothing paternal noises. "No one will know," he said to her. She registered annoyance, and replied sharply, "But I will know!" It was a sight unfamiliar to most admiring Bernstein fans; the image was changed suddenly, and at the table was an average father and an average daughter involved in an average family accident. It was all very touching.

Those who made the pilgrimage to Tanglewood, Massachusetts, in the early days of the Berkshire Festival and Music Center, will remember the younger Bernstein there. He was one of Serge Koussevitzky's bright young men, a spectacular figure on the podium before the Boston Symphony, full of dramatic gymnastics to the point of flamboyancy. He probably set the style for beginning conductors who came to Tanglewood for study and experience; soon every young orchestral director there was a gyrating dynamo on the podium.

Bernstein revealed his ability as a lecturer at Tanglewood. There was one memorable occasion when a group of students gathered in the small chamber music shed for a talk by him. He sat in the center of the floor and around him were some 20 students. His subject was movie music, and his lecture turned out to be a blistering but very witty attack on one of the famous film directors. He turned him inside out —even the name which the movie man adopted to replace his native moniker was twisted and turned. It was a spectacular performance, a brutal surgical job done with the utmost urbanity, a vocal pamphlet in the best tradition of the historic unrelenting wits.

It was at Tanglewood that Bernstein met his wife, Felicia Montealegre, a pretty girl from South America who was also studying there. They made a handsome couple, Bernstein lithe and slender and handsome, his every movement informed with enormous self-confidence. He was Koussevitzky's favorite among his half-dozen assistant conductors.

There was talk at Tanglewood then that Bernstein was becoming too big for Koussevitzky and Tanglewood, and there were some mutterings about ingratitude on the part of the young conductor. Sure enough, it was not long after that Bernstein happened to be on hand when Bruno Walter became indisposed and the New York Philharmonic needed a last-minute replacement. His success on that occasion had much to do with his appointment to the Philharmonic's podium, where he remained for a notable decade.

A very interesting episode in Bernstein's career was the time he gave a lecture on Hebrew music in a New York temple. Wearing the traditional skull-cap, he gave an astonishingly erudite and clear exposition of the subject. This handsome and highly sophisticated man of the world made an affecting figure as he stood before the congregation, blending the heritage of his people with the high technical knowledge that was his. Perhaps a sequel to this incident would be the present made to the conductor by the players of the Philharmonic before the farewell concert. It was a mezuzah, a little scroll containing the Ten Commandments, enclosed in a container of varying decoration, that is nailed to the door of the Devout Jewish home, or worn as an ornament.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 222,751 SUN. 396,682

MAY 25 1969

161.

Around The Town

By Edgar S. Van Olinda

My column recently about the fellow who thought he learned to play the piano from smoking Jose Iturbi's tobacco recalls another dropout from the symphony orchestras list of conductor resignations during the year, that of Leonard Bernstein, director of the New York Philharmonic. Like Mr. Iturbi, Mr. Bernstein had a certain connection with Albany in his early days when he was a pupil of the late Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during one of the Tanglewood seasons.

Reid Callanan, president of the Callanan Road Improvement Co., was also a fine pianist and, at the time of which I write, was also the president of the Albany Symphony Orchestra. One of his right-hand men was Laurence McKinney, a former presiding officer of the group. Someone suggested that Mr. Bernstein be contacted over in the Berkshires with the idea of forming a group of high school musicians in Albany which he would train to the point where they could be integrated into the local senior organization. Mr. Bernstein was invited to come to Albany to meet the officers of the Albany Symphony for a dinner at the University Club and to iron out the plans for his weekly commutation to Albany.

Mr. Bernstein arrived as per arrangements and the plan was discussed pro and con and Mr. Koussevitzky's fair-haired boy was agreeable to the idea. Later in the evening, about 11 p.m. Mr. McKinney, in a weak moment asked Mr Bernstein if he would play some Bach for the group present since the conductor was considered one of the finest exponents of the German composer. The group repaired to the library where there was an upright piano and Mr. Bernstein began his version of the "Well-Tempered Clavichord" as a starter. As he reached the "No. 21 in B-flat," the telephone started to ring in the club's office and one voice, emanating from one of the rooms which the club maintains for resident members, in high dudgeon, yelled: "Tell that moron who is pounding that piano to get lost. He is making such a racket that I can't get to sleep!"

The demand was delivered to Mr. McKinney who had made the initial request and in his well-known gift for calling a spade a spade, rather than a shovel, the Albany man brought the impromptu concert to a decided, but rather abrupt termination.

Since the telephone caller was not identified, how was he to know that the gentleman who was making such beautiful music would, some day, become the most sought after conductor in concert halls, legitimate theater and Hollywood sound stages for which the objector would be paying $10 each for seats to attend "On the Town," or "West Side Story."

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, June 2, 1968

Music

At Last, the Patina Of an Old Master

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

ON Saturday evening, Leonard Bernstein will conduct his final concert as music director of the New York Philharmonic. But, as we all know, New York is not losing a musical director. It is gaining a conductor laureate. For years to come, Bernstein will be around the New York Philharmonic, probably taking four or five weeks each season. That is one reason why the management of the New York Philharmonic is in no outsized rush to name a musical director to succeed Bernstein. As long as he is around, and as long as George Szell is willing to take a couple of months with the orchestra as principal guest conductor, the Philharmonic is sitting pretty. Why hurry into something that you may regret when there still is time to assess the situation without much pressure?

There are all kinds of statistics involved with Bernstein's departure as musical director. The Philharmonic has released a handful that look like the notations in the baseball record books. When it comes to the Philharmonic, Bernstein is the all-time champ. From his first appearance when he substituted for Bruno Walter on Nov. 14, 1943, and made history, to this Saturday's concert, he will have led 943 Philharmonic concerts. It may not be an all-time record, like Lou Gehrig's unbroken streak, for some of the older conductors in action probably have conducted more with their own orchestras. (Who holds the all-time record for the number of concerts with one orchestra? Frederick Stock in Chicago? Fans are invited to submit nominations. Who, for that matter, is the conductor who leads the all-time list in total number of performances? Monteux, perhaps? There probably are no available statistics.)

*

Anyway, Bernstein's 943 concerts are a Philharmonic record. The runner-up is Dimitri Mitropoulos, with 576. During his tenure Bernstein has conducted almost 350 works, some hundred of which have been by American composers (or, looking at this particular statistic another way, he has conducted the music of 126 composers, and 44 of those have been Americans).

The Philharmonic has sent along a complete list of the music that Bernstein has conducted. It makes fascinating reading, as much for the music he has not conducted as for the music he has. His repertory shows a conductor with wide taste and certain gaps, though it has to be said that a large number of those gaps are shared by all conductors. Very few conductors of major symphony orchestras anywhere in the world pay much attention to baroque music, or to classic music of the 18th century aside from Mozart and Haydn, and Bernstein is no exception. Very little Handel is in his repertory, and the few Vivaldi works he has conducted are obviously pieces selected to give the first-desk men of the orchestra some solo work. Bernstein has conducted the six "Brandenburg" Concertos of Bach but not one of the Suites, a curious omission. His Haydn repertory also is curious. He has led six rather rare Haydn symphonies, Nos. 82-87, and three popular ones, Nos. 88, 102 and 104. That is all. Why none before No. 82, and why 82-87 solid? One can only deduce that Bernstein owns Series I, Vol. IX of the Haydn Society "Kritische Gesamtausgabe."

There is a great deal of Mozart and Beethoven (one omission in the Beethoven series is the Piano Concerto No. 2); and the standard works of the 19th century are well represented. Bernstein has, however, made virtually no effort to examine the music of the lesser 19th-century composers. One notable exception was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony. There is surprisingly little Berlioz, though Bernstein has made a very big thing of the "Symphonie Fantastique," one of his favorite warhorses. (It might be interesting to study a compilation of how many times Bernstein has repeated works from season to season.) Mahler and Bernstein have achieved a one-to-one identity, and he has conducted all of the Mahler symphonies and the other major Mahler works. It comes as a surprise, however, to note that Bernstein has conducted only one Bruckner symphony, the Ninth. Of other late romantics, Dvorak does not seem to interest him very much, nor do Smetana or Elgar.

*

Outside of the dodecaphonic school, 20th-century music has received a fair representation. Bernstein has made no secret of his dislike of serial music, and that dislike extends to the serial-derived music of the avant-garde. He lets other conductors take care of Schoenberg, Berg and Webern, though he has conducted representative examples of each of those composers, and he has left the avant-garde largely alone after his festival some years back. Stravinsky, Prokofiev, Copland and Bartók and Hindemith are well represented, and Bernstein also has been hospitable to the big American composers of the 1930's. He also has been instrumental in the Ives revival. Indeed, his performance of the Ives Second almost 20 years ago all but set it off single-handed.

Many of the world premieres Bernstein has conducted—of American works and otherwise—have been largely ephemeral, but that is not his fault. Most music composed during any period has a short life, and in the last decades there has been no take-charge composer of international stature, the way Stravinsky was in the pre-World War II period, Strauss at the turn of the century, Wagner before him, and so on. That is one of the factors leading toward Bernstein's ruminations about the eventual fate of the symphony orchestra. He feels it is a dying organization. Composers do not write much for it any more, and what they do write the public is not anxious to hear.

Anyway, it has been, by and large, a catholic repertory that Bernstein has conducted through the years. Now that he is relinquishing his directorship, he is all but accepted as an old master (at the age of 51), and not only in this country. He has become the idol of Vienna, and has achieved almost as great a success in England. There is not the least suggestion that he is giving up the Philharmonic because he has outstayed his welcome. Quite the contrary. He is more popular than he has ever been; and the fact that he happens to be a better conductor has a great deal to do with it. What Bernstein did at the beginning by animal magnetism and a driving necessity to be loved, he now does through craft—without having surrendered any of the magnetism. That in itself is quite an accomplishment. He still has an amazing quality of youth about him, but he is no longer the Peter Pan of music. In the last five years he has proved himself.

Harry Redl from Black Star

Leonard Bernstein, who conducts his last concert as music director of the New York Philharmonic on Saturday evening. He has an amazing quality of youth about him, but he is no longer the Peter Pan of music. He has proved himself.

VOGUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
BI-MONTHLY 442,000

NOV 1 1968

Bernstein on Bernstein

BY JOHN GRUEN

Leonard Bernstein said: "I like to leave the house ready for the concert. I don't like hanging around in the dressing room. Many conductors arrive very early. Toscanini always used to appear hours in advance. He'd dress there—bring everything—because he wanted to be in the hall, to know that he was safely there and sit and think and whatever.

"I don't arrive in my dressing room and have an absolutely quiet period of meditation, or anything like that. On the contrary, there are usually all kinds of people waiting for me, either to greet me or with problems that must be solved, decisions that must be made."

Before he faces the orchestra, Leonard Bernstein is strangely calm and reserved. It is an inner calm, nurtured by purpose and expectation. Just before he goes on, he likes to have a last-minute look at the score. He does not study it but he looks at it, getting very close to it again. In fact, the last thing that happens is that the librarian comes for the score—if Bernstein is using one—and puts it on the podium. Usually, Lenny will say to him, "Wait a minute. Just another second. Yes. I'll give it to you in a moment." It's like a last goodby before he sees it again out there in the bull ring. And as he put it, "It's really more like touching it with your eyes."

Bernstein studies his scores at home. And the way he studies them is a small lesson in compulsion. What he does first is what he does first when he begins a novel: He sneaks a look at the end. He's dying to see how it comes out. Lenny loves last lines and last bars, last statements. From there, he usually riffles backwards. Oddly enough, he seems to get more of an impression of the general form that way than when he reads forward. Having gone through it once, he then goes back to the beginning and really studies.

To mark scores, he uses a coloured pencil—red on one end, blue on the other. Anything in red is meant for the librarian to copy into the musicians' parts. These are usually special accents, bowings, and other modifications of dynamics. The blue pencil is for his own markings. He uses it to indicate phrasing, to outline the harmonic rhythms—in general to set off the long musical sentences and paragraphs. Bernstein thickens the bar lines at the dividing points, making a kind of map of the score. He also uses this blue pencil to call attention to not immediately obvious dynamic subtleties, to instrumentation that might not be seen offhand, to something he might want to call to the men's attention. These markings are used mostly in rehearsal; by the time of the performance, Bernstein is no longer dependent on them.

When he conducts with a score, it is finally taken from Bernstein and placed on the podium. Then, as in the theatre, someone calls, "Five minutes, maestro." The five minutes up, that same someone says, "Time, maestro." At this point, the Philharmonic's assistant manager takes Bernstein down the elevator and delivers him to the personnel manager, who is waiting in the wings, and who then gives the concertmaster the direction to go on the stage and tune up the orchestra. When the orchestra is tuned the personnel manager quiets the orchestra by shushing it violently from the wings. He then gives a signal to the lightboard man to put the house down. He bows Lenny on. . . .

(In Europe, the conductor is clapped on—the applause is started backstage. This is the signal for the audience to begin clapping, and the conductor goes on.)

And so, Bernstein walks to the podium and bows. At a Friday afternoon subscription concert, with an audience of three thousand ladies who applaud through their gloves, so that one hears more jingling of bracelets than clapping of hands, Lenny may bow only briefly and turn to his appointed task. But then, for the duration of the concert, Leonard Bernstein is immersed.

"From then on I can't tell you what happens," he said. "One could make metaphors about it. I mean, you are swimming in the womb, you are in the labyrinth being led by Ariadne's cord, you are deeply in something. This cord of Ariadne, of course, is a multiple cord, all the various strands of the work that you are doing are leading you, and all of you is being led. There isn't any other place. There isn't any other time or geography except this inner geography, this journey.

"The orchestra never disappears. I mean, one is not alone with Brahms or whomever. We are all alone with him. There is a tremendous involvement with the (Continued on page 222)

THE LEONARD BERNSTEIN FAMILY running on the lawn near their Connecticut house—the children: Nina, Jamie, and Alexander. Undoubtedly the most famous conductor in the world, Leonard Bernstein is the centre of a new, exploratory, deliberately open-ended discussion—with the only discussant Bernstein—of music, his parents, his early conducting, his children, his wife, his friends, and his lack of ego, a discussion called The Private World of Leonard Bernstein, by John Gruen with photographs by Ken Heyman. Excerpts from this Ridge Press book, published by the Viking Press, begin on this page. Now in his final season with the New York Philharmonic, Leonard Bernstein at fifty has been made its first Laureate Conductor for life.

KEN HEYMAN

VOGUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
BI-MONTHLY 442,000

NOV 1 1968

Bernstein on Bernstein

BY JOHN GRUEN

Leonard Bernstein said: "I like to leave the house ready for the concert. I don't like hanging around in the dressing room. Many conductors arrive very early. Toscanini always used to appear hours in advance. He'd dress there—bring everything—because he wanted to be in the hall, to know that he was safely there and sit and think and whatever.

"I don't arrive in my dressing room and have an absolutely quiet period of meditation, or anything like that. On the contrary, there are usually all kinds of people waiting for me, either to greet me or with problems that must be solved, decisions that must be made."

Before he faces the orchestra, Leonard Bernstein is strangely calm and reserved. It is an inner calm, nurtured by purpose and expectation. Just before he goes on, he likes to have a last-minute look at the score. He does not study it but he looks at it, getting very close to it again. In fact, the last thing that happens is that the librarian comes for the score—if Bernstein is using one—and puts it on the podium. Usually, Lenny will say to him, "Wait a minute. Just another second. Yes, I'll give it to you in a moment." It's like a last goodby before he sees it again out there in the bull ring. And as he put it, "It's really more like touching it with your eyes."

Bernstein studies his scores at home. And the way he studies them is a small lesson in compulsion. What he does first is what he does first when he begins a novel: He sneaks a look at the end. He's dying to see how it comes out. Lenny loves last lines and last bars, last statements. From there, he usually riffles backwards. Oddly enough, he seems to get more of an impression of the general form that way than when he reads forward. Having gone through it once, he then goes back to the beginning and really studies.

To mark scores, he uses a coloured pencil—red on one end, blue on the other. Anything in red is meant for the librarian to copy into the musicians' parts. These are usually special accents, bowings, and other modifications of dynamics. The blue pencil is for his own markings. He uses it to indicate phrasing, to outline the harmonic rhythms—in general to set off the long musical sentences and paragraphs. Bernstein thickens the bar lines at the dividing points, making a kind of map of the score. He also uses this blue pencil to call attention to not immediately obvious dynamic subtleties, to instrumentation that might not be seen offhand, to something he might want to call to the men's attention. These markings are used mostly in rehearsal; by the time of the performance, Bernstein is no longer dependent on them.

When he conducts with a score, it is finally taken from Bernstein and placed on the podium. Then, as in the theatre, someone calls, "Five minutes, maestro." The five minutes up, that same someone says, "Time, maestro." At this point, the Philharmonic's assistant manager takes Bernstein down the elevator and delivers him to the personnel manager, who is waiting in the wings, and who then gives the concertmaster the direction to go on the stage and tune up the orchestra. When the orchestra is tuned, the personnel manager quiets the orchestra by shushing it violently from the wings. He then gives a signal to the lightboard man to put the house down. He bows Lenny on. . . .

(In Europe, the conductor is clapped on—the applause is started backstage. This is the signal for the audience to begin clapping, and the conductor goes on.)

And so, Bernstein walks to the podium and bows. At a Friday afternoon subscription concert, with an audience of three thousand ladies who applaud through their gloves, so that one hears more jingling of bracelets than clapping of hands, Lenny may bow only briefly and turn to his appointed task. But then, for the duration of the concert, Leonard Bernstein is immersed.

"From then on I can't tell you what happens," he said. "One could make metaphors about it. I mean, you are swimming in the womb, you are in the labyrinth being led by Ariadne's cord, you are deeply in something. This cord of Ariadne, of course, is a multiple cord, all the various strands of the work that you are doing are leading you, and all of you is being led. There isn't any other place. There isn't any other time or geography except this inner geography, this journey.

"The orchestra never disappears. I mean, one is not alone with Brahms or whomever. We are all alone with him. There is a tremendous involvement with the (Continued on page 222)

THE LEONARD BERNSTEIN FAMILY running on the lawn near their Connecticut house—the children: Nina, Jamie, and Alexander. Undoubtedly the most famous conductor in the world, Leonard Bernstein is the centre of a new, exploratory, deliberately open-ended discussion—with the only discussant Bernstein—of music, his parents, his early conducting, his children, his wife, his friends, and his lack of ego, a discussion called The Private World of Leonard Bernstein, by John Gruen with photographs by Ken Heyman. Excerpts from this Ridge Press book, published by the Viking Press, begin on this page. Now in his final season with the New York Philharmonic, Leonard Bernstein at fifty has been made its first Laureate Conductor for life.

KEN HEYMAN

Leonard Bernstein

(Continued from page 165)

men. Actually, there is no such thing as remaining alone in ecstatic glory. The audience may disappear from consciousness. But the men remain with me.

"When it's over, and you've really been away in the labyrinth, it's really an effort to come back. I once had one of my little verbal game fantasies about coming back to the here and now. I thought 'here-now' transposed is 'now-here,' and 'now-here' put together is 'nowhere,' and I found some kind of profound meaning in that, because compared to where you've been, 'now-here' is, indeed, 'nowhere.'."

I asked Lenny if his performances are ever affected by his own moods. "Not in the easy sense that when you're feeling depressed it will show. Or that that's a good time to conduct Tchaikovsky's Sixth, because it's depressed music. It's not that easy, and it's not that one-to-one. As a matter of fact, when you're in a very strong mood, a very positive mood, it may be exactly the right time to conduct Beethoven's Funeral March.

"I know that in general the stronger you feel, and the readier you feel, the more gism you have for the performance—the better it will be no matter what the music is." . . .

. . . "I've written only two works in the last ten years," he said. "Since I took over the Philharmonic at the point when I finished West Side Story, I've done just those two, neither of them for the theatre: Kaddish and Chichester Psalms. Both Biblical in a way. Something seems to keep making me go back to that book. And there was Jeremiah.

"Of course, it all ties back to Daddy. That whole tremendous influence. It's pure ambivalence. I think the two poles of the ambivalence are not just poles, but are interdependent and mutually influential, if you know what I mean. I'm sure that if you investigate it, it becomes a tangled neurotic knot.

"For example, I must feel a certain guilt about my father, about having resented him, feared him so when I was a child. Because he opposed my music, because he didn't seem to understand me.

"It doesn't mean I had a compensating, equivalent dependence or an elaborate, exaggerated love for my mother. I was very fond of her. But it isn't that I threw myself completely on my mother's side and rejected my father, although she did have much greater sympathy for the music, for the whole artistic idea.

"And yet my father impressed me enormously. I admired him. I learned so much from him. His knowledge was enormous—extremely limited and circumscribed by Talmudic studies, yet within that limited area his knowledge was enormous. His intelligence was equally enormous. The breadth of his reasoning—which is a Talmudic quality—made him in every sense a man of God. He is a deeply religious man. Highly moral."

Bernstein paused. I wondered aloud whether this ambivalent feeling toward his father still showed itself in any way. "In some minor ways, yes," he answered. "To this day I have not been able to rid myself of certain little patterns whose origins I clearly see. For example, I never play golf. I don't want to hear about pinochle. Canasta, poker, bridge, anything you want, but I don't want to know about pinochle because that was his game. Really, to reach my age and still carry those ridiculous taboos around! It's stupid. I mean, man's power to change being his divine element—his divine faculty—why can't I have changed enough to have thrown off these prejudices against such innocent things as golf and pinochle?

"As time went on, he mellowed very much and I understood him much better. We became very good friends—which we are now. I came to love him and understand his terrible faults and foibles and weaknesses—and the pain and the suffering he went through in his life."

(Continued on page 226)

Leonard Bernstein

(Continued from page 222)

Lenny told me that from the very first his father had pinned his hopes on one of two things for him. Either to go into his business or become a rabbi. The idea of Lenny becoming a musician was both distasteful and depressing to him. It had to do with his own somewhat limited points of reference. In his day, to be a musician meant somebody sitting in the lobby of a hotel, playing in a trio. In eastern Europe a musician was a klesmer, a sort of wandering minstrel little better than a beggar, who would go from town to town looking for weddings and feasts, and be thrown a crust, or be invited to sit down and have something to eat for his labours. A klesmer! His son was going to be a klesmer! Never! . . .

"My mother insists that I was always very musical, that even as a child, before I could speak, I was drumming out rhythms on the windowsill—that when I heard a piano, I'd go mad. Or the radio. Those were the very early days of radio. I can remember radio at the age of eight, or so: a huge Atwater-Kent with a big horn and three dials, which took hours to tune in a station. . . . I know that the family was not musical. We never had music in the house. We had no piano. We had a phonograph, but it played only 'Barney Google.'

"I never knew there was a world of music, a world of concerts, or opera. I never was taken to any. I had no notion that anything like this existed. I remember hearing, oh, Rossini overtures and such things on the radio and going mad with excitement. But still, nothing happened.

"And then one day, my Aunt Clara—my father's younger sister, and a remarkable woman—decided to move back to New York and she didn't know what to do with some of her heavier articles of furniture. So she dropped off in our house . . . an upright. An old-fashioned, heavy, carved, upright piano with a middle pedal which, when depressed, caused it to sound like a mandolin. Do you remember those mandolin pedals on the old pianos? Well, this thing was moved into our house and stationed in the hallway because there was no other place to put it. And I touched it. And that was that. . . .

"I was safe at the piano, for some reason. Even before I knew how to play it, I was improvising not only music but a system of music. I made my own system of harmony. Nobody ever taught me harmony till I was in college. I didn't know that you could study harmony. I found that there were chords that existed in a certain relation to one another—and I gave them names. I had 'finishing chords' and 'governing chords.' It's very funny that I came to the name 'governing' because dominant means governing. Subdominants became 'sort-of-governing chords,' some kind of variation like that. I found out later that my own terms matched almost exactly in spirit the official names for the chords. Then I had terms for modulating and keys; I don't know what they were anymore. But it was a rather complete system, as I discovered when I came to study harmony at Harvard. . . ."

Here Lenny paused. "I know it would have pleased my father deeply if I had become a rabbi," he said. "And there is a certain amount of rabbi in me which I get from him, of course. He is the son of a rabbi, and he is very rabbinical in nature himself. If you say to him, 'Pass the salt,' he's already teaching you something: 'You know, Moses said about salt . . .' or whatever. I must say, I've inherited some of that.

"I do tend to be lecture-y, and I love to teach. I also, I'm sure, bore people to death by giving lectures when all they want is a simple answer. I know this is true of my children. I do it constantly. It's part of my rabbinical streak. . . .

"I loved other things. I loved other studies. I was particularly taken with English literature and poetry. And languages. But music was a whole other thing. It wasn't a study, you see. It was a way of life. . . .

(Continued on page 228)

Leonard Bernstein

(Continued from page 226)

"I wrote a piano concerto when I was thirteen. I found a page of it the other day. It looks like Liszt, Wagner, Grieg, Rachmaninoff. A caricature of those composers—but very passionate." . . .

"Of course," Bernstein said, "if anybody said to my father now that he had ever stood in the way of my music, he wouldn't deny it, but he has ways of rationalizing. He had a marvellous line that was quoted in some interview: 'Well, how was I supposed to know that he was Leonard Bernstein!' He said that! It's very witty, actually." . . .

[The following is an excerpt from a transcript of a taped conversation between Mr. Bernstein and the author.]

JOHN GRUEN: Let's turn to the style of your work. Are you still, in effect, in search of a style? Are you dissatisfied with the style in which you now compose?

LEONARD BERNSTEIN: That's a practical point to bring up. Having been wrapped up so much of the last ten years in the New York Philharmonic, which means almost constant conducting, the intervals of time available to me have never been enough to get going again as a composer.

As a result of these long gaps between composing periods—and even longer gaps between one piece and the next—it has been very difficult for me to evolve what you call a style, a language I'm always speaking, always enlarging, enriching, changing by simply speaking in it all the time, which is the way languages remain living. When people criticize my music as being eclectic, they are right. It is.

It always has been eclectic and probably always will be. For this reason. Also for other reasons. But I think no music has ever been written that wasn't eclectic, that hasn't been dependent on music which preceded it. This is as true of Mozart and Brahms as it is of Monteverdi and Stravinsky. But whatever influences you detect—whatever combinations of other styles one can find, say, in a Beethoven piano sonata—there is with it that incredible individual voice which is always recognizable, always there. If I have that to any degree at all at this point, it's a miracle.

I hope, certainly, to have it more as I go on composing. But this will happen when composing is a more continuous and consistent activity. You see, it is two years since I wrote my last note, the Chichester Psalms. Since June, 1965, I have not been able to begin to form a composition. You now find me . . . in the position of starting all over again from where I was then! It's very difficult.

I mean the muscles that were all exercised then and ready for use have now gone slack. I don't know where to begin. I pick up a pencil and think, "Now what do you do when you write a piece? What do you do first?" It's as though I had never done it before. I have to begin again. Each piece I've written has been like that. There were two years between Kaddish and the Psalms. There were six years between West Side Story and Kaddish. Absolutely nothing in between!

Six years! I'm told that I have a personal voice in my music. Thank God for that. If I believed that there wasn't a voice, I don't think I would ever write music. But it's very difficult to pick up the pieces. This, of course, militates against having a very strong, individual style. So, naturally, my music will always be eclectic to a certain degree. I don't care, if that small voice is still there.

J. G.: Do you think you might ever embark on writing atonal music?

L. B.: No. That's not in my cards. I've fooled around with it. I tried during my sabbatical year, and I reported on it. I spent about two months experimenting with various kinds of nontypical styles. But I threw it all away and wrote the Chichester Psalms, which is about the most tonal and baby-simple piece I've ever written. No. I still think the hardest thing for a composer to do in our time is to write a tonal melodic line that doesn't sound stale. That is why I'm very proud of those Psalms.

They contain utterly diatonic phrases which, at least to me, sound fresh and moving. That is a great accomplishment for me. I don't have to go and meddle in electronic or serial music in order to satisfy my longing for advancement and originality. I don't think that is the way I can advance music.

Leonard Bernstein said: "Then came the terrible day—in March, 1943. Oh, I forgot to say that shortly after my Pittsburgh success, I received a telegram from Koussevitzky [Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra] saying, 'I've heard about the success of Jeremiah in Pittsburgh. Would you come and conduct it in Boston?' I asked permission to have that week in Boston, and Rodzinski [Conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and Bernstein was his assistant] said, 'Oh, of course! I can't keep you from the Boston Symphony.' But, again, with a lot of 'Don't think of me' thrown in. I went to Boston. It was again a big smash. It was so exciting because it was my father's city, and my city, and it meant a great deal to me.

"While I was there, I had a telegram from Rodzinski, whom I'd last seen in high dudgeon, saying, 'Congratulations on your great success in Boston. Will you conduct a whole program with the Philharmonic? Any works of your choice, but including Jeremiah.' Well, I can't tell you what a surprise this was. Playing my own piece with the orchestra I was closest to. I was finally going to do a full program of my own devising, fully rehearsed, including my own symphony!

"I came back to New York in a state of excitement and flung myself into Rodzinski's arms and said, 'Aren't you wonderful and generous!' and words like that. Well, everything was warmth and light for about a day or two, and then it started again. Anything would start him off. Seeing my picture in the paper. A chance remark. People, thinking he would feel good, would congratulate him on his assistant. Of course, it was the last thing he wanted to hear. He couldn't stand my name anymore.

"The concert came about. I remember playing the Italian Symphony by Mendelssohn, Aaron Copland's El Salón México, my symphony—and I can't remember what else. The three performances were very exciting. Standing ovations, stuff like that. But a terrible review by Virgil Thomson of my symphony. He said, 'As brilliant as he is as an executor, so dreadful is he as a composer'—something like that. He called it imitative, derivative nonsense, things like that. He hated it.

"I remember he wrote, 'He writes his brasses high!' and conceded that the orchestration was thrilling. Anyhow, the concert went marvellously, and Rodzinski went into the dumps.

"One day I fell sick at a morning rehearsal. I had a stomachache, or something. I told the personnel manager that I was ill and that I would be upstairs in my room if I was needed, that I had to go up and lie down, which I did. In the afternoon I felt better. I went out to get a haircut at the Essex House barber shop. And there in the next chair sat Rodzinski. He glowered at me and said, 'I thought you were sick!' I said, 'I was, and I feel better now.' That was it. We sat in silence having our hair cut for half an hour.

"Promptly the next morning, at 9:30, before his rehearsal, he went to the office of Arthur Judson, the manager of the New York Philharmonic, and said, 'Now! Now I have him! There's your famous Bernstein! Caught in the act. He said he was sick, and there he was in the barber shop.' Somebody also had seen me walking my dog. It was true; I had taken my dog out. Judson called me up. 'What's all this about you and Rodzinski and the barber shop? What's going on?' I said, 'I have no idea. I was feeling ill during the morning rehearsal. I left to go upstairs to lie down. By afternoon I felt better, took my dog out for a walk, brought him back, and went and got a haircut. What have I done?'

(Continued on page 231)

Leonard Bernstein

(Continued from page 229)

"Judson said, 'I don't know, but whatever it is, we can't have this at the Philharmonic. There's an atmosphere of murder! You've got to go backstage before this morning's rehearsal and apologize to him, because he's on the warpath.' I said, 'Apologize for what?' He said, 'I don't know, but whatever it is, just apologize! Make things well again.'

"I went backstage to Rodzinski's dressing room—and before I could say, 'Good morn. . . .'—I didn't get 'good morning' out—he grabbed me by the throat and pinned me to the wall. He was brutally strong. He had this huge, almost humped back, like a bull, solid muscle. And he was calling me a liar, a cheat—I don't know what. I squirmed free somehow, or somebody came into the room and he had to let go, because he was killing me.

"That poor man. When I think of the suffering he must have gone through to bring him to such a point! It's heartbreaking when you think about it. But at that moment I wasn't heartbroken. I was angry and scared. I ran into Judson's office, panting, with these black and blue marks on my throat, and said, 'I've just gone in to apologize, as I was told to, and I got this curious greeting. What do I do now?' Judson said, 'I think you better stay away from him for a while. Don't go to rehearsals. I'll arrange something. I'll tell him something.'

"So I stayed away for a week or so, and I worked very hard on Fancy Free, because that was coming up in a couple of weeks. I got it finished and orchestrated it. We got it on, and it was a glorious success. There were thirty-odd minutes of screaming at the Metropolitan Opera House. I conducted it myself. It was terribly exciting.

"Sol Hurok came, and he said we must do it everywhere, on tour, San Francisco, the Hollywood Bowl, and I must conduct it. He also made me a managerial offer for life. I remember he took me to lunch at the Russian Tea Room and said, 'Look, you'll have all these concerts, but I can give you much more than that. I can give you security. How much do you need to live on a year? What do you need?' I thought at the most I needed $15,000 to live well. I was thinking in terms of living at Carnegie Hall, with no dependents, and eating at the Russian Tea Room. That was life. So he said, 'All right. I'll tell you what. I'll guarantee you $15,000 a year, come hell or high water, and you'll do all the concerts that I arrange for you, and whatever is over the $15,000, of course, I keep.'

"I never had any head for business, but something rang bells that told me that this was some form of slavery. I turned him down. He never really forgave me for that, or for not saying, 'How about making it $100,000?' Yet I am very fond of Sol Hurok and admire him greatly.

"Can you imagine the sort of year I had? Everything beginning on my birthday. Can you imagine? Following the lean and hungry years, suddenly—beginning with that day—everything that could happen happened. Everything you could dream about.

"With the première of Fancy Free, everybody at the Philharmonic realized that I couldn't possibly continue. For many reasons, but mainly because Rodzinski couldn't tolerate it. I didn't see Rodzinski for a long time after his attempt to strangle me. Judson had told me to stay away. Much later I saw him again. I went to his concerts. We said, 'Hello.' But it was just that. He didn't invite me to his house, and no mention was ever made of the incident. I saw him last in Italy where, as you know, he died of a heart attack."

Leonard Bernstein

(Continued from page 165)

men. Actually, there is no such thing as remaining alone in ecstatic glory. The audience may disappear from consciousness. But the men remain with me.

"When it's over, and you've really been away in the labyrinth, it's really an effort to come back. I once had one of my little verbal game fantasies about coming back to the here and now. I thought 'here-now' transposed is 'now-here,' and 'now-here' put together is 'nowhere,' and I found some kind of profound meaning in that, because compared to where you've been, 'now-here' is, indeed, 'nowhere.'"

I asked Lenny if his performances are ever affected by his own moods. "Not in the easy sense that when you're feeling depressed it will show. Or that that's a good time to conduct Tchaikovsky's Sixth, because it's depressed music. It's not that easy, and it's not that one-to-one. As a matter of fact, when you're in a very strong mood, a very positive mood, it may be exactly the right time to conduct Beethoven's Funeral March.

"I know that in general the stronger you feel, and the readier you feel, the more gism you have for the performance—the better it will be no matter what the music is." . . .

. . . "I've written only two works in the last ten years," he said. "Since I took over the Philharmonic at the point when I finished West Side Story, I've done just those two, neither of them for the theatre: Kaddish and Chichester Psalms. Both Biblical in a way. Something seems to keep making me go back to that book. And there was Jeremiah.

"Of course, it all ties back to Daddy. That whole tremendous influence. It's pure ambivalence. I think the two poles of the ambivalence are not just poles, but are interdependent and mutually influential, if you know what I mean. I'm sure that if you investigate it, it becomes a tangled neurotic knot.

"For example, I must feel a certain guilt about my father, about having resented him, feared him so when I was a child. Because he opposed my music, because he didn't seem to understand me.

"It doesn't mean I had a compensating, equivalent dependence or an elaborate, exaggerated love for my mother. I was very fond of her. But it isn't that I threw myself completely on my mother's side and rejected my father, although she did have much greater sympathy for the music, for the whole artistic idea.

"And yet my father impressed me enormously. I admired him. I learned so much from him. His knowledge was enormous—extremely limited and circumscribed by Talmudic studies, yet within that limited area his knowledge was enormous. His intelligence was equally enormous. The breadth of his reasoning—which is a Talmudic quality—made him in every sense a man of God. He is a deeply religious man. Highly moral."

Bernstein paused. I wondered aloud whether this ambivalent feeling toward his father still showed itself in any way. "In some minor ways, yes," he answered. "To this day I have not been able to rid myself of certain little patterns whose origins I clearly see. For example, I never play golf. I don't want to hear about pinochle. Canasta, poker, bridge, anything you want, but I don't want to know about pinochle because that was his game. Really, to reach my age and still carry those ridiculous taboos around! It's stupid. I mean, man's power to change being his divine element—his divine faculty—why can't I have changed enough to have thrown off these prejudices against such innocent things as golf and pinochle?

"As time went on, he mellowed very much and I understood him much better. We became very good friends—which we are now. I came to love him and understand his terrible faults and foibles and weaknesses—and the pain and the suffering he went through in his life."

(Continued on page 226)

Leonard Bernstein

(Continued from page 222)

Lenny told me that from the very first his father had pinned his hopes on one of two things for him. Either to go into his business or become a rabbi. The idea of Lenny becoming a musician was both distasteful and depressing to him. It had to do with his own somewhat limited points of reference. In his day, to be a musician meant somebody sitting in the lobby of a hotel, playing in a trio. In eastern Europe a musician was a klesmer, a sort of wandering minstrel little better than a beggar, who would go from town to town looking for weddings and feasts, and be thrown a crust, or be invited to sit down and have something to eat for his labours. A klesmer! His son was going to be a klesmer! Never! . . .

"My mother insists that I was always very musical, that even as a child, before I could speak, I was drumming out rhythms on the windowsill—that when I heard a piano, I'd go mad. Or the radio. Those were the very early days of radio. I can remember radio at the age of eight, or so: a huge Atwater-Kent with a big horn and three dials, which took hours to tune in a station. . . . I know that the family was not musical. We never had music in the house. We had no piano. We had a phonograph, but it played only 'Barney Google.'

"I never knew there was a world of music, a world of concerts, or opera. I never was taken to any. I had no notion that anything like this existed. I remember hearing, oh, Rossini overtures and such things on the radio and going mad with excitement. But still, nothing happened.

"And then one day, my Aunt Clara—my father's younger sister, and a remarkable woman—decided to move back to New York and she didn't know what to do with some of her heavier articles of furniture. So she dropped off in our house . . . an upright. An old-fashioned, heavy, carved, upright piano with a middle pedal which, when depressed, caused it to sound like a mandolin. Do you remember those mandolin pedals on the old pianos? Well, this thing was moved into our house and stationed in the hallway because there was no other place to put it. And I touched it. And that was that. . . .

"I was safe at the piano, for some reason. Even before I knew how to play it, I was improvising not only music but a system of music. I made my own system of harmony. Nobody ever taught me harmony till I was in college. I didn't know that you could study harmony. I found that there were chords that existed in a certain relation to one another—and I gave them names. I had 'finishing chords' and 'governing chords.' It's very funny that I came to the name 'governing' because dominant means governing. Subdominants became 'sort-of-governing chords,' some kind of variation like that. I found out later that my own terms matched almost exactly in spirit the official names for the chords. Then I had terms for modulating and keys; I don't know what they were anymore. But it was a rather complete system, as I discovered when I came to study harmony at Harvard. . . ."

Here Lenny paused. "I know it would have pleased my father deeply if I had become a rabbi," he said. "And there is a certain amount of rabbi in me which I get from him, of course. He is the son of a rabbi, and he is very rabbinical in nature himself. If you say to him, 'Pass the salt,' he's already teaching you something: 'You know, Moses said about salt . . .' or whatever. I must say, I've inherited some of that.

"I do tend to be lecture-y, and I love to teach. I also, I'm sure, bore people to death by giving lectures when all they want is a simple answer. I know this is true of my children. I do it constantly. It's part of my rabbinical streak. . . .

"I loved other things. I loved other studies. I was particularly taken with English literature and poetry. And languages. But music was a whole other thing. It wasn't a study, you see. It was a way of life. . . .

(Continued on page 228)

Leonard Bernstein

(Continued from page 226)

"I wrote a piano concerto when I was thirteen. I found a page of it the other day. It looks like Liszt, Wagner, Grieg, Rachmaninoff. A caricature of those composers—but very passionate." . . .

"Of course," Bernstein said, "if anybody said to my father now that he had ever stood in the way of my music, he wouldn't deny it, but he has ways of rationalizing. He had a marvellous line that was quoted in some interview: 'Well, how was I supposed to know that he was Leonard Bernstein!' He said that! It's very witty, actually." . . .

[The following is an excerpt from a transcript of a taped conversation between Mr. Bernstein and the author.]

JOHN GRUEN: Let's turn to the style of your work. Are you still, in effect, in search of a style? Are you dissatisfied with the style in which you now compose?

LEONARD BERNSTEIN: That's a practical point to bring up. Having been wrapped up so much of the last ten years in the New York Philharmonic, which means almost constant conducting, the intervals of time available to me have never been enough to get going again as a composer.

As a result of these long gaps between composing periods—and even longer gaps between one piece and the next—it has been very difficult for me to evolve what you call a style, a language I'm always speaking, always enlarging, enriching, changing by simply speaking in it all the time, which is the way languages remain living. When people criticize my music as being eclectic, they are right. It is.

It always has been eclectic and probably always will be. For this reason. Also for other reasons. But I think no music has ever been written that wasn't eclectic, that hasn't been dependent on music which preceded it. This is as true of Mozart and Brahms as it is of Monteverdi and Stravinsky. But whatever influences you detect—whatever combinations of other styles one can find, say, in a Beethoven piano sonata—there is with it that incredible individual voice which is always recognizable, always there. If I have that to any degree at all at this point, it's a miracle.

I hope, certainly, to have it more as I go on composing. But this will happen when composing is a more continuous and consistent activity. You see, it is two years since I wrote my last note, the Chichester Psalms. Since June, 1965, I have not been able to begin to form a composition. You now find me . . . in the position of starting all over again from where I was then! It's very difficult.

I mean the muscles that were all exercised then and ready for use have now gone slack. I don't know where to begin. I pick up a pencil and think, "Now what do you do when you write a piece? What do you do first?" It's as though I had never done it before. I have to begin again. Each piece I've written has been like that. There were two years between Kaddish and the Psalms. There were six years between West Side Story and Kaddish. Absolutely nothing in between!

Six years! I'm told that I have a personal voice in my music. Thank God for that. If I believed that there wasn't a voice, I don't think I would ever write music. But it's very difficult to pick up the pieces. This, of course, militates against having a very strong, individual style. So, naturally, my music will always be eclectic to a certain degree. I don't care, if that small voice is still there.

J. G.: Do you think you might ever embark on writing atonal music?

L. B.: No. That's not in my cards. I've fooled around with it. I tried during my sabbatical year, and I reported on it. I spent about two months experimenting with various kinds of nontypical styles. But I threw it all away and wrote the Chichester Psalms, which is about the most tonal and baby-simple piece I've ever written. No. I still think the hardest thing for a composer to do in our time is to write a tonal melodic line that doesn't sound stale. That is why I'm very proud of those Psalms.

They contain utterly diatonic phrases which, at least to me, sound fresh and moving. That is a great accomplishment for me. I don't have to go and meddle in electronic or serial music in order to satisfy my longing for advancement and originality. I don't think that is the way I can advance music.

Leonard Bernstein said: "Then came the terrible day—in March, 1943. Oh, I forgot to say that shortly after my Pittsburgh success, I received a telegram from Koussevitzky [Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra] saying, 'I've heard about the success of Jeremiah in Pittsburgh. Would you come and conduct it in Boston?' I asked permission to have that week in Boston, and Rodzinski [Conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and Bernstein was his assistant] said, 'Oh, of course! I can't keep you from the Boston Symphony.' But, again, with a lot of 'Don't think of me' thrown in. I went to Boston. It was again a big smash. It was so exciting because it was my father's city, and my city, and it meant a great deal to me.

"While I was there, I had a telegram from Rodzinski, whom I'd last seen in high dudgeon, saying, 'Congratulations on your great success in Boston. Will you conduct a whole program with the Philharmonic? Any works of your choice, but including Jeremiah.' Well, I can't tell you what a surprise this was. Playing my own piece with the orchestra I was closest to. I was finally going to do a full program of my own devising, fully rehearsed, including my own symphony!

"I came back to New York in a state of excitement and flung myself into Rodzinski's arms and said, 'Aren't you wonderful and generous!' and words like that. Well, everything was warmth and light for about a day or two, and then it started again. Anything would start him off. Seeing my picture in the paper. A chance remark. People, thinking he would feel good, would congratulate him on his assistant. Of course, it was the last thing he wanted to hear. He couldn't stand my name anymore.

"The concert came about. I remember playing the Italian Symphony by Mendelssohn, Aaron Copland's El Salón México, my symphony—and I can't remember what else. The three performances were very exciting. Standing ovations, stuff like that. But a terrible review by Virgil Thomson of my symphony. He said, 'As brilliant as he is as an executor, so dreadful is he as a composer'—something like that. He called it imitative, derivative nonsense, things like that. He hated it.

"I remember he wrote, 'He writes his brasses high!' and conceded that the orchestration was thrilling. Anyhow, the concert went marvellously and Rodzinski went into the dumps.

"One day I fell sick at a morning rehearsal. I had a stomachache, or something. I told the personnel manager that I was ill and that I would be upstairs in my room if I was needed, that I had to go up and lie down, which I did. In the afternoon I felt better. I went out to get a haircut at the Essex House barber shop. And there in the next chair sat Rodzinski. He glowered at me and said, 'I thought you were sick!' I said, 'I was, and I feel better now.' That was it. We sat in silence having our hair cut for half an hour.

"Promptly the next morning, at 9:30, before his rehearsal, he went to the office of Arthur Judson, the manager of the New York Philharmonic, and said, 'Now! Now I have him! There's your famous Bernstein! Caught in the act. He said he was sick, and there he was in the barber shop.' Somebody also had seen me walking my dog. It was true; I had taken my dog out. Judson called me up. 'What's all this about you and Rodzinski and the barber shop? What's going on?' I said, 'I have no idea. I was feeling ill during the morning rehearsal. I left to go upstairs to lie down. By afternoon I felt better, took my dog out for a walk, brought him back, and went and got a haircut. What have I done?'

(Continued on page 231)

Leonard Bernstein

(Continued from page 229)

"Judson said, 'I don't know, but whatever it is, we can't have this at the Philharmonic. There's an atmosphere of murder! You've got to go backstage before this morning's rehearsal and apologize to him, because he's on the warpath.' I said, 'Apologize for what?' He said, 'I don't know, but whatever it is, just apologize! Make things well again.'

"I went backstage to Rodzinski's dressing room—and before I could say, 'Good morn. . . .'—I didn't get 'good morning' out—he grabbed me by the throat and pinned me to the wall. He was brutally strong. He had this huge, almost humped back, like a bull, solid muscle. And he was calling me a liar, a cheat—I don't know what. I squirmed free somehow, or somebody came into the room and he had to let go, because he was killing me.

"That poor man. When I think of the suffering he must have gone through to bring him to such a point! It's heartbreaking when you think about it. But at that moment I wasn't heartbroken. I was angry and scared. I ran into Judson's office, panting, with these black and blue marks on my throat, and said, 'I've just gone in to apologize, as I was told to, and I got this curious greeting. What do I do now?' Judson said, 'I think you better stay away from him for a while. Don't go to rehearsals. I'll arrange something. I'll tell him something.'

"So I stayed away for a week or so, and I worked very hard on Fancy Free, because that was coming up in a couple of weeks. I got it finished and orchestrated it. We got it on, and it was a glorious success. There were thirty-odd minutes of screaming at the Metropolitan Opera House. I conducted it myself. It was terribly exciting.

"Sol Hurok came, and he said we must do it everywhere, on tour, San Francisco, the Hollywood Bowl, and I must conduct it. He also made me a managerial offer for life. I remember he took me to lunch at the Russian Tea Room and said, 'Look, you'll have all these concerts, but I can give you much more than that. I can give you security. How much do you need to live on a year? What do you need?' I thought at the most I needed $15,000 to live well. I was thinking in terms of living at Carnegie Hall, with no dependents, and eating at the Russian Tea Room. That was life. So he said, 'All right. I'll tell you what. I'll guarantee you $15,000 a year, come hell or high water, and you'll do all the concerts that I arrange for you, and whatever is over the $15,000, of course, I keep.'

"I never had any head for business, but something rang bells that told me that this was some form of slavery. I turned him down. He never really forgave me for that, or for not saying, 'How about making it $100,000?' Yet I am very fond of Sol Hurok and admire him greatly.

"Can you imagine the sort of year I had? Everything beginning on my birthday. Can you imagine? Following the lean and hungry years, suddenly—beginning with that day—everything that could happen happened. Everything you could dream about.

"With the première of Fancy Free, everybody at the Philharmonic realized that I couldn't possibly continue. For many reasons, but mainly because Rodzinski couldn't tolerate it. I didn't see Rodzinski for a long time after his attempt to strangle me. Judson had told me to stay away. Much later I saw him again. I went to his concerts. We said, 'Hello.' But it was just that. He didn't invite me to his house, and no mention was ever made of the incident. I saw him last in Italy where, as you know, he died of a heart attack."

164

GUNTHER SCHULLER SOUNDS OFF

N.E. Conservatory chief's savage breast is unsoothed by the state of music

By Ralph Locke

Music lovers of all kinds — jazz people, post-Webern people, radical theater people, electronically synthesized sound people, mixed-media people — all you who were oppressed: Rejoice! You have a spokesman and a representative in the formerly tradition-bound halls of the New England Conservatory.

Just a year ago Gunther Schuller was inaugurated president of that august institution, and he's giving it the most thorough and healthy shakeup since it was founded by Eben Tourjee in 1867. Not that the Conservatory has any reason to be ashamed of its first hundred years. It has amassed a list of alumni of which any music school could be proud, and, at the same time, it has done yeoman service for the musical life of the greater Boston area.

What Gunther Schuller is bringing to the Conservatory is not a desire to break with the worthwhile aims of the last century but a rejuvenation of the innovative zeal which was the legacy of the school's founder.

The life of Gunther Schuller is an incredible story of how the musical Establishment can (or at least could) be brought to its knees by a boy who is driven by a desire to make music and to make it as he hears it. At the age of 12, he began to participate actively in music, joining the St. Thomas Choir School as a boy soprano and also taking up the study of composition, flute, and later the French horn.

He started composing at the age of 14 and developed so rapidly in his study of the French horn that in 1942, at the incredibly young age of 16 he accepted a professional position with the Ballet Theatre Orchestra. At 17 he became a solo French horn with the Cincinnati Symphony and the following year performed his own Horn Concerto with the orcestra directed by Sir Eugene Goossens. By the time he was 19, he had accepted a position in the Metopolitan Opera Orchestra, a post which he held until he resigned in 1959 (by that time he was solo horn) to devote more time to creative work.

His work as a composer has received growing recognition from musicians and musical organizations throughout the world, including notable commissions from the Chicago, Minneapolis (Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee), and New York Philharmonic (Spectra, Triplum) Symphony Orchestras, from the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge (Music for Brass Quintet) and Fromm Music (String Quartet) Foundations, from the American Guild of Organists (The Sacred Cantata — Psalm XCVIII), and — most notably — from the Hamburg State Opera Company for his brilliant opera The Visitation (after Kafka's The Trial.)

Schuller's long association with John Lewis and the Modern Jazz Quartet has led him to compose many works for them as well as for such musicians as Ornette Coleman and the late Eric Dolphy. An absorbing example of Schuller's compositions in the "third stream" idiom (combining techniques of contemporary serious music and avant-garde jazz) idiom is his "Conversations", performed by the Modern Jazz Quartet and the Beaux Arts String Quartet in an album on Atlantic Records entitled Third Stream Music.

His analytical study Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development was released this past April by Oxford University Press, the house which also published his book on Horn Technique in 1962. Frank Conroy of the New York Times called it "the definitive work" and added, "A remarkable book by any standard, it is unparalleled in the literature of jazz."

He has brought his conducting talent, especially for contemporary music, to the world's major orchestras — including Cleveland, Chicago, New York, the San Francisco Opera, the BBC, the Berlin Philharmonic, and the French Radio (O.R.T.F.), plus a brilliant performance of Ives' Fourth Symphony last year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Schuller's success in so many areas of music has not prevented him from seeing how much the system has to be charged. On the contrary, the very fact that he educated himself outside of any educational institution has helped him to understand what kind of training is really necessary for a musician. In his speech at the Centennial Dinner, he addressed himself to this point:

"Forgive me for becoming autobiographical for a moment, but I do it only to make a point. I stand before you as one of the original dropouts. I do not have any degrees, and I do not have even a high school diploma. Now I'm not advocating this necessarily as a road to higher education, and I am aware of the fact that times have changed tremendously in the twenty-four years since I left high school. But I have the feeling I would not have been a very good music student in, for example, the rigid programs which allow for almost no electives, which some of our schools demand. What I am trying to say is that we must develop a new flexibility in our music education, in our programs, in our curriculi, to make room for the tremendous range in student and faculty types. We seem to be in the process of doing the opposite."

This appreciation of the urgency of today's problems in music and music education is present in Schuller's discussions of matters that would not be of concern to the usual administrator in the field of music education. But that is precisely why his ideas are proving such a vital, creative force at the Conservatory — because he is very unusual and certainly special. His all-encompassing love and concern for music in all its manifestations is evident in the following interview with this writer for Boston After Dark. His enthusiasm is boundless, his mind seemingly all-encompassing. An articulate spokesman for the Conservatory, for the contemporary composer, and for the perfoming musician, he also speaks very well hor himself.

Mr. Schuller, the state of music criticism in the daily newspapers seems worse than lamentable to many of us. As a composer and performer and as the president of a school which trains composers and performers, how sympathetic do you find the newspaper reviewers?

"As a principle, I rarely read reviews. Oh, I used to, but I soon realized that even favorable reviews are frequently stupid. If they like the work or the performance, it's usually for the wrong reasons. And most witers do not feel a responsibility for backing up their opinions.

"I think we must stop this madness!" —Gunther Schuller, on the excessive degree-consciousness in music education today. From his Centennial Address, Feb. 16, 1967.

"You know, there's a training program for music critics at U.S.C. The Boston Globe has been taking apprentices from that program — last year it was David Noble, this year it's Harry Neville — but it's rare to find someone who has the two necessary talents: a profound knowledge of music and a real flair for writing. And the fact that these qualities are rarely combined just means that there are also few qualified people to teach criticism.

"The fly in the ointment is that when a really competent, serious, and perceptive critic comes along, the newspapers turn him down for someone who can write with more journalistic glitter but is often less responsible. Look at Ben Boretz, the music critic in the Nation. The New York Times would never hire a man like that. No, they'd rather have a glib journalist like Harold Schonberg. The papers don't see that the sense of responsibility they profess to feel toward the news should extend to music criticism."

Mr. Schuller, your concern of intelligent criticism — for getting the message of contemporary music across to the public — seems to assume a communicative function for music in general. Would you agree with Tolstoi's famous definition of art as communication?

"Most definitely. I think that that is one of the responsibilities of today's composers — to keep the lines of communication open between us (composer and audience.) We are, after all, specialists in this field, and as such we should be welcoming the concern of an interested audience.

"I don't mean that we should aim for a mass public where 165 million people are all listening to Boulez or Babbitt. Our new lecture series on contemporary music is an example of how the Conservatory is trying to strengthen the lines of communication between the composers and a lay audience. Now some composers would just fluff such a series off But I find that most people are not narrow-minded and uninterested, . . . I mean the average reasonably intelligent, lively person who wants to stay in contact with the good things in life. If they're given half a chance, if a composed will meet them half way, they want to learn. If I've experienced it once, I've experienced it a thousand times.

"There are very few people with a real Wallace mind, whose minds are entirely closed — viciously closd — to new music. So we must keep trying to find opportunities to keep up communication. I always tell young composers (There are sixteen on the Conservatory faculty, a much-needed expansion, which was one of Schuller's first moves) that if they are not going to try to explain what they are doing when people who are genuinely interested want to know, then who the hell will? Either nobody, or Harold Schonberg in a negative way."

Why is there suddenly such an urgent need for explanation in contemporary music? Is the present situation of composition so unique historically?

"There is something unusual and probably unprecedented about the present situation. There have been two important breaks with traditional music in the last 50 years, and these precipitous advances are too much for the ordinary layman to absorb so fast. Somebody has to do some basic explaining.

"What is so reassuring is how positively people react and how much they understand when you put a little effort to reach them. But many composers don't even bother to take a layman's question seriously. After all, it shouldn't be an affront to the composer's ego if someone asks him. "What are you doing?" It's the same as if I asked a friend of mine who is, let's say, a geologist to explain what he's doing. I'm not ashamed to admit I am not expert in the field of geology ,and I would not expect a geologist to be affronted by my ignorance or inquiry."

And what is the function of a large performing organization like the Boston Symphony Orchestra in keeping open the lines of communication?

(Continued on page 8)

Gunther Schuller muses on music . . .

(Continued from page 6)

"The Symphony Orchestra has a very important responsibility in keeping programs challenging enough so that the audience's critical faculty and ability to listen will be kept alive — particularly if they are concerned about bringing in and keeping younger audiences.

"When we go to Symphony concerts, my teenage children always say, 'Daddy, I hope they play something modern today.' But exposure is necessary to keep this curiosity and interest going. The Boston Symphony, like most major Symphonies in the U.S., just does not give its audiences enough contact with contemporary music."

Isn't there anything you can do to help correct the situation, now that you're head of the Conservatory?

"Unfortunately, there is very little I can do in a direct way. Maybe a kind of neighborly influence. (The Conservatory building is just across the street from Symphony Hall.) Like our lecture series and our own concert programming, including the Artist Series. I mean we can try to set a good example, I suppose.

"But I realize that they have financial obligations and responsibilities and a certain "image" which they alone can solve and determine. There are people inside the organization who realize that the orchestra cannot afford, in the long run, to be just a museum for accepted masterworks. If an art museum has a few Picassos, at least they hang there all year. They can be viewed again and again. But a piece of music does not exist until it is performed. If the conductor an orchestra appoints is not prepared to lead the orchestra in contemporary works, then maybe it is failing in its obligation to its audience, its community, and to the art."

But if the orchestra is always in such tight financial straits, can they afford to take the chance that people will cancel their subscriptions?

"I doubt that many people canceled their subscriptions during the many years when (Serge) Koussevitsky (B.S.O. conductor from 1924 to his death in 1951) introduced so many new works. He in effect trained an audience. There are some conductors today who are still able and — of crucial importance — willing to do this. The audience in Boston however, has been allowed to slip into complacency in recent years. A change has got to come soon or else the Symphony orchestra as an institution will die."

Then it might be said that the B.S.O. and other orchestras following the same policies cannot afford not to submit to some fairly radical changes. Do you foresee that the same kind of change will be needed in the attitude toward music at American universities and in educational institutions like the New England Conservatory?

"They are largely already leading the way. Of course, universities and conservatories still have very different functions. The mastery of performance techniques is still the primary reason for a conservatory's existence.

"Musicology, on the other hand, is clearly a scholarly activity appropriate to universities. Composition, on the other hand, fits equally well into both. Princeton and Harvard, for example, both have excellent composition departments, but they are necessarily different from the conservatories in their approach to composition, because they are not centered around a constant atmosphere of performance. This makes university composition departments very special — just special, not necessarily better or worse.

"At Harvard there is a perhaps purposeful separation of the performing organizations from the department. Of course, this may be once again the choice of the upper echelons, not of the department. I would say that there is a profound effect on composition and other aspects of music study at universities when these subjects are removed from the performance realities. Fortunately, there are some university music departments which combine the best of both worlds, the conservatory and the university. This is what we should aim for."

This, then, is the president of the New England Conservatory — vibrant, dynamic, and passionately concerned with understanding the complex interrelationship of music, the individual, and the society. He is an inspiring teacher precisely because he is such an eager student and observer.

He is presenting challenge upon challenge to the faculty and students. Not only has he hired new teachers, but he has turned the curriculum inside out in his search for the kind of courses which will be both flexible enough to accommodate the strengths and interests of the individual students and to make them relevant to their careers as musicians and their lives as active members of a growing, changing society.

He has initiated the Artist Series — in which superb performers not only give concerts but speak to the students the following morning — and took the wonderful "Music from Marlboro" people away from the B.U. Celebrity Series. The concerts by the Conservatory's own students and faculty (notably the Symphony Orchestra under Frederick Prausnitz) are better and more varied than ever, and they are still free. Unfortunately, public response to all the concerts sponsored by the Conservatory is still woefully slight — especially regretful in view of the concerts' high musical quality.

The plea with which Schuller closed his Centennial Address is especially appropriate here, and — for the sake of the future of music — we should take it to heart in a sense perhaps even more inclusive than Schuller himself intended it.

"I realize very well that it is one thing to design an abstract blueprint such as the one I have just offered. It is quite another thing to infuse this abstract with life, to make it a consistently productive force. There is only one way in which that life can be instilled in such a blueprint: and the key to that is quality — quality of faculty, quality of student. And here there is no room for compromise. Idealism does not thrive on compromise, nor does quality. And to the extent that it is possible for me to achieve this quality in a humane way, I will pursue that goal.

"But I am not so foolish as to think that I can do this alone. I will need help, your help — you who are devoted to the concept of the conservatory, the venerable tradition it represents, and who are particularly devoted to this conservatory at 290 Huntington Avenue. I ask your help and support, be it spiritual, financial, ideational, or moral. I welcome it all, and I trust that we will someday all be proud of the results of this joint effort."

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
Weekly
DEC 18 1968

165

SR: RECORDINGS

45 Ozawa in Transit by Robert C. Marsh

48 The Year of No Show

49 Tape Today by Ivan Berger

49 Reel-to-Reel, Cartridge, or Cassette?

50 The Cassette and Its Content

51 The Tape Equipment Market

56 Recordings in Review by Irving Kolodin

58 Recordings Reports I: Orchestral LPs

59 The Ultimate Pop Experience by Ellen Sander

60 Recordings Reports II: Miscellaneous LPs

61 The "Great Recordings" Revisited by Roland Gelatt

64 Letters to the Recordings Editor

Seiji Ozawa—"His right to lead has been made clear to the most critical of juries . . ."

OZAWA IN TRANSIT

by ROBERT C. MARSH

Seiji Ozawa sat on the terrace of the country club, idly spinning an ice cube in a half-glass of Campari and soda and watching the shadows lengthen on the elegantly kept greens of the golf course he didn't have time to use. "Six days," he said. "Six days I have stayed here, and not once has there been time to play golf. Last year I was lucky. I managed one game. But this year is bad. Never a day off."

Summer 1969 at the Ravinia Festival, where he returned with the ad hoc title of principal guest conductor (after resigning as music director in 1968), meant a hectic fortnight of six different programs with the Chicago Symphony and three all-day recording sessions for EMI. Moreover, within forty-eight hours of the close of his Ravinia chores, Ozawa was to be in Salzburg to begin piano rehearsals for a new production of Così fan tutte that would be his debut conducting opera in a theater. He might get some rest on the plane, he thought, but it would be a little late to play golf.

Ozawa, who passed his thirty-fourth birthday September 1, has securely grasped a role that thousands of musicians hope vainly to achieve. He is a conductor of international stature.

The 1969-70 season finds Ozawa in transit. "I wanted a year when I could get some rest," he observed ruefully, his eyes still wandering to the first tee. He thought of a few carefully selected engagements to provide a graceful transition from the Toronto Symphony, which he led from 1965-69, to the San Francisco Symphony, where he will become music director in the autumn of 1970.

"My plans did not go so well," he observes. "One thing is good. I will have to do no planning, no administration," both tasks he finds disagreeable necessities. "But there is much travel, much work."

Following Salzburg he began a period with the New York Philharmonic when, on August 30, he took over the orchestra from Karel Ancerl at the Meadow Brook Festival to direct the remaining seventeen concerts of its recent transcontinental tour and to direct its opening concert on September 23 in Philharmonic Hall. Then there are dates in Cleveland, Boston, and Paris before he returns to Japan in December for two months, at least five weeks of which are (momentarily) a holiday. A trans-pacific move follows to San Francisco, which he already considers home, where he will lead six weeks of Josef Krips's final season.

"I have bought a house in San Francisco," he adds. "I have been very lucky about houses. In Toronto, I lived right in the center of the city, surrounded by trees and green things. It was very nice. But the San Francisco house is so beautiful, by Twin Peaks, nearly to the top, not all the way to the summits but almost, with the Golden Gate Bridge here and the Bay Bridge there. . . . Ah!" One might guess he was seeing it in his mind's eye, perhaps sadly, as it would be weeks before he could return there, even for a moment.

The vision passed. Ozawa went on. "It is a simple house, unpretentious. After all, Vera, myself, we are only two people. We don't need a fancy house. But now everything has been sent there. I have a real base."

Although Ozawa would like to retain some sort of affiliation with the Chicago Symphony ("It is so great an orchestra, so wonderful to work with musicans like this"), his place at Ravinia has been filled (by István Kertész), and his new obligations as joint artistic director of Tanglewood (with Gunther Schuller) beginning in 1970 limit his potential activity at another summer music center. Like it or not, he has passed a milestone, leaving behind one phase of his career as he enters another.

His "great sentiment" for Ravinia is undoubtedly real. It was, after all, Ravinia that in 1964 first gave Ozawa the title of music director, and it was in his Ravinia years that he added a great deal of music to his repertory. Indeed, he entered the life of the orchestra at a time when it was beginning to feel disenchantment with its winter boss, Jean Martinon, and was all the more willing to respond to its summer conductor with vitality and enthusiasm. There were quite a few occasions, during the mid-Sixties, when Ozawa got consistently better results on short rehearsal than Martinon managed with more extensive preparation.

There was a time, about 1965, when Ozawa could play golf frequently and wind up a weekend evening in Chicago's Old Town, listening (as he still loves to do) to folk, jazz, or rock, or indulging his passion for Italian food. Driving in from Ravinia, he was a youth in a white Mustang convertible, the focal point of a group of laughing friends. Even though he and the band might exchange salutes as he entered a favorite jazz emporium, he was self-effacing, modest, relaxed, the anti-celebrity, the antithesis of the maestro stereotype. Yet one might recall that earlier in the day he had been conducting Xenakis on a rehearsal schedule that would make a senior colleague blanch.

Kinshi Tsuruta, biwa, and Katsuya Yokoyama, shakuhachi; with Ozawa conducting—"It was crazy, . . . I understood nothing."

Ozawa still drives the white Mustang, but it rarely goes to Old Town anymore. Now a slightly road-worn vehicle with the cosmopolitan emblems of Ontario plates and a large Japanese umbrella stowed between the seats (the latter a sun-dodger for Ozawa's radiant bride, Vera), the car is a shuttle bus from job to job. Ozawa's hairstyle changes regularly, but he still dresses in loose shirts, wash pants, and espadrilles. Making his rounds from rehearsals, recordings, and concerts, he totes a slightly dressed-up duffel bag in which a leather baton case, scores, and quantities of clothing—wet and dry—are stuffed with a nice disregard for the conventions of packing. The duffel bag is a step toward elegance. Many recall when its predecessor was a paper shopping bag from Woolworth's.

What is it that has made this slight young man from Hoten an international celebrity at an age when many of the greatest conductors of the past were fortunate to have achieved recognition in a single country?

Among the ready answers are: improved communications, modern press-agentry, a world-wide shortage of fine conductors. But these factors apply equally to many young musicians whose reputations are not equal to Ozawa's. Why is it Seiji Ozawa who succeeds?

Watch him at work and the reasons become clear. He is an extraordinary musician and, equally to the point, he is one of the few conductors of his generation to have served an apprenticeship comparable to that which gave the world Toscanini, Walter, and Szell.

Anticipating the Salzburg Così, Ozawa remarked how pleasant it would be to rehearse an opera cast from the piano, "knowing that this time I get to conduct the performance, too!" As a teen-ager in Japan he worked regularly with three opera companies, teaching singers their roles. "Then when they were secure, and everything was going very nice, the conductor would take over and the performance belonged to him."

The fact of Ozawa's musical talent was established in childhood, but his parents tried to interest him in traditional Japanese instruments. It didn't work. His clear inclination was for the piano. Although dedicated to the cause of Japanese music, he can find it as perplexing in some respects as any Westerner can. Thus, when Takemitsu's November Steps first came to him in score, he found the writing for the biwa and the shakuhachi soloists quite incomprehensible. "It was crazy," he recalls. "I understood nothing, so when I went back to Japan I went to the places where these instruments are played, I studied them carefully, and then I saw what was meant."

In 1951, when Ozawa entered the Toho School of Music in Tokyo, the Western tradition in Japanese music was a mixture of older Central European models and the influence of the American occupation. Ozawa's Americanization, at least in its superficial aspects, came easily. A ten-year-old when the war ended, the Japan Ozawa knows as an adult was shaped by the MacArthur regime, and (like many Japanese) he has high regard for the memory of the general, although he is also sympathetic to the need for continuing changes in Japanese society. In 1959 (at twenty-four) he was recognized as the outstanding young Japanese musician of the year, a composer-pianist who had already appeared professionally as a conductor in his homeland.

Early that same year, Ozawa set off for Europe with little money, no friends or allies, and a severe language problem. By autumn he had won the International Competition of Orchestral Conductors at Besançon, France. At age twenty-five, he was directing the Boston Symphony as a Koussevitzky Scholar at Tanglewood, and the following year took him to Berlin as apprentice conductor to Herbert von Karajan. In 1961 he was back in Japan, first as assistant conductor-elect of the touring New York Philharmonic, and then as guest with Japanese orchestras. The next season was spent in New York as a Bernstein aide, but guest engagements started coming along. (One of them was with the San Francisco Symphony.) He was starting to get around the musical map in the United States, but the date that promised the most came in July 1963, when Georges Prêtre fell ill and the Chicago Symphony needed a conductor fast for the Ravinia Festival. Ozawa accepted, won the support of the orchestra in rehearsal, and conquered the audience in the concerts. It was a clearcut triumph for the twenty-seven-year-old guest.

A few weeks later, when Walter Hendl resigned, Ozawa became the new music director. To the suburban dilettantes who ran the festival, he was talented, attractive ("cute" if you wanted to use the term), and very promotable. Moreover, there was some misapprehension that he would permit the senior trustees to dabble in artistic affairs. Ozawa played it cool, with the over →

Robert C. Marsh is the music critic for the Chicago Sun Times and author of Toscanini and the Art of Orchestral Performance.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443 000

SEP 27 1969

166.

Japanese skill in polite negotiation, but he had the courage to face up to the board and assert the authority of his position. After years in the doldrums, Ravinia began to be exciting in a variety of ways, but never more consistently than on Sunday afternoons when Ozawa offered a series of new and unfamiliar works to a public that had been stuffed full of symphonic staples.

What made everything possible, from Ozawa's initial success to his most imaginative innovations, was an exemplary baton technique that made the conductor's intentions explicit in his beat. Ozawa never could have succeeded as a talking conductor. The language barriers were too great. It was the clarity and precision of his leadership, his ability to make use of the universal, nonverbal qualities of music, and to translate a performance into sung phrases and movement, that won the day and saved him, even when rehearsal time was short and he was obliged to take risks.

For example, one August afternoon in 1968, with some twenty minutes rehearsal time remaining, he turned to the orchestra and observed calmly that "we still have some things to do." The things were the Beethoven Fifth Symphony and the Schubert Unfinished. Ozawa rehearsed the first work for twelve-and-a-half minutes and the second for seven. About thirty seconds were lost in the transition. After the evening performance (a good one), Ozawa recorded both scores and Mussorgsky's Night on Bald Mountain in a day-long frenzy of music at Orchestra Hall. The final master tape contains a finished performance by a great orchestra.

No one chooses to do it this way, but, with the Chicago Symphony, it need not be too dangerous. The men were completely familiar with the music, and there are advantages in not boring them with needless preparation. Put on their mettle, they will pay closer attention and feel a need to respond to the challenge, especially with a leader they respect as they do Ozawa. There are really two problems. First, the conductor must not make a mistake, for the players are going to be following him closely, even into disaster; and secondly, he must make that brief rehearsal the proper musical and psychological stimulus for the evening to follow.

Ozawa began with the opening bars, of the Beethoven Fifth, explaining (and illustrating) how he was going to beat the fermatas. The orchestra got that fast. "Repeat!" he added, and the men got that too. The oboe cadenza was run through "for me," as he put it, and the passage into the coda was played. The second movement was untouched. Ozawa launched the men into the third movement with a surge of vitality, but soon began shouting cues to skip ahead. A few firm baton strokes set the character for the finale. There was a warning "here the repeat was not to be observed," and the rehearsal was over.

(Continued on page 63)

Ozawa in Transit

Continued from page 48

On this foundation Ozawa secured a performance. Six days later, when the men reported to Orchestra Hall to record the work for RCA, the performance was still there—and they were fresh, interested, and ready to participate fully in developing the potential. Hearing the first playback, Ozawa was immediately self-critical, and his words of thanks began to be intermixed with such phrases as "I was wrong," or "Here we must. . . ." The men only needed the guidance, and a new idea was generally fully realized on the first try. Now Ozawa was doing what he could not do in his brief rehearsal, departing from the familiar to implant his own distinctive thinking on the final product.

Once more, I was thinking of Walter and Szell. In a pinch, they could provide an acceptable Beethoven symphony in next to no rehearsal. But who of Ozawa's generation, other than himself, could be trusted with the assignment? Few, I think. Very few. For here technical security, depth of musicianship, and a sure sense of style are uppermost, and, when the pressure is on, these things cannot be faked. In Ozawa's case, no faking is necessary, and this is why his players respect him. He leads because his right to lead has been made clear to the most critical of juries.

No enterprise involving a stageful of musicians can be without some personality conflicts, and Ozawa knows this. Thus, while concentrating on a desired effect ("I try again, I must try. . . ."), his ear can pick a single malefactor out of the strings ("One reason it is not right is that someone takes off his mute too early . . ."). Ozawa is not listening to his internal, idealized performance, but is acutely focused on what the men before him are actually doing.

In five years of fairly regular conversations with Ozawa, I have come to the conclusion that he is an easy person with whom to work but a difficult person to know well. His relaxed approach, his seemingly impenetrable cool, his total lack of pretension or egotism all make superficial exchanges easy and pleasant. He is obviously a genuinely polite, considerate, and understanding person, quite apart from any social or cultural factor.

But behind this facade of good manners there is obviously a lot going on, and the character of that process is not always easy to judge. Indeed, the point of the good manners appears, at times, to deny you the raw materials needed for such judgment. Thus, paradoxically, this young conductor, who seems so friendly and accessible, preserves what probably must be called his spiritual privacy more successfully than many of his senior colleagues, who are aloof, self-revealing autocrats in their personal contacts. Ozawa shows no sign of wishing to be an autocrat, no desire to be a celebrity.

"Professionally," he observes, "I am a very cosmopolitan person. I play the music of many countries to audiences all over the world. But personally, I am still very Japanese. I realize this, and I have no wish to change." Again, of course, he is being polite.

Ozawa will praise a work of music, the musicians he leads, and his colleagues, but I have no recollection of his ever praising himself. (This, too, I suspect, comes under the heading of bad taste.) To speak of his Fifth (rather than Beethoven's) would be offensive to him, I am sure.

Is there, I asked facetiously, an Ozawa sound?

"No," he replied. "Only the composer's—at least for now. I may change as I grow older." Smiling, he added, "I may become more limited."

Yet the fact that he would indulge in a quip such as that is further evidence of change. You can see it as well in his rehearsal technique, which has become more direct. In the past, he tended to avoid straightforward criticism of a player's work. It was very Japanese and indirect: Was his tempo too fast, the material faulty, the beat unclear? Now, especially when on deadline, he will say it flat out—"You are too loud," "That is the wrong note," and so on—without, one must add, the slightest hard feelings from the ensemble, which has heard these phrases before from other conductors.

Perhaps a key to his success is his sense of the paradoxical. "An orchestra, after all," he says, "is a very unnatural thing. An impossible thing, almost. A musician naturally wants to play alone, or in a group where he can be heard, appreciated, and still express his individuality. This is why Così fan tutte is so marvelous—chamber music for 100 musicians. But for so much music, the musicians must submerge themselves into an orchestra to make the necessary sound and let one musician tell them how to play. Whenever it goes well, I am happy, because it is surprising that it ever works at all."

V771
U.E 70 MANILA
REFILL!
SAMUEL WARD - BOSTON

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 122

BSO
Pops

1969 - 1970

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON

Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died fifty years ago on November 14 1919. Shortly after his death The Atlantic Monthly published an appreciation by M. A. DeWolfe Howe, himself a Trustee of the Orchestra, entitled 'A great private citizen'. The following paragraphs are reprinted from that article.

Henry Lee Higginson was commonly designated 'the first citizen of Boston' — and so justly that no second citizen stepped at once into his vacant place; but, not even a native of New England, he was born in New York, November 18 1834. He was a pre-eminent son of Harvard, but studied at the University for less than a single year, the freshman year of the class of 1855. He was best known throughout the country as a patron of music and education, as the 'founder and sustainer' of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a liberal benefactor of Harvard; he was a Puritan at heart, and in his daily life a hard-working, hard-headed man of affairs, deeply immersed in intensely practical matters, a member of an important financial firm, a director of powerful corporations. For approximately forty years he held a conspicuous place in the public eye; but he never held public office. It was as a private citizen, a great private citizen, that he did his far-reaching work for his community and his country.

Major Higginson, who was in reality brevetted Lieutenant-Colonel, U.S.V., before the end of the war 'for gallant and meritorious services', and might naturally have gone through life 'Colonel Higginson', was forty-seven years old, when, in 1881, he established, out of resources acquired by his own industry and intelligence, not through inheritance, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and committed himself to maintaining it by means of resources still to be acquired on the same terms. This work lasted for thirty-seven years. It would have been an impossible task but for certain personal endowments, native and cultivated — courage, unselfishness, a capacity for public friendship, and a pervading sense of whimsical humor, that surest companion to a true sense of relative values. These gifts were not suddenly bestowed at the age of forty-seven. They grew out of his inheritances, his boyhood, and the maturing experiences of his earlier manhood.

When he was a boy at the Boston Latin School, he took his part with a fierce energy in the snowball fights on Boston Common. Henry Adams, in his Education, recalls the battles between the Latin School boys and all comers on the Common, the trick of inserting stones in snowballs, and his own depression one day at 'seeing one of his trustiest leaders, Henry Higginson — "Bully Hig", his school name — struck by a stone over the eye, and led off the field bleeding in rather a ghastly manner.'

His college career was cut short before the end of one year by a weakness of his eyes. This did not disqualify him for business, and for several years he was employed in the counting-house of S. & E. Austin, a well-known firm of Boston merchants. But 'Trade,' as he wrote from Europe to his father in 1857, 'was not satisfying to the inner man as a life-occupation.' Having gone abroad, in 1856, without definite plans, he soon found himself bent on the serious study of music. 'If I find that I am not profiting at all by my work,' he wrote to his father, 'I shall throw it up and go home. If I gain something, I shall stick to it. You will ask, "What is to come of it all if successful?" I do not know. But this is clear. I have then improved my own powers, which is every man's duty. I have a resource to which I can always turn with delight, however the world may go with me. I am so much the stronger, the wider, the wiser, the better for my duties in life. I can then go with satisfaction to my business, knowing my resource at the end of the day. It is already made, and has only to be used and it will grow. Finally, it is my province in education, and having cultivated myself in it, I am fully prepared to teach others in it. Education is the object of man, and it seems to me the duty of us all to help in it, each according to his means and in his sphere.'

These were thoughtful and prophetic words to proceed from a youth of twenty-three. A letter written to his father in the same year contains another significant bit of self-revelation: 'What is money good for, if not to spend for one's friends and to help them? You've done so all your life — let me do so too, when I can, for it is in me (I have always known it) to be a close man, a miser. I know about this.'

For about four years the young man remained in Europe, at first preparing himself, — chiefly in Vienna, — by hard study of the piano, singing, and composition, for such possibilities as a musical career might open to him, and afterwards adjusting himself to the necessity of abandoning it. This was the direct result of over-exertion. A headache that lasted for three days drove him to a barber, who let blood from his left arm to relieve his suffering. He returned to his piano practice too soon after this experience, and disabled his arm, as an eminent physician assured him, permanently. 'I came home,' he wrote, 'and swore like a pirate for a day; then, coming to my senses, I decided to sing away, study composition, etc., hard, magnetize, and await the result. . . . I've hurt myself many times by doing things which other people avoid as a matter of course.'

While reconciling himself to his disablement, and to a growing realization that his musical gifts were not such as to make him a musician of the first order, he supplemented his personal economies by giving lessons in English. Some months before returning to America in November of 1860, he wrote to his father, who must have wondered at his protracted absence from home, confessing the disappointment he had met, and adding, 'If you consider the whole thing and remember that I enjoy in the depths of my soul music as nothing else, you'll easily comprehend my stay.'

Long afterwards, when the orchestra he founded had been established in Boston for more than twenty-five years, he wrote to an old friend who had advised him wisely at its origin, a letter which confirmed the modest estimate he had made of himself as a musical student in Vienna, and at the same time revealed, in his words about Beethoven's Third Symphony, an appreciation of music, and a response to its appeal, which were a life-long justification of his early studies. Thus, in part, the letter runs:

'A few words about our talk last night. Of course I loved music, and therefore studied it — and found no talent whatsoever.

'We young folks used to consider the problems of life, and the rights and needs of men and women, and the injustices of both, also the need of refreshment and not of luxuries or even comforts. And it seemed to me that we of the young beautiful country should and could have music of the best. Hence my hopes and efforts, both for the sake of art and the sake of humanity. Do you see? But talent, or even keen perception of musical talent in others, I have little or none; nor have I ever found talent for anything, except power of work, and of recognizing friends of the best, and the enormous value of them to me. It is all second or third class, and I've been built up and lifted up to a wrong place by friends.

'As to the "Eroica", I had meant to tell you how I felt about it, but it opens the flood-gates, and I can't. The wail of grief, and then the sympathy which should comfort the sufferer. The wonderful funeral dirge, so solemn, so full, so deep, so splendid, and always with courage and comfort. The delightful march home from the grave in the scherzo — the wild Hungarian, almost gypsy in tone — and then the climax of the melody, where the gates of Heaven open, and we see the angels singing and reaching their hands to us with perfect welcome. No words are of any avail, and never does that passage of entire relief and joy come to me without tears — and I wait for it through life, and hear it, and wonder.'

The dreams of youth and the realities of old age — for Major Higginson was nearly seventy-five when he wrote this letter — have not often stood in a closer relationship.

When he returned to the United States late in 1860, realities were soon to supersede the dreams. Within six months Sumter was to fall, and the mettle of individual Americans to be tried. Henry Higginson met the test by immediate participation in the forming of the Second Massachusetts Regiment of Infantry, begun April 18 1861. A remarkable group of young men joined in this undertaking, and became officers of the regiment. The name of Robert Gould Shaw typifies the quality of them all. It was a band of chosen spirits, aflame with the ideals for which a war is most nobly fought; and it was entirely characteristic of Henry Higginson that his friendship with these men entered into the very warp and woof of his army life, and permanently influenced him. A passionate devotion to his country may fairly be counted the controlling motive of all his years. With it was inextricably interwoven a passionate devotion to friends. Indeed, he seems to have conceived virtually all the relations of life in terms of friendship. In his attitude toward his country, his city, his college, even toward the art of music, there was something intensely personal — just as there was in his dealings with individual men and women. It was in blended patriotism and friendship that he made his two chief gifts to Harvard College — the Soldiers Field for athletic games, the Harvard Union for social intercourse. He set up on Soldiers Field the names of six soldier friends, and said about them to the students of Harvard College: —

'Now, what do the lives of our friends teach us? Surely the beauty and the holiness of work and of utter, unselfish, thoughtful devotion to the right cause, to our country, and to mankind. It is well for us all, for you and for the boys of future days, to remember such deeds and such lives and to ponder on them. These men loved study and work, and loved play too. They delighted in athletic games, and would have used this field, which is now given to the College and to you, for your health and recreation. But my chief hope in regard to it is, that it will help to make you full-grown, well-developed men, able and ready to do good work of all kinds — steadfastly, devotedly, thoughtfully; and that it will remind you of the reasons for living, and of your own duties as men and citizens of the Republic.'

An older man does not wholly improvise thoughts of this kind. He brings them out of an experience like war because he takes a great deal into it. As a young officer Henry Higginson took into the war a full measure of enthusiasm and energy. He worked hard at recruiting and drilling his men before they went to the front. They recognized a fighter in him, and liked him. One day he overheard a soldier swearing in the ranks, and checked him, saying, 'If there is any swearing to be done in this company, I will attend to it.' No doubt he did, and by means of the vigor it implied stiffened the discipline for which he was responsible.

